In the Catholic States of France, Belgium, Italy, Spain and Portugal, the total of Protestants is 680,000 in an aggregate population of 90,000,000. Of these, according to an article in the London Times, France has in round numbers 630,000, of whom the greater part are Calvinists, 196,000 adhering to this confession, as against 92,000 Lutherans and 50,000 members of other denominations. Belgium reckons 15,000 Protestants, Italy 11,000. Spain, where a Protestant movement began after Isabella II's overthrow, but has encountered great opposition and persecution, has 30,000 Protestants, and Portugal only 500, almost all foreigners.

Rendall, Isaac Newton, D. D., was born in New York. He graduated at New Jersey College, in 1852. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Mohawk, October 10th, 1860; was stated supply at Oneida Valley, N. Y., 1860-61; stated supply at Emporium, Pa., 1861-5; President at Knoxville, Tenn., 1865-70; and since 1871 has been President of Lincoln University, Pa. Dr. Rendall is a gentleman of pleasing address, scholarly attainments and force of character. He has rendered very valuable service to the important Institution over which he now presides, and which continues to prosper under his judicious and efficient administration, together with the co-operation of his colleagues in the faculty.

Repentance. "Repentance unto life," is defined by our Shorter Catechism (Quest. 87) as "a saving grace, whereby a sinner, out of a true sense of his sin and apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ, doth, with grief and hatred of his sin, turn from it unto God, with full purpose of and endeavor after new obedience." It is a "grace," that is, an unspeakable and unmerited favor (2 Tim. ii, 25; Ezek. xxxvi, 26, 27). It is a "saving" grace (2 Cor. vii, 10). By faith the redeemed of the Lord become entitled to heaven, and by repentance they become prepared or qualified for its employments and enjoyments. The "true sense of sin," which is requisite in repentance, consists in such an inward feeling of our miserable and lost estate, by reason of the wrath and curse of God, and the everlasting punishment to which, for our sins, we are exposed, as puts us into great perplexity and trouble of spirit, so that our consciences, being pierced and wounded, can find no quiet and take no rest in this condition (Acts ii, 37; Josh. vii, 20; Ps. li, 4, 5; Job xl, 4; Ps. cxxx, 3). When there is a distinct "apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ," it furnishes the only pure, as well as the most powerful motive to genuine repentance (Ps. cxxx, 4; Rom. ii, 4; Matt. iii, 2). The "grief" which is an ingredient of true repentance is a real, inward and abiding sorrow for sin as offensive and dishonoring to a holy and gracious God (Job xl, 4, 5; Acts ii, 37; Ezek. vii, 16; Matt. xxvi, 75; Zech. xii, 10). The "hatred" of sin which accompanies true repentance is not only a loathing and abhorring of our sin, but of ourselves on account of it (Isa. vi, 5; Ps. cxix, 128; Job xlii, 6; Ezra ix, 6; Luke xviii, 13). We must "turn" from sin as well as grieve for it (Isa. lv, 7; Prov. xxviii, 13). The breaking off from sin must be: 1. Universal, a breaking off from all sins. 2. Sincere, it must be from the heart (Ezek. xviii, 31). 3. Perpetual (Hos. xiv, 8). There must also be a sincere "turning unto God" (Ps. cxix, 59; Acts xi, 23). The "purpose" of duty to God, into which the true penitent enters, is a purpose or resolution to return to the practice of every known duty (Ps. cxix, 106), and to spirituality in it (Phil. iii, 3). It is a "full" purpose, because it is a determined one and immediately put in execution (Ps. cxix, 60). It is connected with "endeavor," because purposes without endeavors are like blossoms without fruit (Matt. xxi, 30). The "obedience" mentioned is "new," because it proceeds from a new principle (Matt. vii, 17), is influenced by new motives, is directed by a new rule, and has a new end—the glory of God (Ezek. xxxvi, 26, 27). None that truly repent do in this life perform new obedience fully, without any failure or defect, but they diligently endeavor to do it, and wherein they fall short it is their grief and trouble (Ps. xxxviii, 17).

Revelation. Revelation is the uncovering and displaying of that which before was hidden. In a theological sense it is a disclosure by the Deity to His creatures of truths which they could not have known by the contemplation of His works or the deductions of their natural reason.

The possibility of such a revelation can hardly be denied by those who admit the existence of a God and the formation of the universe by His fiat. He who could create beings with powers of intelligence could surely act upon those powers and make such beings conscious of the communications they were receiving. And, if we are to regard God as the moral Governor of the world, there is a high probability that He would make His subjects acquainted with those salutary laws by which He intended to rule. To provide them with faculties which might be rightly or wrongly used, and yet to withhold that knowledge which would sufficiently influence them to take the right path, can hardly be thought befitting the character of a beneficent Father. There is a limit, by its natural constitution, to the powers of a finite creature. He cannot reach, unaided, to the necessary knowledge of the Infinite. It is impossible fully to argue this here. It must be sufficient to assert that just reasoning corroborates the fact that man never does, "by searching, find out God." But there is the argument from experience and history to be briefly adverted to. Left to themselves men have, confessedly, become debased. Philosophy and reason have not proved adequate guides to virtue. Heathen nations, who may be supposed to have had the light of reason, have not improved it; and those who have most diligently cultivated philosophic inquiry have ingenuously confessed that they needed some higher guide. The state of morals in countries, both ancient and modern, where revelation is not known, is proof sufficient that man by himself is unable to apprehend and to attain the chief good. The whole evidence of this cannot be produced. The fearful state of common social life—known well to classical scholars—even in such centres of civilization as Athens and Rome, must not be opened forth to general Christian gaze. All that can be said is that St. Paul's picture of it in Rom. i is far from an exaggeration of the truth. And yet men generally have had some faint, lingering gleam of a revelation made to their remote ancestors. If even with this assistance they have failed, how much more if left without any divine instruction? If, then, God is to be adequately known to His creatures, if His will is to be the rule of their rational obedience, if a standard of right and wrong is to be established, some communication from the Deity must be made, for the good order of the world.

As to the mode of such communication, or the way in which the Eternal Spirit acts upon the human spirit and brings men into a definite conscious relation to Himself, nothing need be said here. Neither is it requisite to argue the question whether, the necessity of a revelation being pre-supposed, it would be more desirable that it should be made to every individual, or committed to a few, with sufficient credentials to establish it to the satisfaction of the rest. Observations bearing on this topic will follow. We have at present rather to do with a question of fact. It is alleged that such a revelation has been made, that teachers especially commissioned by the Deity have appeared to make known His will. The matter of chiefest import is to ascertain whether these teachers have possessed the knowledge and held the commission to which they pretended; or have they been deceivers or self-deceived?

That impostors and fanatics have advanced the largest claims is sufficiently evident. There must, therefore, be some criteria which may distinguish fact from fiction. And it is simply reasonable that, if teachers who profess to come from God possess knowledge greater than men can reach, and exercise powers greater than men can wield, they must have received these from above; to such men we may properly conclude that a revelation has been made. This knowledge and this power are evinced by prophecy and by miracles, which have been fairly considered adequate proofs of revelation. They are appealed to in support of the revelation which we maintain. The Deity challenges the world to declare, as He can, the future (Isa. xli, 22, 23, 26; xlii, 9; xliv, 7, 8); and the great Teacher, who appeared nearly two thousand years ago in Judea, pointed to the mighty works He wrought as evidence sufficient of His divine mission (John x, 37, 38, xiv, 10, 11).

If, then, it can be established that events in the far future have been long before proclaimed, if it can be shown on sufficient evidence that miracles have been performed, we are justified in the conclusion that the finger of God is here. See MIRACLE, PROPHECY, where these topics are discussed.

In estimating the truthfulness of alleged revelation we have certain checks. God cannot contradict Himself. He lets us draw various plain deductions from what we see in the book of nature. These have sometimes been thought inconsistent with the book of revelation. They may be inconsistent with the glosses put upon that book. But the genuine voice of revelation has nothing to fear from investigations in any other field of knowledge. Sooner or later all that really proceeds from God will be found in admirable harmony. Truth will not suffer by large inquiry.

The preceding observations tend to show the possibility and the necessity of a divine revelation, and point out some of the criteria by which to try the pretensions of that which professes to come from God. To us it presents itself in a written form. The communications which are said to have been made by the Deity, by means of several persons, and repeated through successive ages, are embodied for our use in the Bible. Some notice, therefore, must be taken of the shape which, so far as it regards ourselves, they have assumed. Inspiration was necessary to preserve these, and to present them truthfully to us. Here is the distinction to be made between revelation and inspiration—the one the supernatural communication from God, the other the spiritual influence through which the communication is officially proclaimed by word of mouth or by writing; that is, the transference of the communicated truth to the spoken or written word. For revelations may be given which he who receives them is neither authorized nor empowered to declare (2 Cor. xii, 1-4); and record may be made under spiritual guidance of that which has been learned merely by the use of the ordinary senses (John xix, 35).

The structure of such a record must be looked at. It is reasonable to believe that God would act towards His creatures on an intelligent plan, His object in our world being to manifest His glory in the restoration of those who had wandered from His obedience. This plan would be apparent through all the parts of a revelation proceeding from Him. If, then, we can perceive through the Bible, the books of which were composed at widely different periods, the same general plan, we have a strong presumption in favor of its being a revelation from God. Now a revelation must not only disclose that which could not (as above noted) otherwise be known—such as the doctrines respecting the nature, attributes, and character of God, the sin and condemnation of man, the mode of salvation through Christ, and the work of the Holy Spirit, but must involve a moral probation. Else men would be treated as machines, and human responsibility would be destroyed. But, if the great purpose of probation is to be answered, there must be preparation, a training, so to speak, of individuals and of the world. Revelation could not in this view be entire at once. No single period in the world's history could be fixed on, in which the whole divine plan might be propounded, without violating the condition of moral probation to most of the generations of mankind. There must be a gradual development, if the graces of faith and hope are to be exercised with practical effect upon human conduct. This is just the nature of the Bible revelation, propounding truth by degrees, human language and human instruments being employed for this, so as to give the probationary purpose its fullest effect; sufficient being made known for the age to which any part of the revelation was made, and further developments coming after, not contrary to, but illustrative and confirmatory of, that which had preceded, modeled after such a manner that, while each, as just said, was thoroughly suitable to its own time, the whole should, when completed, be of perfect consistency, and continue to serve its purpose of probation through the rest of the generations of the earth. The revelation must be co-extensive with those who were to be benefited by it, and must therefore travel along the course of man's history. And to answer its end it must be shaped, without derogation from God's holiness, so as to meet man's ignorance, weakness and sin.

Now the revelation of the Bible, the more closely it is examined, will be more evidently seen to answer to the conditions adverted to. Its forms of history, biography and prophecy, instead of a series of abstract propositions, its divine side and its human side adapting it as the teacher and the touchstone of sinful men, and above all the marvelous unity of it, the later portions being the natural full growth of the earlier germ—these considerations, taken together with the evidence and criteria previously noted, may well convince us that the Scripture revelation proceeds from God, in mercy to His creatures. (Bib. Know.)

Revelation—Gradual and Progressive. The truths and purpose of God are, in themselves, incapable of progress, but not the revelation of those truths. In nature, the rising sun scatters the mist of the morning, and brings out into light first one prominence and then another, till every hill and valley is clothed in splendor. The landscape was there before, but it was not seen. So in revelation, the progress is not in the truth, but in the clearness and impressiveness with which Scripture reveals it.

In the beginning, for example, God taught the unity of His nature, while the truth that there is a plurality in the Godhead was taught but indistinctly. Several expressions in the earliest books imply it, and are evidently calculated to suggest it. Such expressions, for example, as, Let us make man in our image (see Gen. i, 26; iii, 22); and the use of the plural noun, to indicate the true God, with a singular verb, Gen. i, 1; Ps. lviii, 11 (Heb.); Prov. ix, 10 (Heb.), and several hundred times. In the later prophets the truth comes out with greater distinctness (Isa. ix, 6; Mic. v, 2; Zech. xiii, 7), and in the New Testament it is fully revealed. In the same way the work of the Holy Spirit is recognized in the Old Testament, and with increasing clearness as we approach the times of the gospel. It is in the New alone, however, that we have a distinct view of his personality and work (Gen. i, 2, 6, 3; Ps. li, 11, 12; Isa. xlvi, 16; lxi, 1; Ezek. iii, 24, 27).

This gradual disclosure of the Divine will is yet more remarkable in the case of our Lord. The first promise (Gen. iii, 15) contained a prophetic declaration of mercy, and foretold His coming and work, though in mysterious terms. The first recorded act of acceptable worship (Gen. iv, 1; Heb. xi, 1) was a type, expressing by an action the faith of the offerer in the fulfillment of the first prediction. There was to be triumph through suffering, and there was to be the substitution of the innocent for the guilty.

These promises and types were multiplied with the lapse of time. In the person of Enoch (Jude 11), of Noah (1 Pet. iii, 20; Gen. viii, 20), of Melchisedec (Heb. v, 6) and of Job (Job xix, 25, 1; xlii, 7, 8) there was much that was typical and predictive; still more in the history of Abraham (Gen. xii, 3; xxvi, 4; xlix, 10, etc.) and his immediate descendants.

Under the Mosaic dispensation other typical acts or persons, and places and things, were instituted, and the design of the institution was most distinctly explained (Lev. i, 4; vi, 2-7; xvii, 11). Prophecies, also, became more clear and frequent (Num. xxiv, 17; Dent. xviii, 15; Acts iii, 22, 23).

Between the days of Samuel and Malachi—a period of more than six hundred years—a succession of prophets appear, who gradually set forth the person and work of the Messiah; they foretell, too, the outpouring of the Spirit, and the general prevalence of the truth (1 Pet. i, 11; Ps. lxxviii, 18; Joel ii, 28; Is. liii, 61, 11; Zech. xiv, 9); points on which the earlier revelation is silent.

In the extent of their predictions, the prophets have not gone beyond the first promise, which was intended to give hope of complete redemption; but in their clearness, in the detailed account they give of what redemption involved and what it cost, the difference is most marked; while in the same qualities the gospels have gone at least as far beyond the prophets as the prophets have gone beyond the law.

It is noticeable, too, that the predictions of the old economy and its practical doctrines go hand in hand. The revelation spreads on each point. The light that illuminates the living spring, or the harvest-field of truth, shows with equal clearness the path that leads to them. The law gives divine precept with more fullness than previous dispensations, and the prophets go beyond the law, occupying a middle place between it and the gospel. They insist more fully on the principles of personal holiness as distinguished from rational and ceremonial purity, and their sanctions have less reference to temporal promises. The precepts of the law are, in the law, stern and brief; its penalties denounced with unmitigated severity. In the prophets, the whole is presented in colors softer and more attractive; hues from some distant glory, itself concealed, have fallen upon their gloomy features and illumined them into its own likeness. The law had said, "Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God, with all thy heart and with all thy strength;" and the extent of this command nothing could exceed. The prophets, however, expound and enforce, and animate it with a new spirit, and direct its application to greater holiness. The rule of life thus becomes in their hands increasingly luminous and practical.

The Psalms, again, are a great instrument of piety, and are so far additions to the institutes of legal worship, which contain no specific provision for devotion.

If the reader will compare the precepts of the Pentateuch on repentance with those of the prophets on the same duty (Dent. xxx, 1-6; Ezek. xviii; Isa. lvii, 15, 16; Ps. xl, 6-8; li, 16, 17); or the statements of both on the relation between the Jews, or of the world generally, and Him who came to enlighten the Gentiles as well as His people Israel (Isa. lxvi, 21; Jer. xxxi, 31-34); or will mark the increasing spirituality and clearness of the whole horizon of spiritual truth as the dawn of the gospel day drew on, he will not fail to understand the consistency and progressive development of revelation. In both he will see evidence of the presence of that God who (as Butler expressed it) "appears deliberate in all His operations, and who accomplishes His ends by slow and successive stages, whether they refer to the changes of the seasons, the movements of Providence, or the more formal disclosures of His will.

This peculiarity of Scripture makes it important that the various parts of the Bible should be read in the order in which the Spirit reveals them. A chronological arrangement of sacred history, the Psalms, and the Prophets, is essential to the complete explanation of the several parts; nor is it less so, to a clear and consistent view of the progressive unveiling of the Divine character and plans.

It deserves to be remembered, too, that even when we are not contemplating the gradual unfolding of the truth, the study of Scripture chronologically is often essential to a just appreciation of truth. Sometimes this gradual development of the divine will is spoken of as successive dispensations—the Adamic, the Patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the Gospel; dispensation meaning the way in which God deals with men, or (in this connection) the truth revealed, the ordinances and consequent conduct which are enjoined.

The Adamic dispensation continued only during man's innocency. The patriarchal lasted more than twenty-five hundred years, and the history of it is given in Gen. iii-Ex. xx. It is so called from the fact that the heads of families were the governors and teachers of men (patriarchs), such as Adam, Seth, Enoch and Noah, before the flood, and Job, Melchisedec, Abraham, and his immediate descendants, after it. They were the depositaries of the divine will, the guardians of prophecy, and some of them furnished in their history types of our Lord. There were, during this period, but few predictions, though there are distinct intimations of preparation for the coming of the Messiah, as in the distinction between clean and unclean animals, in reference to sacrifice (Gen. viii, 20), in sacrifice itself, and in the covenant with Abraham (Gen. xv, 20). In the Patriarchal dispensation, too, may be traced many of the first principles of the Mosaic.

The covenant made with the Jews through Moses—the Mosaic dispensation—lasted for about fifteen hundred years, and abounds with typical persons, places and things. The Jewish people were, in truth, a type, both in their institutions and history (See Lev. vi, 2-9; xvi, 21; xvii, 11; Eph., Heb., and I Cor. x).

The Gospel dispensation, the great principles of which may be traced in the previous economies, is founded on the facts given in the Gospels, the life and death of our Lord. In the Acts we see truth in action, both among individual believers and in the church; in the Epistles, the doctrines founded on these facts are developed and enforced; and in the Revelation we have, in prophetic visions, the history of truth in its struggles with error, and of the Church till the end of time.

These books constitute the dispensation of the gospel, and with them the development of evangelical truth (so far as the present state is concerned) ends. There may be passages in the Bible whose full meaning is not yet discovered, and which are, perhaps, "reserved," as Boyle expressed it, "to quell some future heresy, or resolve some yet unformed doubt, or confound some error that hath not yet a name," or prove, by fresh prophetic evidence, that it came from God. Scripture, moreover, is like the deep sea, beautifully clear, but immeasurably profound. There is, therefore, no definable limit to our insight into its meaning. But we are to look for no further revelation; nor are we to regard as developments of Scripture doctrine the additions of men.

Examples of the abuses of this truth it is not necessary to multiply. Popery is the standing illustration. It pleads for the development of truth out of Scripture and in the Church. The blessedness of the dead who die in the Lord, for example, is said, on its theory, to be the natural germ of saint worship. Christ's presence in the Supper is, in the same way, the germ of the adoration of the Host and the salutation of the angel, of the dedication of the Virgin. But all this is abuse. The gradual development of truth in Scripture is one thing; an accretion which overlays the truth is another; and it is for the former only we contend.

Revivals. The Presbyterian Church has always been the friend of genuine revivals. Its entire history furnishes proof of this. The following extract from a Pastoral Letter, addressed by the General Assembly, in 1849, to the ministers and churches under their care, on the Means of Promoting Revivals, possesses an intrinsic and enduring value which entitles it to a record that will secure it a wide and permanent circulation:—

"We beseech you, brethren, to remember that a state of indifference to spiritual things is a great offence in the sight of God. It is, indeed, the very core of depravity. Not to be greatly affected by divine things may be consistent with a decent profession of religion in a low state of the Church, but it is a great sin against God. How terrible are the rebukes of the Almighty to the lukewarm. He says He 'will spew' them out. He says, 'Woe to them that are at ease in Zion.' All persons who promote this state of things in the Church are very offensive to God. He says: 'Woe unto the women (certain prophetesses) that sow pillows to all armholes.' Deplorable, indeed, is the state of any people whose watchmen cry peace, peace, when there is no peace. Deadness, negligence, earthly-mindedness, and vanity in ministers, elders, deacons, or private Christians, are extremely abominable to God. A supine carelessness, and a vain, carnal, worldly spirit, in ministers or people, is the worst madness and distraction in the sight of God. Sound, sober discretion is always to be sought, but worldly policy is the bane of godliness. Carnal prudence is the plague of any church into which it gains admission. When there is none that 'stirreth himself up to take hold of God,' He hides His face, and consumes us because of our iniquities. Proper means are therefore to be used, and in a proper spirit, too, especially—

"1. Prayer. How full are the Scriptures on this point! 'Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify me.' 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' It is as true now as in the days of Elijah or of James, that 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.' 'If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him.' Here 'the Holy Spirit,' the very blessing which we need in all our bounds, to enlighten, renew, sanctify and comfort, is sweetly and assuredly promised to them that ask. Let us humbly, fervently, importunately, and in full assurance of faith, cry to God for so great a mercy. Yea, let us all thus pray. The apostles devolved the actual distribution of alms on deacons, chosen for the purpose, but they no more thought of giving up prayer than preaching. Indeed the very reason they assign for wishing to be relieved from serving tables is that they may 'give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the Word.' If any man ceases to pray fervently he ought to lay aside all other functions in the Church of God, for he is wholly unfit for any of them. We do not deem it for edification to designate any particular days or times when special prayer shall be made, but we beseech you, in your ejaculations, in your closets, in your families, in your social meetings, and in your large assemblies, to make unceasing prayer to God for seasons of merciful visitation. Should any times of special prayer, in addition to those already agreed upon, be deemed proper, you will appoint them yourselves. But we entreat you not to permit anything to prevent your daily and earnest cries to God for mercy and salvation to descend on all our churches. 'Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.' To prayer it is proper to add—

"2. Fasting. When our Lord was yet with us, He said that when He should be taken away His disciples should fast. Pious men in every age have united fasting with prayer in times of distress, even if speedy deliverance was hoped for. So did Daniel, when a captive in Babylon. Having learned, by examining the prophecies of Jeremiah, that God had purposes of mercy to His people, and was about to deliver them, he was greatly encouraged, and 'set his face unto the Lord God, to seek, by prayer and supplications, with fastings and sackcloth and ashes.' So did Ezra, and all the Jews at the river Ahava, on their return from Babylon, and just before the great revival of God's work among them. Like prayer, fasting has been a part of every system of religion known among men. Some, indeed, even in Christian countries, have carried it to the length of superstition, and have thereby impaired their health. Others, who pretended to fast, only exchange one kind of sumptuous eating for another, and thus mock God. We commend not, but rather reprove, all such practices. Yet we fear that some among us seldom, if ever, fast at all. We trust this matter will be inquired into, and if there has been a departure from divine teachings, there will be a speedy return to this Scriptural duty. The nature of an acceptable fast, and the blessings attending it, are clearly stated in the Scriptures, and especially in the fifty-eighth chapter of Isaiah. To prayer and fasting add—

"3. Alms-giving. 'The poor ye have always with you, and whosoever ye will, ye may do them good.' If they need not shelter, they may need fuel, or food, or clothing, or medicine. If they have all these, they or their children may need instruction, warning or encouragement. If there be no poor near you, think of those who are perishing elsewhere, if not in a famine of bread, yet in a famine of the Word of God, whether written or preached. Help them. Be both liberal and systematic in your charities. 'Remember the words of the Lord Jesus; how he said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.' It was when the prayers of Cornelius were united with his alms that they came up for a memorial before God. Separate not prayer and fasting from alms-giving. God has joined them together. One benefit of fasting is that it affords or increases the means of giving to those who are more needy than ourselves. Beware of covetousness. Beware of the spirit of hoarding. Many in our day think they do well if they give even one-tenth of their increase. But the ancient Jewish Church gave far more than that. The gospel settles nothing as to the proportion to be given, but it says, 'As ye abound in everything, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us, see that ye abound in this grace also.' The motives it urges are of the highest kind. Every believer must feel their force. 'Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye, through his poverty, might be rich.' Surely, with superior privileges, Christians should have a higher standard of liberality than those who lived under a darker dispensation. Yet even to the Jewish Church God said: 'Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it.'

"Brethren, will you not 'prove' the Lord? You shall find Him faithful. If from right motives you practice a proper liberality, 'all nations shall call you blessed; for ye shall be a delightful land, saith the Lord of hosts.' To these things unite—

"4. Praise. This duty is much insisted on in Scripture. If we had praised God more for favors received we should have received more favors to praise God for. In heaven there is joy over one sinner that repenteth. It should be so on earth. 'Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me.' Even in the jail at Philippi, Paul and Silas to prayer added the 'singing of praises.' It has long been observed that precious revivals are not only accompanied, but preceded also, by an increased disposition to make thankful mention of God's mercies. Thus, the time that elapsed between the ascension of our Saviour and the day of Pentecost was in some respects a dark season. Yet blessings had been received, and greater ones were expected. In the first chapter of Acts, Luke tells us that during this time the disciples 'all continued with one accord in prayer and supplications.' But in his gospel Luke says, 'They were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God.' There is no contrariety between these statements, because there is no contrariety between prayer and praise. So, when the glorious revival commenced in Jerusalem, and many thousands were converted to God, 'they continuing daily, with one accord, in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favor with all the people; and the Lord added to the Church daily such as should be saved.' When a church finds itself but little inclined to the work of praise, it is certain that the work of God is not likely to prosper greatly. It must have forgotten much of its obligations to Christ. 'By him, therefore, let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name.' Thus shall we at least be prepared to own and profit by any new mercy which the Head of the Church may vouchsafe to us. Besides these things, let us call your attention to a—

is more insisted on in Scripture as requisite to a right state of mind and heart. It is true that some who give great prominence to other duties of religion seldom speak of this. But the Scriptures, and not the example of even good men, are our rule of faith and life. The Word of God dwells much on this subject. Thus says one, 'I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope. My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they that watch for the morning.' Again, 'as the eyes of servants look unto the hands of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until he have mercy upon us.' The same state of mind is beautifully described by the Church in Solomon's Song, where he says, 'I charge you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, by the roes and the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he pleases.' Let us not, therefore, suppose that we shall please God, by a tumultuous, much less by an imperious state of mind. A judicious parent gives nothing to a child when in a turbulent state of mind, however loudly and earnestly it may call for it. Neither will our Heavenly Father hear our cries, unless our spirits be subdued and submissive. The Psalmist says: 'Surely I have believed and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother; my soul is even as a weaned child.' Nor does he regard this as a ground of discouragement, but rather of hope, for his next words are: 'Let Israel hope in the Lord from henceforth and forever.' So, also, whether we apply the fortieth Psalm to Christ or to His people, it teaches the same thing: 'I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me and heard my cry.' We also call your attention to—

“6. Religious Conversation. Has not a sad decline in this respect been manifest of late years? Many speak much of some things concerning religion, but how few delight in speaking of the great things of God, and particularly of experimental religion! We would be very far from encouraging an ostentatious display of personal feelings. But proper conversation is as much opposed to ostentation as to coldness. It was an inspired man who said, 'Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul.' Many of the Psalms, such as the thirty-second, the forty-second, and the fifty-first, are full of declarations of religious experience. The seventh chapter of Paul's epistle to the Romans is most precious to the saints, chiefly because it reveals the internal conflicts of that servant of God. Nor should pious conversation be confined to times of prosperity in the Church. The prophet Malachi lived in times of open wickedness and sad apostasy. But few remained steadfast. Yet even then 'they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened, and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord, in that day when I make up my jewels, and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son, that serveth him.' Indeed, he who would condemn a truthful and modest recital of the dealings of God with one's soul, must not only condemn such works as 'Augustine's Confessions,' 'Bunyan's Grace Abounding,' 'Newton's Authentic Narrative,' and 'Scott's Force of Truth,' but also the conduct of Paul, who often declared the particulars of his conversion, and the conduct of very many of the inspired writers also. We do, therefore, commend this matter to your serious attention.

“7. They who would enjoy extensive and powerful revivals of religion, must also put a high estimate upon them. The Holy Spirit, no less than the Father or the Son, says: 'Them that honor me will I honor, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.' The Holy Spirit is the sole author of genuine revivals. Would we secure His gracious presence? Let us prize it above all earthly good. His love is better than wine; He is the true oil of gladness. Only when He, like the wind, blows on His garden, do the spices thereof flow out. Nothing that man can do is any substitute for His gracious presence; and no labors that man can perform are a substitute for a high estimate of the value and glory of the Spirit's presence.

“8. If our estimate of such blessings be really high, it will lead to a forsaking of all that might, in our judgment, displease God. It will produce great heart-searchings; it will lead us to remove every stumbling block out of the way, and to prepare the way of the Lord. Dear brethren, let us lay aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies and envies, and all evil speakings. Let us heal every breach of charity. The visible form in which the Holy Spirit descended on our Saviour was that of a dove, the very emblem of gentleness—a bird that never dwells with birds of prey, nor amidst noise and strife. Paul says: 'Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption,' and immediately adds, 'Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice, and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven you.' If our churches are in a cold state, it is by reason of sin. 'Your iniquities have separated between you and your God.' How solemn are these words of God to his ancient Church: 'I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early.' Let us prove that we are His people by confessing and forsaking all our offences.

“9. We suggest whether the practice of assembling the people for several consecutive days for prayer, and praise, and preaching, might not be happily revived. In some places it has been continued, and with good effect, but in others, we fear, it has fallen into general disuse. Prudence should be exercised as to the time when and how long such meetings should be held. That they are not novelties, is plain from the Directory for Worship, chapter viii, § 6. A favorite method of noticing the preaching of the gospel in the New Testament is that of bearing testimony. And we all know how mightily the power of testimony over the human mind is increased by two or more agreeing witnesses, so that by the mouth of two or three witnesses every word is established. This principle of our nature was consulted by our Lord in sending out His apostles, and by the apostles themselves. Under the divine blessing on their united testimony borne to the same people, the great work of grace on and after the day of Pentecost was accomplished.

“10. We have no new expedients to commend to you. We fear all such. The Bible indicates all the means to be used. We have noticed the chief of them. We beseech you to use, with zeal and perseverance, all such means as God has appointed for reviving His work. Brethren, be not slothful, but be ye filled with the Spirit. ‘Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.’”

Rice, Benjamin Holt, D. D., was born about 1780. He was two or three years younger than his brother, Dr. John Holt Rice, by whom he was aided in his theological studies. He settled, early in his ministerial life, in Petersburg, Va. The church which he served there was greatly blessed by his ministry, and his reputation for ability in the pulpit, as well as in pastoral duty, attracted the attention of a church in New York, Pearl street, about the year 1820 or 1830. In 1831 he took charge of the Church in Princeton, where he remained till 1847, when he returned to his native State, and spent his remaining years as pastor of the “College” Church, near Hampden-Sidney College. In February, 1856, he was struck with paralysis while preaching, and the last words he was understood to utter in the pulpit were, “Go forward.” He lingered several weeks, increasing in ripeness for his change, till he fell peacefully in the arms of the messenger, Death, sent to bring him to his home above. His sermons were solemn, affectionate and impressive, his elocution clear and his gestures natural, easy and appropriate to his sentiments. Both in his own pulpit and when called to aid his brethren, or supply vacant pulpits, his labors were abundantly blessed. His wife having been suddenly called away, while in Princeton, he tenderly and faithfully performed the part of a widowed father to his motherless children, and all became his followers, as he followed Christ, before he was taken from them. In his long life of seventy-six years, about fifty spent in the ministry, he made warmly attached friends, but no known enemies.

Rice, Rev. David; graduated at Princeton College in 1761, and was ordained by Hanover Presbytery, December, 1763. He labored for some years in Virginia, his native State, and during the Revolution took a warm and decided stand in favor of his country. He took, also, an active part in the establishment of Hampden-Sidney Academy, which afterwards became a college. In 1783 he removed to Kentucky, and there organized and took charge of the Congregation of Concord, at Danville, Cane Run, and the Forks of Dick’s River. Mr. Rice may be considered the father of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky. In 1785 a general meeting for conference was held, for the purpose of introducing and completing a regular Presbyterian organization in the State. Nothing so tended to the firm establishment of that Church in the far West as this conference, and Mr. Rice was the mover and master spirit of the whole, and was chairman of the meeting. He was also the founder, or one of the founders, of Transylvania Academy, which afterwards became Transylvania University. In 1792 he was a member of the Convention to frame a State Constitution. A complete biography of this man would necessarily embrace the most interesting events in the literary, political and religious movements of Kentucky in its early days. Mr. Rice died, honored and lamented, in 1846.

Rice, John Holt, D. D., was born July 23d, 1818, at Petersburg, Va., graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1838, practiced law for a short time at Richmond, Va., with excellent prospects of success, then, after his conversion, in about the twenty-fourth year of his age, devoted himself to the work of the ministry, and entered Princeton Seminary in 1842, graduating in 1845. After being licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 23d, 1845, he assisted his father for several months, who was at that time pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton. From March, 1846, to July, 1847, he labored as City Missionary in New Orleans, La. In the Fall of 1847 he began to preach at Tallahassee, Fla.; was installed pastor there April 30th, 1848, and continued until released March 23d, 1850. He was pastor of the Village Church at Charlotte C. H., Va., from August 31st, 1850, until August 21th, 1855. After serving for nearly a year, as an agent of the Presbyterian Board of Publication in Kentucky and Tennessee, he became pastor of the Walnut Street Church in Louisville, Ky., May 4th, 1856, and labored there zealously and successfully until September 5th, 1861. He then preached for longer or shorter periods at Lake Providence, La., and Brandon and Vicksburg, Miss., after which he was installed pastor of the Third Church in Mobile, May 5th, 1867. Having been released from this charge November 15th, 1868, he served the Church at Franklin, Tenn., as stated supply from 1869 to 1874, and afterwards the Church at Mason, Tenn., from 1871 to 1876. After the latter date he labored as an evangelist in the bounds of Memphis Presbytery, preaching to the poor and the destitute in the neglected portions of its territory, and receiving almost no pecuniary return. He died September 7th, 1878.

Dr. Rice was kind-hearted, amiable, genial, and possessed of large natural gifts. His sermons were often of a very high order. His knowledge was wide and varied, and he was surpassed by very few in his knowledge of ecclesiastical and parliamentary law. He was a truly good man. He loved to preach the gospel, and was especially delighted to carry it to the ignorant and the destitute. He was a member of the Southern General Assembly that met in Knoxville, Tenn., in May, 1878, being chairman of its Judicial Committee, the duties of which he discharged with consummate ability.

Rice, Nathan Lewis, D.D., was born December 29th, 1807, in Garrard County, Ky., and was the son of Gabriel and Phebe (Garrett) Rice. He remained on his father's farm until he was sixteen years old, when he commenced teaching a school, in order to raise money to defray the expenses of a college education. At the age of eighteen he united with Harmony Church, in Transylvania Presbytery, Ky. In the Fall of 1826 he entered Centre College, Ky., then under the Presidency of the Rev. Gideon Blackburn, D.D., and, during a portion of his course, was teacher of Latin in the preparatory department. He remained in college probably about two years, but for some reason did not graduate. He studied theology one year under Dr. Blackburn, and was then licensed to preach by Transylvania Presbytery, October 4th, 1828. In the following January he declined a call to the pastorate of Harmony Church, of which he was by birth and profession a member, and feeling the need of more thorough preparation for the work of the ministry, entered Princeton Seminary in the Fall of 1829. Here he studied most assiduously for two years, and became known by his large attainments and extraordinary ability. He was installed June 8th, 1833, pastor of the Church at Bardstown, Ky., at that time the seat of a Roman Catholic college and cathedral. Here he established an academy for girls, of which he became the principal, also a school for boys, and founded a newspaper called The Western Proponent, which was afterwards merged into The Presbyterian Herald, of Louisville.

After the dissolution of his pastoral relation at Bardstown, which occurred April 8th, 1841, he performed much mission work in the Presbytery of Ebenezer, but for most of the time preached as stated supply to the Church at Paris, Ky. Whilst residing at Paris, he held a debate on "Baptism," with President Fanning, of Nashville, Ky., which not being satisfactory to the Baptists, led to arrangements for a discussion with the well-known Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Va., at Lexington, Ky. This discussion was presided over by some of the ablest lawyers in the State, Henry Clay being among the number, and elicited the most intense interest throughout the whole western country. The efforts of Dr. Rice in this debate were regarded as brilliant and thoroughly successful specimens of logic and oratory, and at once lifted him to fame. The debate was written out by the debaters, and published in a large volume, and widely circulated.

Called to become pastor of the Central Church, Cincinnati, he removed to that city in 1844, and was installed January 12th, 1845. Under his ministrations the church, which was a colony of thirty-two members from the old First Church, rapidly grew and became strong and vigorous. While in Cincinnati, his labors were abundant. In addition to performing his pulpit and pastoral duties, he wrote several volumes, held several public debates, and taught classes of candidates for the ministry. The influence of his presence and labors was felt by the whole city. Early in 1853 he accepted a call to the Second Church of St. Louis, then vacant by the death of Dr. William Potts, and was installed as its pastor October 9th, 1853. His pastorate in this city was characterized by the same varied, incessant and successful labors as that in Cincinnati. He edited The St. Louis Presbyterian, and wrote and published several books. In 1855 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly which met in Nashville. In 1858 he was called to the North Church in Chicago, and installed its pastor October 20th, of that year. The Church, which he found small and weak, soon, under his labors, grew strong and flourishing. He also edited, while here, The Presbyterian Expositor. May 30th, 1859, he was elected by the General Assembly to be Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology, in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, and the duties of this Professorship were performed in addition to his pastoral and other labors.

Dr. Rice was installed pastor of the Fifth Avenue Church in the city of New York, April 2nd, 1861. Here his labors were new in kind and large in measure, and his health, heretofore good, soon began to give way. April 16th, 1867, he resigned this charge, and retired to a farm, near New Brunswick, N. J., where, for a year or more, by order of his physician, he rested from all mental work. From thence he was called to the Presidency of Westminster College, at Fulton, Mo., and at the same time took charge of the church in Fulton. October 16th, 1874, he was installed in the Professorship of Didactic and Polemic Theology in Danville Theological Seminary. He died June 11th, 1877.

Dr. Rice was truly a great man. He impressed all who heard him preach, the most cultured and the most cultivated, with a sense of his power. He was great in intellect, great in labors, great in goodness. His most characteristic mental feature was the logical faculty. Closely connected with this was his well-nigh unrivaled power of analysis. Then he knew men and how to reach their hearts. He was also large-hearted, generous, fervent—the highest style of a Christian man. When his death occurred, it was universally felt that a great man had fallen in Israel. We have not space for a list of even his principal publications.

Rich, Dr. James S., was born in 1795; pursued the study of medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, and was admitted to practice and received the degree of M. D., when about twenty-four years of age. He almost immediately established himself as a physician, in the vicinity of Doylestown, Bucks county, and built up a large, lucrative and successful practice, in which he was engaged for more than twenty years, when declining health obliged him to relinquish the active duties of his profession for eight years. Being restored to comfortable health by a kind Providence, he received the appointment, from the city of Philadelphia, of physician at the Lazaretto, on the Delaware river, below the city, and continued in the faithful and laborious fulfillment of the responsibilities of that position three years, when he removed to Churchville, Bucks county, and entered upon the practice of his profession there. For more than twenty years he resided in that place, useful, respected and honored as an excellent physician, and an unusually intelligent citizen. During the last four or five years of Dr. Rich's life the infirmities of age prevented his going much from home to attend the sick. He first made a public profession of religion at the Central Presbyterian Church, Northern Liberties, Philadelphia, Rev. Anson Rood, pastor, from which he transferred his membership, by letter, to Neshaminy Church, January 9th, 1846. His death occurred March 8th, 1875, when he was eighty years of age. A noble man was removed when his spirit took its flight.

Richards, Elias Jones, D. D., was born in Cheshire, England, January 11th, 1813. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, studied Theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of New York, —, 1838. He was stated supply at Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1839; pastor of the Second Church, Paterson, N. J., 1840; pastor of the Central Church, Spring Garden, Philadelphia, Pa., 1842-3; pastor of the Western Church, Philadelphia, 1843-6; and pastor of the First Church, Reading, Pa., 1846-72. He died at Reading, March 25th, 1872. Dr. Richards was an earnest Christian and an instructive and impressive preacher. In pastoral duty he was specially faithful. He was diligent and successful in the Master's work, and beloved by his brethren. Shortly before his decease he was Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia.

Richards, Rev. George J. E., son of Rev. Charles and Christianna B. (McMuldoreh) Richards, was born at Hector, N. Y., September 11th, 1819. Graduated from Western Reserve College (Hudson, O.) in 1872. Was Tutor there one year. Spent two years in Princeton, N. J., Theological Seminary, and one year in Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., where he graduated in 1876. He was licensed to preach the gospel by Cleveland Presbytery, June 9th, 1875. Ordained by the Presbytery of Wisconsin River, October 10th, 1876. Preached one year at Richland Centre, Wisconsin, when, through excessive work, his health became so impaired that he was required to cease public labor for a few months. He afterwards preached four years at Delmar and Elwood, Iowa. While there he organized a church at Elwood, and built one church edifice at Delmar, and another at Elwood. Was called to Gallipolis, O., and installed as pastor, in the Spring of 1882.

Prominent traits of Mr. Richards are his readiness to grasp the entire details of any matter, and then to make the most of those details. Pre-eminently cautious, yet very persistent and earnest, in accomplishing, in the face of difficulties, the desired end. In public address his language is clear and simple, his argument well and carefully drawn, and accompanied with earnestness, that carries conviction to the minds of his hearers. For amiableness of spirit, accuracy of judgment, and thoroughness of work, both as pastor and preacher, he is very highly esteemed.

Richards, James, D. D., was born in New Canaan, Conn., October 29th, 1767; spent the year 1789-80 in Yale College; then placed himself under the instruction of Dr. Barnet, at Norwalk, and afterwards completed both his academical and theological course under the direction of Dr. Dwight. His improvement was worthy of the best advantages, and in 1791 the corporation of Yale College, at Dr. Dwight's suggestion, conferred upon him the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In 1793 he was licensed by a committee of the Association in the Western District of Fairfield county, to preach the gospel.

In September, 1791, Mr. Richards received a call from the Church in Morristown, N. J., and in May, 1797, was installed its pastor, by what was then the Presbytery of New York. Here he labored, with great acceptance and success, until the early part of 1809, when he felt it to be his duty to accept a call from the Presbyterian Church at Newark, which had become vacant by the removal of Dr. Griffin to a professorship in the Theological Seminary at Andover. In 1805 he was chosen Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. In 1807 he was chosen a trustee of the College of New Jersey, and he was a director of the Theological Seminary at Princeton from its first establishment, both of which offices he held until he left the State. He was also intimately connected, at this period, with several of the earlier and more important of our benevolent institutions. His ministry in Newark, as in Morristown, was signalized by remarkable tokens of the divine favor. The years 1813 and 1817 were specially memorable for the powerful workings of divine influence among his people.

Dr. Richards was inaugurated Professor of Christian Theology in the Theological Seminary at Auburn, October 29th, 1823. His connection with this Institution was justly regarded as ominous of great good to it, as his standing in the Church, for prudence, piety and theological attainment, was such as to secure, not only to himself, but to the infant seminary with which he became identified, the general confidence and favor of the Christian community. He was the chief instrument of increasing its funds—the main-spring of its financial operations. After serving it with marked fidelity, he died, August 2d, 1843. In his last illness, though his articulation became indistinct, he was enabled to bear testimony to the sustaining power of the gospel, and there was a delightful tranquillity diffused over his dying scene, that spoke most impressively of the rest to which death introduced him.

Dr. Richards was a man of singular excellence. There was in his character a happy combination of Christian discretion and deep, sober-minded and cheerful piety. In the pulpit he was eminently impressive. There he appeared as the messenger of God on a mission solemn as death and the awards of eternity, and his great subject filled his soul, and gave an earnestness, an animation, and a deep emotion, often to tears, to his addresses, that awed every mind of his audience. He spoke as a dying man, with the eloquence and power of truth. Besides the "Lectures on the Prayer of Faith," his publications were principally sermons and memorial addresses.

Richardson, E. M., D. D., was born in Camden county, North Carolina, January 12th, 1828. His father removed to Warren county, Miss., in 1832, and here he grew to manhood, and was educated, graduating at Clinton College, Hinds county, Miss., in 1849. The same year he entered Union Theological Seminary, New York, taking a three years' course, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Third Presbytery of New York (N. S.), in 1852. In the Fall of the same year he took charge of the church at Grenada, Miss., and was ordained by the Presbytery of Lexington, South, N. S., at Carrollton, Miss., in the Winter following. He remained for sixteen years pastor of the church at Grenada. In 1868 he received and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn. Rev. Jno. D. Waddel, D.D., LL.D., having been called to the Chancellorship of the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tenn., resigned his position as Secretary of the General Assembly's Committee of Education, in June, 1879, and Mr. Richardson was elected in his stead by the Committee, which has power to fill vacancies. The General Assembly has elected him annually since then. Dr. Richardson still holds the position of pastor of the Third Church, but his duties as Secretary are paramount, and whenever the interests of the cause require, he must give his whole time to the cause of education.

Richardson, James, was born in Hopkinton, N. H., July 14th, 1817, the eighth in descent from Ezekiel Richardson, who belonged to the celebrated Winthrop colony. He was the son of a thrifty New England farmer, and received his education at the district school and at an academy in the neighborhood of his home. His youth was occupied in farm work in the summer and in teaching a country school in the winter. In 1845 he moved to Pittsburg, Pa., where, for twelve years, he conducted a successful grocery business. Changing his residence to St. Louis, in 1845, he engaged in the wholesale drug business, which, under his management, has made the house of Richardson & Co. second only to the largest establishment of its kind in the country.

Tall and commanding in personal appearance, genial and sociable in disposition, Mr. Richardson is distinguished by strong common sense, unusual executive ability, and conservative wisdom. These qualities, which conspired to achieve for him remarkable success in business, have also been conspicuous in his religious and benevolent relations. For many years he has been an elder, and President of the Board of Trustees, in the First Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, and has rendered liberal assistance to the material interests of the Church. For several successive terms he was elected member of the Board of Directors of the St. Louis Public Schools, and served as President of the School Board. His general culture and his experience in educational affairs, together with his deep interest in popular education, have rendered him an efficient member, and for a series of years the honored President, of the Public School Library Committee. To his efforts, more than to those of any other citizen, is to be attributed the eminent success of the Public School Library. During his whole life in the West Mr. Richardson has been a consistent and zealous Presbyterian, of large and liberal Christian sympathies.

Richardson, Richard Higgins, D. D., was born in Lexington, Ky., September 4th, 1823, and graduated at New Jersey College in 1844. He was ordained, by the Presbytery of Peoria, November 19th, 1848, pastor of North Church, Chicago, Ill., 1848-55; pastor of St. Peter's Church, Rochester, N. Y., 1856-1857; Marengo, Ill., 1858-59; stated supply at Red Mills, N. Y., 1860—pastor 1861-63; pastor of the First Congregational Church, Newburyport, Mass., 1864-68. Since 1868 he has been pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from New Jersey College, in 1865. Dr. Richardson is an excellent preacher, instructive and impressive. He is earnest in his work, and blessed in his ministry.

Richardson, Rev. William, was born in Egremont, near White Haven, in England, and coming to America, became a resident in the family of the Rev. Samuel Davies, and studied with him. He was licensed by Hanover Presbytery, in January, 1758, and was ordained July 13th, in the same year, in Cumberland county, as a missionary to the Cherokee towns in North Carolina. The Indians taking up arms, the mission was abandoned on the breaking out of the French War. In 1761, he connected himself with the South Carolina Presbytery, and, in 1763, he was the minister in the Waxhaw settlement.

Richie, Rev. William Nelson, was born in Shelby county, Tennessee, February 15th, 1816. He graduated in Monmouth College, Ill., in 1843, and at the Theological Seminary, Xenia, Ohio, in 1846. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the First Presbytery of Ohio (U. P.), March 27th, 1846, and ordained and installed pastor of the West Forty-fourth Street U. P. Church, New York city, November 15th, 1847, by the Second U. P. Presbytery of New York. On March 20th, 1882, he resigned this charge, and on April 25th of the same year was installed pastor of Westminster Church, Philadelphia. During his connection with this church he has won its esteem and confidence; and under his acceptable preaching and faithful pastoral labor it has received large accessions to its membership. He is earnestly devoted to his work as a minister of Christ.

Richmond, Virginia, Second Presbyterian Church. In a sermon preached by the Rev. William S. Plumer, D. D. (then pastor of the First Church of Richmond), in the month of June, 1813, he remarked that the time was at hand when it would be desirable to send out a colony for the establishment of another church. After the conclusion of the services two gentlemen, walking together on their way home, entered into conversation with regard to the remark of the pastor, and they agreed that they would immediately make the effort to induce others to unite with them in taking such active measures as would demonstrate their approval of the suggestion made in the sermon to which they had just listened. This may be regarded as the origin of the enterprise which resulted in the organization of the Second Presbyterian Church in that city.

The first official act was taken at a meeting of the elders and deacons of the First Church, when a committee was appointed to purchase a lot in some desirable locality, and when it was agreed to invite Mr. Moses D. Hoge, of Prince Edward, who had just completed his studies in Union Theological Seminary, to become the assistant of Dr. Plumer, with a view also to his taking charge of the new enterprise. The invitation was accepted, and in a few months a lecture-room was built on Fifth street, near Main, and dedicated to the worship of God, after a sermon preached by Mr. Hoge, from Luke vii, 5. It was then agreed that there should be a regular service in the lecture-room every Sabbath morning, at eleven o'clock, and another in the afternoon, while the First Church could be opened for service in the forenoon and at night, so that the members of each congregation who so desired could unite with the other in one service every Sabbath.

On the evening of the 29th of January, 1845, after public worship, at a meeting of the Session, held in the new lecture room, an opportunity was given to the members of the First Church who wished to unite in the formation of the Second Church to apply for letters of dismissal, whereupon sixty-three persons presented their applications, and on the 4th of February a committee of East Hanover Presbytery met in the lecture room, and after a sermon by the Rev. John Leyburn, D. D., the members who had received their dismissal were organized into a new church, to be known as the Second Presbyterian.

It is impressive to record the fact that of the sixty-three persons thus enrolled, but seven now survive.

On the 5th of February, 1845, a meeting of the members of the Second Church was called, for the purpose of electing elders and deacons. Great unanimity of feeling prevailed, and the following persons were elected:—

Elders, Mr. John B. Martin, Michael Gretter, Guernsey L. Denison and Richard Sterling.

Deacons, Robert McClellan, Robert Cochrane, John M. Sheppard and Robert A. Payne.

At another meeting, held on the 12th of February, Mr. Hoge was elected pastor, by a unanimous vote, and on the night of the 27th of the same month, after a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Leyburn, he was ordained to the full work of the gospel ministry and installed as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church. The Rev. S. J. Cassels presided. The charge to the pastor was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Plumer, and the charge to the people by the Rev. William Lyon.

It is proper here to make a grateful record of the fact that, neither in the sending out of a colony from the First Presbyterian Church, nor in the organization and election of officers in the Second, were there any dissensions. Brethren who for years had found how good and pleasant it was to labor together in unity, also separated in harmony, in the full interchange of mutual affection, animated only by the desire to extend the interests of Christ's kingdom, and to advance the cause of Presbyterianism in the city.

Regular services having commenced in the lecture-room of the new church, in a few months it was found that the building was too small for the needs of the congregation, and a meeting was held, February, 1846, and plans were adopted for the erection of a new and commodious house of worship, the building committee consisting of the pastor, Samuel P. Hawes and John M. Sheppard. This work was completed and the church dedicated in October, 1848, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Dr. Plumer, from Deut. xxxii, 31; "For their rock is not as our rock, our enemies themselves being judges." A dedication hymn for this service was composed by the late John R. Thompson, Esq., and was introduced into the hymn-book authorized by the General Assembly in 1866.

In the progress of time this edifice also was found to be too small for the requirements of the congregation, and it was determined to enlarge it. This was done by throwing a transept across the eastern end, thus adding two wings to the building, enlarging and beautifying it at the same time. During the enlargement of the church building the congregation worshipped in "Assembly," now "Mozart Hall."

Since the organization of the Second Presbyterian Church scarcely a communion season has occurred without additions to its membership, not only by dismissions from other churches, but by those who have separated themselves from the world by a public profession of their faith in Christ. The only exceptions to this gratifying fact have been during, or immediately following, the absence of the pastor in Europe and in the East. The growth of the church has been far less than was desired, but it has been steady, and since its organization there has been no feud or faction to mar its peace or to disturb the happy relations of the pastor with its members.

During the year 1852, when the pastor, in addition to his regular work, became the Principal of a large school and one of the editors of the Central Presbyterian, he induced his brother, Dr. William J. Hoge, to remove to Richmond, to assist him in his varied labors. The Session of the Second Presbyterian Church recommended to the people to call Dr. Hoge as collegiate pastor, that he might aid his brother in his ministerial duties also.

This recommendation being favorably received by the congregation, Dr. Hoge was invited and accepted the call to become collegiate pastor of the Second Church, in which capacity he continued to labor with great acceptance and with the most happy results, until he was called to the charge of the Westminster Church, in the city of Baltimore. In May, 1856, he was elected Professor of Biblical Instruction in Union Theological Seminary. In the Spring of 1859 he became co-pastor of the "Brick" Church in the city of New York. At the breaking out of war he resigned his charge, and returned to Virginia. Soon after his arrival he took charge of the Church in Charlottesville, and in the Fall of 1863 he accepted the pastorate of the Tabb Street Church, Petersburg, where his earnest labors abruptly terminated a life which had not yet attained its meridian, on the 5th of July, 1864.

A long cherished desire of the pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church was to send out a colony from it, and to see the organization of another church by members dismissed from his own for that purpose. To attain this end a lot was purchased in the western part of the city, in the direction where its growth had been most rapid, and where the new houses erected have been the most tasteful and substantial, and a chapel was built upon it, the chief contributor to which was the late Dr. James McDowell. During the year 1882 everything seemed to be auspicious for the organization of a new church, and the Session began to make inquiry for a young man qualified to take charge of the new enterprise, when a letter was received, signed by all the professors of Union Theological Seminary, recommending Mr. Peyton Harrison Hoge as a suitable person for the undertaking. It so happened, in the providence of God, that East Hanover Presbytery met in the city of Richmond, at which Mr. Hoge passed his examination and was licensed to preach the gospel. His examination and the prescribed lecture and sermon of Mr. Hoge made such a favorable impression that he was invited by the Session of the Second Presbyterian Church to take charge of the new enterprise. He accepted the invitation, and a congregation was speedily gathered by his ministry. Accordingly, on the 14th of June, 1882, thirty-six members of the Second Presbyterian Church having been dismissed, together with five members of the Grace Street Presbyterian Church and one from the First Presbyterian Church, a committee of East Hanover Presbytery organized these members into a new church, to be known as the Fourth Presbyterian Church, and on the 1st of October, 1882, the Rev. Peyton H. Hoge was ordained and installed as pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Dr. Moses D. Hoge preaching the sermon, from Gal. i, 28, and delivering the charge to the pastor, and the Rev. Dr. Read delivering the charge to the people. To this date, August 15th, 1883, fifty-one persons have been dismissed by the Session of the Second Church, to unite with the Fourth Presbyterian Church, the elders of which are George S. Cook and Calvin Wilson, and the deacons P. T. Link, William L. Wade, R. Lindsay Walker and Matthew Gilmour.

The admirable position of this new church, the zeal and devotion of its members, and the efficiency of its pastor, afford the best assurance that, by the blessing of God, it will soon become one of the most prosperous churches in the city of Richmond.

Riddle, David Hunter, D. D., LL. D., was born at Martinsburg, Va., April 11th, 1805. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1823, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Winchester, December 4th, 1828. He was pastor of Kent Street Church, Winchester, Va., 1828-33; of the Third Church, Pittsburg, Pa., 1833-57; of the First R. D. Church, Jersey City, N. J., 1857-62. He was subsequently President of Jefferson College, 1862-5; Professor in Jefferson College, 1865-8; pastor of the Colledge Church, Canonsburg, 1863-8; pastor at Martinsburg, W. Va., 1868-79. He now resides at Martinsburg. Dr. Riddle is a gentleman of winning address and fine literary attainments. As a preacher, in his earlier ministry, he occupied a front rank. His sermons were highly finished, strong in texture, and eloquently delivered. His labors have been attended with the divine blessing. In 1850 he was Moderator of the General Assembly.

Riggs, C. C., D. D., was a son of the Rev. Cyrus Riggs, one of the early Presbyterian ministers of western Pennsylvania. He was born in Fairfield, Mercer county, Pa., April 10th, 1810. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1836; studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Allegheny (now Butler), April 12th, 1839. He then removed to the State of Illinois, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Kaskaskia, on the 13th of April, 1840. His first charge was Chester and Liberty churches, in that Presbytery. Here he labored from November, 1839, till October, 1845, when he received a call from the united churches of Annapolis and Richmond, in the Presbytery of Steubenville. In October, 1849, he resigned the pastoral care of Annapolis, and took charge of Richmond College, under the care of the Presbytery of Steubenville.

In the Spring of 1852 he resigned his position in both the church and college, and accepted a call to the church of Sewickley, in the Presbytery of Redstone. In April, 1861, he accepted a call to the churches of Sharon and Clarksville, Mercer county, Pa., in Beaver (now Shenango) Presbytery. In April, 1863, he gave up the Church of Sharon, and devoted all his time to the Church of Clarksville. After five years he was obliged, by failing health, to desist from all ministerial labor, and he therefore resigned his charge in the Spring of 1868. On April 1st, 1869, he was appointed a Professor in the Ladies' Seminary, Beaver, Pa., and after teaching two years, he was elected Principal of the Beaver Academy, and continued in this position for some time, exhibiting great aptitude as an instructor. He died August 29th, 1883. Dr. Riggs was a sound theologian, a zealous defender of the faith, a watchful and sympathetic pastor, an instructive preacher, and a judicious counsellor in all ecclesiastical assemblages.

Riggs, Rev. Elias, a graduate of Princeton College in 1795, received his license to preach from the Presbytery of New York, in March, 1802, and for some time supplied the Presbyterian Church at Perth Amboy, N. J. On the 2d of August he was ordained. In October, 1806, he removed to New Providence, N. J., and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place, June 10th, 1807. He continued in this pastoral charge to the end of his life. He died February 25th, 1825. Mr. Riggs was eminently a godly man and a faithful pastor, and commended, by his exemplary life and conversation, the affections of his people and the respect of the community. He entailed upon the world a well-trained family, that does honor to his name, and has done good to the Church and the world. Both of his sons became Presbyterian ministers, the younger one being the distinguished missionary at Constantinople, the Rev. Elias Riggs, D. D., LL. D.

Riggs, Stephen R., D. D., LL. D., was a descendant of Edward Riggs, of Wales, who, in A. D. 1635, settled at Roxbury, Mass. He was the son of Stephen Riggs, an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, Ohio, and his wife, Anna Baird. In this place, on March 23d, 1812, Dr. Riggs was born. When a boy, his parents removed to Ripley, in the same State, where he attended a Latin school, and at this time his heart was enlightened by the Holy Spirit. In 1831 he graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa., and then passed a year in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Chillicothe.

The Rev. T. S. Williamson, M. D., who had been a physician to the Riggs family, at Ripley, studied theology, and in the year that Dr. Riggs graduated at Jefferson, went to labor among the Sioux or Dakotas, in what is now the State of Minnesota, and thus the attention of the subject of this sketch was called to missionary work.

On the first of June that year, under a commission of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, he arrived at Fort Snelling, at the junction of the Minnesota and Mississippi rivers. Several months were passed at the Lake Harriet Mission Station, in that vicinity, studying the Dakota language, and from thence, in September, he went to Lac-qui-Parle, and became the associate of Dr. Williamson, the friend whom he had known in boyhood.

In a small upper room of the log mission house, with his wife, he lived for five years, and here his son Alfred, now a Dakota missionary, and two other of his children, were born. In 1813 he opened a new mission station at Traverse des Sioux, and until December, 1816, was in charge, when he returned to Lac-qui-Parle where he remained until 1854, when he removed to Hazlewood Station, near the mouth of the Yellow Medicine, in the valley of the Minnesota river. Here he erected a boarding school for Dakota children, where, in the Summer of 1858, he was assisted by his son Alfred, who had graduated at Knox College, Galesburg, Illinois. Here he cheerfully and patiently worked until the Summer of 1862, when all his purposes for the welfare of the Sioux were suddenly broken off.

The 17th of August, of that year, was a sacramental Sabbath at his mission station, and at that hour an outbreak had commenced among the non-Christian Sioux, which did not stop until hundreds of defenceless white men, women and children were brutally murdered and scalped.

Hours before daylight of the 19th, the mission family left their home, and in perils oft, after several days, succeeded in reaching a place of safety, beyond the reach of the savages. Hastening to St. Paul, Dr. Riggs offered his services to Gov. Ramsey, of Minnesota, who commissioned him as chaplain of the military expedition sent out to protect the frontier, and punish the Indians. After the campaign closed, he devoted much of his time in visiting the Sioux in prison. After the Sioux were removed to reservations on the Missouri river, Dr. Riggs, while, during the Summer, visiting the mission stations that were now being cared for by his son, Rev. Alfred Riggs, and by Rev. John P. Williamson, the son of his old colleague, passed his Winters in Beloit, in completing the translation of the Bible into the Dakota language, which was published before his death. As early as 1839, associated with Gideon H. Pond, he prepared for the press the Dakota First Reading Book. In 1842 he prepared a book in Dakota, based upon Gallaudet's "Mothers' Primer." With his colleagues in the mission, Dr. Williamson and Rev. G. H. Pond, the same year, he prepared a translation of Genesis, part of the Psalms, and the gospels of Luke and John, which was printed in Cincinnati. The next year was published his translation of the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of Paul, and the Revelation. In 1850 he prepared "Dakota Lessons."

To the philologist, the grammar and dictionary of the Dakota language, collected by members of the Dakota Mission, edited by Dr. Riggs, and printed under his supervision, in quarto, by the Smithsonian Institution, is a valuable work of about 400 pages. Many other works were translated by him, which want of space prevents noticing. For English readers he wrote "The Gospel among the Dakotas," and "Forty Years among the Sioux." After six months of ill health and patient suffering, on the 21th of August, 1883, he was called to the better land.

While few missionaries had more privations, he was always uncomplaining. In bearing, he was free from ostentation, courteous to all. While not lacking in decision, he did not offend those from whom he was constrained to differ. The Dakota found him reliable in his utterances, and therefore looked upon him with respect. Those engaged in the Indian trade honored him, for devotion to the cause of Christ. Christians of other branches of the Church loved him, for his desire to do good. His influence in his family was very happy, and three of them are engaged in mission work among the Sioux, and one among the Chinese.

Righteousness. Righteousness is moral perfection; and that being is righteous who possesses such perfection. God therefore is righteous, as having righteousness in the highest sense of the word (1's. cxix, 137; Isa. xlv, 19). But man, created upright, is "very far gone from original righteousness;" and it is the most interesting question that can be propounded, How are those who have committed sin to be accepted by a righteous God? As the observations made here upon this topic must necessarily be brief, it may be well to present the reader with the substance of De Wette's note, cited with approval by Dr. Alford (The Greek Test., note on Rom. i, 17), where the expression "the righteousness of God" does not designate his attribute of righteousness, but the righteousness which flows from and is acceptable to him:—

men possess or strive after; sometimes, imputatively, for "freedom from blame," or "justification." The latter meaning is most usual with Paul; dikaïosunē is that which is so in the sight of God (Rom. ii, 13), the result of his justifying forensic judgment, or of "imputation" (iv, 5). It may certainly be imagined that a man might obtain justification by fulfilling the law; in that case his righteousness is an "own righteousness" (x, 3), a "righteousness of the law" (Phil., iii, 9). But it is impossible for him to obtain a "righteousness of his own" which at the same time shall avail before God (Gal. ii, 16). The Jews not only have not fulfilled the law (Rom. iii, 9-19), but could not fulfill it (vii, 7-25; the Gentiles likewise have rendered themselves obnoxious to the divine wrath (i, 24-32). God has ordained that the whole race should be included in disobedience. Now, if man is to become righteous from being unrighteous, this can happen only by God's grace, because God declares him righteous (iii, 24; Gal. iii, 8), the word signifying not only negatively to acquit (as in Exod. xxiii, 7; Isa. v, 23; Rom. ii, 13), but positively to declare righteous; never, however, "to make righteous" by transformation, or imparting of moral strength by which moral perfection may be attained. Justification must be taken, as the old Protestant dogmatists rightly took it, in a forensic sense—i. e., imputatively: God justifies for Christ's sake (iii, 22-28), on condition of faith in him as Mediator; the result of his justification is "righteousness of faith;" and, as he imparts it freely, it is "righteousness of God." . . . This justification is certainly an objective act of God; but it must also be subjectively apprehended, as its condition is subjective. It is the acquittal from guilt, and cheerfulness of conscience, attained through faith in God's grace in Christ, the very frame of mind which would be proper to a perfectly righteous man, if such there were—the harmony of the spirit with God, peace with God. All interpretations which overlook the fact of imputation are erroneous.

It may be added in the words of Hooker, "There is a glorifying righteousness of men in the world to come, as there is a justifying and sanctifying righteousness here. The righteousness wherewith we shall be clothed in the world to come is both perfect and inherent. That wherby here we are justified is perfect but not inherent. That wherby we are sanctified is inherent but not perfect."

Ripley, Rev. John Bingham, was born in Ellsworth township, Mahoning county, Ohio, April, 18th, 1821; graduated at Jefferson College in 1846, then at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed by Burlington Presbytery. He became an agent for the American and Foreign Christian Union, and labored in Ohio and Michigan. In 1854 he was installed pastor of the Mariners' Church, Philadelphia, where he was exceedingly faithful to the sailors, nothing that he could do for them by the instrumentality of books, visits, exhortations, letters of entreaty and prayer, ever being omitted. He died in March, 1862. His record was that of a devoted servant of Jesus Christ, and his death-bed was a scene of rapture and triumph.

Rittenhouse, David, LL.D. This eminent mathematician was born at Germantown, Pa., April 8th, 1732. His ancestors were emigrants from Holland. He was employed during the early part of his life in agriculture, and occupied himself habitually, at that period, with mathematical studies. While residing with his father he made himself master of "Newton's Principia," by an English translation, and also discovered the science of Fluxions, of which he for a long time supposed himself to be the first inventor. His constitution being too feeble for an agricultural life, he became a clock and mathematical instrument maker, and, without the aid of an instructor, produced work superior to that of the foreign artists. He also contrived and erected an orrery, much more complete than any which had been before constructed.

In 1770 he removed to Philadelphia, and employed himself in his trade. He was elected a member of the American Philosophical Society of that city, and one of the number appointed to observe the transit of Venus in 1769, an account of which he communicated to the Society. His excitement was so great on perceiving the contact of that planet with the sun at the moment predicted, that he fainted. He was one of the commissioners employed to determine the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Virginia, and between New York and Massachusetts. He held the office of Treasurer of Pennsylvania from 1777 to 1789. In 1791 he was chosen President of the American Philosophical Society, and held the place till his death, which occurred June 26th, 1796. He was also, in 1792, appointed Director of the United States Mint, and continued in the office till 1795, when ill health induced him to resign.

In an eulogium, pronounced by Dr. Benjamin Rush, before the American Philosophical Society, he said: "We are assembled this day upon a mournful occasion. Death has made an inroad upon our Society. Our illustrious and beloved President is no more. Rittenhouse, the ingenious, the modest and the wise Rittenhouse, the friend of God and man, is now no more. For this the temple of science is hung in mourning; for this our eyes now drop a tributary tear. Nor do we weep alone. The United States of America sympathize in our grief, for his name gave a splendor to the American character; and the friends of humanity in distant parts of the world unite with us in lamenting our common loss, for he belonged to the whole human race." Dr. Rush also said: "He died like a Christian, interested in the welfare of all around him, believing in the resurrection and the life to come, and hoping for happiness from every attribute of the Deity." The grave of Dr. Rittenhouse is among those of distinguished men filling the burial ground of Old Pine Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

Roan, Rev. John, a native of Ireland, was a student at the Log College, and taught on the Neshaminy, probably, while completing his theological course. He was licensed by the New Side Presbytery of New Castle, and sent to Hanover, Virginia, in the winter of 1744, where he continued for some time; and the happy effects of his ministry were visible and lasting. Soon after, he was settled over the united congregations of Derry, Paxton and Mount Joy. Mr. Roan, towards the close of life, informed the Presbytery that his congregations were deeply sunk in debt. He was sent on missionary tours, and at one time spent eight weeks on the South Branch of the Potomac. He died, October 3d, 1775, and lies buried at Derry meeting-house, on the Swatara, with this inscription on his tomb:—

"Beneath this stone
Are deposited the remains
Of an able and faithful,
Courageous and successful,
Minister of Jesus Christ."

"Truths for once told on a tombstone," says the author of "Mark Bancroft's Tales." The Rev. William Graham, of Washington College, Va., was a member of Mr. Roan's church, and received from him the education preparatory to entering Nassau Hall and his theological training.

Robbins, Frank L., D.D., was born at Camillus,

FRANK L. ROBBINS, D. D.

N. Y., in 1830. He graduated at Williams College, in 1851, and after enjoying the benefits of foreign travel pursued his theological studies at the Auburn Theological Seminary. On the completion of his course he preached a year in connection with the Professors in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati. Returning to the East he accepted the pastorate of the Green Hill Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. Here he labored efficiently, and with ever-widening influence, for seven years. At the end of that time he led the movement which resulted in the establishment of the Church with which his name must always be prominently and most honorably identified—the Oxford Presbyterian Church, corner of Broad and Oxford streets, Philadelphia.

Under the ministry of Dr. Robbins the Oxford Church long enjoyed a large measure of spiritual prosperity, and for several years it has been second to none of the Presbyterian churches in the city in its contributions for benevolent purposes, or in cognate exhibitions of practical Christian effort. At the date of the last official report the number of communicants of the Church was 631. The Sunday-school numbered 861. Dr. Robbins, as a preacher, is characterized by clearness, force and earnestness. He possesses these three qualities in a marked degree. He is the master of a strong, direct, sinewy English, and is vigorous in thought and expression. He knows how to drive home truth by the force of logic and argument, and how to win his way by appeals to the heart. His pulpit talents are rich and varied. In May, 1883, on account of impaired health, Dr. Robbins resigned the charge of Oxford Church.

Robert, Christopher R., was born in Brookhaven, Long Island, March 23d, 1802. After a mercantile clerkship in the city of New York for five years, he became a principal in business, carrying it on chiefly in the city of New Orleans. In 1830 he established himself in New York, as the head of the firm of Robert & Williams. In 1862 he retired from the firm, and in 1863 from the presidency of a large railway and coal company, which he had filled, and thus closed his business career. Mr. Robert served as a ruling elder in the Laight Street Presbyterian Church, New York, from 1831 to 1862; associated for the first six months with Harlan Page; and for nearly thirty years he was superintendent of one of the largest Sunday schools in the city. The property put in his possession was held in trust for the Lord. He sent $1400 to Hamilton College to aid beneficiary candidates for the ministry, and a larger sum was given to Auburn Theological Seminary. The College at Constantinople, however, bearing his name (with his reluctantly yielded consent), has been the principal recipient of his broadcast funds, about $114,000 having fallen to it from him.

Robert, Peter, a French Reformer, or Huguenot minister, the first pastor of the settlement of French Protestant refugees at Santee, S. C. He died in or before the year 1715.

Roberts, James, D.D., son of John and Mary D. Roberts, was born in Montrose, Scotland, Christmas, 1839. He came with his parents to this country, when a boy. He graduated at Lafayette College, among the first of his class, in 1865, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1868. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Castle, April, 1867. He was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Coatesville, Penna., January 15th, 1868, and entered upon his labors at the close of his seminary course, May 9th, 1868. He was ordained and installed May 28th, 1868. He has continued to minister to the congregation with great acceptance, to the present time. His pastorate is now several years longer than that of any other pastor in the Presbytery of Chester. He is a close student, a clear thinker and a ready writer, with a good flow of language. His ministry of sixteen years has been one of earnest, faithful work, with continued manifestations of the Master's approval; and now, at the end of all these years, he holds a very strong place in the hearts of his people, as well as in the confidence and respect of the whole community in which he resides. For fifteen years he has been Stated Clerk of his Presbytery, and was for three years the Permanent Clerk of the Synod of Philadelphia, and when that Synod, together with the other three Synods of Pennsylvania, was merged into one, under the title of the "Synod of Pennsylvania," he was unanimously chosen to the same position in that body, and continues to hold the office at the present time. He is a member of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, a member of the Spelling Reform Association of the United States, and also a trustee of Lincoln University. The trustees of Lafayette College conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, January, 1883.

Roberts, James B., was born of Quaker parentage, in Chester county, Pa., April 8th, 1823, the youngest child of James B. and Esther Roberts. He received no religious instruction in early life, but was, from 10 to 20 years of age, almost wholly under infidel influence. He was converted in the Spring of 1845, in Coates Street Church, Philadelphia; united with Dr. Ballard's Church in St. Louis in 1848. In 1850 he removed to California, arriving in the month of June, and immediately connected himself with the First Presbyterian Church. He was ordained deacon in that church in 1851; went out to help build Calvary Church in 1854; was elected elder in Calvary Church in 1859, and was a trustee continuously from 1854 to 1881. He was superintendent also of the Sabbath school, continuously, for twenty years.

Mr. Roberts severed his connection with Calvary Church during the progress of what is known as the "Cooper Henry Trial," and connected himself with Howard Presbyterian Church, and is at present an elder in that church.

Mr. Roberts is one of the representative men of the Pacific coast and of the Presbyterian Church. Strong in intellect, stronger in will, strong in frame and stronger in faith, he inspires all who know him with confidence in his integrity, and impresses all by his energy, disinterestedness and readiness to help every good cause. His influence is due to the warmth and steadfastness of his attachments, promptness to act, skill to organize, vigor to execute, and more than all to his clear perceptions of truth and duty, his singleness and firmness of purpose to do what he believes to be right. He came to California when gold was the one object of pursuit, and might have acquired large wealth; but giving and working for the various objects which appealed to his generous heart have kept him poor. He is rich in faith, good works, the approval of his conscience and the esteem of his brethren.

Roberts, Rev. William Charles, D. D., was born September 23d, 1832, at Galltmai near Aberystwith, in Cardiganshire, South Wales. On the 25th of June, 1849, the family landed at New York. Some time after William entered the school of Rev. David H. Pierson. In the Fall of 1852 he entered the Sophomore Class of Princeton College, where he graduated, with honors, in 1855. Entering the Theological Seminary he completed a full course in 1858. Having accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, Del., he was ordained and installed pastor by the Presbytery of New Castle, in June, 1858. While at Wilmington he was appointed by the Synod of Philadelphia a trustee in Lafayette College. In the Fall of 1861 he accepted a unanimous call to the First Presbyterian Church, Columbus, O. While at Columbus he acted as chaplain of the State Senate, and was a member of the Committee of Synod to found a State College, which eventuated into Wooster University. In October, 1861, he was elected Moderator of the Synod of Ohio. On account of the health of his family he returned to the seaboard and accepted a call to become a co-pastor with Rev. Dr. Magie, of Elizabeth, N. J., where he was installed December, 1861. The rapid growth of Elizabeth calling for a new church, he went with the colony and formed the Westminster Church, which was organized January 31st, 1866, with one hundred members. He was installed pastor of the new enterprise, March 7th, 1866.

Dr. Roberts was elected a Trustee of Princeton College in June, 1866; appointed by the First General Assembly of the reunited Church one of the original members of the Board of Home Missions, in May, 1869; Chairman of the deputation sent to the Free Church of Scotland for the year 1874; a member of the Assembly's Committee to consider the propriety of holding a general Presbyterian Council; was honored with the title of D. D., by Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in June, 1872; Moderator of the Synod of New Jersey in 1875; member of the First Pan-Presbyterian Council that met in Edinburgh, 1877; and is Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, June, 1881.

Roberts, Rev. William Dayton, was born near Moorestown, N. J., July 29th, 1852. He received the full course of public school education in Philadelphia, graduating from Central High School in July, 1870. He devoted some months as shorthand reporter for the Philadelphia Inquirer; then went to Washington, D. C., as special clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, where he remained for three years, pursuing, at the same time, the studies of the Theological Department of Howard University. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1876, and was installed pastor of Thompson Memorial Church, Brownsburgh, Pa., where he remained for five years. March 1st, 1881, he assumed the pastoral charge of the Temple Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, of which church he is still the pastor, beloved by his congregation and successful in his ministry. Mr. Roberts is an excellent and popular preacher, of pleasing address, sound judgment, and diligent in activity in the Master's work.

Roberts, William Henry, D. D., was born at Holyhead, N. Wales, G. B., January 31st, 1844. He graduated at Columbia College, N. Y., in 1863. He was Statistician at the U. S. Treasury Department, Washington, D. C., 1863-66, and Assistant Librarian of the Congressional Library, Washington, 1867-72. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, December 5th, 1873; was pastor at Cranford, N. J., 1873-77, and since 1877 has been the popular Librarian of Princeton Seminary. Dr. Roberts is at present the acceptable and efficient Permanent Clerk of the General Assembly.

Robertson, Rev. James Lovejoy, was born in Steubenville, Ohio, on September 5th, 1837. His parents were Scotch-Irish, and members of the Associate Reformed (now United) Presbyterian Church.

He was graduated at Geneva College, Ohio, in June, 1855, and studied theology in the United Presbyterian Seminary in Allegheny City. He was licensed to preach by the U. P. Presbytery of Steubenville, Ohio, on June 9th, 1857, and was ordained by the U. P. Presbytery of Caledonia, N. Y., on July 12th, 1859; and installed as pastor of the U. P. Church of Geneva, N. Y. On June 2d, 1867, he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, Ohio. In October, 1870, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Rochester, N. Y., and in October, 1877, to the Euclid Avenue Presbyterian Church of Cleveland, Ohio. His present charge is the Presbyterian Church of Cortland, New York, of which he became pastor on November 11th, 1882. Mr. Robertson preaches the gospel with fidelity and force. As a pastor and presbyter he is faithful to his duties. The blessing of God has attended his labors in the several fields he has occupied.

Robertson, William W., D. D., was born in Lincoln county, Ky., December 6th, 1807. His father, Duncan F. Robertson, was of Scotch, and his mother, Mary Downing, was of English origin. His college course was begun at Centre College, Ky., and finished at Miami University, O., from which he graduated in 1831. His theological training also he received at Miami, under the President, Dr. Robert H. Bishop, and several of the Professors. He was licensed to preach by Oxford Presbytery, in 1836, and ordained by the same in 1837. For six years after his graduation he was engaged in teaching in Miami University. In 1841 he came to Callaway county, Mo., and took charge of the churches of Fulton and Concord. In 1851 he gave his whole time to the Church of Fulton, his connection with that church continuing till 1860—in all nineteen years. In addition to his work as pastor, he started, in Fulton, a Female Seminary, which, as its President, he conducted for ten years, and at which hundreds of young ladies were educated. In 1860 he removed to Concord, took charge of that church, and supplied it for eight years, during the last four opening and conducting a Young Ladies' Seminary. In 1868 he returned to Fulton, and for five years acted as agent for Westminster College. The last ten years of his life have been spent in voluntary evangelistic labors—in gathering and organizing little flocks and caring for them till some one is secured to supply them permanently. As a preacher, he has abounded in labors which God has greatly blessed. The revivals which have attended his preaching, if they were counted, would run up into the hundreds. Presbyterianism in Central Missouri owes more to him than any other man. And Presbyterian educational interests in Missouri might well own him as their father. Besides the Female Seminary which he conducted in Fulton and Concord, it was largely his influence that secured the location of Westminster College at Fulton, and largely his faith and energy that kept it in existence through troublous times, till it has come forth to do the grand work it is now doing. And on his shoulders has rested, in no small degree, the burden of starting and sustaining the Synodical College for young Ladies, located at Fulton in 1871, and now enjoying a high degree of prosperity.

Robinson, Charles Seymour, D. D., was born in Bennington, Vermont, March 31st, 1829. He graduated at Williams College, in 1849; studied theology privately, in New York city, and then passed a year and a half at Princeton Seminary. For a time he was teacher in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Troy, April 19th, 1855. He was pastor of the Park Street Church, Troy, N. Y., 1855-60; pastor of the First Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., 1860-8; preached in the American Chapel, Paris, France, 1868-71, from which last year he has been the popular and efficient pastor of the Presbyterian Memorial Church, New York city. From 1876 to 1877 he was editor of the Illustrated Christian Weekly.

Dr. Robinson is a gentleman of refinement and culture. In his disposition he is of a cheerful temperament. He is a graceful and vigorous writer. The church in which his congregation worships is one of the most magnificent church edifices in New York. His ministry, in the several fields in which he has labored, has been crowned with success. As a preacher, he is eloquent and forcible. His sermons are argumentative, and he will make no sacrifice to declamation, but his mode of handling his subject is so original and scholarly, and so graphic and chaste is his language, that he is very successful in arresting the undivided attention of an audience. Dr. Robinson has published various sermons, and is the compiler of a book of hymns, entitled "Songs of the Church; or, Hymns and Tunes for Sacred Worship." He received his degree of D. D. from Hamilton College.

Robinson, Edward, D. D., LL. D., was born in Southington, Conn., April 10th, 1794. He entered Hamilton College in 1812, and always stood at the head of his class. After graduating, in 1816, he commenced the study of law, but was soon called to take a tutorship in Hamilton College. In 1823 he was appointed Instructor in Hebrew in Andover Seminary, and sustained himself admirably in this position for three years. In 1826 he set sail for Europe in quest of philological opportunities and helps, such as Europe only could afford, returning to this country in 1830, and was shortly afterwards appointed Professor Extraordinary of Sacred Literature and Librarian at Andover. Here he was engaged, in addition to his other duties, in editing the Biblical Repository. At the end of three years he removed to Boston, where he spent another three years in preparing his works on "Biblical Lexicography." In 1837 he accepted the professorship of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, but on condition that he should be permitted, before entering upon the duties of his professorship, to spend three or four years in exploring the Holy Land. The fruit of this tour was the "Biblical Researches," which he wrote at Berlin, spending two years there for the purpose.

The publication of his Biblical Researches, was followed, in 1842, by what Dr. Robinson regarded as the highest of all his earthly honors, the awarding to him of a gold medal by the Royal Geographical Society of London. This gave him a place among the selectest few of scientific discoverers. He made another tour to Palestine, in 1852, the fruit of which was another volume of the Researches. He contemplated and commenced, in 1856, a great work on Scripture Geography. In attempting, in 1859, to rewrite this work, his health failed. He went to Europe to find relief, but sought it in vain. Returning to his home, he died, January 27th, 1863.

Dr. Robinson was not only a Biblical scholar of world-wide reputation, and eminently useful by his labors and publications, but he was also a devoted Christian. He was distinguished for the rectitude of his character, and the elevation and purity of his religious life. As the last end of all his intellectual aspirations, pursuits and attainments, he sought the honor of Him who bore the cross for us all. His studies, his travels, his books, his instructions, redounded, indeed, to his own fame, but his fame, with his heart and his all, he offered on the altar of loyalty to his Saviour.

Robinson, Rev. George, was born at Argyle, New York, graduated at Union College in 1861, and studied theology at the United Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. He was stated supply of the Congregational Church, Benson, Vt., 1867; of the church at Hobart, N. Y., 1867; of the Tenth Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1868. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Donegal, September 8th 1868; was pastor at Lancaster, Pa., 1868-74; at Duncannon, 1874-7; and since that time has been Chaplain U. S. A., at Fort Buford, D. T. He is a gentleman of pleasing address, excellent spirit, and a preacher of ability.

Robinson, John, D. D., was born within the bounds of the Sugar Creek Church, Mecklenburg county, N. C., on the 8th of January, 1768. After some academic education in Charlotte, and in the neighborhood of Poplar Tent, his college course was pursued and completed at Wimsborough, S. C. He studied theology under the care of the Orange Presbytery; was licensed to preach April 4th, 1793, and, at the same time, was directed by Presbytery to visit Dupin county, N. C. That was his first field of labor in the ministry. He was the instrument of much good to the churches he organized or built up in that county, and only left them because the effect of the climate upon the health of his family rendered it necessary. He continued there about seven years. In 1800 he accepted a call from the Church in Fayetteville, but finding the labors of the two offices too exhausting he relinquished both about the close of 1801; then removed to Poplar Tent, where he remained, as preacher and teacher, about four years, but was induced, early in 1806, to return to Fayetteville. Here he resumed his pastoral labors and his classical school, and from among his pupils North Carolina gathered some of its brightest ornaments. He was the father of the Presbyterian Church in that place. He not only organized it, but received to communion many who have been its pillars since. By the entire community he was venerated and loved. In December, 1818, he returned to Poplar Tent, where he passed the residue of his days. His longest and perhaps most useful pastoral relation was here, and it was not surrendered until the infirmities of age demanded it. He died December 14th, 1843. Dr. Robinson was greatly beloved by his brethren. He was a man of consistent and elevated piety. One prominent characteristic of his ministrations from the pulpit was a clear and faithful exhibition of the peculiar truths of Christianity. Benevolence, humility, firmness of purpose and intrepidity, were leading features of his character. His punctuality was proverbial. Throughout his life he was a warm and indefatigable friend to all the interests of learning.

Robinson, John, D.D., was born of Scotch-Irish parentage, in Westmoreland county, Pa., January 27th, 1814. When he was about two years of age his parents removed to Stark county, Ohio. When he was about eight years old his father died, leaving a widow and three sons, of whom he was the eldest. Four years later the family returned to his native place. In 1831 he was indentured to the tinsmith and coppersmith business, in Cadiz, Ohio, where he united with the Presbyterian Church. The man to whom he was apprenticed having ceased business and given up his indenture, and his own mind being turned toward the gospel ministry, he prosecuted the study of language, under the instruction of the pastor, Rev. John McArthur, laboring a part of every day until he had finished the course of the Junior year at college. Then, aided by the pastor and other friends, he entered the Senior Class at Franklin College, Ohio, and graduated in 1837, dividing the first honor of a class of nine with another. He studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Stenbenville, April 8th, 1840, and, after being stated supply of the churches of Corinth and Monroeville for six months, was installed their pastor, March 2d, 1841. In this charge he remained nearly three years, during which period the churches enjoyed almost a constant revival. On June 2d, 1844, he was installed pastor of the Church of Ashland, Ohio, and in this charge he has ever since continued, in uninterrupted peace, among an attached and appreciative people. Dr. Robinson has long been a leading minister in the Presbyterian Church of Ohio. He has been Moderator of the Synod of Columbus, and was prominent among the founders of the Wooster University. But his chief honor consists in the steady increase of his spiritual flock, year by year, during his long pastorate. His labors have been largely blessed.

Robinson, Stuart, D. D., was born November 26th, 1816, at Strabane, Ireland, and was the son of James and Martha (Porter) Robinson. He was brought to this country when about eight months old, and spent his early life in the Kanawha Valley, in West Virginia, where his father died while he was yet a child. He received his preparatory education under Rev. James M. Brown, D.D., in Berkeley county, Va., and Rev. William H. Foote, D.D., at Romney, Va.; united, on profession, with Tuscarora Church, Berkeley county, Va., at about sixteen years of age; was graduated from Amherst College, Mass., A.D. 1836; went thence to Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia and spent one year, 1836-7; then taught two years, 1837-39; spent nearly two years, 1839-41, in study at Princeton Seminary; was licensed by Greenbrier Presbytery, Va., April 10th, 1841; and was ordained by the same Presbytery, October 8th, 1842, at Lewisburg, Va. (now West Va.) On the day of his ordination he was installed pastor of the Church at Kanawha Salines, from which he was released May 8th, 1847; was installed pastor of the Church at Frankfort, Ky., by the Presbytery of West Lexington, June 18th, 1817, and labored there as pastor until released, September 2d, 1852; removed to Baltimore, Md., and supplied the Fayette Street Church (Independent) in that city nearly one year, 1852-3; then organized the Central Presbyterian Church in the same city, and was installed its pastor May 10th, 1853, and was released therefrom October 27th, 1856; was Professor of Pastoral Theology and Church Government in Danville Theological Seminary, Ky., 1856-57; was pastor of the Second Church at Louisville, Ky., where he was installed April 27th, 1858, and released June 16th, 1881, owing to the failure of his health. He died in Louisville, Ky., October 5th, 1881, in the sixty-fifth year of his age, and in the faith and hope of the gospel he had preached. Dr. Robinson was a gentleman of fascinating manners, and of a kind, benevolent spirit. He excelled as a preacher, and won great popularity. His sermons were Scriptural, logical, instructive and impressive, indicating a strong, independent intellect, thorough preparation, and a heart earnestly desirous of doing good. He was a vigorous writer, firm in his convictions of truth, and always ready to defend it. His power of off-hand speaking was great, and his delivery of his discourses in the pulpit was so earnest and emphatic as to largely augment their force and effectiveness. He took an active part and exerted a strong influence in the judicatories of the Church. His life was one of active and extensive usefulness.

Robinson, Rev. William, was born near Carlisle, England, a little after the beginning of the eighteenth century. On his arrival in America he took charge of a school in Hopewell, N. J. It seems probable, also, that he taught a classical school in Delaware, having Samuel Davies for one of his pupils. After his conversion he soon resolved to devote himself to the work of the ministry, and with reference to this, prosecuted his academical and theological studies at the Log College, while he went on with his school. He was licensed to preach the gospel, by the New Brunswick Presbytery, May 27th, 1710, and on August 4th, 1711, was ordained at New Brunswick sine titulo.

In August, 1712, Mr. Robinson received a call to settle at Neshaminy, as successor to the Rev. William Tement, but declined it. The next Winter he was sent as an evangelist, by the Presbytery of New Castle, to visit the Presbyterian settlements in the valley of the Shenandoah, and on the south side of James river, in Virginia, and the numerous settlements of North Carolina, on the Haw. He passed the Winter in Carolina, and, in consequence of imprudent exposure, contracted a disease from which he never recovered. On his return, he preached with great effect to the Presbyterian settlements in Charlotte, Prince Edward, Campbell and Albemarle counties. Here he was waited upon by a deputation, that persuaded him, instead of pursuing his contemplated route to the head of the Shenandoah, to return to Hanover, where he preached, July 6th, 1813, the first sermon from a Presbyterian minister ever heard in Hanover county; and continued preaching, with great acceptableness, for four successive days. The people, from gratitude for his services, constrained him to accept a handsome present in money, which, however, he appropriated toward the education of Samuel Davies, afterward the illustrious President Davies, for the ministry.

Mr. Robinson subsequently kept at his work, part of the time in the State of New York, and part of the time in Maryland, and a rich blessing seems everywhere to have attended his labors. He was called to the pastorate of the congregation of St. George's, Del., but, in April, 1747, before he had yet been installed over his charge, his earthly course was finished. There remains little documentary testimony concerning him, but there is a uniform tradition that he was an eminently devout and benevolent man, and one of the most vigorous and effective preachers of his day.

Robinson, Rev. William M., was born in Indiana county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in the Fall of 1811; and passing through the regular three years' course in the Western Theological Seminary, he was licensed to preach the gospel on the 19th of June, 1844, by the Presbytery of Blairsville.

On the 1st of December, following, not wishing to build on another man's foundation, he commenced preaching in a new field in Licking county, O., within the bounds and under the direction of the Presbytery of Zanesville, by which he was ordained an evangelist on the 14th of January, 1846. In due time two churches were organized, Hebron and Brownsville; and in this field he labored, with a good degree of encouragement, for ten years and six months. In the Spring of 1855 he was called to the pastorate of the First Church of Newark, O., successor to Rev. Dr. Wm. Wylie. This pastorate continued seven years, during which the congregation was considerably increased, and the membership just doubled. Then, for one year and nine months, he was the stated supply of the Church in Wellsburg, W. Va., Washington Presbytery.

In the Spring of 1861 he accepted a call to the newly organized Second Church of Mercer, Pa., in the Presbytery of Erie. Entering upon his labors the first Sabbath of April, he was installed on the 14th day of June. Eight years and one month were spent in this charge, and connected with these years of labor there was very much that was encouraging; and the charge was resigned, when God, in His providence, seemed to call him and his family to Allegheny, in the Spring of 1872.

On the second Sabbath of July he commenced preaching in the Providence Church, Allegheny; accepted a call to become their pastor, and was installed on the first Sabbath evening of November. This pastorate still continues.

Mr. Robinson is of large frame and fine personal appearance. He is a model of the faithful pastor, maintaining, in their proper relations to each other, the unremitting visitation of the flock and the evangelical preaching of the Word. In the latter he is methodic, instructive and deeply spiritual. In the delivery of sermons and in addresses at the mercy seat, he is characterized by great tenderness. He therefore never fails to win the attention and sympathy of the listener. Of late years he has made great sacrifices in performing mission service in one of the less promising portions of Allegheny.

Rochester, N. Y., Brick Church. The foundation or plans for a village, on the site which Rochester now occupies, had been perfected in about the year 1812. In 1815 the population had increased to 331. No church organization had yet been formed. The Presbytery of Geneva, on application, appointed a commission, consisting of Ministers Daniel Tuller and Reuben Parmelee, and Elders Samuel Stone and Isaac B. Barmum, to "meet in Rochesterville, in the town of Gates, on the 23d of August, 1815, to take into consideration the expediency of forming a church in that place." At the appointed time sixteen persons presented letters, assented to articles of faith and a covenant, and were constituted a church, Rev. Eleazer Fairbank preaching on the occasion, from Ephesians ii, 20-22. Two elders and two deacons were elected and ordained. On the 17th of January following, the same Presbytery installed Rev. Comfort Williams as their pastor, "in an unfinished store on Carroll (now State) street." As the young church suffered the want of a place of worship, and were pecuniarily unable to build, some parties bought, of Colonel Nathaniel Rochester, lot No. 10, on which the American Express office now stands, on the west side of State street, and erected a frame building, to rent to the church. Mr. Williams tendered to the church his resignation as their pastor, May 15th, 1821.

The society continued to occupy the building until their new stone edifice was completed, in 1824, on the ground where the present City Hall stands; and the records in the County Clerk's office show that, April 14th, 1825, "Josiah Bissell, Jr., Levi Ward, Jr., and Ira West, agents or active partners of the Rochester Meeting House Company," conveyed the estate to Josiah Bissell, Jr.

Ten years had elapsed since the First Presbyterian Church was organized; the population had increased to 1274 when the village census was taken, in February, and to 5273 when the State census was taken, on August 1st. Many felt that the growth of the church did not keep pace with that of the village, which was fast extending its bounds. After many consultations, a church was organized, its organization preceding that of the Society some four months.

The congregation met "at the usual place of public worship," on the 13th day of March, 1826, two elders of the Church, Linus Stevens and Silas Hawley, presiding. They adopted as their corporate name, "Trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church of Rochester," and elected as their first trustees, Timothy Burr, Ashbel W. Riley, Lyman Granger, Richard Gorsline and Henry Kennedy.

"The usual place of public worship" referred to was the framed building then recently decided by the "Rochester Meeting House Company" to Josiah Bissell, Jr., and vacated by the First Presbyterian Society when they took possession of their new stone edifice, about one year before. This house was rented of Josiah Bissell, Jr., at two hundred dollars per annum, and used until the new church was fitted for occupancy. For most of the term Timothy Burr, Benjamin Campbell, Aristarchus Champion, Richard Gorsline, Lyman Granger and Henry Kennedy, became personally responsible on the lease.

December 26th, 1826, a Society meeting was held, to act on the subject of locating and erecting a house of worship. Strong diversity of feeling on the subject of location was manifested. The first resolution adopted was "That the site be on the west side of the Genesee River." A committee was appointed to select and negotiate for a site, the result of which was, that on the 2d of February following the trustees took a deed from Silas Smith, of lot number 204, being 66x165 feet of the ground now occupied by this edifice, then described as on the corner of Hugh and Ann streets, for which they paid $2000. At the time there was a dwelling house on its east end, which Benjamin Miner removed to the sixteen square rods of the west end. At the same meeting, Timothy Burr, Ashbel W. Riley and Richard Gorsline were appointed a committee to procure a plan and estimate of expenses of building. The committee executed a contract with Abner Hubbard for $16,000. It having been discovered that the organization of March 13th, 1826 was irregular, there was a re-organization of the Society May 15th, 1827, under the name of "The Trustees of the Second Presbyterian Church in the Village of Rochester." No ceremony was observed at, or deposit made, in laying the corner-stone. The contractor promptly fulfilled his engagement, to the satisfaction of the Society. No dedicatory exercises are reported or records found showing at what date the new house was completed, but as annuity on its pews dated from October 1st, 1828, it is presumed to have been about that time. The revival attending the labors of Rev. Charles G. Finney, commencing in September, 1830, added much to the number and pecuniary strength of the Society. The new elements, demanded an advanced movement. They re-organized the Society, November 20th, 1833, under the name of "The Trustees of the Brick Church in Rochester."

As the Society grew, the want of a larger house of worship was seriously felt. The old church was not worth enlarging, or its shape adapted to it. May 24th, BRICK CHURCH, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

1858, the Society bought lot 169 of Charles A. Carroll, and added fifty-six feet wide on the south side to the church lot. In the latter part of 1859 a subscription was started for means to build a new church. Louis Chapin, Charles J. Hayden and William Otis, were appointed a building committee. Drawings were prepared by A. J. Warner, architect, and the contract let, March 25th, 1860, to Richard Gorsline & Son and Edwin Taylor, for $39,390. The closing exercises in the old church were held April 1st, 1860. The Washington Street Church being then unoccupied, it was rented and occupied by the Society till the last of June, 1861. The work of the new building was prosecuted vigorously, and its corner-stone laid July 3d, 1860. Byron Sunderland, D.D., of Washington, D. C., delivered an address on the occasion. A box containing a large number of Presbyterian and secular periodicals, a city directory, and many other documents, was deposited in the top course of stone in the southeast corner of the main tower. The church was completed in June, 1861, and on the last day of that month a dedicatory sermon was preached by Samuel W. Fisher, D.D., President of Hamilton College, from the text, Psalm xviii, 9. The whole cost of the newly bought ground and building, with windows, gas fittings, furnaces, pews, cushions, carpet, organ, chairs, seats, settees and fence, was $61,881.73.

The pastors of the Brick Church, and the dates of their service, are as follows: Rev. William James, July 21th, 1826, to October 11th, 1830; William Wisner, D.D., May 1st, 1831, to September 23d, 1835; Rev. George Beecher, June 18th, 1838, to October 6th, 1840; James Boylan Shaw, D. D., became pastor of the Church, February 16th, 1841, and continues in this relation to the present time, very greatly blessed in his labors, and endeared by his excellent character and marked official fidelity to his congregation, and to the whole community (see his sketch). The membership of the church at present is 1335. Eight persons who have been teachers or scholars in the large and ever-flourishing Sabbath school of this church have been foreign missionaries under the appointment of the American Board, viz: T. Dwight Hunt, to Sandwich Islands; Edwin O. Hall, to Sandwich Islands; Fidelia (Church) Coan, to Sandwich Islands; Alanson Curtis Hall, to Ceylon; Henry Cherry, to Madura; Maria (Preston) Johnson, to Siam; Elijah F. Webster, to Bombay; Harriet Seymour, to Turkey.

Rockwell, Elijah Frink, D.D., son of Joseph and Sarah (Huntington) Rockwell, was born in Lebanon, Conn., October 6th, 1809, and was prepared for college by Charles P. Otis, at Colechester. He was graduated from Yale College in 1831. He then taught school, to repay funds expended in his college course. In 1835 he came to North Carolina, and was associated with Dr. Simeon Colton, in the Donaldson Academy, in Fayetteville, for two years. He was received under care of Fayetteville Presbytery, N. C., in 1837, studied in Princeton and Columbia seminaries, and in June, 1839, was licensed by his Presbytery. He supplied the Fayetteville Church a short time, and in the Fall of 1840 went to Fourth Creek (now Statesville) Church, of which he was ordained pastor by Concord Presbytery, November, 1841. In 1850 he was elected Professor of Natural Science in Davidson College, where he remained, filling various chairs, till his election to the presidency of Concord Female College, in Statesville, N. C., in 1868. The college soon after changing hands, he engaged a stated supply of several churches—Bethesda, Bethany, Tabor, Fifth Creek, Concord. He still resides (May, 1883) in Iredell county, N. C.

In June, 1882, the University of North Carolina conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

Dr. Rockwell has used his pen frequently, in contributions to various periodicals—the North Carolina Presbyterian, the Southern Presbyterian Review, and the Historical Magazine, of Morrisania, N. Y. The titles of his more important articles are "The Alphabet of Natural Theology;" "The Prophetic Period of 1260 Years;" "Sketch of Rev. Stephen Frontis;" "The Early Conversion of Children;" "Final Destiny of the Globe;" "Sketch of Rev. John Thompson;" "Second Classical School in Iredell." These titles are selected from more than one hundred important articles published by Dr. Rockwell. He has been a diligent student all his life, and has gathered vast stores of knowledge in many departments, but has a special fondness for antiquarian research, and unusual lines of thought. He has always been a faithful preacher, either as pastor, in his earlier days, or as supply, during his educational labors. He is still working, with unabated zeal, in the vineyard of the Master.

Rockwell, Joel Edson, D. D., the son of Warren and Sarah R. Wells) Rockwell, was born at Salisbury, Vt., May 4th, 1816. He graduated at Amherst College, Mass., August 24th, 1837, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, June 30th, 1841. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Columbia, April 21st, 1841, and was ordained and installed, by the same Presbytery, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Valatie, N. Y., October 13th, 1841. He remained with this charge until called to the Hanover Street Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, Del., over which he was installed, May 4th, 1847. On the 13th of February, 1851, he was installed pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., then located on Willoughby street. Here he remained seventeen years, and under his ministry eight hundred were added to the church, of which nearly one-half was by profession of their faith. In September, 1868, he removed from Brooklyn to Stapleton, L. I., at the call of the First Presbyterian Church of Edgewater, and after a few years' service as pastor, he passed to his reward in heaven.

Dr. Rockwell was a constant contributor to the religious and secular press. He was the author of a number of valuable works, such as, "Sketches of the Presbyterian Church," "Young Christian Warned," etc. Besides these, he published a number of sermons and addresses, delivered on special occasions. He was for some years a member of the Board of Publication, and at one time was the editor of "The Sabbath-School Visitor," published by the Board. He was appointed a member of the Committee on the Reunion of the Presbyterian Church by the General Assembly of 1867, in the place of the Rev. Dr. Krebs, who was incapacitated by the illness which terminated in his lamented death. He was a good preacher, vigorous writer, and useful man.

"Rocky Mountain Presbyterian, The." An illustrated Home Mission monthly, Sheldon Jackson, D. D., editor and proprietor, Denver, Colorado. This monthly was established March, 1872. It commenced an eight-page paper, with four columns to the page, which was 12x17 inches in size. From March to December, 1872, it was printed at Bellefonte, Pa. January, 1873, it was removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, and the form changed to a four-page paper, with seven columns to the page, which was 17x24 inches in size. January, 1874, a weekly edition was commenced, and continued through the year. In connection with the weekly there was a special illustrated monthly edition, devoted to Home Missions. January, 1875, the paper returned to its monthly form, giving increasing attention to its illustrations.

During 1879 it was adopted as the official organ of the recently formed Woman's Executive Committee for Home Missions, the paper having been the originator and chief promoter of the movement. The size being found inconvenient for use at mission meetings it was changed, in January, 1880, to a sixteen-page, with three columns to a page, the pages being 9x12 inches.

Having outgrown its original field in the Rocky Mountains, the name was changed, January, 1881, to Presbyterian Home Missions. January, 1882, the paper, with its mail lists, was presented by the editor to the Board of Home Missions, and is now published by them, under the title of The Presbyterian Home Missionary.

During the years that it was published by Dr. Jackson its typographical neatness and admirable arrangement were due to the interest in it taken by Dr. J. G. Monfort & Sons, of Cincinnati. The editor was so situated that he could do nothing more than furnish the material, and leave his publishers to arrange, issue and mail. The editor's office was in his carpet bag. One month he would be able to sit in his study at Denver and prepare the copy, the next month he might be exploring in Montana, and stopping off the coach a day to prepare in some log cabin the copy for the next paper. The third month, reaching Salt Lake city, he would use the comfortable study of Bros. Welch or McNiece, in which to prepare copy. If east, holding conventions, the copy would be mailed, it may be, from Albany or Detroit. Then, at another time, from Alaska or Arizona. For years no two successive copies would be prepared at the same place. It was an attractive, progressive and instructive mission journal, exerted a wide-spread and growing influence upon the denomination in mission affairs, and created a new and more intelligent sympathy in home missions.

Rocky Spring Church, Franklin county, Pa. After a ride of four miles from Chambersburg, over the tortuous road which runs over the Slate Hills, toward Strasburg, we approach the venerable edifice. It stands near the brow of a hill, which slopes gradually away in the distance, towards the east. At the foot of the hill, below the church, on the west, the Rocky Spring gushes from the hill, and spreads out into a broad sheet of cold and clear water in the vale, and after forming a pretty cascade, by falling over an embankment, soon becomes lost among the luxuriant meadows, and quietly wends its way to Back Creek, into which it empties.

The church is an ancient and time-worn structure, which stands upon the hillside, without any ornament near it except a single large hickory tree, which grows near the north end, and a small cluster of trees a few rods distant, toward the southwest. Its form is nearly square, and is, in size, about 60 by 48 feet. It is built of brick, upon a stone foundation, which is several feet in height. On the southern side is the front of the church. There are two doors by which it is entered. On the northern side there is no entrance, but there are four windows, between two of which is a small square one, which is immediately behind the pulpit. The window shutters are made of plain boards, without any panel-work, and, together with the doors, were formerly painted red. Time has, however, nearly removed the paint, and leaves them of a dark rust color. The doors are somewhat more elaborately made, and, like the window-shutters, exhibit the same evidences of age. The arches of brickwork above the windows and doors were painted red, and form a contrast with the rest of the building. There is no enclosure around the building, which stands alone, upon the barren and dreary hill. The inside is in correspondence with the exterior of the edifice. As we enter, we observe the pews, formed very much like those of modern times, with high, straight backs, and without any paint. Their arrangement is like that in our modern churches. The aisles are paved with bricks, and in some places, these having crumbled away, limestones have been substituted. The broad space in front of the pulpit, and between it and the pews, is also paved with brick. The floors of the pews are boarded. The pulpit is old-fashioned and rough. It is of a circular form, and extends some feet from the wall. Above, there is an oval-shaped sounding-board, or canopy, on which is a rude representation of a star. A plain wooden casement extends on either side of the pulpit, which, together with the pulpit, is painted a deep blue color. The pulpit is entered by a staircase, towards which a passage, with railing on each side, leads. In front of and below the pulpit is the chancel. It is a square enclosure, with board walls, and contains an old-fashioned walnut table, a bench formed of heavy timber, with rough supports, a hickory chair, and a couple of benches attached to the sides of the enclosure. The ceiling is arched, and at the place where the walls and the ceiling meet there is placed all around the room a narrow strip of board, which, together with the edges of the window cases, is painted blue, similar to the pulpit.

The original church, which was built about the time the ancient congregation was organized, stood between the present building and the graveyard. It stood pretty much in the relation to the points of the compass which the new church sustains, the front being towards the south, and smaller ends facing the east and west. It was erected about one hundred and forty years ago, and was a rough log building, a story and a half high, and was built in the rude style of architecture peculiar to that early day. It had one row of windows on the lower story, the lights of which were small and few in number. It was entered by two doors, which were placed in the eastern and western ends of the house. The doors were small and single; they were made of plain boards, without any panel-work.

The present building was erected in the year 1794, by Mr. Walter Beatty. The old building answered the purpose of a place of worship very well for some years, but as the congregation increased, it was found necessary to build an addition to the house. This was formed by constructing a small square building, which was attached to the south side of the church, and which extended only one-half the length of the main structure. The roof was then continued over it from the original edifice. When completed, the wall between it and the church was sawn away. There were no windows in this addition, and it was consequently poorly supplied with light. In a few years after this alteration the increasing size of the congregation demanded still more room, and another similar addition was built by its side. These alterations gave the house a singular, slanting appearance towards the south end.

About the time the original church was erected, there was also built a small, rough log structure, about fifteen feet square, with a wide fire-place, and a large wooden chimney, covered with mortar, and extending nearly along the whole end of the house. This structure stood close beside the church at the northeastern end, and was called the "study house." It was originally built as a receptacle for the saddles of the members in rainy weather, as, in those early days, they generally came to church on horseback, carriages and other vehicles being rarely used. In later years the minister was accustomed to use it in preparing for the services, when he chanced to arrive before the hour at which they began. The church Session also met here and arranged the business of the church and examined candidates for admission to membership. After service, the minister would resort to it, to prepare for any afternoon service which was to be held. The "study house" stood for nearly a hundred years.

It was in the old log church that its first pastor, the Rev. Mr. Craighead, preached for many years. There it was that, in glowing terms, he preached Jesus Christ, the only hope of salvation, and, after the delivery of his sacred message, in eloquent and patriotic strains, exhorted the youth of the congregation to rise up and join the noble band then engaged, under the immortal Washington, in struggling to free our beloved country from British oppression. It is related that, upon one occasion, from the pulpit, the patriotic preacher declaimed in such burning and powerful terms against the wrongs we then were suffering, that, after one glowing description of the duty of the men, the whole congregation rose from their seats and declared their willingness to march to the conflict. There was but one, tradition says, in the entire assembly, who was not overcome by the stirring appeal that was made, and that was an aged female, in whom maternal affection, recently caused to bleed, completely mastered both a sense of propriety and the love of liberty. "Stop, Mr. Craighead," she exclaimed, "I jist want to tell ye, agin you loss such a purty boy as I have, in the war, ye will na be so keen for fighting; quit talking, and gang yersel to the war. Yer always preaching to the boys about it, but I dinna think ye'd be very likely to gang yersel. Jist ga and try it."

In answer to an urgent appeal by the pastor to his congregation, to hesitate no longer which to choose, cowardly inactivity or the noble part of brave defenders of their country's rights, on the following Monday, a company was organized, and after an earnest prayer to the Almighty, the Reverend captain placed himself at their head and marched off to battle. They joined the army of Washington, and gave undoubted evidence that their courage was of no mean order. Their captain engaged vigorously in the war, and during the hours spent in camp habitually acted as chaplain to the soldiers. After the war was over he returned to his charge, and faithfully watched over the congregation until the period of his death, which occurred in 1799.

The graveyard at Rocky Spring, filled with the mortal remains of the pious and patriotic, is large, and is enclosed by a rough post-and-rail fence. Over the gateway is a yoke, extending from one post to the opposite one. Along the fence, on the outside of the yard, near the gate, stand three or four oak trees. These, with two poplar and wild-cherry trees in the southern end, and a single cedar near the centre of the yard, are the only trees about the enclosure. We are sorry to say that this destruction of trees is not natural, but is owing to the destructive propensities of uncultivated man. As we enter the graveyard from the gate, at a distance of a few feet from the fence, we meet the resting-place of the first regular minister of the church. When the tomb was first built, it consisted of a brick wall, upon which a large flat slab of gray stone was placed. Through the effects of time the walls have sunk, and the slab now lies upon the ground, broken into several pieces, from which, when placed in their proper position, the following inscription may be read:—

"In memory of Rev. John Craighead, who departed this life the 20th day of April, A. D. 1799, aged 37 years. Ordained to preach the gospel, and installed pastor of the congregation of Rocky Spring, on the 13th of April, A. D. 1798. He was a faithful and zealous servant of Jesus Christ."

The oldest tombstone in the burying-ground is of slate, has a venerable and antique appearance, and in the form of the letters and the mode of spelling, differs materially from the custom of later times. The stone is nearly round on the top, and contains a rim cut into it in a rough manner. Above the inscription appears a representation of an angel's face and wings. The inscription is as follows:—

"Here lies the body of John Burns, who departed this life December 23, 1760, aged 79 years."

A marble slab, with the inscription—

"In memory of James McElmout, Esq., who departed this life July 19th, 1809, aged 72 years."

makes the resting place of one who was a Major in the Revolutionary War, and became distinguished as a brave and accomplished soldier.

In the extreme southwestern corner of the burial ground, beneath the poplar trees, are a number of pieces which form a very beautiful monument, although, for some reason now unknown, they were never erected into a tomb. On the topmost slab are the following inscription and verses:—

"Jane Cooper, was born 1st of July, 1768, and (J. N.) died, on the 20th evening of June, 1796.

"Jane Nicholson's respected dust, now here,
Once fixed esteemed, and shared health's warmest cheer;
Her life seemed fixed, as but with age to cease,
Till fatal accident produced disease.
Young, wise and good, she was her children's guide,
Bless to her partner, joy to all allied.
From tender youth she obeyed, with love and awe,
Reason's religion, and her parents' law;
So grew her dignifying strength of mind,
Though firm, yet soft and happily refined,
No affectation, pride, or passion, stained,
Nor harbored ill, her candid breast proclaimed.

"Her face, expressive, spoke each thought sincere,
Truth and its friends, to her, were ever dear.
Eager she prized each social, virtuous joy,
But prudent shunned the haunts which peace destroy.

"For others' woes, her kindest sorrows flow'd,
Or for the impious, wandering from the true God.
Is she perhaps your guardian Angel, still O children! live as would obey her will,
So shall you join her on that happy shore,
Where death or grief will visit you no more.

In another part of the burial ground are three graves, upon the respective headstones of which, the following initials are rudely chiseled:—

N. L.
M. L.

A few paces from these is a marble stone, which is erected

"In memory of Mary, the wife of James Gibson, who departed this life April 25th, 17—, in the seventy-first year of her age.

"All you that come my grave to see
Prepare for death and follow me,
Prepare for death, make no delay,
For suddenly I was snatched away."

The first regular minister of Rocky Spring Church was the Rev. John Craighead, who, with others sustaining the same relation, are elsewhere noticed in this volume. As already stated, he joined the army of General Washington, in New Jersey. Of his valor there can be no question. "He fought and preached alternately," says a friend, in noticing his character, "breasted all danger, relying on his God and the justice of his cause for protection." He was somewhat celebrated as an humorist. His friend, the Rev. Dr. Cooper, of Middle Spring Church, who was also, it is believed, captain of a company, was with him in the same mess, as they were congenial spirits. One day, it is said, going into battle, a cannon ball struck a tree near him, a splinter of which nearly knocked him down. "Bless me!" exclaimed Dr. Cooper, "you were nearly knocked to staves." "Oh, yes," was his reply, "and though you are a Cooper, you could not have set me up."

After Mr. Craighead's decease a vacancy existed in the congregation for about one year, when the Rev. Francis Herron, afterwards the Rev. Dr. Herron, of the First Church, Pittsburg, was ordained and installed April 9th, 1800, pastor of the congregation, and continued so for about ten years.

Dr. Herron was succeeded by the Rev. John McKnight, D. D., who ministered to the people for several years, who was also succeeded by his son, the Rev. John McKnight, D. D., in a pastorate of several years' duration. His successor was the Rev. A. K. Nelson, who was installed pastor of "Campbellstown and Rocky Spring," in 1810, and had charge of these churches for a number of years. The latter has long been without any regular supply for its pulpit. Once it occupied an important position among the churches in the Cumberland Valley. People resorted to Rocky Spring, from Loudon, Mercersburg, Greencastle, Chambersburg, Culbertson's Row, Greenvillage, Roxbury, Orrstown, Strasburg, and from the whole valley along the mountain foot, extending nearly to Shippensburg. When there chanced to be no preaching at Middle Spring, the people of that congregation were accustomed to worship here. But the original settlers have long since died, and their descendants, to a considerable extent, have moved to other regions, and persons from other places (particularly Germans) have taken their places. These, generally, belong to other denominations, and have deserted this ancient temple of the Most High. Then, again, other churches have sprung up in the neighboring towns, and many of those who formerly attended at Rocky Spring can now enter the sanctuary nearer their homes, without the inconvenience of riding several miles, as was formerly necessary. All these circumstances have conspired to produce the present forsaken and desolate condition of the church, and its doom seems inevitable. A few short years only will have elapsed before the stranger will stand by the tottering walls on the hill-top, and sadly meditate upon the past history of the sacred pile. Then the descendants of the old congregation will have gone, and no one will be able to recount the many stirring events connected with it in former years, or reverentially commemorate its departing glory.

Rodgers, Rev. James L., is a native of Shippenburg, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1817. After completing his theological studies at Princeton Seminary he was installed, August 31st, 1851, pastor of Mt. Joy and Donegal churches, in Lancaster county, Pa. Here he labored for a few years, acceptably and successfully. Mr. Rodgers, who has a fine capacity as an instructor, has for a long time been teaching advanced scholars in his flourishing institution, Springfield, Ohio, and was for a year a stated supply at Yellow Spring Church.

Rodgers John, D. D., was born in Boston, August 5th, 1727. His parents removed to Philadelphia in 1728. During the first visit of Whitefield to Philadelphia, in 1739, while preaching at night on the court-house steps, young Rodgers pressed near, and held a lantern for his accommodation. Absorbed and deeply interested, he became so much agitated as to be scarcely able to stand, the lantern fell from his hand, and was dashed to pieces. When little more than twelve years old he became hopefully pious.

Mr. Rodgers, resolving to enter the ministry, became a student, in 1743, in the school under the care of the Rev. Samuel Blair, at Fagg's Manor. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, October 14th, 1747. He spent the summer of 1748 in Somerset county, Md., where, in a very uncommon degree, his labors were blessed. He was installed pastor at St. George's, Del., March 16th, 1749. Here the congregation rapidly enlarged; a new house of worship was erected, and was soon too strait for them. The Forest Church, near Middletown, had a third part of his time. In these congregations he was very zealous and successful, nor did he neglect the vacancies hopelessly sinking out of existence all along the Peninsula.

Mr. Rodgers, having declined, in 1751, an invitation to visit New York with a view to settlement, he was called thither in January, 1765, and under the advice of Synod he accepted the call. His pastoral relation to St. George's was dissolved May, 1770, 1765, and he was installed in his new charge September 4th. A considerable revival of religion almost immediately ensued; a large number were brought to the knowledge of the truth.

In the close of February, 1776, Dr. Rodgers, with many others, removed their families from New York, expecting that a speedy effort would be made to seize the city and hold it for the Crown. He became chaplain of Gen. Heath's brigade, in April, and on resigning, spent the winter in Georgia. On his return to New York the parsonage was gone, having been consumed in the great fire; the Wall Street Church had been converted into barracks, and the Brick Church into a hospital, and left in a ruined state. Dr. Rodgers preached in St. Paul's and St. George's Episcopal churches, which had been kindly offered for his use, alternately, from November, 1783, till June, 17—.

Dr. Rodgers was the Moderator of the first General Assembly, in 1789. After 1803 he ceased to preach more than once on the Sabbath. He preached for the last time in September, 1809. On May 7th, 1811, in his eighty-fourth year, he entered into rest. His influence, in his old age, was most healthful, and kept alive in our Church a remembrance of the years of the right hand of the Most High, a sense of the importance of revivals, and a longing for their return. He lived to see the gloomy clouds that hung over our land so ominously for years after the Revolution, roll away, and to witness the enlargement and prosperity of our Church, beyond all the most sanguine expectations of his youth.

Rodgers, Dr. John Richardson Bayard, was an elder in the First Presbyterian Church of New York city for a long time. He was a son of the distinguished clergyman, Rev. John Rodgers, D.D., of New York. He received his degree of Doctor of Medicine in Edinburgh, and became a practitioner of medicine in New York city, and was for many years the leading physician in the city and a professor in Columbia College. He was distinguished for his benevolence and high Christian character. Dr. Rodgers was the father of the late eminent surgeon, J. Kearny Rodgers, of New York, and of the late Rev. Ravaud K. Rodgers, D.D., of New Jersey. He died in 1833.

Rodgers, Ravaud Kearney, D. D., was born in New York city, November 3d, 1796. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1815, and at Princeton Seminary in 1818. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 18th, 1818; spent his first year of ministerial labor in the West as a missionary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Troy, March 14th, 1821. Before his ordination he served the churches of Sandy Hill and Glen's Falls, N. Y.; as stated supply from April, 1820, until he was ordained on the day above mentioned, and, on the same day, was installed as their pastor. Here he labored until March 9th, 1830, as an ardent, earnest, noble young preacher of the Word. May 5th, 1830, he became pastor of the Church at Boundbrook, N. J., and continued to labor there forty-four years, until, overtaken by the growing infirmities of advanced age, he was released, at his own request, October 21st, 1874. Soon after he removed to Athens, Ga., where his only daughter, the wife of Robert L. Bloomfield, Esq., resides, where he spent the calm and beautiful evening of a long and honored life. His death occurred January 12th, 1879.

Few ministers of the Presbyterian Church were more widely known or more universally loved and respected than Dr. Rodgers. As a companion, he was one of the most interesting and agreeable of men. On public occasions he was prominent as a speaker. He was always a useful member of ecclesiastical bodies, from his wonderful knowledge of the law and practice of the Church. As Stated Clerk of the Synod of New Jersey for many years, he was unrivaled in the discharge of all official duty. As a pastor, he was a model. He knew all his people, even the young children and domestics, and was their trusted counsellor and confidential friend. As a preacher, his sermons were instructive and fervent, and were delivered with energy and impressiveness. He was always a hard worker, industrious and untiring until very near his end, and he was a truly pious man. He carried, everywhere, a heart warm with the love of Christ. He lived in the perpetual sunshine of his Saviour's presence, and rejoiced to be about His work.

Roe, Azel, D. D., was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, in 1760, and two years after was ordained. In 1763 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Woodbridge, N. J., afterwards connected with Metuchin. During the Revolutionary war he proved his patriotism in many ways. He graduated at Princeton College in 1756, and was a trustee of the college from 1778 to 1807. The manners of Dr. Roe were more than ordinarily graceful and dignified. His preaching was distinguished for substantial excellence, rather than those qualities which attract the multitude. He was universally and highly esteemed as a pastor, and was in charge of the same flock for fifty-four years. He died in November, 1815.

Rogers, Ebenezer Platt, D.D., was born in New York city, December 1st, 1817. He graduated from Yale College in 1837; studied at Princeton Seminary nearly one year, 1837-8; finished his theological course under the direction of Dr. L. H. Atwater, at Fairfield, Conn., and Dr. Joel Hawes, at Hartford, Conn., and was licensed by the South Association of Litchfield county, Conn., June 30th, 1840, and ordained by the Hampton Association, November 4th, 1840. His successive fields of labor were: 1. The Congregational Church at Chicopee Falls, Mass., from November 4th, 1840 to April 10th, 1843. 2. The Edwards' Congregational Church at Northampton, Mass., from May 17th, 1843 to November 21th, 1846. 3. The First Presbyterian Church at Augusta, Ga., from December 10th, 1847 to April 6th, 1851. 4. The Seventh Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, from May 3d, 1854 to October 1st, 1856. 5. The First Reformed Dutch Church of Albany, N. Y., from November 19th, 1856 to May 12th, 1862. 6. Lastly, the South Reformed Dutch Church in the city of New York, from June 15th, 1862 to April 19th, 1881, when he was released, because of ill health. Dr. Rogers died October 23d, 1881. His last days were full of joy in God as his strength and hope. He was an amiable, genial, polished Christian gentleman, warmly beloved by his ministerial brethren and by all the congregations he successively served. As a preacher he was lucid, impressive, able, eloquent and thoroughly Scriptural.

Rogers, Rev. Thornton, was born of Presbyterian parents, in the county of Albemarle, Va., December 24th, 1793. His classical education was received at the classical schools of Dr. James Waddel and Mr. William Robertson. He was made a ruling elder at an early age, under the ministrations of the late Rev. William J. Armstrong, D. D. His occasional addresses in private meetings were so pertinent and excellent as to lead some of his friends to suggest to him the idea of devoting himself to the ministry, and he finally yielded to the suggestion, and, after prosecuting his theological studies under many disadvantages, was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery, in 1829. He continued to reside on his small farm, and to preach to the people in the neighborhood, who heard him with great pleasure and profit. But he was not permitted to serve them long. He died just one year after his ordination, in 1833. He was an eminently devout and godly man, and his death-bed presented a wonderful illustration of the all-sustaining power of Christian faith.

Rollins, Hon. Edward Ashton, son of Daniel G. and Susan Binney Rollins, was born in Wakefield, New Hampshire, December 8th, 1828. He graduated at Dartmouth College, with honor, in 1851. After three years' study of the law, he was admitted to the Bar, in 1851, and commenced the practice of his profession in Great Falls. The following year he was elected cashier of the Somersworth Bank. In 1856 he resumed the practice of law, and formed a partnership with Hon. Ichabod G. Jordan. In the Spring of 1860 Mr. Rollins was elected to the Legislature, from Somersworth; was re-elected the two following years, and was called upon to preside, as Speaker, over the largest legislative body in America, in 1861 and 1862, when the nation was in the turmoil of a great civil war. In 1863 he was appointed by President Lincoln Cashier of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The following year he was appointed Deputy Commissioner. In 1865 he was appointed Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and held this office until March 8th, 1869, when, completely worn out and exhausted, by mental strain and pressure of business, he insisted upon his resignation being accepted.

HON. EDWARD ASHTON ROLLINS

In the Summer of 1869 Mr. Rollins was elected Vice President of the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, located in Philadelphia, and in 1872 he was elected President of that Institution. After resigning this position and spending some time in foreign travel, he conceived the idea of establishing a new National Bank—the Centennial National Bank—and was elected its President, which office he continues to hold. Mr. Rollins is an exemplary, active and useful elder of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia; also a trustee of "The Presbyterian House," and a manager of "The Presbyterian Board of Publication." His whole plan of life is founded upon deep religious convictions, which have never ceased to control his private and his official career. For his culture, social qualities and great integrity, he is held in high esteem by all who know him.

Romeyn, John Brodhead, D.D., was the only son of the Rev. Dirick Romeyn, D.D., and was born at Marbletown, Ulster county, N. Y., November 8th, 1777. He graduated at Columbia College, with high honor, in 1795; studied theology mainly under the direction of his father, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Classis of Albany, June 20th, 1798. In May, 1799, he was set apart to the pastoral charge of the Reformed Dutch Church in Rhinebeck, N. Y., where he labored more than four years, with great popularity and success. In November, 1803, he accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church in the city of Schenectady, where he remained but a single year, having, in November, 1804, received a call from the First Presbyterian Church in Albany, which, on the whole, he thought it his duty to accept. At Albany he sustained himself in his important position for four years, laboring with great zeal and acceptance.

In 1808 Mr. Romeyn accepted a call to the new church in Cedar street, New York, which had just been established. In 1809 the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the College of New Jersey. In New York, within a short period, he gathered around him one of the largest and most respectable congregations in the city. Here he labored, with marked success, until his death, February 22d, 1825. Dr. Romeyn's mind was of a high order. As a preacher, he stood eminent, in some respects primus inter pares, among the great lights New York could boast of at that day. Large audiences waited on his ministry, and it was crowned with success. He published a large number of occasional sermons.

Rommel, Rev. William Cooper, was born at Elizabeth, N. J., December 1st, 1816; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1848, and was, for a time, Tutor in the Institution. He studied theology at Union Seminary, New York, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, June 20th, 1852. He was stated supply at Helena, Montana, 1852-56, and since 1877 has been the faithful and efficient pastor of Gaston Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

Root, Rev. Lucius Insley, son of Charles and Elizabeth Ward (Douglass) Root, was born at Brutus, Cayuga county, N. Y., August 16th, 1820; graduated at Union College, in 1847, studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, April 15th, 1849. Mr. Root was Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Carroll College, at Waukesha, Wis., which he largely aided in founding, from November 1st, 1849, until he resigned, November 1st, 1852. He then preached, first as stated supply and then as pastor elect, at Saline, Mich., from April, 1853, to April, 1856. He next labored at Bay City, Mich., as stated supply, from May, 1856, until installed as pastor, November 17th, 1858, and on until released from this charge, February 14th, 1860, teaching also a boys' school, at the same time and place, from 1856 to 1858. His fields of labor after leaving Bay City were as follows: At Ionia, Mich., as pastor elect, from January, 1860; he was installed there as pastor August 9th, 1860, and was released July 17th, 1861. He was installed as pastor at Medina, N. Y., October 31st, 1861, and was released June 27th, 1863. He was stated supply at Upper Alton, Ill., from November 1st, 1865, to November 1st, 1871. He was next at Shelbyville, Ill., where he was installed as pastor, May 2d, 1872, and was released from his charge April 9th, 1874. He then became pastor at Greencastle, Ind., where he was installed May 19th, 1874, and was released January 31st, 1876. At Edwardsville, Ill., he was stated supply from March 1st, 1876; was installed as pastor April 8th, 1877, and was released March 3d, 1879. Soon after this latter date he entered upon the Professorship of Mental and Moral Science in Park College, at Parkville, Mo., and had been engaged in his new duties just one month when he died, very suddenly, May 1st, 1879. Mr. Root was greatly esteemed and beloved by all who knew him. He was a consistent Christian, a devoted husband, a loving and tender parent, an unwavering believer in the divine promises, a diligent, faithful and acceptable minister of the gospel.

Rosbrugh, Rev. John, was born in Scotland, in 1711. In 1740 he settled near Danville, N. J. When past middle life he entered the ministry, graduating at Princeton College in 1761, preaching in Warren county, N. J., in the three united charges of Oxford, Greenwich, and what is now Washington, until 1769, when he was transferred to the churches of Allen Township and Mount Bethel, in Pennsylvania, where David Blainert had been located twenty-two years before.

When, in December, 1776, the Provincial Council of Safety of Pennsylvania issued their call for troops for the Continental service, Mr. Rosbrugh enlisted a company in his own congregation, and at their head marched to Philadelphia within a week from the date of the call. On December 26th he was commissioned by the Council as chaplain of the Third Battalion of the Northampton County Militia. In the memorable engagement at Trenton, N. J., on the 2d of January, 1777, he fell, pierced with bayonet wounds, he received at the onset of the Hessians. Dying so early in the war, he has been fitly termed the "clerical martyr of the Revolution." He was a man of great activity and energy, genial and cheerful. Many of his descendants reside in New York and Canada. Numerous anecdotes illustrating his character are given in the account of his life and labors, written by Rev. John C. Clyde, "Rosbrugh, a Tale of the Revolution," 1880, pp. 93.

Rose, Rev. John McAden, second son of John M. and Jane S. Rose, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., October 16th, 1849. He is the great grandson of Rev. Hugh McAden, pioneer Presbyterian minister in North Carolina, and first Moderator of Orange Presbytery, and nephew of Rev. James H. McNeil, former Corresponding Secretary of the American Bible Society, N. Y., and of Rev. George McNeil, the founder of the North Carolina Presbyterian.

He was educated at Davidson College, N. C., and the University of North Carolina; entered Union Theological Seminary, Va., in the Fall of 1870; licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery, Synod of North Carolina, June 5th, 1872; graduated at Union Theological Seminary, May, 1873; ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, Synod of Virginia, and installed pastor of Portsmouth, Va., Presbyterian Church, December 7th, 1873. February 1st, 1884, he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Memphis, Tenn.; February 1st, 1883, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Goldsboro, N. C.

Mr. Rose is of pleasing, graceful manners, quick intuitions and perceptions, and a wide-awake, working pastor. He is of strong convictions and ready debating powers, a good presbyter, a clear, logical, earnest preacher, and, though ordained but ten years, has already reached a position of influence and distinction.

Rossiter, Rev. Stealy B., was born at Berne, Albany county, New York, May 22d, 1842. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1865, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1869. He preached a short time to the Congregational Church at Elizabeth, N. J. He was installed pastor of the North Presbyterian Church, New York, September 21st, 1873. This is his present charge. Mr. Rossiter is frank and courteous in manner. He is blessed with a good judgment in what he undertakes to do. He is earnestly devoted to the work of saving souls. In the pulpit he is fervent and fluent, and preaches at once with sincerity and effectiveness.

Rou, Louis, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister, pastor of the French Church in New York for forty years, 1710 to 1750. He was born in Holland in 1684, and was the son of a distinguished French refugee in that country, Jean Rou. Louis was ordained to the gospel ministry by the Synod of the Walloon Churches of Holland, and was recommended to the French Church in New York, by the Consistory of the French Church in London. He was a man of learning and ability. He died in New York, 25th of December, 1750, in his sixty-seventh year.

Rowland, Rev. John, was a native of Wales. He studied at Neshaminy; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, September 7th, 1738, and on the same day an application was made to the Presbytery for his services, by the united congregations of Maidenhead (Lawrence) and Hopewell (Pennington). Presbytery, in receiving Mr. Rowland under their care, having violated a standing rule of the Synod, which required that every candidate, before being taken on trial by any Presbytery, should submit himself to an examination on his classical and scientific attainments by a committee of the Synod, this fact produced dissension among the congregations to which he was called. Mr. Rowland, however, accepted the call, and after a time, his labors among them were attended with an extraordinary blessing, in a great revival of religion in both these congregations.

When the division took place Mr. Rowland was sent by New Brunswick Presbytery to the New Side congregations in Pennsylvania, beginning at Fagg's Manor, going as far as Pennsborough (Carlisle) and Conococheague (Chambersburg), and returning by way of Pigeon Run, Christina Bridge and Greenwich, in West Jersey. His labors during this mission were largely blessed. He settled at Charleston and New Providence, Chester county, Pa. Mr. Davies spoke of him, to Mr. Finley, as eminently holy, and peculiarly endowed with abilities, natural, supernatural, and acquired, to win souls to the Saviour. Dr. Henderson, of Frechold, says he possessed a commanding eloquence and many estimable qualities. Whitefield said, "There was much of the simplicity of Christ discernible in his behavior."

"Though Mr. Rowland," says Dr. Archibald Alexander, "filled a considerable space in the Church, while he lived, as he was a Boanerges in denouncing the terrors of the law against impenitent sinners, inasmuch that he acquired among the irreligious the title, so often given to faithful preachers, 'the hell-fire Rowland,' yet no word or memorial of the close of his life remains. He seems not to have been married, and to have died early."

Rue, Rev. Joseph, a native of New Jersey, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1784, and was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Pennington, N. J. Here he remained a faithful pastor for forty-one years. He died in 1826.

Ruffner, Henry, D. D., LL. D., the son of Col. David and Ann Ruffner, was born in the Valley of Virginia, in what is now Page county, January 19th, 1789. He graduated at Washington College, Va., in 1817, and commenced his labors as a school teacher in Mereer Academy, Charlestown, Va.

In 1819 he was elected Professor in Washington College, Va. He studied theology with George A. Baxter, D. D.; was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, in 1819, and took charge of the Church of Timber Ridge, Va. During the thirty years of his connection with Washington College he successively filled every Professor's chair, and was its President for ten or twelve years. In 1848 he was compelled, by ill health, to resign his position. The next year he left Lexington, and in the year following that retired to a mountain farm in Kanawha county, to recruit his health. Here he preached, as he was able, to the poor people scattered through the hills. After a few years he took charge of the Church in Malden, on the Kanawha river, six miles above Charleston, but was compelled, by ill health, to give up preaching the year before his death. Whilst he was in Washington College, he, for many years, preached to the churches of Timber Ridge and Fairfield, six and twelve miles from Lexington. When they were provided with a pastor he took charge of New Monmouth, three miles from his home. In all his charges he was greatly beloved, and was very useful. Several revivals of religion took place under his ministry, in which many were added to the Church.

Dr. Ruffner was an untiring and enthusiastic student all his life. In learning, he had few equals, and no superiors in his native State. His preaching was always solemn and instructive, and often of the highest order. In character, he had peculiar simplicity, meekness, and unobtrusiveness. He was a man of few words, but keenly alive to the beauties of nature and of art, with strong attachments to personal friends, and great enjoyment of congenial society when released from the active duties of the college. He was a contributor to the religious press of his day, besides publishing a number of pamphlets, some of them quite important. He was the author of "The Fathers of the Desert," in two volumes, "The Predestinarian," and a volume on "Monasticism." He died at Malden, Kanawha county, Va., December 17th, 1861.

Rumple, Jethro, D. D., was born in Cabarrus county, N. C., March 10th, 1827. The first eighteen years of his life were spent on a farm, varied by attendance upon the country schools. About the age of eighteen he made a profession of religion, and soon after undertook, by his own exertions, to secure a classical education. By teaching and attending neighboring academies, he was prepared to enter Davidson College, where he graduated with distinction, in 1850. He then taught school for several years, to defray the expenses of his literary and theological education. In 1851 he was received under the care of Concord Presbytery, and the same year entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., in which the Rev. J. H. Thornwell, D. D., was then Professor of Theology, and remained two years. He was licensed by Concord Presbytery, July 31st, 1856, and was ordained by the same, January 9th, 1857, and installed pastor of Providence and Sharon churches, in Mecklenburg county, N. C. He served these churches four years, when he was called to the Presbyterian Church at Salisbury, Rowan county, N. C., in the same Presbytery, where he was installed pastor, November 21th, 1860. He has continued to be the faithful and beloved pastor of this church until the present time (May, 1883).

In both of these fields his labors have been abundantly blessed. During his pastorate of the Salisbury Church six young men have entered the ministry.

The high estimate set upon Dr. Rumple's character and abilities by his brethren is shown by the varied and responsible positions to which they have called him. For more than twenty years he has been a Trustee of Davidson College and a Director of Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. He has been a commissioner to several General Assemblies, and in Synod and Presbytery has served the Church in well nigh all the most honorable and important positions. As a pastor, he is prudent, laborious and sympathizing. As a preacher, he is earnest, clear, tender and able. As the stores of his learning increase, so does his preaching possess additional freshness and power.

Besides his pastoral and Presbyterian duties he has made excursions in the field of authorship. For the last five years, in the N. C. Presbyterian, he has been writing up the "History of Presbyterianism in North Carolina." These sketches, when completed, will be issued in a volume, giving a full account of the churches and ministers of his native State. In the meantime he published, in 1881, a "History of Rowan county, N. C."

In 1882 the University of North Carolina conferred upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity.

With mental and physical powers unimpaired by the labors of the past, and with an increasing reputation, and, above all, with a heart loyal to Christ and His truth, may his life be spared many years to serve the blessed Lord, who has been in the past his "Sun and Shield!"

Russell, Rev. Joshua L., was born in Clifton, O., September 29th, 1815, and graduated at Wittenberg College, in that State, in 1864. He was stated supply at Troy, O., in 1866; ordained by the Presbytery of Miami, August 17th, 1867; pastor at Middletown, O., 1867-72; pastor of Park Church, Dayton, 1872-76; and took charge of the Spring Garden Church, Philadelphia, in 1876; retaining the pastorate for several years. In 1883 he was installed over the Second Church, Altoona, Pa. He is a graceful writer, frequently using his pen for the periodicals of the day, and as a preacher is thorough, direct, and faithful.

Russell, Rev. Robert, was a graduate of Princeton College in 1792. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1795, and about 1797 he joined the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Allen township (now Allentown), Pa. Here Mr. Russell labored for more than a quarter of a century. He died in 1827.

Rutherford, Edward Hubbard, D. D., was born at Brownsville, Tenn., February 23d, 1831. His collegiate course was taken at Hanover College, Ind., where he graduated in 1854. He pursued his theological studies at Danville Theological Seminary, completing his course in 1857. In 1856 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Western District, Tenn., and ordained by the Presbytery of Central Mississippi in 1857. His first charge was at Vicksburg, Miss., where he remained nine years. In 1866 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Petersburg, Va., remaining there until 1872, when he took charge of what is now the Grand Avenue Presbyterian Church of St. Louis, Mo., and in 1881 he was called to the pastorate of the Southern Presbyterian Church of Paris, Ky., which charge he still retains.

Dr. Rutherford is one of the strong men in the Southern Church. He is solid and intellectual as to his matter, yet very earnest and spiritual in his manner of preaching. As a man, he is kind, sympathetic, of remarkably pleasing address, and with a manner especially magnetic and winning.

Rutter, Rev. Lindley Charles, son of David and Mary Ann (Potts) Rutter, was born at Pine Forge, Berks county, Pa., September 3d, 1807; received his classical education at Reading, Pa.; studied theology at Princeton Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 22d, 1830; and was ordained by Chillicothe Presbytery, April 6th, 1831, and installed the same day pastor of the church at Manchester, Ohio, which he had previously supplied as a licentiate for nearly a year. From this charge he was released October 4th, 1831; was installed January 29th, 1833, pastor of the united churches of Centre and Upper Perry in Pa., from which he was released December 24th, 1834; was installed pastor of the united churches of Chestnut Level and Little Britain, May 22d, 1835; was released from the church of Little Britain, April 10th, 1860, and continued pastor of the church of Chestnut Level alone until released, April 13th, 1875, on account of the failure of his health. From this time he resided, in very infirm health, among the people he had served so long and so faithfully, until his death, which occurred at Chestnut Level, Lancaster county, Pa., March 5th, 1882. He was an earnest, clear and fervent preacher of the gospel, loving the souls of his hearers and largely successful in winning them to Christ.

Ryerson, Martin, LL.D., was born in 1815, in Newton, N. J. His father was Thomas C. Ryerson, a Judge of the Supreme Court of the State, and his mother was a daughter of Robert Ogden, one of the founders of Olio Hall, Princeton College. He graduated at this college in 1833, dividing the first honor, and receiving the Latin oration. He was admitted to the Bar in 1836, and practiced in Newark, until 1841, afterward in Newton, and then in Trenton in 1853. In 1844 he was a very active member of the Convention that framed the present Constitution of New Jersey. In 1855 he was chairman of the commission appointed to revise the statutes. The next year he became a Judge of the Supreme Court, which office failing health compelled him to resign in 1858. In 1873 he was appointed, by General Grant, one of the Judges of the Court of Commissioners of the Alabama claims. He assisted in the organization of the Court, and drew up its rules, but in the Winter of 1875 was compelled, by sickness, to resign. He died on the 11th of the following June.

Judge Ryerson made a profession of religion in 1853. He at once became deeply enlisted in the work of the Church at home and abroad, in the Bible and Tract Societies, and the Sabbath school, toward all of which he liberally contributed according to his means. He was made a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, Newton, N. J. (Old School), in 1858; was for several years superintendent of the Sabbath school, and for a long time teacher of a young ladies' Bible class. He represented his Presbytery in the General Assembly, of which he was always an active and influential member. He warmly approved of the rennion and advocated it strenuously. His mind was judicial, logical, intense. His memory was very tenacious. His convictions were slowly matured, after a wide survey of a subject. He lacked imagination and sprightliness in his style of address, but this was compensated for by an earnestness, clearness and forcefulness, which made a deep impression and carried his audience with him. He warmly admired "Jay's Exercises for the Closet," which he daily read, in course. He had no taste for light literature.

Ryors, Rev. Alfred, was born on Long Island, N. Y., in 1812; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1835, and became Tutor in Lafayette College, where he spent one year. In 1836 he was elected Professor of Mathematics in the Ohio University. After studying theology privately, he was licensed, in 1838, by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia. He retained his professorship in the Ohio University until 1844, when he was elected Professor of Mathematics in the Indiana University. During this period he was ordained to preach the gospel, but was never installed as pastor over any church. In 1848 he was recalled to the Ohio University, and elected President, which office he held until 1853, when he left for the Indiana University, and became stated supply of the Church at Madison, Ind., until June, 1854, when he was elected Professor of Mathematics of Centre College, Ky. He was also stated supply for New Providence Church, Ky., and was co-pastor (elect) with Professor Green, of the Second Church, Danville, Ky. He died May 8th, 1858. Mr. Ryors was a good man, a careful writer, and as a Professor was eminently distinguished for his attainments and for the success with which he taught his classes.

Sabbath. We find a record of the original institution of the Sabbath in Gen. ii, 2, 3: "And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." God's "sanctifying" the seventh day can be nothing else and nothing less than his setting it apart from a common to a sacred use. And for whose sacred use? Beyond all doubt for theirs for whom all days were made. And in what way did he "bless" it? Certainly by ordaining it to be a day of special blessedness to those for whose observance and benefit it was thus specially separated and blest. The correctness of this interpretation is ascertained by the testimony of Him who "is Lord of the Sabbath." He affirms that "it was made for man," an early and highly important provision for the whole race, and made by the express authority and appointment of God, the Creator of man, and the rightful disposer of all days and times. It is a fact that the patriarchs, long before the Jewish Sabbath, and all, even the most ancient heathen, nations, distinguished time into weeks of seven days, which no appearances in nature could have suggested, and which, therefore, must have resulted from the early appointment of a weekly Sabbath. It is also a fact that the earliest pagan writers, particularly Homer and Hesiod, speak of the seventh day as peculiarly sacred. The latter styles this day "the illustrious light of the sun;" the former has this verse: "Then came the seventh day, which is holy." To this day of sacred rest, as ordained by God, and as known to be thus ordained, Moses referred the Israelites on the occasion of manna being miraculously furnished to them in the wilderness: "And Moses said, eat that to-day; for to-day is a Sabbath unto the Lord; to-day ye shall not find manna in the field. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, the Sabbath, in it there shall be none" (Ex. xvi, 25, 26). Moses evidently takes for granted that the people were acquainted with the institution of the Sabbath, and of this their conduct gave proof. They had been previously commanded to gather daily of the manna only what was sufficient for the daily supply of themselves and families; yet, on the day preceding the Sabbath they, of their own accord, gathered twice as much as they were wont to gather. For this no other reason can be assigned than that, aware that the seventh day was the Sabbath, they made this provision previously, that they might not violate the rest of the Sabbath. The conduct of the people and of Moses evinced a perfect knowledge of the institution, and the design of Moses was to remind them of it, and admonish them of the necessity of observing it sacredly, and that a special dispensation of manna would permit them to observe it, and distinctly show the will of God in that matter.

At Mount Sinai the Sabbath was solemnly revered and confirmed (Exod. xx, 8, 9, 10, 11). Here, when, after their fifty days' wandering in the wilderness, God gave the children of Israel the ten commandments, the language was "Remember the Sabbath-day, to keep it holy." It is not, "Sanctify the Sabbath," but "remember to sanctify it." The day was something to be remembered; it was no novel observance first given by Moses, but one long before known and of ancient date. And the reason for it runs back to the creation, and entwines itself with the original institution and blessing: "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy, for in six days the Lord thy God created the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day and hallowed it." The position which the Sabbath holds in the Decalogue proves that the day is to be universally and perpetually observed. Of the Ten Commandments given on Mount Sinai, nine are confessedly not Hebrew, nor temporary, nor ritual, but of essential duty and universal obligation, presenting, in fine, an epitome of practical religion and ethics, from which we can take nothing without leaving a lacuna to be deprecated; to which we can add nothing that would not hold a secondary place, as compared with either of the nine. With these, fourth in the series, preceded by the law which interdicts blasphemy, the most audacious of sins against the Majesty of heaven, and followed by the law which enjoins filial piety, the first and most sacred in the catalogue of relative duties and the fountain-head of all social virtues, stands the precept, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." If this be a mere provision of the Jewish ritual, why is it here, and not rather in Leviticus, along with the feast-days? Its place clearly indicates that it was regarded, at least by the author of the Pentateuch, as, like the rest, a law of divine enactment, intrinsic fitness, and universal obligation. Our Saviour and His apostles evidently take this ground. They never represent the Hebrew ritual as binding on any but the posterity of Jacob, or as permanently binding on them, but they repeatedly cite the Decalogue as of universal and perpetual obligation, and Jesus quotes it in answer to the question, "What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" He also says, without limitation or qualification, "The Sabbath was made for man," not for the Hebrews, but for all men; and in claiming as appropriate for its observance works of love and charity, he implies that there are other works, in themselves innocent and right, from which it is a duty to abstain on the Sabbath. Yet more, he cites God's beneficent activity during the Sabbath of creation, as the precedent for His own beneficent activity on the weekly Sabbath—"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work."

The change in the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day falls in with the changes that were introduced in the external organization of the Church of God at the introduction of Christianity. Everything was changed by the example and authority of the divine Author of the Christian dispensation. What was Jewish was done away, because the Gentiles were now called into the kingdom of Christ, and all monopoly of religious privileges was abolished. The rites and ceremonies of the Levitical law were repealed; the pre-figurations of that whole shadowy system were superseded by the reality, while all that could be permanently valuable was modified. The Jewish priesthood was superseded by the Christian ministry, the Jewish Passover by the Lord's Supper, the rite of circumcision by baptism, and the Jewish Sabbath by the Lord's Day.

In consequence of the change just noticed, immediately after the resurrection of Christ the disciples began to assemble on the first day of the week, and by meeting repeatedly with them on that day He gave countenance to the practice. It was continued after His ascension, and after the mission of the Holy Ghost, whose office it was to lead them into all the truth. Thus at Troas, when the disciples came together on the first day of the week, Paul preached to them (Acts xx, 7), and the time of meeting is manifestly mentioned as the usual one. On that day the Corinthians were commanded to lay by them in store as the Lord had prospered them (1 Cor. xvi, 2), and it is reasonable to think that the first day was specified as the proper time to make collections for the poor, because it was consecrated to religious duties. Christians are exhorted "not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is" (Heb. x, 25). This, of course, implies fixed times for such public acts, nor is it possible to conceive, since such public assemblies must be held on some day, that any day could more commend itself to them and to us than that which commemorates the cardinal event in the history of Christianity, the resurrection of our Lord. It is undoubtedly the same day to which the beloved disciple refers when he says, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day" (Rev. i, 10)—the day which Jesus Christ peculiarly claimed as His own, or the first day of the week, which is consecrated to His honor.

What are the facts in relation to Sabbatical observances as they now exist? With very few exceptions, the whole Christian world observes the first day of the week. We observe this day, so did our fathers, and so did generations that preceded our fathers. How is this fact to be accounted for? We trace back this usage until we find it sanctioned by the churches in the early centuries of the Christian era, according to the testimony of Ignatius, who was a companion of the apostles; Justin Martyr, who flourished at the close of the first and the beginning of the second century; Irenæus, a disciple of Polycarp; Dionysius, who lived in the time of Irenæus; Tertullian and Petavius, of the second century. We find it sanctioned by the apostles, and by our infallible Lord himself. We go back until we reach the period when a new and most gracious dispensation first marked the moral history of man, and find that the introduction of it was commemorated by the observance of this same day. We go back further still, and find the Jewish prophets anticipating this same observance, and are satisfied that, so far from detracting from the importance of the original institution, this Christian memorial gives magnitude and emphasis to the primeval Sabbath. It is scarcely credible that the King of Zion would have suffered His Church, the very Church which the Scriptures teach us is to exist in her greatest beauty under the Christian dispensation, and which is to extend her light and glory to the Gentiles, to have remained in darkness for eighteen centuries, in relation to the day on which she is to celebrate her religious festivals. It was of no small moment that her external institutions and ordinances should be rightly maintained, nor would the all-wise and all-gracious Founder of Christianity have left the weekly Sabbath, its great guardian and bulwark, without its proper place in the earth.

The Sabbath is a Necessity. Man was not made for constant and unrelieved employment. He was not formed for seven days' toil, but for six. There is an unyielding demand in his constitution for stated rest. He can no more labor a series of years without the Sabbath, than he can labor a series of days without nocturnal repose. Just as a beast of burden breaks down prematurely that is worked every day in the year, will our constitution run down if the toil of the week is not succeeded by the weekly rest which the beneficent Creator has prescribed.

The same thing is true of the mind. It can no more bear to be overworked than the body. It becomes oppressed and burdened, sinks in depression, and not unfrequently, from its mere neglect of the divinely-appointed day of rest, wanders in derangement. From this point of view the observance of the Sabbath is a duty of absolute consequence. "From a long experience of a laborious life," said Mr. Gladstone, in one of his great speeches, "I have become most deeply impressed with the belief—to say nothing of a higher feeling—that the alternations of rest and labor at the short intervals which are afforded by the merciful and blessed institution of Sunday are necessary for the retention of a man's mind and of a man's frame in a condition to discharge his duties, and it is desirable as much as possible to restrain the exercise of labor upon the Sabbath, and to secure to the people the enjoyment of the day of rest."

The necessity of the Sabbath is evident from its connection with the productiveness and profitableness of human labor. Eminent statesmen, successful merchants and enterprising manufacturers have long since conceded the need of this day, simply on the ground of political economy. It is shown, by the joint admission of employers and employees, that, in the long run, the wages of a week of seven days is only equal to the wages of six, and that the work is no more in the longer week than in the shorter. "For my own part," said Lord Macaulay, in discussing the Ten-hour bill in the House of Commons, "I have not the smallest doubt that if we and our ancestors had, during the last three centuries, worked just as hard on the Sundays as on the week-days, we should have been at this moment a poorer people and a less civilized people than we are, that there would have been less production than there has been, that the wages of the laborer would have been lower than they are, and that some other nation would have been now making cotton stuffs and woolen stuffs and cutlery for the whole world."

The Sabbath is a necessity for the best interests of the working classes. Suppose the day be abstracted from the world, and how sad to this important portion of the community would be the result. Think of labor thus going on in one monotonous and continuous and eternal cycle, limbs forever on the rack, the fingers forever playing, the eyeballs forever straining, the brow forever sweating, the feet forever plodding, the brain forever throbbing, the shoulders forever stooping, the loins forever aching, and the mind forever scheming. Think of the beauty it would efface, of the merry-heartedness it would extinguish, of the giant strength it would tame, of the resources of nature it would exhaust, of the aspirations it would crush, of the sickness it would breed, of the projects it would wreck, of the groans it would extort, of the lives it would immolate, of the cheerless graves it would prematurely dig. Think of what toiling and moiling there would be, what sweating and fretting, grinding and hewing, weaving and spinning, sowing and gathering, mowing and reaping, raising and building, digging and planting, unloading and storing, striving and struggling, in the garden and in the field, in the granary and in the barn, in the factory and in the mill, in the warehouse and in the shop, on the mountain and in the ditch, on the roadside and in the woods, in the city and in the country, on the sea and on the shore, on the earth in days of brightness and of gloom, and no day of rest!

Now, in contrast with this state of things, think of the blessings which the Sabbath brings with it to the class which we are describing. How do they rejoice when the cares and perplexities of the week are ended, so that they may withdraw themselves for a little while from life's busy scene. The day of rest dawns upon them with benignant lustre. It resenes them for a season from everything painful in the inferiority of their allotment, and reminds them that, whatever be the depression of their civil condition, they may still be the Lord's freemen. They visit the same sanctuary, and join in the same songs of praise with those on whom they feel themselves in a measure dependent. They enjoy the happiness of domestic intercourse. Thus passes the day, and they rise the next morning with a peaceful bosom and an invigorated frame, sustained by a feeling of self-respect and braced by a feeling of contentment, to resume the duties of their proper calling.

Unquestionably, therefore, the Sabbath is the workingman's friend, and to deprive him of it would be to rob him of one of the richest boons which Heaven has conferred upon him.

The Sabbath is necessary for national prosperity. The distinguished Perrier, the Prime Minister of France, bewildered by the complexity of national affairs, and appalled by the refractory and insubordinate spirit of the people, exclaimed, on his death-bed, "France must have religion." Our own renowned Washington declared, in his "farewell address," that "of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports." The world's history attests the truth of these utterances. Throughout all the ages Christianity has proved itself the essential basis of national purity and perpetuity, the companion of liberty in all its conflicts, the cradle of its infancy and the divine source of its claims.

Could this beneficent system exist without the Sabbath? Evidently not. Without this blessed day our public institutions designed to promote and perpetuate religion would cease, our Sabbath schools would be disbanded, family instruction would soon come to an end, the sanctuaries would be closed, the ministry dismissed and discarded, the current of worldly affairs would be unbroken, and plans of evil would meet with no interruption. All realizing faith and living religion would be supplanted in the minds of men.

This is the effect in vast numbers among us now, notwithstanding the Sabbath and the constant recurrence of the public exercises of religion. What, then, would remain to hinder the same effect, or to repair the evil, were it once to proceed so far as to procure a general desecration of the day? It is impossible to doubt that, in such a case, the direct and dreadful consequence would be downright infidelity, blank atheism, a dereliction of all sense of accountableness, all fear of judgment, all sense of a future being.

Beyond all question, the presence of Christianity in our land is essential to the perpetuation of our government. Men talk of refined education as being sufficient for this purpose. They do this, too, in view of the fact with which they are confronted in the history of ancient Greece, that music, painting, poetry and the arts, instead of purifying and ennobling, softened, debilitated and sensualized the nation's heart. Others boast of law as enough to protect the government from threatening peril. But of what avail would laws be if called to deal with a public conscience uninfluenced by religion? Let this be wanting, and in the "body politic," far deeper than the eye of the law can penetrate, humors would gather which would corrupt and ruin the sources of its vitality. Let this be wanting, and all laws would be but green withes with which the giant of depravity is bound, that he might break them "as the thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire."

It may not be doubted that there is in our country a deliberate and earnest design, on the part of not a few, to obliterate the Sabbath. "In the experiment going on in our land," says the Rev. Albert Barnes, "not few hands are engaged, but many. It is not the mere work of thoughtlessness and recklessness, but it has all the marks of purpose and plan. It has evidence of being under the control of that master mind that is the author of all evil and the father of all the embarrassments that Christianity has ever met with. For who is engaged in the work of blotting out the Sabbath? Every atheist is engaged in it, and here places his main hope of success. Every skeptic is engaged in it, and anticipates more from this than from all his arguments. Every profane man, and every intemperate man, and every licentious man, is engaged in it, for in this way they hope that all restraint will be removed from unlimited indulgence in vice. And a multitude of men who are not professedly atheists or infidels, but whose heart is with them in their leading purposes, unite with them in opposing the sacredness of this day."

"There is one weapon," adds Mr. Barnes, "which the enemy has employed to destroy Christianity, and to drive it from the world, which has never been employed but with signal success. It is the attempt to corrupt the Christian Sabbath; to make it a day of festivity; to cause Christians to feel that its sacred and rigid obligation has ceased; to induce them on that day to mingle in the scenes of pleasure or the exciting plans of ambition; to make them feel that they may pursue their journeys by land and water, by the steamboat and the car, regardless of the command of God. And this has done, and will continue to do, what no argument, no sophistry, no imperial power has been able to accomplish. The 'Book of Sports' did more to destroy Christianity than all the ten persecutions of the Roman emperors; and the views of the second Charles and his court about the Lord's Day tended more to drive religion from the British nation than all the fires that were enkindled by Mary. Paris has no Sabbath, and that fact has done more to banish Christianity than all the writing of Voltaire; and Vienna has no Sabbath, and that fact does more to annihilate religion than ever did the skepticism of Frederick. Turn the Sabbath into a day of sports and pastime, of military reviews, and of pantomimes and theatrical exhibitions, and not an infidel anywhere would care a farthing about the tones of Volney or Voltaire, about the skepticism of Hume, the sneers of Gibbon, or the scurrility of Paine."

Sackett, Rev. Samuel, was a native of Newtown, Long Island, and ordained by New Brunswick Presbytery, October 13th, 1741. After laboring for a time at the Highlands, White Plains, and other places, he was installed, October 12th, 1743, at Bedford; May 19th, 1747, Crumpond obtained the half of his time, until December, 1749. In 1751 he is reported as a member of Long Island Presbytery. He resigned the charge of Bedford, April 4th, 1753. Immediately after leaving Bedford, he settled at Hanover, in Cortland Manor. On April 1st, 1760, he was dismissed from Hanover, and is said to have been installed at Crumpond the next year. He died at Yorktown, June 5th, 1784. His tomb bears record that he was judicious, faithful, laborious and successful in his ministry.

Sacramental Occasions, in Western Pennsylvania. "These," says Dr. S. J. M. Eaton, in his valuable "History of the Presbytery of Erie," "were great days in the history of the fathers. They usually embraced the services of four days. The first day was usually Thursday, and set apart as a 'fast day.' It was observed precisely as the Sabbath. No work was done, and everything was quiet, throughout whole neighborhoods, as the Sabbath itself. In some cases it was observed as a literal fast day, by abstaining from food, but when this was not done there was abstinence from labor. The second day of the service was Saturday, and after the preaching the Session of the Church met, for the purpose of receiving applications for membership in the church. 'Tokens' were also distributed to the members of the church, admitting them to the communion the following day. These 'tokens' were simple bits of lead, with the initial letters of the name of the congregation upon them, as 'F. C.' denoting Fairview congregation. These bits of lead were distributed by the pastor and elders, on Saturday and Sabbath mornings, to all who wished to unite in communion, or who were in good standing in the church. After the communicants had seated themselves at the table the elders collected these tokens, when the services proceeded. This practice of distributing tokens was evidently brought from Scotland and Ireland. Its object, no doubt, was to exclude unworthy communicants, especially at times when a large number present were strangers. But it is extremely doubtful whether it was ever of any practical advantage. After their use began to be discontinued, a good old elder who had never even dreamed that a communion could be held without them, was dreadfully horrified by a facetious minister advising him to put his tokens in his gun and shoot them at the crows."

The Communion Sabbath as it was observed by our fathers has been thus aptly described by the author of "Old Redstone":—

"The action sermons, as they were called, on Communion Sabbaths, were generally preached by the pastors, or resident ministers. This was considered peculiarly proper. And we must remember that perhaps fully one-half of the audience were not his ordinary hearers. Then followed what was called fencing the tables. This was often tedious, occupying an hour or more. Not unfrequently there was a regular review of all the sins forbidden in each of the Ten Commandments. And it was remarked, by the profane, that the preacher never stopped until he had solemnly debarred from the ordinances every one of his people, and himself besides. Our old ministers, however, seldom indulged in such lengthened details as the Seceders were said to be in the practice of doing, forbidding and debarring various classes of offenders, that were not to be found among them, such as stage-players and visitants of theatres, and yet it must be confessed that our venerable fathers took this occasion to pour out a great deal 'de omnibus rebus et quibusdam aliis.'

"Concerning this same matter of fencing tables, there was no doubt call for admonition and warning, yet, withal, it savored of harshness and severity. It must have been, oftentimes, gall and wormwood to the trembling, fearful Christian, needing, instead of such words, encouragement and assurance. One who remembers those old scenes makes the remark that on such occasions there were usually two ministers, one of whom debarred every person from coming, by the strictness of his charge, when the other would censure, and upbraid, and reproach every one for not coming, when the invitation was so free. It must be confessed that in those days the spirit of John the Baptist seemed to characterize the preaching more than that of John the beloved disciple.

"The ordinance was in those days always connected with the literal use of tables. Sometimes there was accommodation for all to partake at the same time; if not, there were two or more tables, just as circumstances might require. In this way the services became often very tedious, and even exhausting. There were usually two or more ministers in attendance, who divided the labors between or amongst them. Still the exercises on such occasions were exhausting.

"Oftentimes these services were held in the woods. Indeed, this was usually the case in the Summer season, for no house of worship then in use would have contained the people. This woods service was in connection with what was called a tent, for the accommodation of the ministers. The tent was simply a stand, such as is used at political and Fourth of July meetings at the present time. The seats were simple logs, raised to the proper height, with intervening aisles for the accommodation of the people.

"The fourth day of the service was Monday, following the Sabbath, when the services were concluded. To these old-fashioned communion services the people came far and near. It was nothing unusual to come a distance of ten or twelve miles. It was also usual for strangers to spend the evenings of Saturday and Sabbath in the congregation, and many a house in near proximity to the place of worship was literally packed with guests, and these guests expected to enact the part of host to their entertainers on some similar occasion. In this way sociability was cultivated, as well as practical godliness."

(Whilst concurring, in the main, with what has here been said concerning the old Sacramental occasions, we cannot but believe that, in our day, their observance has run into an opposite and equally exceptionable extreme. They have, in our judgment, by the changes which mark their observance, been shorn of a measure of the solemnity which properly pertains to them. The necessary qualifications for the performance of the sacred duty are not, in many cases, stated with sufficient fullness and force; neither are the characteristics of the Sacrament as defined in our Catechisms, as prominently and clearly presented, as they should be. If our fathers erred in too many and too long exercises on such occasions, it is equally undesirable and unwarrantable to make such exercises too hurried and brief. It has always seemed to us, moreover, that, instead of any good being gained by the abandonment of literal tables, much of the sacred influence of the ordinance has been lost. Many still live who can remember the peculiarly deep and solemn impression that pervaded congregations, in former days, when communicants left their pews and reverently moved forward to their place at the Sacramental board, singing, with tremulous and tender tone, as they advanced:—

"I'll of salvation take the cup,
On God's name will I call,
I'll pay my vows now to the Lord
Before His people all."

Sacrament Day at Monmouth. The following sketch from the pen of the Rev. John Leyburn, D. D., appeared some years ago, in the Presbyterian. The name, as is intimated, is fictitious, the place alluded to having been New Monmouth, Va., in the neighborhood of Lexington, at one time a joint pastoral charge with the Lexington Church. Dr. Baxter is the person spoken of as having preached the morning sermon. In addition to the interest of the sketch, as an illustration of the country sacraments, the particular occasion here described was one probably never surpassed in interest in any of the churches of the Valley:—

"WEYMOUTH SACRAMENT DAYS."

"A lambent and earnest of eternal rest,
A festival with fruits celestial crowned,
A jubilee releasing him from earth,
This day delights and animates the saint;
It gives new vigor to the languid pulse
Of life divine."

"Three miles from our village was an old church, which I shall call Weymouth, though that was not its name—a favorite and memorable resort of the villagers on special occasions. Built of blue limestone, blackened by the pencil of time, with a steep stairway to the gallery, outside, on the front, crowning the summit of a beautiful knoll, and peering out from a dense grove of majestic old oaks, it was the very beau idéal of an ancient rural house of God. For many years it was under the same pastoral charge with our village congregation; and after this connection was severed, it was customary for our minister to assist the pastor on 'Sacrament days,' and for many of his people to resort thither. Great was the joy amongst us young folks, when one of these days arrived; much the bustle and stir in the village; horses saddled and ready for mounting at various front doors; groups of children in their best Sunday clothes, bright as a new pin, eager for the time to set off, and baskets laden with the wherewithal for cold dinners. Most of the older people went on horseback; but the younger ones were afoot; and as the sacraments were usually in the Spring and Autumn, it was a beautiful walk over the hills, through the well-tilled fields and amid the noble forests. Some of those bright Autumn Sabbaths have left their pictures clear and strong in my memory—the delicious, inspiring October air, the very atmosphere seeming to sparkle as with diamonds; the deep blue of the fathomless heavens, with fleets of white clouds floating lazily on its ocean bosom, and here and there one aground upon a mountain top; the grand old mountains in parti-colored livery of black, green, red and yellow; the forests waving their lofty pennants of crimson and gold, with now and then a chestnut tree holding out its ripened nuts, and tempting little folks to break the Sabbath by gathering a pocketful; yellow fields, thick with stubble, from which had been garnered spacious barnfuls of wheat, rye and oats, or covered with crowded stalks of Indian corn, rustling their dry leaves in the breezes, and showing a proud array of massive teeth from out the parted lips of broken husks; melancholy cows or ponderous oxen feeding in pastures of clover, with sheep-bells tinkling from the flock on the distant hill; birds caroling their morning hymns, and children's voices prattling with the exuberance of the young life within them, more intense, from the excitement of the day. Bright, beautiful, glorious, long-to-be-remembered Sabbaths!

"The scene as we gained the summit of the last hill, bringing us in view of the church, was most inspiring. From every country road, old men and matrons, young men and maidens, in long processions, two abreast, came pouring in on horseback, emerging from the thick forests, and clattering across the limpid brook that murmured through the intervening vale, hundreds of impatient steeds tied under the trees of the grove, neighing salutations to newcomers; groups sitting upon rude benches, or on the moss-covered rocks, or clustered round the sparkling spring; the sound of sacred song floating from the old church doors, mellowed and harmonized by the distance; friends meeting and greeting, and the crowd growing too great to be contained within doors. In the 'Session House' adjoining the church in the rear, the ministers and elders assembled at an early hour, to exchange fraternal salutations, to spend a season in prayer, examine candidates for communion, and make arrangements for the day. Here baskets and napkins filled with provisions were deposited till the 'interval' between the public services, the stated time for taking refreshments, and here rustic mothers, who could not leave their babes at home, brought their infant charges, and sometimes remained during the sermons, listening with eager ears to the minister's words, as they fell through the open door over head, adjoining the pulpit.

"The interior of the meeting-house wore an antique and time-worn aspect. The pulpit, unlike our primeval octagon box in the old church at home, was long, and capable of accommodating a goodly number of ministers, and the sounding-board over head, suspended by a rusty iron rod, sufficiently extended to have shut them all in, had it come down from its fastenings; the pews were extravagantly tall, and the aisles depressed, so that when persons were in the latter nothing but their heads and shoulders could be seen, the benches and backs, as you sat in them, being the perfection of discomfort, and to the young folks the most serious drawback to the favorite Weymouth Sacrament days. Not a speck of paint had ever touched pulpit, pew, or gallery, the yellow pine, grown tawny by the lapse of years, stood up in its native nudity. But when village, farm-house, and mountain glen, had poured their quotas into the old sanctuary, until every nook and crevice was filled, below and above stairs, leaving crowds at the doors and on the benches without, it was a congregation which might have fired the heart of any minister.

"One Sacrament day at Weymouth, which occurred in my childhood, will be remembered as long as one of those blackened stones stands upon another; as long, indeed, as lasts that sanctuary not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. For some time previous there had been an extraordinary degree of religious interest in the village and surrounding country. Many had been inquiring the way of salvation, and not a few had found the pearl of great price. Prayer meetings and special services had been held night after night. Religion was the great theme of conversation in the streets and in domestic circles. Hardly was there a house where one or more of its inmates had not been wrought upon by the Spirit's power. Spiritual songs, lively and stirring, or plaintive and heart-touching, were sung with zest and soul; and a pamphlet, containing a selection of them, was published for this special use. A dire and fatal epidemic which had prevailed, carrying off numbers to their graves, and filling almost every home in the village with sorrow, had brought death and eternity near, and prepared the way for the impressions of the gracious work. Not a few of the subjects of the revival were awaiting the Weymouth Sacrament, publicly to profess their new-born love. The Session House and the adjoining grove, on the morning of that memorable day, presented a scene over which angels might have rejoiced. Here is a fond-hearted mother giving words of counsel to a daughter convulsed with grief because of the burden of sin; here is a venerable father with a favorite son beside him, under that great old oak, to whom he is making solemn appeals, not to let this favored season and this affecting day pass without making his peace with God; and here, on the rude bench against the wall, sits our venerable pastor, with weeping eyes, listening to the delightful narrative of what God had just been doing for one of his flock, for whom he had so often prayed. Not a careless face was seen in all the throng which to-day has been drawn together in unusual numbers, by the tidings of the revival.

Our minister preached the morning sermon. He was always evangelical, solemn and impressive, and, at times, there was a sublime and majestic roll in his utterances, which marked him the great man all acknowledged him to be. But to-day there is a power, a vivid spreading out of eternal things, a directness and earnestness altogether peculiar. At times his voice would falter, as he almost choked with the swelling emotion. A divine afflatus had breathed upon his heart, and from its profound depths he spoke as a dying man to dying men. To this day that discourse is remembered by many who heard it, as one of the most remarkable efforts of a man whose ordinary sermons would have honored any pulpit. The scenes in which he had recently mingled, and the stories of broken hearts, troubled consciences and heavenly hopes, which had been poured into his ear, had unsealed the great fountains of his soul.

The sermon well prepared the way for the communion, and when the invitation was given for the young converts to assemble around the table spread before the pulpit in the cross aisle, there was a spectacle which moved every heart, and drew tears of joy from many an eye. Fathers, mothers, ministers, Christian friends, at last saw the answer to their prayers. Those who had been dedicated to God in infancy, and re-dedicated a thousand times since in the closet, at the family altar, and at this very sacramental table, had now, after tedious years of waiting, which had almost sickened the heart with hope deferred, come forward to avow Jesus as their new Lord and Master. The village beauty, the erstwhile careless and wild young man, the sturdy, bronze-faced mountain farmer and the old veteran with the weight of years upon him, together left their several pews, and made their way through the crowded aisles for the first time, to sit at this affecting festival. The scene was too much for some of them. Hearts would overflow, tears would fall; and, in the midst of the minister's address, as he spoke to them in touching terms well suited to their present case, reminding them of what they had been by nature, of what grace had done for them in snatching them as brands from the burning, and of the debt of gratitude and love they owed to Him who had shed His blood to save them, one young man sobbed aloud, overcome by his emotions. This touched a sympathetic chord in all hearts, and the old meeting-house became a Bochim—a place of tears; sweet tears of penitence, and a peace passing all understanding. The unconverted, who sat wondering spectators, felt the power of the eloquent appeal. They were cut to the heart, and resolved that they, too, must seek the Lord; and many a pious saint, feeling that his cup of joy was full, was ready to say, with old Simeon, 'Now, Lord, lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'

'One of the ministers, either on this or a similar occasion, at the same period, held up the sacramental cup, and asked, in language that went to every unconverted heart, 'Can you, will you, longer reject and trample on this precious blood, poured from the wounds of a dying Saviour?' 'I call God and this great assembly to witness,' said he, 'that it is offered to you atresh this day. Again dare to spurn it from your lips, and the record will be written against you on high, which, in the terrible day of God's coming judgment, will flame out, to your astonishment and dismay, in letters of fire.' Not a few, who felt the power of that appeal, were soon after drinking of that cup, in memory of Him who had washed them from their sins, and given them a hope, through grace, of drinking it with Him hereafter in His heavenly kingdom.

The many hours of the services, protracted by the numerous successive tables of communicants, and the afternoon sermon, passed swiftly on, no one heeding the lapse of time, until, at last, when the great festival was ended, and the crowds turned into the various roads and by-ways to their several homes, the long shadows of approaching evening were already spreading their sable mantle over mountain, field, and forest.

In all the history of old Weymouth meeting-house, that Sabbath and that Sacrament day stand alone. Time and eternity must conspire to do honor to a scene so hallowed by the presence and power of God's gracious Spirit. Years have passed since that memorable day. Some of those who shared its blessings have long since become ministers of the gospel, and valued officers and members in the household of faith. Some soon tired of the service upon which they had professed to enter, and turned back to the world, their last state being worse than the first; and others have died in the glorious hopes of the gospel, and are now in the company of the just made perfect, around the throne on high, blessing God and the Lamb for that old Sacrament day at Weymouth."

Sacraments, The, as Defined in our Standards.

THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL.

Historically considered, the teaching of our standards in regard to the Sacraments is Calvinistic and Reformed, distinguished no less from the Zwinglian doctrine on the one hand, than from the Roman and Lutheran doctrine, on the other. "Luther and Zwingli always had in mind a corporeal presence of Christ's body and blood in the Lord's Supper, and an oral manducation of the same, which one affirmed and the other denied. Calvin substituted for this the idea of a virtual or dynamic presence of the psychic life-power and efficacy of Christ's humanity, and a spiritual reception and assimilation of the same, by the organ of faith, and, therefore, on the part of believing communicants only, through the secret mediation of the Holy Ghost. Calvin's doctrine passed into all the leading Reformed Confessions of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and must be regarded as the orthodox Reformed doctrine. Zwingli's theory has considerable popular currency, but no symbolic authority."—Schaff's Creeds of Christendom, vol. 1, p. 456.

The teaching of our Standards "is as far removed from the bare remembrance theory attributed to the early Swiss Reformers, as from the consubstantiation of Luther, and the local or supra-local presence contended for by Roman Catholics and Anglo-Catholics."—Mitchell's Introduction to the Minutes of the Westminster Assembly, p. 68.

The Westminster Confession and Catechism contain the most comprehensive, elaborate and specific definitions of the sacraments to be found in the symbols of the Reformation. Their teaching, in regard to the sacraments in general, may be briefly summarized as follows:—

(1) The sacraments are holy ordinances instituted by Christ. And, therefore, there are only two sacraments, viz.: Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Our Standards reject the doctrine of the Romish Church, which, of its own authority, and without any warrant from the example or teaching of Christ, adds five more, viz.: Confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony and extreme unction.

(2) "These two sacraments were instituted and intended by Christ to be perpetually observed in His Church till His second coming, and therefore to neglect or contemn them is a great sin."—Conf. Faith, xxviii, 5.

(3) "There are in every sacrament these three things: An outward and sensible sign, used according to Christ's own appointment, an inward and spiritual grace thereby signified, and a spiritual relation or sacramental union between the sign and the thing signified."—Larger Catechism, 163; Conf. Faith, xxvii, 2. Where any one of these is wanting, there is not a complete sacrament. The outward form is made necessary by Christ's appointment; but the outward form without the informing spirit is dead. A mere act of consecration or of worship, however sincere and devout, and with whatever outward ceremonies it may be performed, does not constitute a sacrament.

(4) The sacraments are "effectual means of salvation" (S. Cat., 91), not the mere memorials of Christ's redeeming work, the signs of his grace and the badge of our Christian profession. "The word of institution contains, together with a precept authorizing the use thereof, a promise of benefit to worthy receivers."—Conf. of Faith, xxvii, 3. The sacraments are not mere signs, but means and actual conveyances of grace. "In them, by sensible signs, Christ and the benefits of the New Covenant are represented, sealed and applied to believers."—Short Cat., 92. "A sacrament is a holy ordinance instituted by Christ in His Church, to signify, seal and exhibit unto those that are within the covenant of grace the benefits of His mediation."—Large Cat., 162. "The grace which is exhibited in or by the sacraments, rightly used, is not conferred by any power in them."—Conf. Faith, xxvii, 3. "The grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost."—Conf. Faith, xxviii, 6. The several terms employed in these passages are not tautological. To seal means more than to signify; to apply or confer means more than to seal. It should be observed that up to and after the time when our Standards were written, the word "exhibit" was used as being synonymous with "confer." It is evidently so used in Conf. Faith, xxvii, 3, as quoted above. The phrase "sacramental grace," meaning the grace which is conferred in or by means of the sacraments, is orthodox and consistent with our Standards. Its use has the sanction of the most eminent members of the Westminster Assembly.

(5) The efficacy of the sacraments as means of salvation does not depend upon any virtue in them, nor in the administrator of them, but only upon the blessing of God and the work of His Holy Spirit, which He has been pleased to connect with the use of the sacraments. In the case of adults this efficacy is inseparably connected with the exercise of personal faith on the part of the recipient. "The efficacy of baptism is not tied to the moment of time wherein it is administered; yet, notwithstanding, by the right use of this ordinance, the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, to such, whether of age or infants, as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's will, in His appointed time."—Conf. Faith, xxviii, 6. "God often regenerates long after baptism those baptized in infancy; some in early youth, some in old age. The benefit of baptism, therefore, continues through the whole life, because the promise signified therein continues always in force."—Hodge's Theology, vol. III, 518. What is here said of baptism is equally applicable to the Lord's Supper. Its efficacy is not tied to the moment of time wherein it is administered. It is evident that the teaching of our Standards does not differ from the doctrine of the Lutheran and of the Roman Catholic Church, in regard to the reality of sacramental grace, nor in reference to the efficacy of the sacraments as means of salvation. The point of difference is the question wherein the efficacy consists, and how the sacramental grace is secured to us. We deny that it inheres in the outward signs of the sacrament, or that it depends upon the character, intention, or office of him who administers the divine ordinance, and insist that it depends and consists upon the blessing of Christ and the work of the Spirit, fulfilling the promise which is involved in the precept whereby the use of the sacraments is made obligatory upon us.

(6) "Neither Sacrament can be lawfully administered by any but a minister of the Word, lawfully ordained."—Conf. Faith, xxviii, 4.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

"The Lord's Supper is a sacrament wherein, by giving and receiving bread and wine, according to Christ's appointment, His death is showed forth; and the worthy receivers are, not after a corporal and carnal manner, but by faith, made partakers of His body and blood, with all His benefits, to their spiritual nourishment and growth in grace."—S. Cat. 96.

(1) The external elements, or "sensible signs," in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, appointed by Christ, and, therefore, not to be altered by men, are bread and wine, i. e., the common bread of daily life, and the fermented juice of the grape.

The notion that unleavened bread must be used has no sanction in our Standards; neither do they countenance the use of wafers. "By wine, as prescribed to be used in this ordinance, is to be understood the 'juice of the grape,' and the juice of the grape in that state which was and is in common use, and in the state in which it was known as wine. It was not the juice of the grape as it exists in the fruit, but that juice submitted to such a process of fermentation as secured its preservation and gave it the qualities ascribed to it in Scripture. That oinos in the Bible, when unqualified by such terms as new or sweet, means the fermented juice of the grape, is hardly an open question. It has never been questioned in the Church, if we except a few Christians of the present day. Those in the early Church whose zeal for temperance led them to exclude wine from the Lord's table were consistent enough to substitute water. They not only abstained from the use of wine, and denounced as 'improbos atque impios' those who drank it, but they also repudiated animal food and marriage, regarding the devil as their author. They soon disappeared from history. The plain meaning of the Bible on this subject has controlled the mind of the Church, and, it is to be hoped, will continue to control it till the end of time."—Hodge's Theology, vol. III, 616.

(2) The consecration by which the bread and wine are "set apart from a common to a holy use" (Conf. Faith, xxix, 3), does not effect any change in them. They are bread and wine still. Our Standards reject and condemn the doctrine of transubstantiation, as held by the Roman Catholic Church, and the same doctrine as held, in a modified form, by the Lutheran Church, under the name of consubstantiation. "The notion that the bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ is the centre of the whole Romish system, and is the source of manifold errors and idolatries."—Conf. Faith, xxix, 6.

(3) While they reject both transubstantiation and consubstantiation, our Standards teach the real presence of Christ in this sacrament, and the real feeding of the believing communicant upon the body and blood of Christ, according to the true meaning of our Lord's own words: "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you" (John vi, 53); and according to Paul's saying: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion (i. e., the participation) of the blood of Christ? And the bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" (1 Cor. x, 16). But our Standards are careful to distinguish this real presence of Christ and this real feeding of the communicant upon His body and blood from a corporeal presence and a carnal feeding. "As the body and blood of Christ are not corporally or carnally present in, with, or under the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and yet are spiritually present to the faith of the receivers, no less truly and really than the elements themselves are to their outward senses, so they that worthily communicate in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, do therein feed upon the body and blood of Christ, not after a corporal or carnal, but in a spiritual manner, yet truly and really, while by faith they receive and apply unto themselves Christ crucified and all the benefits of His death."—Larger Catechism, 170.

(4) The Lord's Supper is not only a memorial of Christ's sufferings, a badge of our profession, a bond and a pledge of our communion with Christ and each other as members of His mystical body; it is to all believing communicants an effectual means of salvation, because it is, by God's appointment and promise, the seal, the exhibition, the transfer, and the application to them of Christ and all His benefits, for their encouragement, nourishment and growth in grace.

(5) The qualifications for a participation in the Lord's Supper are twofold: knowledge to discern the Lord's body, and a credible profession of faith in Christ. Of these qualifications, under our form of church government, the Session of a particular church are the sole judges. The affirmative vote of the Session admits a candidate to the Lord's table, and fully recognizes or constitutes him a communicant member of the Church. When a public profession is made before the congregation, which is generally regarded by Presbyterians as a scriptural and edifying ceremony, it ought to be so conducted as to preclude the idea that the person making such profession is received to membership by the whole Church. The practice of "propounding" persons for membership to the congregation has no sanction in our Standards.

In regard to what constitutes a credible profession of faith and sufficient knowledge to discern the Lord's body, while our Standards do not give specific rules, they fully recognize the principle that nothing is to be made a term of communion which is not declared by Scripture to be a term of salvation. We are to receive to the full communion of the Church all those in regard to whom we have probable reason for believing that Christ has received them. A credible profession of faith is not one which constrains belief, but one against which there is no evidence to the contrary. The Session does not authoritatively pronounce those whom it admits to the Lord's table to be converted or regenerated. It simply accepts them as professed believers. Private members of the Presbyterian Church are not required, as a condition of membership, to accept and adopt our Confession of Faith and Catechisms. They are required to profess only such doctrinal belief as is essential to Christian character; and of the extent of that belief the Session is the judge in each individual case.

An assurance of acceptance with God and of due preparation for the Lord's Supper are not necessary for admission to this holy ordinance. "One who doubteth of his being in Christ and of his due preparation to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper may have true interest in Christ, though he be not yet assured thereof; and in God's account hath it, if he be duly affected with the apprehension of the want of it, and unfeignedly desires to be found in Christ and to depart from iniquity: in which case (because promises are made and this sacrament is appointed for the relief even of weak and doubting Christians) he is to bewail his unbelief, and labor to have his doubts resolved; and so doing, he may, and ought to, come to the Lord's Supper, that he may be further strengthened."—Larger Cat., clxxii.

(6) While the Confession of Faith (chap. xxix) forbids the celebration of the Lord's Supper by any person alone, and the carrying of the elements from a public celebration of the ordinance to any "who are not then present in the congregation," there is nothing in our Standards to forbid the administration of the Lord's Supper, by an ordained minister, in private houses, or in the chambers of the sick (See Moore's Digest, p. 668).

(7) Our Standards say nothing as to the frequency of administering the Lord's Supper in our churches. This is left to the discretion of the Session of each church. The tendency has been, and still is, to more frequent communion. While the Directory for Worship (ch. viii, v) prescribes sitting, which is the ordinary posture at common meals, as the proper posture for communicants at the Lord's table, no instruction is given, as to whether they shall remain in the pews or come to a table spread in the aisle; as to whether the elders or the deacons shall assist the minister in distributing the elements. But our Standards insist that both the bread and the wine shall be given to each communicant, as opposed to the practice of the Romish Church of withholding the cup from the people, leaving all questions as to the mode of distribution as matters of indifference, to be determined by Christian discretion, according to circumstances. The prevailing custom in the Presbyterian churches of this country is, for the elders of the church to receive the bread and wine from the minister, and distribute both to the people, who remain seated in their pews.

BAPTISM IN GENERAL.

(1) Although there were, under the Old Testament economy, "divers washings" (or baptisms), baptism did not become a sacrament until it was instituted by Christ, in the words of the great commission, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen" (Matt. xxviii, 19, 20). The observance of this sacrament is to be perpetual in the New Testament Church, and is obligatory on all Christ's disciples. "It is a great sin to contemn or neglect it."—Confession of Faith, xxviii, 5.

(2) Baptism, according to our Standards, can be lawfully administered only by an ordained minister. The Romish Church teaches that baptism is essential to salvation, even in the case of those who die in infancy; and, therefore, she holds to the validity of lay baptism, in cases of emergency, where the services of a priest cannot be obtained. But, in common with all the Reformed creeds, our Confession and Catechisms maintain that neither of the sacraments should ever be administered by any but a minister of the gospel, lawfully ordained.

(3) The mode of baptism is not rigidly defined in our Standards. They do not condemn immersion; they simply say "Dipping of the person into the water is not necessary, but baptism is rightly administered by pouring or sprinkling water upon the person."—Confession of Faith, xxviii, 3. But in the directory for the administration of baptism to infants, pouring or sprinkling is expressly enjoined as the only suitable mode. "Then the minister is to pray for a blessing to attend this ordinance, after which, calling the child by its name, he shall say, 'I baptize thee in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' As he pronounces these words he is to baptize the child with water, by pouring or sprinkling it on the face of the child, without adding any other ceremony."—Directory vii, 5. The prohibition of any other ceremony is intended to exclude the use of the sign of the cross and various other rites practiced by the Romish Church.

(4) The validity of baptism administered by a Romish priest, or in other words, whether persons baptized in the Romish Church and desiring to be received into the communion of any of our churches, ought to be baptized over again, seems to be an open question in the Presbyterian Church. Our Standards say nothing on the subject; the General Assembly has decided the question at different times in opposite ways. The last decision is ambiguous. The writer of this article agrees fully with Calvin, who thus defended his own refusal to be re-baptized. "If we have rightly determined that a sacrament is not to be estimated by the hand of him by whom it is administered, but is to be received as from the hand of God Himself, we may hence infer that its dignity neither gains nor loses by the administrator. This confutes the error of the Donatists, who measured the efficacy and worth of the sacrament by the dignity of the minister. Such, in the present day, are the Catabaptists, who deny that we are fully baptized because we were baptized in the Papacy, by wicked men and idolaters; hence they furiously insist on anabaptism. Against these absurdities we shall be fully fortified if we shall reflect that by baptism we were initiated not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; and, therefore, that baptism is not of man, but of God, by whomsoever it may have been administered."—Calvin's Institutes, Book, 4 ch. 15, see 16.

(5) The significance and efficacy of baptism is thus defined by our Standards: It is the divinely appointed "sign and seal of our engraving into Christ, and partaking of the benefits of the covenant of grace, and our engagement to be the Lord's."—Shorter Catechism, 94.

The benefits of the covenant of grace signified and sealed to us in baptism are defined by the Confession of Faith to be "regeneration and remission of sins." And by the Larger Catechism as "remission of sins by His (Christ's) blood, regeneration by His Spirit, adoption and resurrection unto everlasting life. These benefits are not only signified and sealed, but conferred and applied, in every instance where there is a true and effectual sacrament of baptism, consisting first, of an outward and visible sign, according to Christ's own appointment; secondly, of an inward and spiritual grace thereby signified; and, thirdly, of a spiritual relation; a sacramental union between the sign and the thing signified."—Larger Cat., 163 and 165; Conf. Faith, xxvii, 2 and 3; xxviii, 1.

(6) The qualifications for baptism, in the case of adults, are the same as the qualifications for the Lord's Supper. They who are admitted to this ordinance must have sufficient knowledge to make a credible profession of their faith, and must actually make such a profession. Nothing can rightly be required in such a profession beyond what Christ has enjoined and declared to be a term of salvation.

BAPTISM OF INFANTS.

(1) "Baptism" says the Shorter Catechism (Question 95), "is not to be administered to any that are out of the visible Church, till they profess their faith in Christ and obedience to Him; but the infants of such as are members of the visible Church are to be baptized." This statement is capable of two interpretations: first, that which makes the latter clause of the sentence exceptional to the former, as though it read "infants of church members are to be baptized without making a profession of faith and obedience, notwithstanding they are out of the visible Church;" and secondly, that which harmonizes the two clauses, as though it read, "infants of church members, because they are already in the visible Church, are not required to profess faith and obedience as a condition of baptism." The latter is evidently the true interpretation. "The children of all professors of the true religion are, on that account, fellow members with their parents of the visible Church."—Dr. A. A. Hodg's Commentary of Confession of Faith, p. 425. "The infant seed of professing Christians, in virtue of their parents' faith and standing, are born members of the visible Church, and are considered as partakers of those benefits of the covenant of grace which belong to the offspring of believers, before they are baptized."—Dr. Ashbel Green's Lectures on the Shorter Catechism, vol. ii, p. 270. "Although the New Testament does not contain any specific text which in so many words declares that the infant seed of believers are members of the Church in virtue of their birth, yet it abounds in passages which cannot reasonably be explained but in harmony with this doctrine."—Miller on Infant Baptism, Presbyterian Tracts, vol. i, p. 212. This is one of the strongest points in which the Reformed Creeds differ from the views of Romanists and Lutherans, who hold that all children are born outside of the Church and are brought into it by baptism. Our Standards assume that the children of believers are born within the Church, and on that account are to be baptized. "The visible Church, which is also catholic or universal under the gospel, consists of all those throughout the world that profess the true religion, together with their children."—Confession, xxv, 2. "Children born within the pale of the visible Church, and dedicated to God in baptism, are under the inspection and government of the Church."—Directory ix, i. "Baptism is not to be administered to any that are out of the visible Church, and so strangers from the covenant of promise, till they profess their faith in Christ and obedience to Him; but infants descending from parents either both or but one of them professing faith in Christ and obedience to Him, are in that respect (i. e., because of their parents' professed faith and obedience, within the covenant (i. e., in the visible Church), and are to be baptized."—Larger Catechism, 166.

Baptism, therefore, so far as infants are concerned, is not an initiatory rite into the visible Church, but a recognition of church membership already existing as a Christian birthright. The places where it is spoken of as the "solemn admission of the parties baptized into the visible Church" (Conf., xxviii, 1; Larger Cat., 165) must be understood as applying only to the baptism of adults. Some writers, as Dr. Ashbel Green, and Dr. James Fisher, in his explanation of the Shorter Catechism, maintain that by being "solemnly admitted to the visible Church," is meant that by baptism "we are publicly declared to be church members before."

(2) To the question whose children are entitled to baptism? our Standards answer (in Conf. of Faith xxviii, 4), "the infants of one or both believing parents;" in Larger Catechism (166), "infants descending from parents, either both or but one of them professing faith in Christ and obedience to him;" in the Shorter Catechism (95), "the infants of such as are members of the visible Church." These definitions have been variously interpreted. Some have taken the extreme ground that all who were themselves baptized in infancy have a right to have their children baptized; of which Dr. A. A. Hodge (in his Commentary on the Confession, p. 475) justly says, "it is manifestly absurd to suppose that every one who has been baptized in infancy has an indefeasible right to have his children baptized, whether he professes personal faith in Christ or not. First, because all church members have not a right to all the privileges of church membership. Baptized members have no right to come to the communion until they make a profession of personal faith; until they do this, they are like citizens under age, with their rights held in suspension. These suspended rights are those of communing and having their children baptized. Secondly, because a person destitute of personal faith can only commit perjury and sacrilege, by breaking the solemn profession, and taking the obligations involved in the baptismal covenant. It is a sin for them to do it, and a sin for the minister to help them do it." Still, it is an open question, whether the profession of faith on the part of the parents, which is the pre-requisite to the baptism of their children, must have been formerly pronounced credible by the church Session, as a qualification for admission to the Lord's Supper, or whether the minister who administers baptism to infants in the exercise of his own discretion, may be the judge of the credibility of such a profession at the time the baptism is to be administered. We think the tendency of opinion and practice in our Church is towards the latter conclusion.

(3) The Scripture warrant for the baptism of infants is thus summed up in our Directory for Worship, ch. vii, 4:—

"It is instituted by Christ; it is a seal of the righteousness of faith; the seed of the faithful have no less a right to this ordinance, under the gospel, than the seed of Abraham to circumcision, under the Old Testament. Christ commanded all nations to be baptized; he blessed little children, declaring that of such is the kingdom of heaven. Children are federally holy, and therefore ought to be baptized. We are by nature sinful, guilty and polluted, and have need of cleansing by the blood of Christ, and by the sanctifying influence of the Spirit of God."

(4) The significance and efficacy of baptism, as applied to infants, are precisely the same as when it is applied to adults. There is only one baptism, and one definition of the same. To the same extent and for the same reasons, in the case of infants, no less than in the case of adults, it "signifies and seals our engrafting into Christ, and partaking of the benefits of the covenant of grace, and our engagement to be the Lord's." The popular notion that infant baptism is something different from and less than adult baptism has no sanction in our Confession and Catechisms. A single quotation from the Larger Catechism settles this question so far as it can be settled by the authority of our standards: "baptism is to be administered but once, with water, to be a sign and seal of our regeneration and engrafting into Christ, and that even to infants" (177).

(5) The status of baptized children, their relation to the Church, and the duty of the Church towards them, their Christian training, and the time and conditions of their admission to the Lord's table, are questions of vital importance. The doctrine of our Standards, on these points, is briefly summed up in the following extract from the Directory for Worship (ch. ix, sec. 1): "Children born within the pale of the visible Church, and dedicated to God in baptism, are under the inspection and government of the Church, and are to be taught to read and repeat the Catechism, the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer. And when they come to years of discretion, if they be free from scandal, appear sober and steady, and to have sufficient knowledge to discern the Lord's body, they ought to be informed that it is their privilege and duty to come to the Lord's table."—HENRY J. VAN DYKE, D.D.

Safford, Jefferson Price, D.D., son of Harry and Patience (Van Horne) Safford, was born at Zanesville, Ohio, September 22d, 1823, and was graduated from the University of Ohio, at Athens, Ohio, A. D. 1843. After teaching a few years he entered Princeton Seminary, where he studied three years, 1849-52, and whence he was regularly graduated; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 5th, 1851; taught mathematics in Richmond Academy, at Richmond, Va., 1852-55, supplying also, 1852-53, the Church at Bethlehem, Va.; and was ordained by the Presbytery of West Lexington, at Frankfort, Ky., February 9th, 1855. His successive fields of labor, after his ordination, were as follows: pastor of the Church at Frankfort, Ky., installed February 9th, 1855 and released September 1st, 1857; pastor of Piqua (Ohio) First Church, installed November 15th, 1857, released December 1st, 1862; pastor of New Albany (Ind.) First Church, installed December 15th, 1862, released May 1st, 1867; District Secretary of the Board of Missions for Ohio and Indiana, from May 1st, 1867 until January 1st, 1870. In 1868 he returned to his old home in Zanesville, and lived there until his death. He never again settled as pastor, yet these last years were among his most active and useful ones, as he was constantly engaged in preaching. He served as stated supply to Brownsville (Ohio) Church, from January 1st, 1870 until October 1st, 1876, at the same time supplying also Fairmount Church, from January 1st, 1870 until April 1st, 1877; Roseville Church, from July 16th, 1871 until April 30th, 1873; acting as President of Zanesville University in 1871 and 1872; supplying Uniontown (Ohio) Church, from July 16th, 1871 until April 30th, 1873; supplying Hanover Church, from April 30th, 1873 until April 30th, 1874; Kirkersville Church, from September 20th, 1874 until 1879, and Claysville and West Carlisle churches until his death. He was also the accurate and efficient Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Zanesville, from 1873, and of the Synod of Columbus, from 1876 until his death. That event occurred at Zanesville, Ohio, July 10th, 1881. He was a man of a vigorous mind, of more than common originality, of large information, of sound judgment, of warm heart and kindly humor, and was much beloved by all who knew him.

Sample, Rev. Nathanael Welshard, was a native of Pennsylvania. He was licensed by the New Castle Presbytery, in 1799. Having supplied a Church at St. George's, Del., for six months, and declining their call to settle, he accepted a call to Leacock, Lancaster and Middle Octorara churches, in Pennsylvania. His relation to these churches continued forty years. He was released from his charge September 26th, 1821, and died August 26th, 1831. Mr. Sample was an able preacher, exerted an extensive influence for good, and under his direction several young men were trained for the ministry.

Sample, Robert F., D. D., son of John and Jane (Wilson) Sample, was born at Corning, N. Y., October 28th, 1829. He was consecrated to the ministry when four years of age, on a day spent by his parents in special prayer with reference to this dedication. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1849, and at the Western Theological Seminary, in May, 1853. He was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Mercer, Pa., 1853-6; at Bedford, Pa., 1856-60, and supply of the Andrews Church, Minneapolis, Minn., 1866-68. From March, 1868, to the present time he has been pastor of Westminster Church, Minneapolis.

Dr. Sample is the author of four small books on Christian experience, written for the young, anonymously published; several poetical effusions incorporated in publications of the Presbyterian Board, and the "Memoir of Rev. John C. Thom," pastor of Pine Street Church, St. Louis, Mo. He is a graceful, vigorous and popular writer. His ministry has been blessed with several precious revivals. As a preacher he is thoroughly evangelical, able, instructive, impressive. His present charge is the largest in the Northwest, numbering nearly 800 members. The church building, erected at a cost of $110,000, is one of the most spacious and beautiful in this country. Dr. Sample has been called to churches in Eastern cities, but deemed it his duty to remain in his present charge. He wields a strong influence in that region, by his sound judgment, earnest zeal and exemplary Christian character. He is a Director of the Seminary of the Northwest, Chicago; a Trustee of Macalester College, Minnesota, and is a delegate to the Presbyterian Alliance which is to meet in Belfast in 1881.

Sampson, Francis S., D. D., was the son of Richard Sampson, a distinguished agriculturist in the neighborhood of Dover Mills, Goochland county, Va. He was born in November, 1814, and entered the University of Virginia, September 10th, 1831, and continued his studies there till July, 1836, taking a very extensive course, not only in the Academic departments, but in the schools of Junior Law, Anatomy and Physiology, and securing the degree of Master of Arts, which was then attained by very few. On the 9th of November, 1836, he entered Union Theological Seminary, Va., and on the resignation of Professor Ballantine, in the Spring of 1838, he was appointed teacher of Hebrew, and from that time continued to perform other duties of the Oriental department. He was licensed to preach by the East Hanover Presbytery, in October, 1839, and was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, in October, 1841. In the Summer of 1848 he crossed the ocean, and after spending nearly a year in Europe, chiefly at the Universities of Halle and Berlin, in the prosecution of his Oriental studies, he returned in August, 1849. In October, 1848, he was elected Professor of Oriental Literature and Language in the Seminary with which he had been connected, but he had for many years performed the work of a full Professor, though with the title and compensation of an assistant. He died April 9th, 1854. Dr. Sampson was eminently characterized by methodical industry, and by the uniformity and healthfulness of his devotional spirit. He was in a high degree conscientious in everything.

and in nothing more than in the use of property. As a master of the art of communicating knowledge, he was unrivaled. One of the foundation stones of his success was his indisputable scholarship. He was greatly endeared to his pupils. His preaching exhibited the lucid order and the animation of mind which marked everything that he produced.

Sanctification. The sanctification of believers consists in their purification from the pollution of sin, and the renovation of their nature after the image of God. Sanctification may be considered as initial and progressive. Initial sanctification is the same as regeneration, whereby we become "new creatures," "old things being done away, and all things becoming new." In progressive sanctification the several lusts of the old man are more and more weakened and mortified. In initial sanctification the Spirit of Christ enters the heart, with all His train of graces, and implants them there. In progressive sanctification these graces are more and more quickened and strengthened.

Sanctification extends to the whole man, including all the faculties of the soul and all the members of the body (1 Thess. v. 23). Our entire nature was originally created in the image of God; by the entrance of sin this image was utterly defaced and lost, hence corruption and depraved nature is called "the old man," because it infects the whole man, and defiles both soul and body. Now, as original corruption pervades the whole man, so sanctifying grace extends to every part; hence our nature as renewed after the image of God is called "the new man," because the holiness communicated in sanctification possesses and ennobles the whole man.

But, while sanctification extends to our whole nature, and leaves no part of it unrenewed, we must not imagine the work to be so complete as to restore us, in this life, to a state of perfect purity. It is acknowledged that the Scriptures call upon us to aim at perfection, and speak of some individuals in such a manner as may lead superficial readers to conclude that they had fully succeeded. They call upon us to "behold the perfect man," and give this as the character of certain individuals. But one part of Scripture should be explained in consistency with another, and it is contrary to the laws of legitimate interpretation to wrest a particular expression to a sense at variance with the known and avowed sentiments of the author. If we take this rule along with us, we shall immediately perceive that, in the cases before us, perfection can mean nothing more than integrity or sincerity. He is perfect who unfeignedly loves God, and has a respect to all His commands.

That the most eminent saints mentioned in Scripture, even some of those to whom the epithet perfect is applied, were not free from sin, is evident from the defects and blemishes which are discovered in their conduct. Noah is said to have been "perfect in his generations" (Gen. vi. 9); "not perfect in the sense of sinless," says Prof. Bush, "but sincere, simple, upright, having respect to all God's commandments, and like Caleb, following the Lord fully. Christian perfection is not absolute freedom from sin, but evangelical integrity, a perfection implying completeness of parts, rather than of degrees, in the renewed character, and it may be better understood by viewing it as opposed to partiality and hypocrisy, to a partial obedience and an insincere profession." The praise of high attainments will undoubtedly be conceded to the Apostle of the Gentiles; and it is not easy to conceive upon what principle any man could persuade himself that he or others have excelled him; but we find him thus expressly disclaiming any pretension to perfection: "I see a law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members" (Rom. vii. 23). The wise man tells us that "there is not a just man upon the earth that doeth good, and sinneth not" (Ecc. vii. 20). And an apostle rejects the doctrine of sinless perfection in these strong terms: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1 John i. 8). On our Lord's inculcation of a duty, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. v. 48), Dr. Alford very well observes; "complete in your love of others, not one-sided or exclusive . . . but all-embracing and God-like. . . . No countenance is given by this verse to the ancient Pelagian or the modern heresy of perfectibility in this life. Such a sense of the words would be utterly at variance with the whole of the discourse; see especially vv. 22, 29, 32, in which the imperfections and conflicts of the Christian are fully recognized." To the evidence already adduced to disprove this doctrine, it may be added that, were any person truly perfect, he would not stand in need of those institutions or means of grace which God has provided for the perfecting of the saints. In particular, daily prayer for the forgiveness of sin would not be his duty; he would enjoy uninterrupted communion with God; would not be subject to discipline, which presupposes errors and failings, and, having spent a life undisturbed by pain and sorrow, would be translated, we may presume, into a better world, without suffering death (see Job ix. 20; Ps. xix. 12; Phil. iii. 12).

Whilst, however, it is true that none can attain to absolute perfection in this life, it is nevertheless the duty, and will be the earnest and constant aim, of every real Christian to reach it (see 2 Cor. xiii. 7, 9; Col. iv. 12; Heb. xiii. 20). The higher our mark the stronger will be our efforts. He who aims at the sun, though he fall far short of the mark, will assuredly shoot higher than he who shoots only at a shrub. The gardener, though he has never reared a faultless rose, perseveres in setting new slips; the traveler finds himself unable to penetrate the recesses of some labyrinthine cave, but he will push his way further and yet further still, till he has outstripped all earlier discoverers, and made the path easier for future explorers. So will the true child of God, though conscious of many imperfections and discouraged by many failures, press onward and upward, until at death he is "made perfect in holiness," and joins the souls of departed saints, which in Scripture are called "the spirits of the just made perfect" (Heb. xii, 23).

Sanderson, David Davidson, D.D., was born in Juniata county, Pa., November 15th, 1821. His parents emigrated to Alabama in 1822, so that his life has nearly all been spent in that State. His youth was chiefly occupied with commercial pursuits. He pursued both his literary and theological course at Princeton, N. J., and graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1849, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 7th, 1849, and ordained by the Presbytery of South Alabama, October 20th, 1850. He was installed pastor of Fairview Presbyterian Church, near Marion, Ala., February, 1851, and served that church, with great acceptability and success, for nine years.

In November, 1860, he became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Entaw, Ala., where he has labored faithfully to the present time. He has a clear, vigorous and well-balanced mind, has made varied attainments as a scholar, is a sound theologian, and an able, instructive and successful preacher. Neighboring churches have been sharers in his regular services, and his labors have been extended over a wide field, in which he has accomplished large and valuable results. No minister in his Synod is more highly esteemed nor more warmly loved. The University of North Carolina conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity several years since. Dr. Sanderson has recently been elected a Professor in the Institute for the Training of Colored Ministers, under the care of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, a work for which he is eminently qualified.

Sands, Rev. John Scott, was born in the city of Pittsburg, Pa., on September 1st, 1811. He graduated at Westminster College in 1831, and at the Allegheny Theological Seminary in 1838. On March 25th, 1837, he was licensed to preach by the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Monongahela. While still busy with his studies in the seminary, he was, in October, 1837, placed by the Presbytery in charge of a mission enterprise in the city of Pittsburg, and was ordained as an evangelist on April 21st, 1838. He declined a number of calls to other fields of labor, and continued in charge of this one nearly thirteen years. He organized there the Eighth United Presbyterian Church, and had the pleasure of seeing it grow, under his ministry, into a vigorous, self-sustaining congregation, possessed of a substantial church building. He left his old home, to accept a call from the Arch Street Presbyterian Church, in the city of Philadelphia, and was installed as pastor of that church on September 19th, 1850. Here he continues to labor among an attached and appreciative people. Mr. Sands is an excellent preacher, at once instructive and impressive, a faithful pastor, a good presbyter, is beloved by his people, and held in high esteem by his ministerial brethren.

Sanford, Rev. Joseph, was born in Vernon, Vt., February 6th, 1797. He graduated at Union College in 1820. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and in April, 1823, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York. Immediately after this he went to Montreal, L. C., and for several weeks supplied the American Presbyterian Church in that city, to which he received a unanimous call, but which he felt constrained to decline. In October of that year he was pastor of the new Presbyterian (now the First) Church of Brooklyn, N. Y. Here he continued to labor with great acceptance, his congregation rapidly increasing under his ministry, till October, 1828, when he received a call from the Second Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, which he accepted. His installation over this church took place January 21st, 1829. From the time of his settlement in Philadelphia his health was so much impaired that he was but ill-fitted to bear the burden of responsibility and care that rested upon him. He died December 25th, 1831. His disease was attended, during a considerable part of the time, with delirium, but in every lucid interval it was manifest that the Sun of Righteousness was pouring beams of joy into his soul.

"Mr. Sanford," says Dr. Waterbury, "had a vein of moral and mental excellence, the purity and richness of which none could know who did not go beneath its surface to discover it." He was a model pastor. His manners were kind and conciliatory. His chastened aspect forbade all undue familiarity, but he was neither harsh nor repulsive. He had an ardent mind, which, in the pulpit, took fire by its own action, communicating warmth and light to the congregation, and ever and anon flashing upon them some brilliant thought, or some burning sentence. He spoke from the heart to the heart. In prayer he was singularly gifted. "His prayers seemed to take hold of the very gates of heaven, and struggle to open them. Here was seen the man of God, one who lived on the mount, 'seeing God face to face.'"

San Francisco, Cal., Calvary Church, was organized July 23d, 1854, with sixty-three members; Wm. A. Scott, D. D., pastor. Dr. Scott resigned in 1861. Until the arrival of his successor the pulpit was supplied by Rev. S. T. Wells. At a congregational meeting held December 9th, 1861, Charles Wadsworth, D. D., of Philadelphia, was elected pastor, and preached his first sermon on the first Sabbath of June, 1862. Dr. Wadsworth resigned in 1869. Rev. John Hemphill, of Magerafelt, Ireland, was elected pastor, November 16th, 1869, and began his pastorate in April, 1870. Mr. Hemphill resigned

CALVARY PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

October 13th, 1882. On the 13th of November, 1882, Samuel P. Sprecher, D. D., of Oakland, was called to the pastorate, and was installed December 24th, 1882. The first church building, situated on Bush street, between Montgomery and Lansome, was erected in 1851. The present edifice, built of brick and stone, situated on the corner of Geary and Powell streets, fronting on Union Square, was commenced early in 1868, and was dedicated on the 16th of May, 1869.

Satan. We determine the personality of Satan by the same criteria that we use in determining whether Cesar and Napoleon were real, personal beings, or the personifications of abstract ideas, viz: by the tenor of history concerning them and the ascription of personal attributes to them. All the forms of personal agency are made use of by the sacred writers in setting forth the character and conduct of Satan. They describe him as having power and dominion, messengers and followers. He tempts and resists, he is held accountable, charged with guilt, is to be judged and to receive final punishment. On the supposition that it was the object of the sacred writers to teach the proper personality of Satan, they could have found no more express terms than those which they have actually used. And on the supposition that they did not intend to teach such a doctrine, their use of language incapable of communicating any other idea is wholly inexplicable. To suppose that all this semblance of a real, veritable, conscious moral agent, is only a trap, a prosopopœia, is to make the inspired penmen guilty of employing a figure in such a way that by no ascertained laws of language it could be known that it was a figure—in such a way that it could not be taken to be a figure, without violence to all the rhetorical rules by which they, on other occasions, are known to have been guided. A personification protracted through such a book as the Bible, even should we suppose it to have been written by one person, never dropped in the most simple and didactic portions, never explained when the most grave and important truths are to be inculcated, and when men, the most ignorant and prone to superstition are to be the readers—a personification extending from Genesis to Revelation—this is altogether anomalous and inadmissible. But to suppose that the several writers of the different books of the Bible, diverse in their style and intellectual habits, writing under widely differing circumstances, through a period of nearly two thousand years, should each, from Moses to John, fall into the use of the same personification, and follow it, too, in a way so obscure and enigmatical that not one in a hundred of their readers would escape the error which they did not mean to teach, or apprehend the truth which they wished to set forth—to suppose this, is to require men to believe that the inspired writers, who ought to have done the least violence to the common laws of language, have really done the most.

Such uniformity of inexplicable singularity, on the part of such men as the authors of the several books of the Bible, could be accounted for only on the hypothesis that they were subject to an œlia as well as a good inspiration. On the other hand, such uniformity of appellations and imagery, and such identity of characteristics, protracted through such a series of writings, go to confirm the received doctrine of a real personality.

The agency of Satan extends to all that he does, or, through the employment of demons which belong to his kingdom, causes to be done. His agency is moral and physical. First, moral. He beguiled our first parents, and thus brought sin and death upon them and their posterity (Gen. iii). He moved David to number the people (1 Chron. xxi, 1). He resisted Joshua, the high priest (Zech. iii, 1). He tempted Jesus (Matt. iv); entered into Judas to induce him to betray his Master (Luke xxii, 3); instigated Ananias and Sapphira to lie to the Holy Ghost (Acts v, 3); hindered Paul and Barnabas on their way to the Thessalonians (1 Thess. ii, 18). He is the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience (Eph. ii, 2), and he deceiveth the whole world (Rev. xii, 9).

But his efforts are directed against the bodies of men, as well as against their souls. That the agency of Satan was concerned in producing physical diseases the Scriptures plainly teach (Job ii, 7; Luke xiii, 16). Peter says of Christ, that he went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil (Acts x, 38). Hymeneus and Alexander were delivered to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme (1 Tim. i, 20), where physical suffering by the agency of Satan, as a divine chastisement, is manifestly intended.

It is of no avail that there are difficulties connected with the agency ascribed to Satan. Objections of little weight when brought against well-authenticated facts. Any objections raised against the agency of Satan are equally valid against his existence. If he exists, he must act, and if he is evil, his agency must be evil. The fact of such an agency being revealed, as it is, is every way as consonant with reason and religious consciousness as are the existence and agency of good angels. Neither reason nor consciousness could, by themselves, establish such a fact, but all the testimony they are capable of adducing is in agreement with the Scripture representation on the subject. If God communicates with good men without their consciousness, there is no apparent reason why Satan may not, without their consciousness, communicate with bad men. And if good men become better by the influence of good beings, it is equally easy to suppose that bad men may become worse by the influence of evil beings. Such an influence no more militates against the benevolence of God than does the agency of wicked men, or the existence of moral evil in any form. Evil agents are as really under the divine control as are good agents. And out of evil God will cause good to come. He will make the wrath of devils as well as of men to praise Him, and the remainder He will restrain.

Savage, John Adams, D. D., son of Abraham and Mary (Adams), was born in Salem, Washington county, N. Y., October 9th, 1800. He graduated from Union College, in 1822, and studied theology privately while teaching academies in Delhi and Auburn. In 1825 he was licensed, and in 1827 ordained by the Washington County Associate Reformed Presbytery, and settled at Fort Covington. In 1832 he was called to Ogdensburg, and remained there for twenty years, prosecuting a faithful and successful ministry, and growing, to the last, in the esteem of the church and of the community. In 1850 he was persuaded to accept the Presidency of Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis. The Institution was so infantile when he took charge of it that he may be considered its parent; and by the most assiduous nurture he brought it up to the stature and vigor of youth. Of unquestioned piety and of great excellence, he never spared himself in his work, and died, at Waukesha, December 13th, 1861, prematurely worn out. One who knew him well remarked at his funeral, that he had taken no rest for a quarter of a century; and he was described by another as "a man of great sagacity, integrity and benevolence; a man of deep piety and excellence of character, an able and instructive preacher, a good and useful man."

Sawyer, Rev. Samuel, son of Calvin G. and Hannah V. Sawyer, was born near Goshen, Orange county, N. Y., June 20th, 1823. After graduating at Princeton College, in 1842, he spent several years in teaching, and entered Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., with the class of 1845, graduating in 1848. He was then commissioned by the Home Mission Society to labor at Rogersville, and in Hawkins county, East Tennessee. He remained there until 1857, organizing the Liberty Hill, Moorsburg and Kincaid churches. He was blessed with precious revivals at Rogersville, which greatly strengthened the church. He was in demand at sacramental meetings throughout the bounds of the Synod of Tennessee, and at different times preached in most of the central points in seasons of revival. Though not claiming to be a traveling evangelist, Mr. Sawyer did the work of one. If the mountains, hills, valleys, bridle-paths, highways, churches, school-houses, private dwellings and groves of East Tennessee could testify, they would join with the people of those days, and, quoting the great apostle, would say of this man, "In journeyings often, in perils of waters. . . . In weariness and painfulness. . . . in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold" and heat, he carried the glorious gospel to multitudes of thirsty souls. Like Paul, he preached only "Christ and him crucified." In the Spring of 1857 he was chosen Professor of Languages in Caldwell College, Rogers-ville, Tenn., but resigned his Chair that Fall, and removed with his family to Marion, Grant county, Ind. Here he was chosen President of the College of Indiana, and preached to the Presbyterian churches of Marion and Jonesborough. In 1861 he yielded to the request of the Board of Missions to reorganize our Presbyterian churches in East Tennessee, where he was so well known. He threw his whole energy into this work, with important results, and as he went up to the General Assembly with Rev. T. J. Lamar, and reported the good progress of the work, he received the hearty welcome and approval of his brethren. Since then he has labored in Chillicothe, Mo., East St. Louis, Ill., Schooley's Mountain, N. J., and is now pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Throntown, Ind.

Sayre, Hon. Theodore S., was born in Utica, N. Y., April 25th, 1837; the son of excellent Christian parents; his father a prominent business man of the city. In his eighteenth year, he made profession of his faith in Christ, uniting with the First Presbyterian Church of Utica, where, under the guidance of a beloved pastor, he learned the privilege of working in the cause of the Master. Having engaged in work as a teacher in a mission Sunday school, in 1856, he has continued to labor in the same field, as teacher or superintendent, and in other ways, until the present time, for these twenty-eight years, and he gives no sign of growing weary. A church having grown out of the mission school, in 1868, he soon transferred his church membership to this new organization, that he might give it all the help possible. His latest act is the consummation of interest in Christ's work thus begun and increased by continued activity in service. What is thus referred to is his gift to his church, at a cost of more than $30,000, of a house of worship, built of stone, commodious, handsomely finished and furnished throughout. Not seeking thus to make himself a name, but to glorify God, he has set an example for others to follow, and identified his name with the Memorial Presbyterian Church of Utica, which now flourishes in the enjoyment of new privileges thus provided, through desire for its welfare.

Scarritt, Isaac, was born in Vermont. He removed, with his parents, to Illinois when about six years old, and settled on what was afterwards known as Scarritt's Prairie, and now the town of Godfrey. His business was that of a dry goods merchant. While yet a youth, he connected himself with the Presbyterian Church in Godfrey, and was subsequently made elder. He was eminently inspired with an earnest and consecrated purpose. Although not an enthusiast, he was ever alive to the best interests of the Church, both spiritually and financially, and her prosperity, peace and unity were dear to his heart. In seasons of religious awakening he was especially tender and helpful. One of Mr. Scarritt's prominent characteristics was love for and interest in children and young people. For twenty years the Superintendent of the Sabbath school of the church, his influence as a Christian teacher was far-reaching, and many persons in that and other churches owe their first religious impressions to him. He spared no labor or expense that he might make his school-room an attractive place for the young, while his pleasant smile and cordial welcome made the Sabbath morning hour a delightful memory to all. Always methodical and reliable in all the relations of life, he was a tower of strength in the church and community. A clear head and sound judgment, combined with unusual executive ability, eminently fitted him for the responsible positions he was called upon to occupy. The educational interests of the city received a new impulse at his hands, and of the theological and charitable boards of the State he was an honored member. As a friend and neighbor, he was characterized by unvarying friendship, tender sympathy, kindly interest and efficient help. He died December 22d, 1873.

Schaff, Philip, D.D., LL.D., was born at Coire, Switzerland, January 1st, 1819. He was educated at the college of his native city, and prosecuted his studies at the Gymnasium at Stuttgart, and the Universities of Tübingen, Halle and Berlin, and in 1842 he was Lecturer on Theology in the University of Berlin. The German Reformed Synod in the United States, in October, 1843, having thought it desirable to have a suitable representative of German theology in this country, applied to their German brethren for one, and at the recommendation of Drs. Neander, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Müller, Krummacher and others, he was invited to the United States. During the first twenty years he made his residence at Mercersburg, Pa., acting as Professor of Church History and Exegesis in the seminary, and in 1863 he removed to New York, to edit Lange's Commentary, and to superintend the printing of the last two volumes of his "Church History." Since his residence in New York he has delivered a course of lectures on Ecclesiastical History, in the Theological Seminary at Andover, and in 1868 he was elected Professor of Church History in the Hartford Theological Seminary, and in May, 1870, Professor of Theological Encyclopedia and Symbolism in the Union Theological Seminary. In 1863 he revisited Europe, and in 1869 he was sent by the Evangelical Alliance of America to extend an invitation to the leading divines in Europe to attend a general Conference, to be held in New York in September, 1870, in which he met with great success. In 1869 he was elected Professor of Church History, and, in 1873, Professor of Hebrew and the Cognate Languages, in Union Theological Seminary.

Dr. Schaff is the author of many valuable volumes. His great works, however, are his "History of the Apostolic Church, with a General Introduction to the Study of Church History," and his "History of the Christian Church." In 1861 he began the translating and editing of Lange's "Exegetical, Doctrinal and Homiletical Commentary on the Scriptures." During the preparation of these great works he has always been engaged in preaching the gospel, in writing books for Sabbath schools, and in laboring to convince the people, both from the pulpit and by the press, of the duty and benefits flowing from the observance of the Sabbath as a day dedicated to the service of God. He has also endeavored to make the German and English populations better acquainted with each other's thoughts and feelings, by such works as "America: a Sketch of the Political, Social and Religious Character of the United States of America," two lectures delivered at Berlin in 1851, etc., etc. Dr. Schaff was editor of Der Deutsche Kirchenfreund from 1848 to 1859, and has contributed largely to periodical literature, both in German and English.

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D.

Schaffer, Rev. Samuel, was born in Philadelphia, of German descent; made profession of faith in the Church of Northern Liberties, in 1819; prepared for college at Lawrenceville, N. J.; graduated at Union College and Princeton Theological Seminary. The first ten years of his life were spent as a stated supply in Western New York. For a number of years he taught in various academies in Central and Northern Pennsylvania. He had decided literary tastes. Two small volumes, "Theobald; or, the Fanatic," and "Mary de Goldenbeck," were translated by him, from the German into English. A sermon was published in the National Preacher in 1861. He died at Scranton, Pa., February 21st, 1879, aged seventy-seven.

Schenck, Rev. William, was a native of Allentown, N. J. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1771, and ordained in 1772. After preaching at various places in New York and New Jersey, he was finally settled, in 1780, at Pittsgrove and Cape May, where he remained until 1787, when he removed to Ballston, New York. Towards the close of 1793 he removed to Huntingdon, L. I., and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, December 27th of that year. In 1817 he left Huntingdon and removed to Franklin, O., where he was pastor for several years, and died September 1st, 1822. Mr. Schenck was the grandfather of the Hon. Robert C. Schenck, late Minister to Great Britain. He was a dignified, excellent man, though not distinguished as a great or popular preacher. His labors were acceptable, and his church received large accessions under his ministry.

Schenck, William Edward, D.D., was born in Princeton, N. J., March 29th, 1819. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1838; studied law; was a missionary in the coal regions of Pennsylvania, 1842; ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 28th, 1843; was pastor at Manchester, N. J., 1843-5; stated supply of Hammond Street Church, New York city, 1845; and its pastor, 1847-8. In 1848 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Princeton, N. J., and continued to be its pastor until 1852; from 1852 to 1854 he was Superintendent of Church Extension in the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and from 1862 to 1870, was Editor, as well as Secretary, of the Presbyterian Board of Publication.

Since that time he has been Corresponding Secretary of the Board.

In his connection with the Board of Publication, Dr. Schenck has shown himself ardently devoted to its interests, and its present prosperous condition is very largely due to his judiciousness, zeal, and administrative ability. Several valuable volumes from his pen are numbered with the publications of the Board. Dr. Schenck has been honored by his brethren with other important positions of high trust and responsibility. He was a member of the Reunion Committee of Fifteen appointed by the General Assembly (O. S.) at St. Louis, to confer with a similar Committee from the New School General Assembly. He has been a Director of Princeton Theological Seminary since 1866, and is Vice-President of the Trustees of the General Assembly. He prepared the General Catalogue of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1883, and is Secretary of the Alumni Association of the same, also Chairman of its Necrological Committee, and in the latter capacity has, since 1873, prepared its Necrological Reports. The fidelity and ability with which this arduous and important service has been rendered has several times been gratefully acknowledged by the Association. Dr. Schenck preaches occasionally, as opportunity offers, and his sermons are marked by able, instructive and impressive exposition of gospel truth.

Science and Revelation. It is really surprising with what confidence and courage men who claim superior wisdom in the realm of science will hurl their discoveries at the volume of Revelation, just as if these discoveries were final and certain, instead of being, as they at least are, doubtful in their character.

The past has a lesson for us on this subject. For example, erroneous and intrinsically absurd as was the Ptolemaic theory of the universe, it was for some 1400 years the accepted astronomical science, and it is but 250 years since Galileo, under threatened penalty for maintaining an "awful heresy," was compelled to "abjure, rail at and abominate" the Copernican system, which affirmed, what everybody now believes, that the earth revolves around the sun. So with light. From Newton's time up to within less than a century, the emanation or corpuscular theory respecting light, taught as it was by that prince of philosophers, was universally believed to be a scientific verity, and every scholar in optics was made to believe that vision was ascribable to a ceaseless emission of luminiferous matter from the sun and other luminous bodies, and the striking of this matter against our visual organs. It was under this theory that the question was often sneeringly asked: "How is it that the Bible represents light as existing before the sun and moon were created?" And yet how changed the views of scientists now? Humboldt, Wagner, Schubert, Agassiz and Guyot have shown that light exists independently of the sun, and results from molecular action or combination. Hence the command "Light be" was simply another way of saying: "Let molecular action begin," whereupon light was at once evolved. And thus, as Professor Dana says, "at last, through modern scientific researches, we learn that the appearance of light on the first day and of the sun on the fourth—an idea foreign to man's unaided conceptions—is as much in the volume of nature as that of sacred writ."

In addition to the lesson of the past, let us not overlook the present unsettled state of science. Voltaire said, in his scoffing mood, of the theories of creation which came under his notice: "Philosophers put themselves, without ceremony, in the place of God, and destroy and renew the world after their own fashion." How applicable is the spirit of this remark to many modern scientists! How widely they differ from each other! Lamarck, for example, held to spontaneous generation. The author of the book, "Vestiges of Creation," so celebrated thirty years ago, but utterly fallen out of the popular notice to-day, took even more extreme views. Darwin denounces both. Huxley is at sword's point with Darwin on the question of a Creator who breathed life at first into one or more beings. Wallace insists that Darwin's great doctrine of natural selection is not proven, and if proven would be entirely inadequate to account for the origin of man. Owen contends for the physical unity of the race, and Agassiz, while granting the moral unity of the race, contends for different pairs in different geographical centres. Herbert Spencer denounces all the rest of the scientists, deeming his theory about force sufficient to account for the world as it is, and for the origin of the human race; while Miller, Dana and Guyot, names that equal any, hold most zealously to the theory of one human pair, and on scientific grounds indorse the Scripture statements as to the origin of the race. So with the theories of eminent geologists—say, for instance, on the question of the age of the earth. They differ from each other by tens of thousands of years. The very last deliverances of scientists in this direction are most significant—that of the President of the British Association and that of the Vice-President of the American Academy of Natural Sciences, both of whom have admitted it to be the prevailing feeling of the geologists that the "whole foundation of theoretic geology must be reconstructed." Is it not true, then, that science is unsettled, and that, until it can assert definite and acknowledged conclusions, it is premature to demand a reconciliation between it and Revelation?

Dr. Rudolph Virchow, the eminent Professor of Pathology, of Berlin, said: "All attempts to transform our problems into doctrines, to introduce our theories as the basis of a plan of education, particularly the attempt simply to depose the Church, and to replace its dogma by a religion of descent, these attempts, I say, must fail. Therefore, let us be moderate; let us exercise resignation, so that we give even the most treasured problems which we put forth always as problems only. . . . Do not take this for confirmed truth; be prepared that this may perhaps be changed; only for the moment we are of opinion that it may be true." Such counsel from such a source should be heeded. The sands of time are strewn with the wrecks of scientific fancies which have sprung up from the teeming brains of men who boast of their learning and ability, but which have perished forever, like the shadowy phantoms of the night. Christian men have no quarrel with the facts of science. But when men shift their position from year to year, when theories which can hardly stand without propping, and over which scientists themselves wrangle and dispute, and show no signs of coming to an agreement, are pressed upon us as authoritative, with all the marks of infallibility which distinguished the ages of darkness that are passed, we beg to be excused from accepting theories so crude or statements so feebly sustained. A volley of boiled peas will not batter down the fortress of Gibraltar, nor will the explosion of a fire-cracker overturn the everlasting hills; and it will require more than the mere theorizing of a man who claims that he has descended from a monkey to expel the Almighty God from the universe which He has made, or hush the voice of the heavens which declare His glory, or the throbbings of the countless loyal hearts that are filled and strengthened by His grace and love.

It is urged by infidels against the Bible that "a perfect volume should be perfect in its science." But how futile is this objection! It is natural, and even necessary, that the records of a revelation should employ the current speech and method of the times in which they were written. How much more reasonable was it for the sacred writers to speak of sunrise and sunset (as we do even now) than to expound the laws of the planetary motion, and to refer to the ends of the earth instead of explaining its rotundity, and to call insane persons lunatics than to enter a special disclaimer against the influence of the moon in cerebral disease! The fact is, as has been well remarked, that books thus written would have been in part unintelligible to the men of their own times; and, so far as they were understood, would have run so entirely counter to their received opinions on extra-religious subjects as to awaken incredulity as to their religious contents. Scientific truth can be legitimately reached only stepwise, often with age-long preparation for a new step in advance, often with long intervals between the announcement and the popular reception of a new fact, theory or law. Thoroughly scientific Scriptures would have laid upon them the impossible task of anticipating this progress; of revolutionizing men's notions about the universe before they knew the reasons for changing them, and, failing of this, they would necessarily have failed of a hospitable reception for their religious contents.

"What," says Hugh Miller, "would skeptics such as Hobbes and Hume have said of an opening chapter in Genesis that would describe successive periods—first, of mollusks, star lilies and crustaceans; next of fishes; next of reptiles and birds, then of mammals, and finally of man—and that would minutely portray a period in which there were lizards bulkier than elephants, reptilian whales furnished with necks slim and long as the bodies of great snakes, and flying dragons, whose spread of wing greatly more than doubled that of the largest bird? The world would assuredly not receive such a revelation."

How strong the testimonies of learned men in favor of the harmony of science and the Bible!

"Thus far," says Dr. Samuel Hopkins, "the demonstrations of natural science have been expositions of the Mosaic records, and, being such, they foreshadow the grand results to which her labors are tending, a complete verification of all the scientific mysteries recorded in our sacred writings."

"Science," says Dr. Atwater, "so far from disproving, confirms the entire inspiration of Scripture. This appears from the fact that there is no other way of accounting for the great amount of scientific truth, wholly unknown to ancient science, which the Bible sets forth. Take the most momentous of all—the cosmogony of the first chapter of Genesis, which presents the order of the creative epochs essentially as the latest conclusions of geological research show it to have been. Now, all this was entirely unknown to the early science and knowledge of the world. How could any writer of the book of Genesis have discovered or conceived of it, or have been led to make such a narration, the scientific import of which was wholly unknown to him, without supernatural guidance? Science, then, so far from discrediting, proves the Divine inspiration of the Bible in this climacteric and crucial case. But the same is true of the latest trend of scientific discovery in reference to such matters as the unity of the race, the fall, the deluge, the Babel confusion of tongues and consequent dispersion, and the re-peopling of the earth in separate portions by Noah's three sons. That the drift of ethnic, linguistic and geologic science is in this direction, is undeniable."

"I feel," said Professor Silliman, "that science and religion may walk hand in hand. They form two distinct volumes of revelation, and, both being records of the will of the Creator, both may be received as constituting a unity, declaring the mind of God."

To these valuable testimonies might be added many such as the following:—

"All human discoveries seem to be made only for the purpose of confirming the sacred Scriptures."—Herschel.

"In my investigations of natural phenomena, when I can meet anything in the Bible it affords me a firm platform on which to stand."—Lieutenant Maury.

"The grand old Book of God still stands, and this old earth, the more its leaves are turned over and pondered, the more it will sustain and illustrate the Sacred Word."—Professor Dana.

"The Shasters of the Hindoos contain false astronomy as well as false physiology, and the Koran of Mohammed distinctly avows the Ptolemaic system of the heavenly bodies, and so interwoven are these scientific errors with the religions of these sacred books, that when you have proved the former you have disproved the latter. But the Bible, stating only facts, and adopting no system of human philosophy, has ever stood, and ever shall stand, in sublime simplicity and undecaying strength, while the winds and the waves of conflicting human opinions roar and dash harmlessly around, and the wrecks of a thousand false systems of philosophy and religion are strewn along its base."—Professor Hitchcock.

"There is no need to be frightened at the phantoms raised by such terms as matter, and force, and molecules, and protoplasmic energy, and rhythmic vibrations of the brain. There are no real terrors in a philosophy which affirms the conceivability that two and two might possibly make five, or in that which predicates that an infinite number of straight lines constitute a finite surface, or that which denies all evidence of a design in nature, or in that which assimilates the motives which induce a parent to support his offspring to the pleasures derived from wine and music, or in that which boldly asserts the unknowableness of the supreme and the vanity of prayer. Surely philosophies which involve results such as these have no permanent grasp on human nature. They are in themselves suicidal, and in their turn, after their brief day, will, like other philosophies, be refuted or denied by the next comer, and are doomed to accomplish the happy dispatch."—Professor Prichard.

Any alarm, therefore, which the friends of revelation may feel from the allegation that it conflicts with science is wholly unnecessary. They have nothing to fear from any discoveries that can be made in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. The geologist may dive and delve into our globe's deepest recesses; the astronomer may move along his star-paved way until we are dazzled at the story of his ascents; and the evolutionist may discourse learnedly about the whole animal creation culminating in man, having sprung from a little particle of jelly floating in some primeval sea; but, after all, the pillars of the "sure word of prophecy" will remain firm as ever. Let science perfect yet more her telescopes, and make taller her observatories, deeper her mines and more searching her crucibles, and yet will not all the research, even though the new masters of physical lore should blaspheme where a Cuvier, a Newton and others adored, bring God into contradiction with Himself, or subvert the truth which He has given, or eclipse the light which shineth in this dark place. Still will it be true, however boldly it may be alleged that Jehovah's works conflict with His Word, that the highest deductions of reason harmonize with moral truth.

Certainly, if the scientists who assail the Bible had more of the spirit of the greatest of philosophers, as expressed in words quoted in every child's book: "I am but a child, picking up pebbles on the shore of the great sea of Truth," they would be less rash and reckless in assaulting the Word of God with their so-called "discoveries." It is high time for them to understand that their bold assertions must fall short of accomplishing their design. It is not as easy as they imagine to unsettle men's faith in the oracles of revealed truth. A religion wrought into the world's history through the long centuries, mastering the confidence of men in spite of intellectual struggle, verifying itself to the heart through practical experience in sorrow and trial, justifying itself to the deepest intuitions of the whole race in spiritual things—a religion that has quickened thought, overthrown despotism, softened manners, inspired hope, whose banner is light and whose breath is benediction—such a religion cannot be dislodged from men's affection and confidence by boasting prophecy, by counter-revelation out of a "vain imagination," nor by degrading the intelligence of those who cling to it. The "seed" which the modern "birds of the air" would, with the old appetite, devour, is no longer a seed, as they fancy, but has "become a tree," in the branches of which they themselves are "lodging." Well would it be for them also to remember that upon the attitude we assume to the Bible depends what we find in it. Those who come to it with a receptivity for truth find their faith confirmed; but to those who come as doubters, God's principle is true; to the pure He shows Himself pure, and to the froward He shows Himself froward; God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. As Cowper has beautifully said:—

"Learning itself received into a mind
By nature weak, or viciously inclined,
Saves but to lead philosophers astray,
Where children would with ease discern the way."

Scott, Rev. Archibald, was a native of Scotland, who migrated in his boyhood, and alone, to the colony of Pennsylvania, about the year 1760. He enjoyed the advantages of a thorough academical training in the school of a Mr. Finley, a teacher of high reputation at that day; for which he rendered compensation, in some measure, by working on the farm. Soon after leaving the school, he migrated to the Valley of Virginia. He was for several years a student of theology, under the supervision of Principal Graham, of Liberty Hall Academy, and during this period supported himself by teaching a school. He was licensed to preach by the Hanover Presbytery, October 31st, 1777, and was ordained and installed pastor of the united churches of Hebron and Bethel, in Augusta county, in December, 1778. This relation he sustained until his death, March 4th, 1799.

Mr. Scott entered warmly into the American cause, and exhorted his people to fight for freedom; but he felt that the more important work that devolved upon him was to assist in laying deep the foundations of our republic on religious truth, and doing what he could, by instruction and example, to prepare the rising generation to enjoy and preserve constitutional liberty. He possessed a logical and discriminating mind, and was a strong, vigorous thinker—"a workman that needed not to be ashamed." His preaching is said to have been in a high degree instructive, and often eloquent and powerful. He exerted great influence in the community at large, while, by his own people, he was regarded with an almost boundless esteem and veneration.

Scott, Rev. David, was born in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., March 13th, 1849, and was a son of David and Mary (Baxter) Scott. He was graduated from the College of New Jersey in 1873, taking a Fellowship in the Classics, one of the conditions of which is, that the recipient shall spend one year abroad, in some European university. Immediately after leaving college, Mr. Scott entered Princeton Seminary, and studied one year, at the end of which he went to Leipsic, in Germany, where he pursued the study of theology and philology for one year; then returning, he entered the Middle Class in the seminary, and having finished the remaining two years was graduated in 1877. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 4th, 1876, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, as an evangelist, June 21th, 1877. For one year, from September, 1876, to June, 1877, Mr. Scott was Tutor of Latin and Greek in Princeton College, while pursuing his studies in the seminary. Having been accepted as a missionary by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, he embarked with his wife, September 1st, 1877, for Teheran, in Persia. There he remained about sixteen months, during which he had well mastered the Persian language, when, on account of the continued illness of his wife, by the advice of physicians and of the Mission, he returned to the United States, intending again to resume his work at Teheran as soon as possible. He arrived in New York near the end of March; almost immediately afterwards grew ill, and died in that city, April 1st, 1879. He was a young man of excellent abilities, and of fine scholarship, and his death was regarded as a sad loss to the cause of Foreign Missions.

Scott, Rev. James Long, occupies a prominent place in the history of Presbyterian missions. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1833; spent two years in teaching; then entered Princeton Seminary in 1835, and graduated in 1838. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, September 27th, 1837, and was subsequently ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, September 26th, 1838.

Not long after his ordination Mr. Scott sailed for India as a missionary, in connection with the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. His first field of labor was at Futtelghurh, where he began to work in 1839. After a year and a half he commenced the station at Mynpoorie, where he remained about two years. He was then called back to Futtelghurh, where he labored about six years. He was next sent to Agra, where he spent about a year, and then made a visit to the United States; but after about a year returned to Agra, where the great mutiny of 1857 found him. The station at Agra being abandoned he went again to Futtelghurh, and remained there nearly seven years, until his health broke down and he repaired to London. In London he spent about three years, and thence, by the advice of his physicians, returned to America, where he opened a school at Hammonton, N. J., which he taught from about 1868 to 1878. He then again returned to Northern India, and resumed his labors at Landour. His health, which had long been delicate, again failed, and he died at Dehra, India, January 20, 1880, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He met death without fear. His last moments were entirely peaceful, and he rested wholly on his divine Saviour.

Mr. Scott was a man of great gentleness and amiability of character, of warm affections, an earnest worker in the Lord's vineyard, of great humility but strong in faith, and who labored long and faithfully to bring the heathen to the saving knowledge of Christ.

Scott, Hon. John, was born July 14th, 1824, in Alexandria, Huntingdon county, Pa. His father, John Scott, was a native of Adams county, Pa., and his mother, Agnes Irvine, of County Down, Ireland, both of Presbyterian stock. He received his education in the common schools at Alexandria, studying Latin and Greek with such private tutors as could then be secured in the village, among them being the Rev. John McKinney and the Rev. Henry J. Van Dyke, the latter being then the teacher of the village school prior to entering the ministry. The Sabbath-school was then, and for fifty years, under the superintendence of John Porter, an elder in the Alexandria Church, and very widely known and recognized as one of the most devoted and useful men in the Presbytery of Huntingdon. In that Sabbath school, held in the Old White Church on the hill, John Scott was a scholar in the days when the "Shorter Catechism" was the principal text-book, after the Bible itself. He connected himself with the Presbyterian Church in Huntingdon, in 1855, then under the ministry of the Rev. O. O. McLean, D. D., and was in the next year elected and ordained a ruling elder, and became Assistant Superintendent of the Sabbath school, remaining in that capacity, and, after the death of the venerable Jacob Miller, as its Superintendent, until he left Huntingdon, in 1875.

After his removal to Pittsburg, he connected himself with the Shady Side Presbyterian Church, and was a Trustee of the Western Theological Seminary. He was a commissioner to the General Assembly in 1857. He removed to Philadelphia in April, 1878, where he has since resided, and is a member of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church. He is now one of the Trustees of the Theological Seminary at Princeton and a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication.

Mr. Scott studied law in Chambersburg, with the Hon. Alexander Thomson, and was admitted to the Bar in 1846. During his student life he was a teacher in the Sabbath school of that place. He was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature in 1862, and elected to the United States Senate in January, 1869, serving from March 4th, 1869, to March 4th, 1875. In 1875 he became general counsel of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in relation to its interests west of Pittsburg, and since his removal to Philadelphia he has been General Solicitor of the company just named.

Mr. Scott is an exemplary Christian and a gentleman of genial spirit, sound in judgment, inflexibly adherent to what he believes to be right, and true to all the trusts committed to his charge. He is a lawyer of decided ability, and faithful in all the relations of life. He is a forcible speaker, possesses fine administrative powers, and both in the State and National Councils left a good record for uprightness, diligence and fidelity.

Scott, Rev. John L., was born at Boyina, N. Y., December 21st, 1846. He graduated at Monmouth College, Ill., in 1870, and at the United Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Newburgh, N. Y., March, 1872. He was assistant to the Rev. Dr. F. R. Masters in the Presbyterian Church at Matteawan (Fishkill), N. Y., from February to December, 1872, when he was installed pastor. During this pastorate two hundred were added to the church, and a debt of $10,000 was paid. He resigned this charge in November, 1882, and the following December became pastor elect of the Church at East Boston, Mass., where, in addition to the church's spiritual prosperity under his acceptable and efficient ministry, it has been relieved of a debt of $16,000.

Scott, John Work, D. D., LL. D., was born within the bounds of the Presbyterian congregation of Slate Ridge, York county, Pa., November 27th, 1807. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1827, after which he taught several years. His theological studies were commenced under the Rev. Samuel Martin, D. D., at Chancelford, Pa., and completed at Princeton Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, October 3d, 1832, and installed as pastor at Poland, Ohio, October 3d, 1834. Released from this charge April 13th, 1836, in the same month he became stated supply to the Church at Three Springs, in the Presbytery of Washington, also of the Free Church of Steubenville, Ohio, in connection with Rev. C. C. Beatty, D. D., until October, 1847.

Dr. Scott's chief work was that of an educator, in which work he was eminently successful. He was founder and Principal of the Grove Academy at Steubenville, from October, 1836, to October, 1847; Principal of the Lindsley Institute at Wheeling Va., from October, 1847, to April, 1853; President of Washington College, Pa., from April 1853, to June, 1865; Principal of Woodburn Female Seminary, and of the Academy at Morgantown, W. Va., from 1865 to 1867, then Vice-president of the State University at the same place, and Professor, first of Ancient Languages, afterwards of Mental and Moral Science, and for two years was Acting President. About March 1st, 1879, he went to North Carolina to supply a vacant place in Biddle University, at Charlotte. His ripe scholarship and long experience made him a most valuable accession to its Faculty, and, although in feeble health, he performed most acceptably the duties he had undertaken. He died July 25th, 1879.

Dr. Scott was a man of excellent intellectual powers, of great activity and vigor of mind, of rare energy, and fixedness of purpose. As a teacher, he was admirable, and rarely surpassed. Hundreds of his former pupils will mourn his loss, and remember gratefully the eminent services he rendered them.

Scott, William Anderson, D. D., LL. D., was born at Rock Creek, Tenn., January 31st, 1813. He graduated at Cumberland University, Tenn., in 1833, and at Princeton Seminary in 1834. In 1829 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hopewell, West Tennessee, and May 17th, 1835, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Louisiana. He was missionary in Louisiana and Arkansas, 1835-36; stated supply and Principal of Female Academy, Winchester, Tenn., 1836-38; stated supply at the Hermitage Church, on the estate of General Andrew Jackson, 1838-40; Principal of Nashville Female Academy, 1838-40; pastor at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, 1840-43; pastor of the First Church, New Orleans, La., 1843-54; pastor-elect of Calvary Presbyterian Church, San Francisco, Cal., 1851-61; pastor of Forty-second Street Church, New York city, 1863-70; and since 1870 has been pastor of St. John's Church, San Francisco, Cal., and Professor in San Francisco Theological Seminary.

The manners of Dr. Scott are courteous and genial in the extreme. His conversational powers are very superior. He exhibits a fund of the widest learning and the richest thought upon deeper subjects, and not less spirit and intelligence in regard to those of a more common character. His life has been one of varied experience, the largest acquaintance with his fellow-men, and a clear-sighted observation. A missionary in the wilds of America, a tourist in refined Europe, a pilgrim in the Holy Land, a preacher in the great cities, and a professor in a seminary for training young men for the ministry, his field of view has been the most extensive, and to experience he has added a treasure of lore, gained in a lifetime of profound mental application. Fame and honors have never lifted him away from sympathy and communion with the humblest who might cross his path. Dr. Scott is an erudite scholar, an excellent writer and an agreeable speaker. He always has full mastery of his subject. He excels in debate. Of an independent, courageous nature, his assaults upon error are bold and uncompromising. He was Moderator of the General Assembly at its meeting in New Orleans in 1858. For three years he was editor of the New Orleans Presbyterian, and he founded the Pacific Expositor. He is the author of many valuable works, among which are "Daniel, a Model for Young Men;" "Wedge of Gold;" "Trade and Letters; Their Journeys Round the World," and "The Christ of the Apostles' Creed; The Voice of the Church against Arianism, Strauss and Renan."

Scott, Rev. William Cowper, the eldest son of the Rev. William N. Scott, was born in Martinsburg, Va., January 13, 1817. He graduated at South Hanover College, Ind., in 1837, and in the Autumn of the same year entered the Union Theological Seminary, Va., where he remained three years. Here the depth of his piety, the high literary merit of his performances, and the vigor and originality of his intellect, marked him as a candidate for the ministry of no ordinary promise. In April, 1840, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Winchester. The next Summer he spent in the mountains of Virginia, laboring in connection with his father, and visiting some vacant churches; and he became, during the ensuing Autumn, a stated supply to the churches of Providence, in Halifax county, and Cub Creek and Bethesda, in Charlotte county. In May, 1842, he was installed pastor of the churches of Providence and Bethesda, and continued this relation till 1846, when he accepted a call from the Church in Farnville, Va. After three years' labor in this new field, he was compelled, by bronchial disease, to resign his charge; but, after two years' absence from the pulpit, in which he was industriously engaged in doing good, he was again able to preach, and was called, with perfect unanimity, to become a second time pastor of the Bethesda Church, which he faithfully served until he was called up to higher services in the Church triumphant. He died, October 25d, 1851, not only in peace, but triumph. Mr. Scott was a man of highly cultivated intellect, of correct literary taste, and of manly scholarship, and as such contributed his share to the literary reputation of his native State and of his country. He was modest, diligent and retiring, but he was, at the same time, a fearless advocate of the true, the beautiful, the holy in human character, and a lovely example of what he taught to others.

Scott, William McKendree, D.D., was born in Jefferson county, Ohio, in 1817; graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1846. He was licensed by West Lexington Presbytery. In 1847 he was elected Professor of Languages in Centre College, Danville, Ky., and accepting a call as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in that place, he was ordained by Transylvania Presbytery, in 1848. In January, 1856, he was called as pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1859 the General Assembly elected him Professor of Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, Ill. He died December 23d, 1861, in Princeton, N. J., at the residence of his father-in-law, Rev. Dr. Charles Hodge.

Dr. Scott was a man of decided ability. As a teacher, both in college and seminary, he was laborious and thorough, accurate to the last degree, and most enthusiastic in imparting instruction. As a pastor and preacher he stood in the front rank of the ministry. He loved the courts of the Church, and in them his thorough acquaintance with the theory and practice of our system and his practical business-like cast of mind, with his great earnestness in carrying out his convictions of truth and duty gave him a leading part. A life spent in Christian service fitly ended in a death of triumph.

Scovel, Sylvester, D. D., was born in Peru, Berkshire county, Mass., March 3d, 1796. In 1812 he removed to Albany, N. Y., where he engaged in business as a clerk in a store of one of his brothers. He graduated at Williams College, in 1822, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. About a month after his licensure he received an appointment from the Board of Domestic Missions to labor for six weeks as a missionary in five different neighborhoods on the Delaware river, between Trenton and Philadelphia. This appointment he fulfilled with great zeal and efficiency. He was pastor of the Church at Woodbury, N. J., 1825-28. This pastorate was eminently successful; many were added to the Church, and the strength and prosperity of the congregation were increased in other respects. His labors extended to a second church at Blackwoodtown, six miles East of Woodbury; here he was equally successful. During his residence at Woodbury, a successful effort was made to supply every family with a copy of the Scriptures, which, without his zeal, industry and perseverance, would have been a failure. He left this charge in the Fall of 1828, for a wider field of labor, carrying with him the confidence and love of his congregation and the community.

After preaching six months at Norristown, Pa., Mr. Scovel accepted commission from the Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church, to labor as a missionary in the West. Here he took charge of the church at Harrison, Ohio, which place, together with Laurenceburg, Ind., situated on the Ohio river, and several other intermediate and contiguous points, embracing a district of over twenty miles long, and an average width of ten miles, constituted his field of labor for the first three years. After this his ministry was confined to narrower limits, Harrison becoming his central and more important preaching point. His labors in this region were crowned with large success. During the seven years he cultivated these fields about three hundred made a profession of faith under his ministry.

In 1836 Dr. Scovel accepted an agency in the West for the Board of Domestic Missions. The field assigned him was the territory covered by the Synod of Cincinnati, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and Missouri, in which, to perform the duties of agent required great self-denial and much of the spirit of the gospel. Dr. Scovel proved adequate to the demands of the position, and his earnest, indefatigable and self-sacrificing labors were signally blessed. In the Fall of 1846 he was elected President of Hanover College, Ind., and immediately after accepting this office became financial agent of the Institution, in which capacity he was successful in raising funds for an endowment, towards which he contributed liberally himself. Under his wise administration of the college it was blessed with prosperity. He took special interest in the spiritual welfare of the students. Dr. Scovel died, July 4th, 1849, in that serenity of spirit which was the fruit of God's love shed abroad in his heart. To him the cause of religion and education in the West owes, under God, much of its success. To found and build up churches, schools, seminaries and colleges in that great valley, may be said to have been the master passion of his soul.

Scovel, Sylvester Fithian, D.D., son of the Rev. Dr. Sylvester Scovel, just noticed, was born in

SYLVESTER FITHIAN SCOVELL, D.D.

Harrison, Ohio, December 20th, 1835. He graduated at Hanover College, in the class of 1853, and at New Albany Theological Seminary in 1856. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Albany, April, 1857, and ordained by the same Presbytery, October 28th, 1857. He was pastor at Jeffersonville, Ind., 1857-60; and pastor at Springfield, Ohio, 1860-66. In 1866 he was called to the pastoral charge of the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., as successor to Dr. W. M. Paxton, and continued in this important position until the Spring of 1883, when he accepted the Presidency of Wooster University, Ohio, which office he now fills.

Dr. Scovel is a gentleman of genial spirit and winning and popular manners. He stands high as a preacher, being able, earnest and eloquent. As a pastor he has an excellent record. In the several churches he has served his ministry has been largely blessed. During his long residence in Pittsburg, he was held in the highest esteem as a minister, and as a public-spirited and useful citizen, and rendered valuable service to several educational institutions of the city, as well as to the Western Theological Seminary. He was a member of the Second General Council which met in Philadelphia in 1880, and read an admirable paper on "Presbyterianism in relation to Civil and Religious Liberty" before that body. Dr. Scovel is a vigorous writer, and by his scholarship, energy and sound judgment is well qualified for the prominent position he now occupies.

Scovell, Oliver P., was born of godly ancestry, in Orwell, Vt., March 21th, 1820. While a young man he removed with his parents to Niagara county, N. Y. In 1854 he was made elder of the Presbyterian Church of Lewiston, which office he still holds. During much of this time he has also served the Church as Sunday-school Superintendent, Trustee, Treasurer and Clerk of Session. Elder Scovell is an intelligent and devout believer, rooted and grounded in the faith. He magnifies all the ordinances of the gospel. He has, indeed, a "Church in his house." His household worship has always been rendered peculiarly interesting and beautiful by all the children praying in turn, down to the smallest one that could lisp the name of Jesus. He happily combines excellent business ability with fervent spirituality, so that with the co-operation of his fellow officers all the affairs of the Lewiston Church have been kept up in good order. He is a man of general intelligence and influential character, and is a noble representative of our useful band of Presbyterian elders.

Scriptures—Their Mysteries. Mysteries meet us on every side. The animal world is full of them. The problem of animal life is to this day as mysterious and unsolved, and probably insoluble, as it ever was. Pathology, the doctrine of disease, is as dark to this hour as any doctrine in theology. The vegetable world is full of mystery. There is not a flower or blade of grass that has not in it more mystery than all the wise men in the world can remove. The mineral world is full of mystery. Scarcely a stone can we take up but it presents to us the inexplicable marvels either of chemical affinity or of crystallization. The anatomist, with all his discoveries, cannot tell us how mind and matter are united, and exercise power over each other. Nor can the astronomer, though he calculates with such wonderful accuracy the motions of the heavenly bodies, explain upon what all these motions rest. How unreasonable, then, is it to object to the Bible, because mysteries are found in portions of it! If there were no mysteries, their absence would be as valid a ground of objection as their presence is. If a book professing to come from the infinite God could all be grasped by man's finite understanding, surely this very fact would prove that the volume wanted the signs most elementary of a heavenly origin.

The truth is, that the Bible, by its very mysteriousness, is adapted to accomplish its purpose. It is wisely fitted for the formation of character. It is a revelation clear enough to render faith possible, and obscure enough to leave unbelief possible. It affords thus a trial or test of character; it searches the heart. Too bright as well as too dark a revelation might defeat the very end of revelation. It would bring the educational and probationary period of life to a close, it would bring on the day of judgment. The very difficulties and limitations of revelation are adapted also to the conditions of moral growth. It requires and it repays toil. It tasks and tries and puzzles and strengthens faith. It is like man to make everything regular, easy, and plain, but that is not like the God of nature, of history, or of the Bible. A revelation in which the way never could be missed, a revelation made level and smooth to our feet, would be like the work of man, but not like the builder of the mountains. Were there no Alps for men to climb, no ocean's depths beneath the plummet's reach, no stars still unresolved, no Scylla and Charybdis waiting to catch up the unskillful voyager, no burdens of toil and sorrow laid upon our manhood, if this life were only the play of children, and all the days were sunshine, then, indeed, might we expect to find a Bible without difficulties, a gospel without parables, a kingdom of truth without tasks for the athlete, and without rewards for the victor. But the God of nature, of history, and of the Bible, surely does not intend to people His heaven with a race of moral imbeciles. "To him that overcometh" is the promise—seven times repeated—of "the crown of life."

Scudder, Col. Nathanael, belonged to an old family in Monmouth county, N. J. After leaving the College of New Jersey, he studied medicine, and practiced in his native county until the opening of the Revolution, when he entered actively into public life. He was Colonel of the Battalion of the Monmouth Militia, and from 1777 to 1779 represented New Jersey in the Continental Congress. He was also a member of the Committee of Safety. Colonel Scudder was an earnest Christian, and was an elder in Mr. Tennent's church at Freehold. He was the grandfather of the distinguished missionary, Rev. John Scudder, M. D. He was killed in a skirmish against the "Refugees" at Black Point, Monmouth county, New Jersey, in 1781. At the time of his death, Dr. Scudder was a Trustee of Princeton College.

Seaver, Norman, D. D., was born in Boston, Mass., April 23d, 1834; graduated at Williams College in 1851; in 1855 was admitted to the Boston Bar, where he practiced for some time; then entered Andover Theological Seminary, graduating in 1860. His first settlement was over the Congregational Church at Rutland, Vermont, where he was ordained and installed in August, 1861. After a faithful service of over seven years, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church in Henry street, Brooklyn, N. Y. He is at present pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Syracuse, N. Y. Dr. Seaver is a gentleman of great sincerity and kindness of feeling. In study he is an intellectual investigator, looking deeply into all subjects, and in his pastoral labors he is conscientious, devoted and energetic. He preaches with a pointed and clear explanation of his theme, and with an earnest interest in the spiritual welfare of those committed to his charge, and in all his activity exhibits a steadfast purpose to do his whole duty.

Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. This church was organized in the year of our Lord, 1743. As its name suggests, there was at the period of its organization one other church of the same faith and order in the city. That Church still exists under its original name of "The First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia." The original house of worship was "The Barbadoes lot store," situated on the northwest corner of Chestnut and Second streets, where they worshiped, in common with the Baptists, from about the year 1695. They continued together for about three years, after which the Presbyterians occupied it alone till they built a new house of worship in Market street, between Second and Third, on the south side. This occurred in 1704. That body continued to worship there till the year 1820. Since that time they have occupied their noble and commodious edifice on the south side of Washington Square.

If, at the commencement of the period which we are about to notice, so far as this church is concerned, there was but one Presbyterian Church in this city, the other denominations were very little, if at all, in advance of them. Christ Church, founded in 1695, was the only Episcopal church then existing. The First Baptist Church, founded in the same year with the First Presbyterian Church, existed alone of its order, in 1713. The First Lutheran Church, founded in 1712, was then the only one of its name. The Moravian Church was also founded in 1742. Nor were there, at that period, more than two or three Friends' Meeting-houses in the whole city and liberties, the most important of which was situated on the southwest corner of Second and Market streets. There is reason to believe, also, that there was a small mass-house, or Popish chapel, erected at the northwest corner of Walnut and Front streets, as early as the year 1686. These, with the old Swede Church, in Southwark, were the only religious societies which preceded the establishment of the Second Presbyterian Church. At this time the population of the city was about 13,000.

The Rev. Gilbert Tennent, the first pastor of this Church, was the oldest son of the Rev. William Tennent, who established the famous Log College at Neshaminy (see his sketch). In 1743 he was called to the Second Church in Philadelphia, where he remained until his death, in 1761. Mr. Tennent was one of the most distinguished and influential ministers of his age.

On the 21st of October, 1762, the Rev. George Duffield, afterwards pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church in this city, was chosen as an assistant minister to Mr. Tennent, then in feeble and declining health, but he refused the call. On the 30th of July, 1761, the Rev. John Murray, a native of Ireland, was called to the pastoral office, which he accepted. He probably entered upon the duties of the office in the beginning of the year 1765, but was not put in charge by the Presbytery till the following April. His connection with this church was, however, of short duration. He is represented to have been a man of considerable talent and learning, and the master of a powerful eloquence. He appears to have been popular, useful and beloved by the congregation. It was not long, however, before reports injurious to his moral character followed him from Europe, which eventuated in his leaving Philadelphia, in the latter part of the year 1765, to the great regret of the people.

From the time Mr. Murray left, the congregation remained destitute of a pastor for nearly three years. This was, probably, owing, in a great measure, to dissensions growing out of the circumstances connected with Mr. Murray's case. After several unsuccessful attempts to obtain a pastor, the congregation convened for the purpose on the 30th of August, 1768, and by a unanimous vote elected the Rev. James Sproat, then pastor of the Congregational Church at Guilford, Connecticut, which he accepted, and was installed in March, 1769. About three years after the settlement of the Rev. Mr. Sproat, the enterprise at Cumpington was commenced. A small building was erected at the northwest corner of Coates and Second streets, for the purposes of public worship, as a kind of chapel of ease, or collegiate appendage of this church, and was principally supplied by its pastors till it became an independent charge under the pastoral care of the Rev. James Patterson, in the year 1813. The ministry of Dr. Sproat continued till the 1st of October, 1793, when he fell a victim to the yellow fever, which raged in that year. His ministry was, however, interrupted by the events of the Revolutionary contest. Warmly attached to the independence of his country, as were also the body of his congregation, he was obliged to absent himself from the city while it was in possession of the British. How long his absence continued we have no means of ascertaining, as there is a total lack of records, both sessional and corporate, from the 10th of November, 1780, to the 15th of April, 1782.

Dr. Sproat's ministry was, upon the whole, a happy and prosperous one. His principal difficulties arose from a change in the psalmody of the church from Rouse to Watts, about the third year of his ministry.

On the 22d of December, 1786, Mr. Ashbel Green, then a licentiate, and at the time a Professor in the College of New Jersey, was elected co-pastor with Dr. Sproat, and was ordained and entered upon the duties of his office on the 15th day of May, 1787.

In the Summer of 1791 Mr. John N. Abel, a licentiate of the Reformed Dutch Church, afterwards one of the collegiate pastors of that Church in the City of New York, was called as an assistant, both to Dr. Green and the Rev. Dr. John B. Smith, then pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church in this city, to preach two-thirds of the time in this church, and one-third in the Third Church. He continued in this relation about a year and a half, when he accepted a call to New York, where he labored with distinguished usefulness till his death, in 1812, in the forty-third year of his age. After his removal, Dr. Green had the sole charge of the congregation till the Rev. Dr. Janeway was called to be his colleague. This took place on the 2d day of January, 1799, but he was not ordained and installed till the 13th of the following June. The church continued under their joint pastoral care till Dr. Green removed to Princeton to take charge of the College of New Jersey, as its President, to which distinguished and highly important office he had been elected on the 13th of August, 1812, and upon the duties of which he entered the ensuing Autumn. His connection with this church, therefore, was somewhat over twenty-five years.

From that time till the month of April, in the year 1813, this church remained under the sole pastoral charge of Dr. Janeway, when Mr. Thomas H. Skinner (afterwards the Rev. Dr. Skinner, Professor in the Union Seminary, at New York), was called to be his colleague. This connection continued till the Fall of 1816, when the Rev. Mr. Skinner resigned his charge. The whole pastoral charge again devolved on Dr. Janeway, and remained with him till the month of July, 1828, when he resigned it to take charge of a professorship in the Western Theological Seminary, then recently instituted in Allegheny, Pa. This endeared connection was dissolved after it had continued, with great unanimity and cordiality, for more than twenty-nine years.

On the 29th of September, of the same year, the Rev. Joseph Sandford, then pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, Long Island, N. Y., was elected pastor of this church, and was installed soon after. The ministry and life of Mr. Sandford terminated on the 25th day of December, 1831, after holding the pastoral office in this church for about three years. During Mr. Sandford's ministry a division occurred in the church, which resulted in the organization, in 1832, of the Central Presbyterian Church.

After Mr. Sandford's decease there was a vacancy in the pastoral office of nearly two years. The Rev. Cornelius C. Cuyler, D.D., was called to fill the vacancy, on the 25th of November, 1833, and was installed pastor on the 14th of January, 1834. Dr. Cuyler was, at the time of his call, pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church in Poughkeepsie, New York, where he had been eminently blessed of the Lord as the instrument in the hopeful conversion, as is computed, of seven hundred souls. In the Spring of 1850 he resigned the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, after a ministry of about sixteen years. He departed this life on the 31st of August following, greatly lamented, beloved, and held in honor as a faithful servant of Christ.

The Rev. Charles W. Shields was installed pastor of the church on the 18th of October, 1850. Mr. Shields, at the time of his receiving the call from Philadelphia, was pastor of the Church at Hempstead, on Long Island, where he had been ordained to the work of the ministry and installed pastor, on the 8th of November, 1849. Dr. Shields continued his pastoral relation, the Lord smiling upon his labors, until 1865, when he was elected to the Professorship of Science and Religion in New Jersey College, which position he still occupies.

The Second Presbyterian Church has contributed largely from its members to the formation of other churches which have sprung up in the city. This has particularly been the case with the churches of Campington, now First Church, in the Northern Liberties; the Eleventh Church, on Vine street, which became the West Arch Street Church; the Arch Street Church; the Seventh (now the Tabernacle) Church, and the Central Church, for many years located at the corner of Eighth and Cherry streets, but, within a few years, removed to Broad street above Fairmount avenue. It has, in its day, done its full share in the establishment and support of benevolent institutions. Many ministers have gone forth from its fold to preach the gospel, who were trained and aided by its prayers and contributions. The largest number of communicants was in 1832, before the division, when they amounted to seven hundred and eighty-nine. This Church, born in a revival, was nursed in its early years, under God, by Whitefield, the Tennents, the Hodges, the Bayards, the Boudinots, the Hazards, the Eastburns, and their coadjutors. No church ever had more distinguished ruling elders, from the olden time down to its later days.

When the Second Presbyterian Church was organized, the meetings were held, for about seven years, in a building known as the "Academy," between Arch and Market streets, in Fourth street. This building was commenced in 1741, and was designed by Mr. Whitefield, through whose instrumentality it was erected, for the use of itinerant preachers forever, and for the use of his own adherents for the time being. There this congregation worshiped till 1750, when they removed to their new house of worship, situated on the northwest corner of Arch and Third streets. The funds for the erection of that building were mainly collected by the unremitting efforts of Mr. Tennent, whose heart was warmly engaged in the enterprise. It was at first built without a steeple, but one was erected about three years afterwards, and taken down again about the commencement of the present century. The house was enlarged and its exterior remodeled in the year 1809.

The church edifice occupied by the congregation, in Seventh street, below Arch, was dedicated to the worship of God on the 16th of July, 1837. It was one of the most beautiful of the churches in the city. The front was of pure, white marble. The pulpit was of the same material. The interior was marked by exquisite taste, simplicity, and convenience. This elegant edifice it became necessary to abandon, in favor of another site further up in the city, whither the members of the congregation had very generally settled.

After abandoning the church building on Seventh street below Arch, the congregation worshiped for a time in a hall in Broad street above Spruce. They took possession of their present building, southeast corner of Walnut and Twenty-first streets, which is one of the handsomest edifices of the Denomination in Philadelphia, or in the United States, in 1872. The Rev. E. R. Beadle, D.D., LL.D., who was installed pastor of this church November 12th, 1865, continued in this relation, greatly beloved and prospered, until January 6th, 1879, on which day he died, having been taken ill in returning to his residence from the public worship of the morning. The Rev. Dr. J. S. McIntosh, the present popular and efficient pastor, was installed, March 17th, 1881.

Senior, Rev. Faunt Leroy, was born in Madison, Ind., November 5th, 1821. He graduated at Hanover College. He pursued his theological studies at New Albany, Princeton, and Lane seminaries. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Albany, and ordained by the Presbytery of Muhlenburgh, November, 1851. He was pastor at Paducah, Ky., 1851-5; Principal of Female Seminary at Paducah, 1854-5; pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Louisville, Ky., 1855-62; pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Rockford, Ill., 1862-66; Principal of Centreville Collegiate Institute, Centreville, Ill., 1866-68; stated supply at Eaton, O., 1868-70; pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Newport, Ky., 1870-74; pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, Pa., 1874-77; pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church in the same city, 1-77-9; since that date he has had pastoral charge of the Church at New Alexandria, Pa. Mr. Semour is a gentleman of pleasing address, and an able and attractive preacher. He is an earnest advocate of the Temperance cause. He is the author of several interesting and popular volumes.

Sevier, Major Robert, an elder in the Church at Richmond, Mo., was a native of Tennessee. After graduating at West Point, he entered the service of the United States, as Second Lieutenant of the Sixth Infantry, at Jefferson Barracks, Missouri. For meritorious services he was promoted to Adjutant of his regiment. He resigned his commission in 1837, and two years later settled in Liberty, Mo. In 1840 he made his permanent residence in Richmond. There he filled the office of Clerk of the Circuit Court, for a period of twenty years, discharging its duties with honor to himself and satisfaction to the people. His profession of faith in Christ was made in 1851, after he had reached middle life, and he allied himself to the Presbyterian Church. In 1867 he was ordained ruling elder in the Richmond Church, which office he filled with marked wisdom and humility until the day of his death. The church was frequently without a pastor, but in him it found a faithful leader and supervisor of its welfare. By his devotion and influence it was chiefly sustained. Before the community he displayed a Christian life of great beauty and increasing brightness.

Major Sevier was a man of fine culture, extensive reading, and elegant manners, and possessing rare conversational powers, he was an agreeable and charming companion. These superior attainments he laid at the feet of the Master. His pecuniary means were held subject to the Lord's demands, and he used them freely in the building of His kingdom, but with no ostentation. His memory is dear to the community and the church, in which he was esteemed as an honored and useful member. His decease occurred in 1879, in the seventy-second year of his age.

Sewall, Rev. Grenville Pierce, son of Rev. Jotham and Anna (Baker) Sewall, was born in Westbrook, Me., September 1-04, 1811. He united with the Presbyterian Church of North Granville, N. Y., by confession of faith, in July, 1858; graduated from Williams College in 1867, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1870. Was ordained and installed at Cayuga, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Cayuga, December 2-04, 1870, and was dismissed from Cayuga, by the same Presbytery, in 1879, to accept a call from the Presbyterian Church of Troy, Pa., over which he was installed pastor, in 1879. He is an earnest, conscientious, devoted minister of Christ.

Seymour, Rev. Ebener, was born in Stillwater, N. Y., September 15-01, 1801; graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1821; and entered Auburn Theological Seminary in 1825. He was ordained by Albany Presbytery in 1828. His first pastorate was in Albion, N. Y., 1831-32. In 1834 he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Bloomfield, N. J., and he continued such for fifteen years. His abundant labors were greatly blessed to the people. Those of his parishioners who survive remember him as a pastor who performed his duties in a most acceptable and useful manner. From 1847 to 1860 he was Principal of the Bloomfield Institute, where he maintained a high standard of instruction, and many young men who were graduated from it afterward entered the ministry. Mr. Seymour's love for the natural sciences led him to devote much time to mineralogy, in which connection he was well known in this country and Europe. There are few more genial and kindly natures than his was, and none have exerted a purer and more religious influence than he did in his life circle. He died June 21-01, 1879.

Seymour, James S., was a native of West Hartford, Conn.; born April 13-01, 1791, and traced his descent to Richard Seymour, the first of his ancestors that came to this country, and one of the original landholders of the town of Hartford in 1639. His father, Timothy Seymour, was a highly esteemed citizen, and his mother was a descendant of the godly Puritan minister, Thomas Hooker, who fled, with a chosen company, from persecution in England to the vicinity of Boston, in 1633, where the devoted band was organized as a church, of which he was made pastor; and in June, 1636, at the head of his congregation, consisting of about one hundred souls, crossed the wilderness to the Connecticut river, where they joined the settlement of Hartford, which had been founded the previous Autumn.

About the time of his father's death, which occurred in 1812, young Seymour became a mercantile clerk in Hartford, and in the Autumn of 1814 engaged in a manufacturing business, in copartnership with Samuel G. Goodrich. August 11-01, 1817, the day the Bank of Auburn, N. Y., was first opened for business, he entered upon his duties as its Cashier. He remained in this office until 1849, when he was chosen its sixth President. The fiftieth anniversary of the Institution was observed by presenting him with a fitting testimonial, in recognition of his personal service and devotion to its interests during the half century. He made a public profession of religion in the First Presbyterian Church, Auburn, in 1821. A number of names had been enrolled as candidates for admission to the church, at the communion near at hand, to be read, as was the custom, from the pulpit on the appointed Sabbath, when, at the last moment, he yielded to the solicitations of the pastor, in a reply, the humility of which will surprise no one who knew him: "Well, if you will put my name at the bottom of the list." In 1827 he was elected a ruling elder of the church, but declined. Five years after, he was elected again to this office, and accepted it by his silence, which was often more potent than speech. This position he held until his death, a period of forty-three years.

Mr. Seymour was an eminently devout and useful man. Dr. Luther Halsey, Professor of Ecclesiastical History in Auburn, from 1837 to 1844, says: "I ever considered, after long and intimate acquaintance, our departed friend the best model of Christianity in ordinary social life I have ever known—'diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.' . . . I bless God that He ever brought me to the knowledge and confidence of James S. Seymour. Like the bones of the dead prophet, the touch revives me. I am refreshed by the fragrance of his memory."

Mr. Seymour had a mind of excellent stamp, with more than ordinary culture; there was nothing in him brilliant, nothing that might be called genius, unless it was a superior faculty for doing good. In his several relations to the church as one of its spiritual rulers, he exhibited the same substantial qualities with which he conducted the business of life. His well-poised mind and practical good sense, his quiet, unvarying firmness, genuine courtesy, and unaffected spirituality qualified him in an eminent degree for the duties of the eldership, both in counsel and discipline, while his conspicuous integrity, with the ceaseless flow of his benevolence in the various directions which an open-hearted and thoughtful charity takes, gave him unwonted influence in the community and with all classes. The two Institutions, educational and charitable, in Auburn, with which he was more especially identified, and which shared most largely in his benefactions, are the Theological Seminary and the Orphan Asylum. He served both as a trustee—the former from 1829 to 1845, the latter from its organization in 1852—and as president until his death. He took part in the first subscription to locate the Seminary in Auburn, in 1818, and was its steadfast and cherished friend through all its vicissitudes from the days of struggling weakness to its present condition of assured prosperity. Mr. Seymour's public bequests for religious, educational and philanthropic purposes, were $159,000, and a valuable store and lot. He died in 1875, sinking away as gently as a child falls asleep, and leaving a record radiant with the sanctified virtues which glorify God and adorn humanity.

Shafer, Joseph L., D. D. Born in Stillwater, Sussex county, N. J., May 9th, 1787. His father was of German descent and his mother Scotch-Irish. He graduated at Princeton College in 1808. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. Woodhull, of Freehold, N. J., who prepared a large number for the ministry. Mr. Shafer was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, October 2d, 1810. For two years he labored as a missionary in Monmouth county, N. J., and in 1812 was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Newton, N. J. Here he was greatly prospered in his work, and remained until 1835, when he accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church, Middletown Point, N. J. But neither the people he left nor himself were satisfied, and in three years he was recalled to Newton, where he continued until his death, November 12th, 1853, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He was struck with paralysis in the pulpit, while reading the last hymn, a few weeks before his death. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Lafayette College, in 1843. Dr. Shafer was the man for a life-long pastorate. He could love only one flock, and to them he was ardently attached. He had a very tender heart, and was often moved to tears when pleading with sinners. He was a diffident man, and, although a fluent speaker, never rose in the pulpit without a flutter of the heart. He was mainly instrumental in the establishment of a Presbyterian academy in Newton. Several revivals occurred during his ministry.

Shanks, D. W., D. D., was born December 11th, 1830, in Finecastle, Botetourt county, Va. After the usual preparatory training, he studied two years at Washington College, Va., and two years, also, at the University of Virginia. At the latter Institution he was graduated in law. He entered the Union Theological Seminary, Va., in the Fall of 1859, and was licensed to preach the gospel by Montgomery Presbytery, in May, 1861. His first charge was at Amelia Court House, Va. In 1868 he took charge of Falling Spring Church, Rockbridge county, Va., where he labored, with success, for fifteen years, when, on account of impaired health, he resigned the pastorate.

Dr. Shanks is a superior preacher. His mind is vigorous and logical, and he presents truth with force and tenderness, and in a captivating and impressive style. He is, by reason of his clear understanding, strong convictions, and ready utterance, an influential and valuable member of the Church courts. In the discussions in Montgomery Presbytery, which attended the revision of the Form of Government, and the Rules of Discipline of the Southern Presbyterian Church, he advocated successfully, and with great ability, the principal changes adopted. Dr. Shanks now resides in Lexington, Va. His voice is no longer heard in the pulpit, or in the courts of the Church, but he still finds a way to do good by the use of the pen.

Shannon, Rev. Samuel, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, October 25th, 1781, and in 1784 was ordained and settled as pastor of Windy Cove and Blue Spring congregations, in Virginia. About 1788 he removed to Kentucky, and became pastor of Bethel and Sinking Spring Presbyterian churches, where he preached four years. He then took charge of Woodford Church, of which he continued pastor until 1806. In the War of 1812 Mr. Shannon volunteered to accompany the Northern Army as a chaplain. He labored indefatigably in his work. The latter years of his life were employed in missionary labors, chiefly in the destitute regions of Indiana. He died in 1822.

Sharon, Rev. James C., son of the Rev. James R. and Esther C. Sharon, was born near Harrisburg, Pa., November 15th, 1810. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1830, studied theology at Princeton, N. J., and was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle. His first field of labor was Wysox, Pa., where he was ordained. He labored near Zanesville, O., from 1835 till 1842. In 1842, with his wife and three children, he removed to Birmingham, Iowa, making the entire journey by team—some six or seven hundred miles—traveling by day and camping out by night. After preaching at various points, he was elected Professor of Languages in Des Moines College, at West Point, where he remained five years. For the following five years he was Principal of a Female Seminary at St. Francisville, Mo., besides preaching regularly. In 1858, he was recalled to Birmingham, where he labored five years. He then resigned, and took charge of Mission work in Davis county. He was instrumental in the establishment of Bloomfield Church. Here he labored with his own hands, and contributed liberally of his own means. He died June 28th, 1868. Mr. Sharon was an instructive and faithful preacher, especially a faithful, wise, and tender pastor. His life was spent mainly in the midst of feeble churches, where he bore uncomplainingly the trials incident to pioneer work, and when urged to leave for more promising fields, his oft-repeated answer was: "If I leave them, who will come and preach to this people?"

Sharp, Rev. Samuel M., the son of William Sharp, who was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, was born in West Middletown, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1855, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1858. He was licensed and ordained as an evangelist in the Spring of 1858, and arrangements were made for himself and wife, a daughter of Rev. Jesse M. Jamieson, to depart for the foreign field. The mission selected was that of New Granada, in South America. They sailed for Bogota, South America, June 18th, 1858. He reached Santa Martha, one of the principal seaports of New Granada, after a voyage of seventeen days. Thence they proceeded up the Magdalena river, by steamboat, to Honda, and thence on horseback, over the mountains, to Bogota, arriving there July 20th. Here he at once commenced in earnest his great life-work, with his wife as his helper and adviser. In the midst of his labors he died, at the mission house in Bogota, October 30th, 1860. Mr. Sharp was a good man and a devoted missionary, of earnest and consistent piety; he had early imbibed the missionary spirit, and had the promise of great usefulness.

Sharpe, Rev. J. Henry, was born August 8th, 1842, and reared in Steubenville, Ohio. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., then under the presidency of Rev. John W. Scott, D. D., in 1863. The same year he entered the Western Theological Seminary, and was graduated in 1866, being in the class that received the first full course of lectures in Systematic Theology by Prof. A. A. Hodge. In 1866 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Steubenville, and remained a fourth year in the seminary, meanwhile assuming charge of a mission station in Allegheny City, which, under his care, was organized into "The Valley Church," and of which he became the first pastor. He was pastor of the Wharton Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, from 1869 to 1874, when he became associate pastor with Rev. Henry A. Boardman, D. D., of the Tenth Church, Philadelphia, which position he resigned on the resignation of Dr. Boardman. He then assumed charge of the Holland Memorial Chapel, at that time under the care of the Tenth Church, but resigned it in 1881, and accepted the pastorate of the West Park Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, of which he still continues the efficient and successful pastor. Mr. Sharpe is a good preacher, an interesting writer, a faithful presbyter, and an earnest worker. He has served the Church for many years, as a member of the Board of Publication.

Sharswood, Hon. George, LL. D., was born in Philadelphia, July 7th, 1810. He was of English descent, an ancestor of the same name having emigrated from England about 1665, and settled in New London, Conn. At the age of fifteen he entered the Sophomore class of the University of Pennsylvania, and there displayed in their early development the same talents and industry that afterward raised him to the highest dignities of his chosen profession. That profession was the law, and on August 23d, 1828, about a month after graduating, with the highest honors, and delivering the Latin Salutatory on Commencement day, he was registered as a law student in the office of Joseph R. Ingersoll, then one of the shining lights of the Philadelphia Bar, and admitted to practice, September 5th, 1831.

After his admission to the Bar the young advocate, while building up a handsome practice, continued his general studies, and in both occupations prepared himself to assume the duties of his true calling, which was rather that of a judge than an advocate. He served three years in the Pennsylvania Legislature, of which he was a prominent and influential member. In 1845 he was made a Judge of the District Court, and was President Judge from 1851 to 1867, when he was elected an Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of the State. For a number of years he was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and when, with the close of 1882, his term ended, concluding thirty-seven years and nine months of continuous judicial service, he received from the Philadelphia Bar a public testimonial which was worthy of the lustre which his eminent record had reflected upon his State. At the banquet which was given in his honor on this occasion, legal gentlemen of all parties united in expressing their strong personal regard for him, and their high appreciation of the ability, dignity and fidelity with which he had discharged the duties of the responsible office from which he had retired.

The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon Judge Sharswood by the University of the City of New York, and also by Columbia College. In 1850 he was appointed Professor of Law in the University of Pennsylvania, and he filled this position for a number of years with signal success. He contributed largely to the literature of the science by his works, as well as by his numerous decisions. In 1834 he published the first paper of his series on the Revised Code of Pennsylvania, in the American Quarterly for June of that year. Within a twelvemonth he was elected one of the Vice-provosts of the Philadelphia Law Academy. Soon afterward he published an American edition of "Roscoe on Criminal Evidence," enriched with notes and references. His report on the affairs of the United States Bank appeared in four closely-printed columns of the United States Gazette of April 8th, 1841. In 1843 he became editor of the American Law Magazine. In 1844 he gave to the legal world editions of Stephens' "Nisi Prius" and "Russell on Crimes." In 1852 he published the first of five annual editions of "Byles on Bills," and the next year undertook the work of editing the successive volumes of the English Common Law Reports, republished in Philadelphia, for the use of the American Bar—a labor which he continued from volume 65 to volume 90, inclusive. In 1854, the year he was elected Provost of the Law Academy, he published his absorbing work on "Professional Ethics," followed, two years later, by his "Popular Lectures on Commercial Law," originally prepared for the students of a business college. The ensuing years were devoted to the work which may be regarded as the culminating achievement of his literary life, and through which he became most quickly and widely known. This was his great edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, enriched with his own annotations. The work, important as it was, met with instant and universal acceptance from one end of the Union to the other. It was made the text-book in all the law schools in the United States, and was pronounced by the most eminent instructors in the law the best edition of Blackstone ever put before the public.

Judge Sharswood was for many years an elder of the Presbyterian Church, and one of the trustees of the General Assembly. He was a gentleman of great suavity of disposition and pleasing address. He adorned, by his ability and integrity, every position he occupied, and justly enjoyed, in the highest degree, the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. As a lawyer, he was second to none in the history of the American Bar. His literary labors, in connection with his profession, made his name familiar throughout the country, and the decisions of the Supreme Court, during the fifteen years of his membership, were received by the Bar with more than ordinary confidence and respect.

Judge Sharswood died at his home, in Philadelphia, May 28th, 1883, lamented by all classes of the community, and especially by the Bar, which had grown up under the deceased jurist, and took a personal pride in contemplating his blameless life, his great public services and his exalted reputation.

Shaw, James Boylan, D. D., the son of James and Margaret Shaw, was born in the city of New York, in 1808. He was among the first children on whose heads the venerable Gardiner Spring laid his hand in baptism. He was fitted to enter the Sophomore class in Yale College, and then entered the office of a physician, and attended a course of medical lectures. After that he entered the office of Thomas Addis Emmet, and commenced the study of the law. When he was about to be admitted to the Bar, the Lord touched his heart. He united with the Brick Church of New York, in 1829. In 1834, having been previously licensed to preach the gospel, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Genesee, and installed pastor of the Church at Utica. For more than forty years he has been pastor of the Brick Church of Rochester, N. Y. The College of Western Reserve conferred upon him the honorary degree of A. M., and in 1852 the University of Rochester gave him the degree of S. T. D. In 1862 he was elected a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Dr. Shaw was Moderator of the General Assembly which met in Brooklyn in 1865. He is a trustee of the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., where he graduated in 1832. He was a member of the General Assembly of 1837, when the act of excision was passed; and that, as a member of the Joint Committee on Reunion, he has had a part in healing the breach, he counts the greatest honor of his life. He was also a member of the Assembly which met at Saratoga, in 1853.

Dr. Shaw is an earnest, practical, and forcible preacher. His ministry has been very largely blessed. He is highly esteemed by all who know him. When (1840) he assumed charge of the Brick Church the roll of the church bore 415 names; the report to the last Assembly reveals that there are now 1185. During the entire pastorate about 2000 persons have been received on profession of faith, and 1400 by certificate; in all, about 3400 additions. The contributions of the church to benevolent and charitable objects during this period have been $265,000. Although now seventy-five years of age, Dr. Shaw continues to preach, with unabated vigor of intellect and fervor of eloquence, to a large congregation, composed of both the old and the young. His evening audience averages from 1000 to 1200 persons. It is earnestly hoped that he may be spared yet a number of years to exert his far-reaching influence for the glory of God and the good of men.

Shaw, Rev. John S., was born in Arnite county, Miss., in 1818. He graduated at Davidson College, N. C., in 1843, and at Union Theological Seminary, Va., in 1846. He was licensed in April, of that year, by the Presbytery of New Orleans. Taking charge of the Church at Rodney, he labored faithfully there until 1859, when he was called to the church near Natchez, Miss., of which he is now pastor. Though yet young he gives promise of extensive usefulness. Robust in health, he can endure any amount of labor. Having a strong voice and clear articulation, the largest audience can easily hear him. His fine culture, based upon good common sense, enables him to present truth in a winning and convincing manner.

Shearer, F. A., D.D., was born in Path Valley, Franklin county, Pa., January 1st, 1812. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1836; studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary and under the direction of the Rev. A. A. McGinley, D. D.; was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 11th, 1839, and ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Richland in Savannah, Ohio, June 9th, 1840. He is now pastor of the Church of Colfax, Iowa, and still actively and usefully engaged in ministerial work. Dr. Shearer's long ministerial life has been crowned with the divine blessing. He has changed his fields of labor several times, but the churches of which he has had charge, and for the most part started, have continued to prosper. Under his ministry four houses of worship have been built from the beginning, two others finished, and his present congregation is now engaged in the erection of another.

Shearer, Rev. Frederic Eichelberger, was born at Dillsburg, Pa., March 27th, 1838, and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1862, after which he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Long Island, August 16th, 1866. From 1866 to 1870 he was co-pastor at Southampton, L. I. Since 1870 he has been the efficient District Secretary of the American Tract Society, San Francisco, California.

Shearer, Rev. George Lewis, was born at Dillsburg, Pa., October 16th, 1835, and graduated at Lafayette College in 1857. For a time he was a teacher. He was ordained an evangelist by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 3d, 1865. He was District Secretary of the American Tract Society, Philadelphia, Pa., 1861-5; its District Secretary, Richmond, Va., 1865-68; Assistant Secretary New York city, 1868-72, and since 1872 has been Financial Secretary of the same institution. He is an earnest Christian, an indefatigable worker, and renders very efficient service in the position he occupies.

Shedd, Henry, D. D., was born in Jaffrey, N. H., May 16th, 1803. He graduated at Dartmouth College, in 1826, and at Andover Seminary in 1829; was licensed to preach in April, and ordained September 21th, the same year, by the Presbytery of Newburyport. He was a Home Missionary within the bounds of the Presbytery of Columbus seven years; stated supply of Pisgah Church, near Cincinnati, one year and a half, then occupied his former field of labor again for four years; then occupied a large destitute region in Madison, Union, and Delaware counties ten years, in the meantime being pastor of Lower Liberty Church eight years. Subsequently he preached at Lexington, O.; was pastor at Mt. Gilead, and supplied vacant churches in the Presbytery of Marion. Dr. Shedd is still living at Mt. Gilead, where he has spent forty years of his life. He is a retired veteran, honored as a father in the Presbytery and among the churches, many of which he has founded and served. He was one of the hard working and self-denying pioneer preachers of the gospel to the early feeble churches of Central Ohio, and helped to lay the foundations of their prosperity and influence.

Shedd, William Greenough Thayer, D. D., LL. D., was born at Acton, Mass., in 1820, and was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1839, and at Andover Seminary in 1843. From 1843 to 1845 he was pastor of the Church at Brandon, Vt., and from 1845 to 1852 Professor of English Literature in the University of Vermont; from 1852 to 1854 Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in Auburn Seminary, and from 1854 to 1861 Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Pastoral Theology in Andover Seminary. In 1862-63 he was associate pastor of the Brick Church, in New York, and from 1863 to 1874 was Professor of Biblical Literature in Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in which Institution he has since filled the chair of theology.

Dr. Shedd is a gentleman of profound and varied erudition. He has published the following works, all of which indicate marked ability, and have attracted much attention: "Philosophy of History," "Discourses and Essays," "History of Christian Doctrine," re-published in Edinburg, "Homiletics and Pastoral Theology," also re-published in Edinburg. His translations are, "Thezemlin's Rhetoric," from the German; "Guerliche's Church History," from the German. His edited works are, "Coleridge's Complete Works, with Introductory Essay;" "Augustine's Confessions, revised, with Introductory Essay;" "McCosh's Intuitions of the Mind, with Introductory Note;" "Garbett's Dogmatic Faith, with Introductory Note," and the book of Mark, in the American edition of "Lange's Commentary. Besides a number of his discourses published in pamphlet form, he is the author of several articles in the Bibliotheca Sacra and American Theological Review.

Sheddan, Samuel Sharon, D. D., was born in Northumberland county, Pa., September 13th, 1810. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1831, and studied theology at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, October, 1835. He was stated supply at Muncy, Pa., 1834; pastor 1835-38; stated supply at Williamsport, 1831-38; stated supply at Warrior Run, 1839; pastor 1847-52; and pastor of the First Church, Rahway, N. J., 1852-74. He died at Rahway, October 18th, 1874. Dr. Sheddan was an excellent preacher. He united in his sermons freshness of thought and Scriptural instruction, with gracefulness of style. In the Presbytery and other judicatories of the Church, he exerted a strong influence. He was the author of several small but valuable volumes.

Shellabarger, Hon. Samuel, is the second son of Samuel Shellabarger, long a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church, and was born December 10th, 1817, in Clark county, Ohio; received a common school education; graduated at Miami University in the class of 1847; studied law under General Samson Mason; came to the Bar in 1847; was a member of the first Legislature of Ohio which was elected under its present Constitution; was, in 1860, elected to Congress; and first took his seat in the House at the special session which was called by Mr. Lincoln 4th July, 1861; was elected to the 37th, 39th, 40th, and 42d Congresses, retiring 4th March, 1873; was Chairman of the Committee of Commerce, etc., etc. Mr. Shellabarger was, by General Grant, in 1869, made minister to Portugal, and after his retirement from Congress he was, under Grant, on the Civil Service Commission. He now resides, for the practice of his profession, temporarily at Washington, D. C., but retains his property and residence at the county of his birth, in Springfield, Ohio, where he still retains his membership in the Second Presbyterian Church.

Sherrard, Rev. Thomas Johnson, was born at Steubenville, Ohio, February 25th, 1815, and graduated at Washington and Jefferson College in 1868. He studied theology at the Northwestern Seminary, Chicago, Ill. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, June 11th, 1872; was pastor at Lost Creek, Pa., 1871-75, and at Millintown, 1872-80. In 1880 he was installed over the Church, Brookville, Pa. In the Fall of 1882 he accepted a call to the Church at Houtybrook, Pa., which is his present charge. He is a good preacher and a faithful pastor.

Shields, Charles Woodruff, D. D., was born in New Albany, Indiana, April 4th, 1825; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1844; studied theology three years at the Princeton Seminary; became for a short time pastor of the Church at Hempstead, L. I., from which he accepted a call, in 1850, to the Second Church in Philadelphia, and continued in that charge till December, 1865, when he was elected Professor of the Relations of Religion to Science, in the College of New Jersey, and had Modern History added to his department in 1870. "Memorial Discourses," from his pen, for Dr. Darragh, Hon. Joel Jones, and Dr. William M. Engles, which were admirably prepared, have been published. He published, in 1861, "Philosophia Ultima." In 1855 "The Book of Remembrance: a Pastor's Gift for the New Year." In 1862 "A Manual of Worship suitable to be used in Legislative and other Public Bodies, compiled from the Forms, and in accordance with the common usages of all Christian Denominations." In 1863 "The Directory for Public Worship and the Book of Common Prayer, considered with reference to the question of a Presbyterian Liturgy." And in 1867 "The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, as amended by the Westminster Divines in the Royal Commission of 1661, and in Agreement with the Directory of Public Worship of the Presbyterian Church of the United States," and in the same volume, "Liturgia Expurgata; or, the Prayer Book Amended according to the Presbyterian Revision of 1661, and Historically and Critically Revised." Dr. Shields is an affable gentleman, a polished and vigorous writer, and an instructive preacher.

Shields, James M., D. D., was born, January 27th, 1829, near Indiana, Pa. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., and at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1851, and was licensed to preach, in April of that year. In August, 1855, he was installed pastor of the churches of Georgetown and Fairview, Presbytery of Erie, in which he labored with marked success for nine years. Taking charge of the Church at Bridgewater, Pa., in 1864, he continued its pastor for ten years, leaving an excellent record. Installed over the Church at Millvale, Pa., in 1874, he labored, with diligence and success until, in 1883, he was called to the Church at Orrville, Ohio. Mr. Shields, whilst at college, was a conscientious student, and a good scholar in all departments. He is an amiable gentleman, an able theologian, and an admirable preacher. The crown and glory of his life has been his success as a minister of the gospel in winning souls to Christ. The title of D. D. was conferred upon him, in 1883, by New Windsor College, Maryland.

Shrom, William P., D. D., was born in Carlisle, Pa., November 2d, 1840, and spent his boyhood on a farm. He was graduated at Otterbein University, Westerville, Ohio, in 1868, and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa., in 1871; licensed to preach by the Allegheny Conference of the United Brethren in 1870, and ordained by the same body in 1871. After filling for one year the chair of Mental and Moral Science in Lebanon Valley College, Pa., he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Zanesville, O., in 1873. His ministry there, covering a period of ten years, was one of great usefulness, both in the church and the community. In 1883 he became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Cadiz, Harrison county, O., where he still labors with acceptableness and success.

Shunk, Hon. Francis Rawn, was born at the Trappe, Montgomery county, Pa., August 7th, 1788. He became a teacher at the age of fifteen, and in 1812 received the appointment as Clerk in the Surveyor General's office, under General Andrew Porter. In 1811 he marched, as a private soldier, to the defence of Baltimore. In September, 1816, he was admitted to the practice of the law. He filled the position of Assistant, and then Principal Clerk of the House of Representatives for several years; next became Secretary to the Board of Canal Commissioners, and in 1839 Governor Porter appointed him Secretary of the Commonwealth. In 1842 he removed to Pittsburg, engaging in his profession. In 1844 he was elected Governor of Pennsylvania, and re-elected in 1847.

Governor Shunk was an honest public servant, and filled the various offices to which he was called with marked ability and fidelity. On July 9th, 1848, as Executive of the State, he issued the following:—

"To the People of Pennsylvania:

"It having pleased Divine Providence to deprive me of the strength necessary to the further discharge of the duties of your Chief Magistrate, and to lay me on a bed of sickness, from which, I am admonished, by my physicians and my own increasing debility, I may, in all human probability, never rise, I have resolved, upon mature reflection, under a conviction of duty, on this day to restore to you the trust with which your suffrages have clothed me, in order that you may avail yourselves of the provision of the Constitution to choose a successor at the next general election. I, therefore, hereby resign the office of Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and direct this my resignation to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth.

"In taking leave of you, under circumstances so solemn, accept my gratitude for the confidence you have reposed in me. My prayer is that peace, virtue, intelligence and religion may pervade all your borders; that the free institutions you have inherited from your ancestors may remain unimpaired till the latest posterity; that the same kind Providence which has already so signally blessed you may conduct you to a still higher state of individual and social happiness, and when the world shall close upon you, as I feel it is soon about to close upon me, that you may enjoy the consolations of the Christian's faith, and be gathered, without a wanderer lost, into the fold of the Great Shepherd above."

Governor Shunk died on the 30th of July, 1848, and at the time of his decease was a member of the Presbyterian Church at Harrisburg, then under the care of his particular friend, the Rev. W. R. DeWitt, D. D.

Siege of Londonderry. The gallant defence of Londonderry had a remote and interesting connection with the success of William of Nassau, and the establishment of the present Protestant succession on the British throne.

At the time of the great emigration from Scotland and England into Ulster, which was encouraged by James I, one of the conditions of settling in the northern part of the province was the fortification of Londonderry. The plan of King James II, the Papist, seems to have been first to overcome the Protestants of Ireland by the aid of the large body of Papists, then pass over into Scotland to act in concert with Claverhouse, and having thus gained possession of Ireland and Scotland, to march against King William, in the southern portion of the kingdom.

In the Autumn of 1688 there were rumors in Ireland of a general massacre of the Protestants by the Papists on an approaching Sunday. A few days before the time, Papal troops were marched toward Londonderry, and whilst the chief men of the place were deliberating what to do, some apprentice boys wisely shut the gates. This resolute act saved the city. James II, aided by the troops and money of Louis XIV, landed in Ireland in March. His party wrested from the Protestants town after town, and the resistance of Derry was now almost the only obstacle to entire success in Ireland. On the 1st of April, 1689, the siege of Londonderry was formally commenced. The fate of Ulster and of Ireland hung upon the result. The area within the walls was small and of an oval form, its greatest diameter being about two thousand feet, and the shortest about six hundred. The siege was close, the assaults frequent, the bombardment severe. The inhabitants endured at the same time the three calamities of the race—famine, pestilence and war; and as the Summer advanced death made the most frightful ravages. Of the 27,000 inhabitants it is computed that 9000 perished, and the loss of the besiegers is said to have been about the same. The heroism of the city was undaunted to the last. The women often took part in the battles that were waged around the ramparts. On the 16th of July, Claverhouse, impatient of waiting longer for the French and Irish forces detained at Derry, gave battle at Killikrankie, and, although successful, he was himself killed in the midst of his triumph, and with him perished the fruits of his victory and the hopes of James in Scotland.

Londonderry still held out. Its Presbyterian inhabitants fought under the old banner of Christ's crown and covenant, and, with the spirit of martyrs, opposed Pope and King. Finally a fleet came to their relief, and the siege was raised on the 28th of July. A short time after, King James was defeated at the battle of the Boyne, and his last pretensions to the crown vanished. Few places in history have witnessed more courage and suffering than Londonderry during its terrible siege, and the results of its gallant defence are incorporated with the prosperity and glory of the British empire.*

Silence of Scripture. Not only by what it says, but by its silence, the Bible is instructive for us. It was said by one man of another that more might be learned from his questions than from another man's answers. With yet higher truth might it be said that the silence of Scripture is oftentimes more instructive than the speech of other books. Take an example:—

All ancient systems of religion, and all eminent philosophers of antiquity, so far as they are known, maintained notions on science no less absurd than their theology.

In Greek and Latin philosophy, the heavens were a solid vault over the earth, a sphere studded with stars, as Aristotle called them. The sages of Egypt held that the world was formed by the motion of air and the upward course of flame; Plato, that it was an intelligent being; Empedocles held that there were two suns; Zenoëppus, that the stars were kindled by their motions, and that they nourished the sun with their fires.

All eastern nations believed that the heavenly bodies exercised powerful influence over human affairs, often of a distasteful kind, and that all nature was composed of four elements, fire, air, earth, and water, substances certainly not elementary.

In the Hindoo philosophy, the globe is represented as flat and triangular, composed of seven stories, the whole mass being sustained upon the heads of elephants, who, when they shake themselves, cause earthquakes. Mohammed taught that the mountains were created to prevent the earth from moving, and to hold it as by anchors and chains. The "Fathers of the Church" themselves teach doctrines scarcely less absurd. "The rotundity of the earth is a theory," says Lactantius, "which no one is ignorant enough to believe."

How instructive, that while every ancient system of idolatry may be overthrown by its false physics, not one of the forty writers of the Bible, most of whom lived in the vicinity of one or other of the nations who held these views, has written a single line that favors them. This silence is consolatory, and furnishes a striking confirmation of the truth of their message.

Look at another example: How full of meaning to us, that we have nothing told us of the life of our blessed Lord between the twelfth and the thirtieth years; how significant the absolute silence which the gospels maintain concerning all that period; that those years, in fact, have no history, nothing for the sacred writers to record. How much is implied herein! the calm ripening of His human powers, the contentedness to wait, the long preparation in secret, before He began His open ministry. What a testimony is here, if we will note it aright, against all our striving and snatching at hasty results, our impatience, our desire to glitter before the world; against all which tempts so many to pluck the unripe fruits of their minds, and to turn that into the season of a stunted and premature harvest which should have been the season of patient sowing, of an earnest culture and a silent ripening of their powers.

Such examples, and they are many, illustrate and confirm that saying of the Hon. Robert Boyle concerning the Holy Scripture: "There is such fullness in that book, that oftentimes it says much by saying nothing; and not only its expressions, but its silences are teaching, like a dial, in which the shadow, as well as the light, informs us."

Silliman, Rev. John, son of John and Isabella Silliman, Scotch Covenanters, was born in Rowan county, N. C., August 13th, 1786. When he graduated is not known, as his diploma, with many valuable papers of his own, was burned, with the home of his childhood, about the year 1818 or 1819. He studied theology with Dr. John H. Rice, of Virginia, and was licensed and ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, at Prince Edward, Va., and was one year a co-pastor with the Rev. Matthew Lyle. In January,

* Many of the emigrants of Ulster were the early fathers of the Presbyterian Church, especially in Pennsylvania and Virginia.

1819, he was installed pastor of the Church in Morgantown, N. C. and continued in this relation until the time of his removal to Illinois. During his pastorate of seventeen years he received into the church over six hundred persons on examination, besides those received in the outposts or missionary stations among the mountains. In 1836 he became pastor of Sharon Presbyterian Church, in Illinois—which was probably the oldest Protestant Church in that State—organized by the Rev. James McGready, in 1816. He was an eminently devout and faithful minister, and greatly beloved by his people. The headstone of his grave, in the old churchyard at Sharon, bears the following inscription:

"In memory of
Rev. John Silliman, Presbyterian Clergyman.
 Departed this life, November 3d, 1838,
 Aged 52 years."

"Let his grave be where the western sunbeams rest,
 When they promise a glorious morrow,
 An emblem of hope that the righteous are blessed,
 When they rise free of all cause of sorrow."

Silver Spring Church, Cumberland county, Pa. The early history of this church, which was first designated as the "People over the Susquehanna," still later as "East Pennsboro'," and finally as "Silver Spring," is to some extent clouded by a want of clearness in distinguishing it from Upper Pennsboro', or Carlisle. In one publication the claim is made that the last named church was the first established in the Valley. The only authentic source of information on the subject are the minutes of the Donegal Presbytery, established in 1732. Col. A. L. Snowden, in an address delivered at the celebration of the centennial of the church, August 16th, 1853, says: "I have carefully examined all the entries in the minutes having any reference to the churches in this valley, and am thoroughly convinced that priority belongs to this people, and also, that the first church, of any denomination, planted west of the Susquehanna river, was this venerable church, called Silver Spring, not, as is popularly supposed, after the beautiful stream of silvery water that bursts from the rocks a few yards from the church edifice, but deriving its name from the original owner of nearly all the land in the immediate neighborhood, Mr. James Silver.

"From the minutes before referred to it appears that on October 16th, 1731, it was ordered by Presbytery that Rev. Alexander Craighead supply 'Over the River for two or three Sabbaths in November.' Subsequent reference is had to the 'Upper Part of the Congregation of Conodoguinet,' which undoubtedly refers to the church of Carlisle. The fact that the Church at Carlisle was located immediately on the Conodoguinet has been urged as the strongest argument in favor of its claim to priority. It should, however, be borne in mind that this church is now less than a mile in a direct line from the creek, and that the original log structure in which our ancestors worshiped was much nearer the stream than the present building; indeed, the traditions which my father received from some of the old settlers and gave me, made the location within a very short distance of the same, a little way above where Sample's Bridge now stands.

"In addition to the minutes of Donegal Presbytery we have handed down from generation to generation the unvarying claim of our ancestors, that this was the first church planted in this valley. I have heard my grandfather, who preached in Harrisburg, in 1793, and also, Mr. Elder, of Harrisburg, whose ancestors, I believe, preached at Paxton in 1737, give to this church the priority I claim."

"From the date of its organization, in November, 1734, until the present time," continues Colonel Snowden, "this church, through all the changes that have marked the civil and religious institutions of this continent, has maintained its existence, preserving in their purity and simplicity the truths of the covenant and the forms of worship taught to the founders by the fathers in the land from whence they came; not only in doctrines and forms of worship has there been uniformity, but also in the character of the people who have composed, and still compose its membership. The founders were of that hardy and indomitable brave race, designated the world over as Scotch-Irish, and you will find, by a reference to the records, that the descendants of these men and men of the same race now, and at all previous times, have been preachers, elders, trustees and ruling spirits, with rare exceptions, and have, indeed, constituted nearly the whole of its membership.

"From November, 1731, until 1739, the pulpit was supplied as Presbytery found opportunity. In addition to Rev. Alexander Craighead, Revs. Bertram, Thomas Craighead, Gelston, Black, and Thomson, preached to the people. In 1738 this church and the one at Carlisle united in a call to the Rev. Samuel Thomson, who was ordained and installed November 14th, 1739, as the first regular pastor. In March, 1745, Mr. Thomson, on account of 'bodily weakness,' requested to be relieved from the charge of this church, which was granted, he continuing as pastor of the Carlisle Church. From 1745 to 1749 the pulpit was occupied by supplies furnished by Presbytery. In 1748 a call was presented Rev. Samuel Caven, which was accepted, and he was installed August 1st, of the same year. He was permitted to minister to his flock but fifteen months, when he was removed, by death, at the early age of forty-four. His grave was among the first in yonder crowded 'city of the dead,' where so many of our kindred and friends lie buried. Mr. Caven was the only one of the pastors of the church, excepting Mr. Waugh, who died during his ministry. From 1750 to 1759 there was a break in the Donegal Presbytery records, owing to the loss of a volume of the minutes.

From Mr. Caven's death until Mr. John Steel, who received the united call of this church and that of Carlisle, was installed, April, 1764, there was no regular pastor over this people. Previous to this period—November, 1761—this church united with Monaghan (now Dillsburg) in a call to the Rev. James Beard, which was declined. It is probable that the pastoral relations of Mr. Steel with this church were dissolved about the year 1776, as his whole time after that period appears to have been given to Carlisle. In 1779 this church and Monaghan again united in a call, this time to the Rev. Matthew Ward, who declined and accepted a call to Hanover. In April, 1782, this church and Monaghan united in calling Rev. Samuel Waugh, who was then preaching in Cameron Parish, Loudon county, Va. This call was accepted, and he was installed June 18th of the same year. The ministrations of Mr. Waugh extended over a quarter of a century, and were not only the most protracted in years over any of his predecessors or successors to this time, but were crowned with the richest blessings to the people under his charge. He was a man of ripe scholarship, of wise discretion, of painstaking earnestness and of undoubted piety. These qualities are recognized not only in the written declarations of those who were contemporaries with him, but in the results of his labors. He added largely to the number of the communicants of the church, and renewed the fervor and quickened the zeal of all the members. Shortly after he was installed as pastor he began preparing the minds of his flock to the necessity of erecting a new, more commodious and substantial church edifice than the one then in use, and in less than fourteen months after his installation the corner-stone of the present edifice, which this day has rested in its place one hundred years, was laid, with supplication to divine Providence that he would see the work completed. Under Mr. Waugh's guidance the church was completed in due time, and he had abundant evidence on every side that the work the great Master assigned him had prospered in his hands. After a brief illness he was gathered to his fathers, in 1807.

Mr. Waugh was succeeded by the Rev. John Hays, in 1808, who continued pastor until 1814, when he resigned, and was succeeded by the Rev. Henry R. Wilson. Mr. Wilson resigned in 1823, and was followed by the Rev. James Williamson, who continued as pastor until 1838, when the church called the Rev. George Morris, recently from Scotland, who was installed in 1839 and continued as pastor until 1860, when he resigned, having served for over twenty years. He was succeeded by Rev. W. H. Dinsmore; he by Rev. W. G. Hillman, in 1866; he by Rev. W. B. McKee, in 1870; he by Rev. R. P. Gibson, in 1871; and he by Rev. T. J. Ferguson, the present zealous and efficient pastor, in 1878.

Simonton, Hon. John Wiggins, was born in West Hanover township, Dauphin county, Pa., in 1830, and was the son of Hon. William Simonton and Martha J., daughter of Rev. James Snodgrass, who for more than fifty years was the pastor of West Hanover Church. The family was of Scotch-Irish descent, and the sons all received a liberal education. John W., after passing part of his college course at Lafayette College, finished his studies at Princeton, graduating in 1850. Choosing the law as his profession, he was admitted to the Bar in 1853, and from that time until 1881 continued in the practice of his profession, with growing success and enlarging honors. At the latter date he was chosen as the President Judge of the Twelfth Judicial District, to succeed Judge John J. Pearson, who retired after a very lengthened service. In his profession Mr. Simonton was regarded as one of the ablest and soundest lawyers of Central Pennsylvania, and since his accession to the Bench he has won high honors for his ability, for his knowledge of law, and for the clearness and strength of his judicial decisions.

While yet a young man he confessed Christ and united with the Presbyterian Church, and has maintained a consistent character for Christian integrity. He is well versed in theological opinions, a staunch defender of Biblical truth, and a faithful teacher in the Sunday school of his church.

Simonton, Rev. William, son of William Simonton, M. D., and Martha Davis, was born in Hanover township, Dauphin county, Pa., September 12th, 1820. He graduated with honor at Delaware College, in 1846, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1850. In 1849 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle. After being stated supply of the churches of Northumberland and Sunbury, Pa., in 1850, he was installed their pastor, May 28th, 1851, and continued in this relation three years, his labors being very acceptable and greatly blessed. In 1854 he received a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Williamsport, Pa., and having served the church for one year as stated supply, he accepted the call and was installed as pastor. When he took charge of this church it was in a feeble condition, but through his able and faithful labors, it became one of the strongest churches in Central Pennsylvania. Here he remained the beloved and successful pastor for the space of seventeen years. In 1871 he was released from this charge, and after resting from pastoral work for two years, he was installed, December 9th, 1873, pastor of the churches of Emmittsburg, Taneytown, and Piney Creek, Md. In this relation he still continues, with the high esteem of his people, and the divine blessing on his labors. Mr. Simonton's ministry has been greatly honored by the Head of the Church. He is a man of scholarly attainments, a sound theologian, an able and instructive preacher, and has also the qualities of mind and heart needed for the pastoral office.

Simpson Rev. John, a native of New Jersey, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1770, and for the two following years he preached at Easton, Pa. In 1772 he was appointed by the Synod of New York and Philadelphia to visit Virginia and North Carolina. He spent seven months in this missionary work, and in 1774 was ordained and settled as pastor of Fishing Creek Church, South Carolina. In 1790 Mr. Simpson became pastor of Roberts and Good Hope congregations in Pendleton county, S. C. In 1802 his churches were visited with a most remarkable revival. Here he continued his labors until his death, in 1808.

Sin, is defined in our Shorter Catechism (Q. 14), to be "any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God." In the original language of the New Testament the word for sin (hamartia) is derived from a word whose primitive signification is to miss the mark. This suggests as perfect and extensive an idea of sin as, perhaps, can be given. The law of God holds up to us a mark at which we are to aim, or a rule or line to which we are to conform. Everything which misses or falls short of this mark, or which deviates from this rule or line, is sin (Ps. iv, 4; 1 Thess. v, 22; 2 Cor. vi, 17; Ps. xxvii, 10; Prov. xiv, 9; Ps. cxix, 11).

By "want of conformity unto the law of God" is meant both an unsuitableness and disagreeableness to the law, and a non-observation and non-obedience to it. This want of conformity includes: (1) Original sin, and that natural enmity which exists in the heart against the law of God (Rom. viii, 7). (2) All sins of omission. The former is a want of conformity of heart, the latter a want of conformity of life, to God's law (Deut. vi, 5; John xvii, 3). As a sin of omission is a neglecting or forgetting to do that which the law commands (James iv, 17; Matt. xxv, 20), so a sin of "transgression," or commission, is doing what the law forbids, a going beyond the bounds of duty within which the law of God is to keep us (Ezek. x, 8; Gal. iii, 10; Ps. li, 1).

All sins are not equal in intensity. Some are more heinous than others. (1) From the person offending or offended. (2) From the means against which they are committed. (3) From the quality of the offence. (4) From the place in which they are committed. (5) From the time when they are committed. (6) From the manner in which they are committed.

The most heinous of all the sins in the world is the sin against the Holy Ghost (see Matt. xii, 31; Mark iii, 29; 1 John v, 16; Heb. vi, 1-5; x, 26, 29; Tit. iii, 10, 11). "This sin," says Ursinus, "is a denial of the acknowledged truth of God, and a willful opposition to it in connection with his will and works, concerning which the mind has been fully enlightened and convinced by the testimony of the Holy Ghost, all of which proceeds, not from fear or infirmity, but from a determined hatred to the truth and from a heart filled with bitter malice." "This sin shall not be forgiven—not because the blood of Christ is not sufficient to wash it away, for his blood 'cleanseth from all sin,' but because those who are guilty of it willfully, maliciously and perseveringly reject the testimony of Christ speaking by the Holy Ghost in His Word."

Skinner, Rev. Thomas H., D.D., LL.D., was born in North Carolina, in 1791. He graduated at Princeton College, and was licensed to preach in 1812. He became co-pastor with Dr. Janeway in the Second Church, Philadelphia. This connection lasted till 1816, when Dr. Skinner, having espoused the views of the New School, and Dr. Janeway being decidedly in favor of the Old, Dr. Skinner quietly withdrew, with fifty of the parishioners, and organized the Arch Street Church, which, under his eloquent and efficient ministrations, speedily attained a high degree of prosperity. From this charge he was called to the Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric, in Andover. In 1835 he became pastor of Mercer Street Church, New York. After thirteen years of service there, he accepted the Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric, Pastoral Theology and Church Government in Union Theological Seminary, New York, which position he retained and adorned to the close of his life. He died, February 1st, 1871, in the eightieth year of his age.

Dr. Skinner, whilst highly esteemed as a man of literary culture and mental power, commanded in a peculiar degree the love of those with whom he came in contact. His artless simplicity, his courtesy, his piety and unworldliness, distinguished him even among good men, and strongly attracted the affections of those with whom he came in contact. He was a prominent leader of the New School party in the Church, but rejoiced in the reunion. As a preacher his style bore marks of culture and polish, not elaborate or artificial, but natural and easy. The sword of the Spirit was not so wrapt up in the flowers of rhetoric as to hide its point. On the contrary, his ministry was accompanied by numerous and powerful revivals. He was regarded as one of the best sermonizers in America. As a professor he was as much at home in the teacher's chair as he was in the pulpit. His students both respected and loved him.

Dr. Skinner's published works were "Preaching and Hearing," "Hints to Christians," "Translation of Vinet's Pastoral Theology," "Discussions in Theology," and numerous discourses.

Skinner, Thomas Harvey, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., October 6th, 1820; graduated at the University of New York, in 1840; was licensed to preach the gospel, in 1843, and ordained and installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Paterson, N. J., in 1843. In 1846 he accepted a call to the West Presbyterian Church, New York city, and in 1856 was transferred to the Church at Honesdale, Pa. In 1859 he took charge of the Reformed Dutch Church in Stapleton, Long Island, in which he continued till 1868, when he accepted the pastoral care of the First Presbyterian Church, Fort Wayne, Indiana. In 1871 he was settled as pastor in Cincinnati, O. He is now connected with the Theological Seminary of the Northwest, as Cyrus H. McCormick Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology. Among Dr. Skinner's published writings are the following articles in the Princeton Review: (1860) "The Bible its own Witness and Interpreter;" (1866) "The Trinity in Redemption;" (1867) "Sanctification."

Slack, Elijah, LL. D., the son of J. and M. (Torbert) Slack, was born November 24th, 1784, in Lower Wakefield Township, Bucks county, Pa. He graduated in Princeton College in 1808; was three years Principal of Trenton Academy, and was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery in 1811. In 1812 he was elected Vice-president of New Jersey College, and Professor of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. In 1817 he was elected Superintendent of the Literary and Scientific Institute, Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1819, when the Cincinnati College was established, he was appointed its President, and continued so until 1828. In 1837 he established a high school at Brownsville, Tenn., which was very successful. He died May 29th, 1866. Dr. Slack, in all his labors, never failed to preach as opportunity offered. He was consistent and conscientious in the discharge of duties, either secular or religious. He was highly esteemed as a Christian and man, and as a teacher and lecturer was very successful.

Slemmons, Rev. John, a graduate of Princeton College in 1760, was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal in 1763, and ordained by the Presbytery of Carlisle in 1766, and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian churches of Slate Ridge and Chanceford, Pa. He resigned his charge previous to 1798, and died in 1811.

Sloan, Rev. William B., born near Lamington, N. J., 1772. His father was Samuel Sloan, and his mother was Elizabeth Kirkpatrick, sister of Chief Justice Kirkpatrick, of New Jersey. Both were of Scotch-Irish descent. He graduated at Princeton in 1792, and studied theology with Dr. Woodhull, of Freehold, N. J. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, May 31st, 1797, and was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Greenwich and Mansfield (now Washington Church), February 13th, 1798. He served both congregations for seventeen years, when their growth required a separation; he became pastor of Greenwich only, where he remained until declining health induced him to resign, October, 1834. He was taken with his last sickness while on a visit to his brother, in the old homestead, where he died, July 3d, 1839, aged sixty-eight. Mr. Sloan was a very fine-looking man, tall, erect, with a clear blue eye, and of a manly bearing. His presence was impressive. He had a very kind, tender heart, and was easily moved to tears. He was an earnest, affectionate and practical preacher, greatly beloved by his congregation.

Sloss, Rev. James Long, was a native of Ireland, but came to this country at an early age. Under the care of the Rev. Dr. Waddel he completed his theological course, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina, in November, 1817. The next day after his licensure he was commissioned by the Presbytery to labor as a missionary through portions of Georgia and the newly-formed settlements of what was then called the Alabama Territory. In less than a year he was ordained an itinerant on the Southwestern frontier, and soon after accepted a call from St. Stephen's, Clark county, Ala., where he remained for three years, preaching successfully, and at the same time taking charge of an academy. In 1821 he removed to Selma, in Dallas county, and took charge of the three churches of Selma, Pleasant Valley and Cahawba. He subsequently labored at Somerville and New Providence, and finally at Florence, in Lauderdale county, where the closing years of his life were spent. Nearly his whole career was passed in Alabama. It was characterized by great activity and devotedness, and much of it by great self-denial.

For intellectual ability and consistent and enlightened piety, Mr. Sloss stood eminent among his brethren, and his whole manner as a minister, by its fervor and boldness as well as propriety, was fitted to make a deep impression. He labored in connection with quite a number of churches during the period of his ministry, and in the camp-meetings, which were annually held not many miles from his residence, he took an active part. From these occasions, when, as was usually the case, thousands were assembled—some coming a distance of more than thirty miles—hundreds dated their first religious impressions, and often their conversion.

Sloss, Robert, D. D., was born in the city of New York, November 23d, 1838. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1865, having received during the course the honor of Junior Orator, and delivered the second Belles Lettres oration at Commencement. He was Tutor in that Institution, 1867-68. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, September 13th, 1868; pastor of the Third Church of Indianapolis, Ind., 1868-72; pastor of the Fourteenth Street Church, New York city, 1872-75; pastor at Titusville, Pa., 1875-77; pastor of the Third Church, Indianapolis, Indiana, 1877-79, and is now stated supply at Greensburgh, Ind. As a writer, Dr. Sloss is clear, concise, vigorous. As a preacher, his elocution is characterized by great distinctness of enunciation and marked adaptedness of expression to the sentiments uttered. He preaches the gospel in its purity, and proclaims the great doctrines of repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ as the radical cure of all evil and the grand incentive to all good. His ministry, from the beginning, has been characterized by earnestness, fidelity and success.

Sluter, Rev. George, A. M., the son of Frederick Ludwig and Dorothea Eleonore (Kraeft) Schlueter, was born in Rodenberg, Germany, May 5th, 1837. In 1847 the family settled in St. Louis, Mo. In 1860 Mr. S. graduated at Westminster College; in 1863 at Princeton Theological Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in February, 1863, and ordained by the Presbytery of Palmyra, in August, 1865. He has been settled over the churches of Rensselaer, Mo. ('63-'65); Webster Street, St. Louis ('65-'70); Duluth, Minn. ('70-'71); Shelbyville, Ind. ('71-'81); and Arlington, N. J., '81 to the present. From 1866 to 1870 he was Secretary of Home Missions of the Synod of Missouri, and since 1881 has been New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Herald and Presbyter. He has published an elaborate "History of Shelby County, Indiana," in one large quarto; also, an "Historical and Critical Essay on the Acta Pilati;" a "History of our Beloved Church;" "Memorial of Joseph Hamilton;" "Life and Character of Mrs. Jane Major;" "Resources of our County in 1876;" "Christian Home Life;" "The Religion of Politics;" a "Plea for a Religious Literature;" and has now under way a "Life of the Emperor Tiberius," from original sources.

Small, David E., known as "The Model Elder," and widely influential in the Church. He was born at York, Pa., December 3d, 1824, and his whole life of fifty-nine years was associated with the interests of that city. From boyhood he was characterized by ardent thirst for knowledge and intense energy in the pursuit of whatever commanded his attention. At the age of thirteen he entered the store of his relatives, P. A. & S. Small, and rapidly rose from one position to another, till, at twenty, he had come to be a foremost and confidential clerk. During this period he was also very attentive to religious duties, and some memoranda which he left indicate that he was led by the Spirit of God to deep and searching experiences, and to the formal dedication of himself to Christ as his only Saviour. In 1849 he united with the First Presbyterian Church of York. From that time he became known and approved as a man of exemplary Christian character and beneficial influence. In 1865 Mr. Small was ordained a ruling elder in this church, and with what fidelity, zeal and growing usefulness he shared the responsibilities of that office, notwithstanding the pressure of his large and varied business, multitudes were the admiring witnesses. He was ever ready for service in the Master's name. With rare personal magnetism and oratorical power, added to lively Christian sensibilities and earnest devotion to the Redeemer's cause, he was well fitted to co-operate efficiently with his colleagues, and to be a ready, sympathetic and reliable support to his pastor. His interest in the Temperance cause, in Sabbath schools, in Young Men's Christian Associations, in efforts for the welfare of the colored race, and kindred objects, was very hearty and influential. Few men have touched society at so many important points, or been more honored and beloved in all the relations of life. Few men have better illustrated the high idea given to us by inspiration—"Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

Smalley, Rev. John, was born September 18th, 1813, in Middlesex county, N. J.; graduated at Lafayette College in 1839; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 3d, 1842. He taught a select school at Middletown, N. Y., one term, in the winter of 1839 to 1840; was assistant teacher in Mr. Ezra Fairchild's classical school, at Plainfield, N. J., during the summer terms of 1840 and 1841; and was Principal of Muncy (Pa.) Female Seminary from May, 1847, to October, 1855. During a part of this time, from April, 1843, to October 1850, he was also stated supply to the church at Muncy. In November, 1855, he became Principal of the Witherspoon Institute, at Butler, Pa., belonging to the Presbytery of Butler, where he remained until April, 1858. He became stated supply of Buffalo and Glade Run churches, April, 1857, and served the former six months and the latter one year. In April, 1858, he went to Iowa, where he supplied the Waverly Church, from June, 1858, until October, 1866. He also supplied Mt. Vernon Church two years, from 1858 to 1860. He died, August 30th, 1879. Mr. Smalley was a man of great gentleness of character, genial, unassuming, modest, gentlemanly. As a Christian he was humble and conscientious. He possessed a well trained and well furnished mind, and produced some sermons of marked excellence. He was strong in his convictions, a thorough Presbyterian, and fearless in his defence of whatever he believed to be God's truth.

Smaltz, Rev. John H., was born in Philadelphia, in 1793. He was a graduate of Rutgers College. He was called to the pastorate of the Third Church of Baltimore, in 1822. He was subsequently settled at Germantown, Pa.; Frederick, Md.; Trenton, N. J.; Harrisburg, Pa.; spending his closing years in Philadelphia. A true man, a faithful, practical preacher, industrious, persevering, retiring and domestic in his habits, and with a heart devoted to every good cause, he was beloved. He died July 30th, 1861.

Smiley, George W., D. D., a member of the Presbytery of Lehigh, and, at the time of his decease, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Pottsville, Pa., was born in Perry county, Pa., in 1818, and in his youth went into a store in Carlisle. Here his desire for an education grew so strong, that with great effort he made himself ready to enter Dickinson College, but was only able to remain two years. He went to Cincinnati, O., and Lexington, Ky. In Lexington he was converted, and entered the Methodist ministry.

He spent twenty years as a minister in the Methodist Church, and then accepted a call to the Reformed (Dutch) Church, at Seventh and Spring Garden streets, Philadelphia. His call there occasioned a lawsuit, which was lost by his friends, and, after a short ministry in Philadelphia, he was called to the Second Church in Pottsville, which he served for fourteen years. He was a fine preacher, thoughtful, clear, and very popular wherever he went. His friends were warmly drawn to him, and his home was one into which it was pleasant to enter. It was gradually shadowed by many sorrows, and life grew dark, until it at last closed, on June 29th, 1883. His remains were borne to Lexington, Ky., to be placed by the side of his wife and children.

Smith, Rev. Ambrose Cephas, was born in Wrightsville, Pa., August 21st, 1841. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1861, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in the class of 1864. After preaching as stated supply two years at Wantage (Bremerville), N. J., and Harrisburg, Pa., in the Autumn of 1866 he assumed charge of the South Presbyterian Church, Galena, Ill., where he has ever since labored, enjoying the respect, confidence and affection of his people, and giving in return to the church and to the community he has known so long a constant influence for good. Mr. Smith is a student and a scholar. Questions which lie on the border land between Natural Science and Revelation, College classics, extensive historical reading, English literature in wide limits, proficiency in the German language, the New Testament in the original, and the familiarity of an adept with the Old Testament Hebrew—such pursuits and acquirements, as illustrating his mind and his taste, are well known by those who are acquainted with him.

Smith, Benjamin M., D. D., was born in the county of Powhatan, Va., June 30th, 1811. Having lost his father when seven years of age, his education was carried on under his mother's roof, by teachers in the family or immediate vicinity, except for one year, till, at the age of fourteen, he entered Hampden-Sidney College, where he graduated September, 1829, sharing equally the first honor with Chancellor Garland, now of Vanderbilt University. During his connection with the Institution, he was an inmate of the family of the Rev. John H. Rice, D. D., the founder of Union Seminary, who had lived in his father's house when a young man, for about a year, pursuing his studies in medicine under their family physician, and who also married his father's niece, and took a tender interest in the children of his friends.

At eighteen years of age Mr. Smith taught the Milton (N. C.) Male Academy, five years. He entered Union Seminary January 1st, 1832. In April, 1831, when he had yet, by four or five months, not completed the three years' course, he was elected Tutor of Hebrew and introductory studies in the seminary. In April, 1836, he resigned this post, and, with a view of improving his impaired health, as well as to extend his opportunities for study, he went to Europe, and remained till the Fall of 1837. Having supplied the pulpit of the church at Danville, Va., for some time, he was installed its pastor in the Spring of 1838. Finding his health again failing, in the Summer of that year he traveled for a season in the Valley of Virginia.

Dr. Smith took charge of Tinkling Spring Church, Augusta, county, Va., in November, 1840, and during part of the five years he sustained this pastoral relation he was also employed in conducting a classical school. In November, 1845, he became pastor of the Church at Staunton, Va., and labored there successfully till November, 1853, when he entered on the work of Secretary of the Board of Publication of the Presbyterian Church. In October, 1854, he accepted the office of Professor of Oriental Literature in Union Theological Seminary, which he now fills. He was Moderator of the General Assembly (Southern), at Savannah, in 1876.

Besides a number of sermons and addresses, Dr. Smith has given to the press a volume on "Family Religion," a "Commentary on Psalms and Proverbs," part of a work on the whole Bible, of which Dr. David Brown and Rev. Mr. Fausset and others furnished parts, and which was published in Glasgow, Scotland, and a volume of "Questions on the Gospels," all of which are works of marked ability. He has also contributed a number of valuable articles to the Southern Presbyterian Review. Dr. Smith's life has been a busy, influential and useful one. He is a genial and cultivated gentleman, a ripe scholar, an eloquent preacher, a vigorous writer, and has devoted his attainments and influence, with exemplary zeal and large success, to the grand objects and interests of his profession.

Smith, Rev. Caleb, was born in Brookhaven, Long Island, December 29th, 1723, and graduated at Yale in 1743. New York Presbytery licensed him in April, 1747, and ordained him, November 30th, 1748, pastor of Newark Mountains, now Orange, N. J. Mr. Smith was an untiring friend of the College of New Jersey, making long journeys to collect funds, and going to Virginia to prevail on Mr. Davies to accept the Presidency. He was indefatigable in study, delighted in prayer, and excelled in pastoral visitation and catechizing. He died October 29d, 1762, aged thirty-nine.

Smith, Rev. David, the son of the Rev. David Smith, was born, it is believed, in Wilmington, Delaware, in 1772. At the age of about sixteen, there being no academy in the West, he accompanied his father to one of the meetings of the Synod of Virginia, and was there placed under the care of Dr. John B. Smith, then President of Hampden-Sidney College. His health being impaired by too close study, he took an excursion, as a traveling companion, with the Rev. Dr. Hill, who had been then recently licensed and appointed to itinerate for six months in the lower counties of Virginia. He returned to his college, and in due time graduated. After studying theology, under his father, he was licensed to preach the gospel, and installed pastor of the united churches of George's Creek and the Tent, in Fayette county, Pa. Here he labored, with great success, for about four years, when he removed to the Forks of Yough, in Westmoreland county, and took charge of the congregations of Rehoboth and Round Hill, where he preached till he died, August 24th, 1803. His death-bed was a scene of the triumph of faith. His weeping people bore his mortal remains to the grave, near the church where he preached his last sermon. The unexpected death of this young and faithful servant of God produced a very wide-felt sensation, and was made instrumental in giving fresh impulse to that greatest of all revivals that has ever been in the West.

Smith, Edward Dunlap, D. D., was born in Greenwich, N. J., September 17th, 1802; graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1822, and also at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was a missionary in Georgia, 1828-9, and chaplain of the University of Virginia, 1830. He was ordained by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia in 1831, and was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Washington city, from 1831 to 1835. In the year 1835 he assumed the pastoral charge of the Eighth Presbyterian Church, in the city of New York, continuing thereon eight years, when he was installed pastor of the church known as the Chelsea Presbyterian Church, now no longer on the roll of Presbytery. He served this church until the year 1869, discharging all the duties of a pastor with great earnestness and fidelity, and retiring, after a ministry of nearly forty years, with the undiminished confidence of his brethren and the affection of all the people whom he had served as a minister of Christ. Dr. Smith was a man of scholarly tastes and habits, a Christian gentleman in all his intercourse with men, and a faithful, sincere disciple of Christ. He died in the city of New York, March 27th, 1883.

Smith, George W., formerly an elder in the Presbyterian Church in Mauch Chunk, Pa., was born February 28th, 1805, at Princeton, N. J. He was one of the pioneers of Presbyterianism in the Lehigh Valley. He passed his early life at Berry Meeting, Pa., and in 1821 removed to Mauch Chunk. In 1826 he helped to organize the first Sabbath school, out of which have grown three prosperous churches of different denominations. He was largely instrumental in the organization of the Presbyterian churches of Mauch Chunk and Summit Hill, of which he was one of the original elders many years. In 1863 he removed to Catasauqua and connected himself with the First Presbyterian Church. Here he died, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. At the time of his death he was a trustee of the church and a teacher of the young ladies' Bible class. He was twice a delegate to the General Assembly.

Smith, H. Augustus, D. D., was born in Montgomery county, N. Y., May 28th, 1823, and died in Philadelphia, March 7th, 1883. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in the class of 1853, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York City. His first charge was the South Street Church, of Philadelphia, which he resigned, after two years, to accept the pastorate of the Northminster Church in the same city. He continued his ministry here for eighteen years, resigning the charge in May of the year of his decease, on account of ill health. During his pastorate the congregation built the edifice at Thirty-fifth and Baring streets, the entire debt upon which was provided for before his resignation, and which, with its solid grandeur and enduring beauty, is a fitting symbol, as it will be a lasting monument, of the great spiritual work he accomplished therein.

Dr. Smith was a scholarly, studious and eloquent minister, and a sympathetic and efficient pastor. Though without the sustaining power of a strong physical constitution, he lived fast, and wrought more in his fewer years than many others in the half century of labor allotted them. He did not often take a prominent part in public meetings other than those of his own church, but when he did, his course, especially in our Church judicatories, was always marked by a prudent, judicious, deliberative spirit. He was a member of the Board of Publication, and was greatly beloved by his ministerial brethren.

Smith, Henry Boynton, D. D., LL. D., was born in Portland, Me., November 21st, 1815. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1834, sharing in the highest honors of his class. He studied theology at Andover and Bangor, and later in Halle and Berlin. After his return, in 1840, he took for a year the duties of the President at Bowdoin College. He was installed December, 1842, pastor of the Congregational Church of West Amesbury, now Merrimac, Mass., where he spent five years. In 1847 he went to Amherst College, as Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy. In 1850 he was called to the Chair of Church History in Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., and in 1851, was transferred to that of Systematic Theology, which he held until compelled by prostrated health to resign it, in 1871. He was then appointed Pro-an enthusiasm enhanced by his vast learning and the loveliness of his personal character.

His influence was potent in ecclesiastical bodies. No one labored more earnestly than he for the interests of the Evangelical Alliance, of whose executive committee he was the first chairman. He has been called the "Hero of Reunion." As Moderator of the New School General Assembly, in 1863, it was his happiness to welcome the first delegation from the Old School body. His sermon at Dayton the next year "struck the key-note of reunion," and his "Declaration," unanimously adopted by the Assembly in that place, was the "first definite, official action taken by either body in favor of reunion." His labors during the following years, in Review articles and editorials in the New York Evangelist, in public addresses, correspondence and conferences, in the meetings of the General Assembly in St. Louis and Harrisburg, and in the Union Convention in Philadelphia, were pre-eminent and most effective.

As a writer Professor Smith made many valuable contributions to religious newspapers, and to reviews and encyclopedias, and published many occasional sermons and addresses. He translated, with copious and valuable additions, "Gieseler's Church History" and "Hagenbach's History of Doctrines." He published, in 1859, "Chronological Tables of Church History," a monumental work of enormous labor. Several other valuable German works were translated by him. In 1858 he took the editorship of the American Theological Review, which, after some changes, took the name of the Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, and was under the joint editorship of Rev. Dr. Atwater and himself. Since Professor Smith's death, have been published "Faith and Philosophy," "Apologetics," and "Introduction to Theology," all of which are valuable productions of his gifted pen. As a philosophic Church historian, theologian and apologist for the Christian faith, his place is pre-eminent.

Smith, Jacob Henry, D. D., the oldest son of Samuel R. and Margaret Smith, was born in Lexington, Rockbridge county, Va., August 13th, 1820. He was prepared for college in his native town, and graduated from Washington College—now Washington and Lee University—June 29th, 1843. In the Fall of the same year he entered Union Theological Seminary, Va., and taking the full course, received his certificate in 1846, and in August of the same year he was licensed by Lexington Presbytery, and transferred to West Hanover Presbytery. In September of this year he took charge of the Church at Pittsylvania C. H., Va., where he was ordained and installed, July 31st, 1847. Being invited to take charge of "Samuel Davies Institute," in Halifax county, Va., as Principal and Professor of Greek, he went thither in the beginning of 1850, and conducted that Institution with great success until 1851. At this time he was invited to Greensboro, N. C., and fessor Emeritus, and continued giving occasional instruction in Apologetics. After a long and weary struggle with disease, he died, February 7th, 1877, most beloved and lamented.

For a quarter of a century his life in New York was one of extraordinary activity and influence. As a preacher, he was, although without the external graces of oratory, fervent and deeply impressive. The devoted loyalty to our Lord Jesus Christ which glowed through his pulpit ministrations was also the marked characteristic of his teachings in the seminary. Christ, the Redeemer and Glorifier of humanity, in whom all things are to be reconciled and consummated, was his central idea, in both history and theology. He gave a new impulse and direction to philosophic study in both, inspiring his students with Charlottesville, Va. Accepting the latter place, he preached at Charlottesville till 1859, when he accepted the renewed invitation to Greensboro, N. C., and began his work there April 20th, 1859. In June following he was received by Orange Presbytery, and installed in July over the Greensboro Church, where he continues to labor with great success and acceptance.

Dr. Smith is an accomplished classical and Belles Lettres scholar, a well-informed theologian, and fairly abreast of the literature of the day. He is the owner of a good, well-selected and well-read library of sacred and polite literature. But his peculiar forte is that he is a powerful and impressive preacher. His sermons are finished and polished productions, filled with the choicest thought and garnished with graceful allusions, and enlivened with appropriate illustrations. To the polish of the graceful composer, Dr. Smith adds the attractions of the skillful elocutionist, and the controlling power of a magnificent voice.

The Lord has greatly blessed his labors, granting him revival after revival in his own churches, and in others. About one thousand souls have been hopefully converted under his preaching. He is still active, able and ready to preach, and is heard with pleasure wherever he goes. In 1872 Hampden-Sidney College conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and in 1877 the University of North Carolina repeated the honor.

Smith, Rev. James Power, is a son of Rev. Joseph Smith, D.D. (author of "Old Redstone"), and great-grandson of Rev. Joseph Smith and James Power, D.D., pioneer ministers of Western Pennsylvania. He was born at New Athens, Ohio, July 4th, 1837; educated at Jefferson College, Pa., and graduated in 1857. His theological education was conducted at Union Theological Seminary, Va., where he graduated in 1861. He was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery in 1863, and ordained by Montgomery Presbytery in 1866. He was pastor of Big Lick Church, Roanoke county, Va., from 1866 to 1869, and of the Fredericksburg Church from that time to the present (1883). He has also held the position of Stated Clerk of the Synod of Virginia from 1870, and is Chairman of Committee on Sustentation for East Hanover Presbytery. He has always been a faithful and efficient pastor, remarkable for his executive ability and talent for keeping all the enterprises in his church in a state of life and movement.

Smith, John Blair, D.D., was the fourth son of Dr. Robert Smith, of Pequet. He was born June 12th, 1756. Converted at fourteen years of age, he graduated under Dr. Witherspoon at eighteen. At the early age of twenty-three he succeeded his brother, Samuel Stanhope Smith, as President of Hampden-Sidney College and pastor of the Briery Church. Becoming convinced that his proper sphere was the pulpit, he resigned the presidency in 1789; and after preaching some time without a fixed charge, in 1791 he accepted a call to the Third or Pine Street Church, Philadelphia. Here his health failed, and his resolution was shaken. While on this account he disavowed all fickleness, he accepted the presidency of the newly founded Union College, in Schenectady; but on the restoration of his health he returned to his former charge, and was formally reinstalled over Pine Street Church, May, 1799. But his stay with them was short, and did not vindicate his claims to prescience. He succumbed in three months to an attack of yellow fever, and died, August 22d, 1799.

Dr. Smith was an extemporaneous and impassioned preacher, and powerful revivals occurred under his ministry. Like others of his compatriots, he showed his faith by his works, and marched at the head of his students and other youths of his congregation, in pursuit of the enemy in the lower parts of Virginia. He exerted also a great influence in opposition to Patrick Henry, in preventing the unequal taxation and assessment of the Presbyterian churches in Virginia. He left no printed works behind him. Dr. Smith was the Moderator of the General Assembly in 1798.

Smith, John Cross, D.D., was the son of James and Ann (Dickey) Smith. He was born in Baltimore, Md., October 29th, 1803. He made a profession of religion at about sixteen years of age. After his preparatory education at a classical school in his native city, he studied theology under the Rev. John M. Duncan, D.D., for a considerable time, but, in 1826, entered Princeton Seminary and remained there about one year. Licensed by Oneida Presbytery (N. Y.), August 7th, 1828, from October 18th of that year he labored as an evangelist at Fortress Monroe (Va.) and its vicinity, for six months. He became pastor of the Church of Portsmouth, Va., December 12th, 1829, and labored there with great zeal and success until April 28th, 1832, when he accepted a call to the Bridge Street Church, Georgetown, D. C., where he was installed May 2d, 1832, the church prospering and growing under his active and earnest efforts. From the Spring of 1839 to September 10th of the same year he was an agent for the American Tract Society, when he accepted a call to the Fourth Church in Washington city, and was installed September 27th, 1839. Here he labored with unwearied zeal and energy for nearly thirty-eight years. His ministry was attended by numerous revivals. He was specially efficient in building church edifices free from debt, and in removing debts from those which were burdened. He died in Washington, D. C., January 23d, 1878, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Dr. Smith was a man of acute mind, great strength of character, an emotional nature, a determined will, sensitive conscience and great tenderness. He was pre-eminently a revival preacher, not spasmodic, but continuous, efficient and successful. He was a devoted student of the Bible, and abundant and systematic in pastoral visitation.

Smith, Rev. Joseph, of Nottingham, Md., was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, August 5th, 1767, and was ordained and installed pastor of Lower Brandywine Church, Del., April 19th, 1769. This charge he resigned in 1772, but in 1774 accepted a call from the Second Church, in Wilmington, that church having been united with his old Brandywine Church. He labored here until April, 1778, when he resigned, on account of the distracted state of the country.

But now he was about to enter upon the great work of his life, in Western Pennsylvania. Here he became prominent for piety and energy, and was one of the fathers of the Presbyterian Church in that region. The Revs. James Power and John McMillan had already preceded him. His first charge was Buffalo and Cross Creek, where he was settled in 1780. A revival soon began in his church, which never ceased till the day of his death, more than twelve years.

As a preacher, Mr. Smith was very impressive, both in the terrific and the pathetic. Some one said of him, "I never knew a man who could so completely unbar the gates of hell, and make me look so far down into the dark, bottomless abyss, or, like him, could so throw open the gates of heaven, and let me glance at the insufferable brightness of the great white throne." Mr. Smith died April 19th, 1792.

Smith, Rev. Joseph Davis, was born in —, Ireland, May 30th, 1828. On completing his collegiate course at Canonsburg, Pa., in 1856, he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1859; was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, in April, 1859, and preached in Philadelphia, in Newark, Del., and in New Haven, for a time, as a missionary, under the direction of the Domestic Board. He was ordained and installed pastor of Slate Ridge Church, York county, Pa., October 30th, 1860, and has continued pastor of this church ever since, faithful in duty and blessed in his labors.

Smith, Joseph T., D. D., was born in Mercer, Pa., of godly Presbyterian ancestry. He pursued his preparatory studies at the Academy in Mercer, and entered Jefferson College in the Spring of 1833. He studied theology privately, under the direction of the Rev. Samuel Tate; was licensed by the Presbytery of Erie, in April, 1841, and was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Mercer, in April, 1842. In April, 1849, he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. He was elected, in 1860, Professor of Church Government and Pastoral Theology, in the Theological Seminary at Danville, Ky., and entered upon his duties there in December following. He accepted a call from the Central Presbyterian Church of Baltimore, in 1862, in the service of which he still remains. With one exception, he is the oldest pastor of any denomination in Baltimore. A number of his sermons, addresses, etc., have, from time to time, been published. Dr. Smith is a gentleman of amiable disposition, great urbanity, and winning address. As a preacher, he stands in the front rank for ability and fidelity. As a presbyter, he is prompt and faithful. He has served the Church in various important capacities, and his ministry has been blessed with large success. He justly enjoys the affectionate regard of his congregation and his brethren, and the esteem of the public, for his consistent, earnest and useful life.

Smith, Josiah, D., D. D., the son of William and Sarah Smith, was born in Westmoreland county, Pa., November 29th, 1814; was educated in South Hanover College, Indiana, and studied theology in Hanover Theological Seminary, Indiana. He was licensed by Madison Presbytery, and ordained by Columbus Presbytery, in 1841, and installed pastor of the Truro and Hamilton churches, Ohio. He subsequently became pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Columbus, O., and during his pastoral charge he died, May 29th, 1863. When his utterance was so feeble as scarcely to be understood, there was one affectionate ear which caught the words that were meant for none but the Master to hear—"The lowest place, the lowest place, dear Jesus!" Dr. Smith was one, the fervor of whose piety was a constant atmosphere about him, yet so as by no means to assume an air of undue religious-ness. His preaching was sought unto by men of mature and well-trained intellects, who always found in his discourses a breadth, and solidity and earnestness that were well adapted to commend to them the excellency of the knowledge of Christ, and yet his preaching was never intellectual at the expense of the spiritual and emotional elements, and was always so clearly in accordance with the Scriptures, if not in the very words of inspiration, that the humblest hearer who knew the Scriptures would scarcely fail to be both edified and interested.

Smith, Rev. Reuben, was born in South Hadley, Mass., September 26th, 1789. He graduated at Middlebury College, in 1812, at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1816, and was licensed by the New York Presbytery, and ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Ballston Centre, N. Y., by Troy Presbytery, in 1816. Here he labored some years, and was called to the Third Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y. In 1829 he became pastor of a Congregational Church in Burlington, Vt., and in 1832 he rejoined Troy Presbytery, as pastor of the Church at Waterford, N. Y. This pastorate extended over a period of sixteen years, and during his ministry many souls were added to the church, of such as shall be saved. In 1848 he again preached at Ballston Centre, and in 1854 he removed West, joining Winnebago Presbytery, and living at Beaver Dam, Wis. He died November 7th, 1860. Mr. Smith was a man of deep and earnest piety, a wise counsellor and an able and successful minister. He was the author of a volume of "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," and several tracts.

Smith, Robert, D.D., was born in Londonderry, Ireland, in 1723, and came with his parents to this country in 1730. He received his education from Rev. Samuel Blair, of Egg's Manor. He was ordained pastor of Pequea Church, Lancaster county, March 25th, 1751, where he remained for forty-two years, till his decease, April 15th, 1793. Other accounts place his death in 1790.

Dr. Smith was a man of superior gifts, an able theologian and profound casuist, a plain preacher but active pastor, and all that he published was a small treatise on faith. The school which he established at Pequea acquired a great reputation, but he is better known to posterity as the father of those two great lights of the Church, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, of Princeton College, and Dr. John Blair Smith, of Union College. The fact of a father and two sons successively elevated to the Moderator's Chair in the General Assembly is without a parallel.

Smith, Rev. Robert F., a son of Rev. John Blair Smith, was settled for some time over a Presbyterian Church at Snow Hill, Md., where he died, in 1824.

Smith, Rev. Samuel Buchanan, was born at Gettysburg, Adams county, Pa., March 22d, 1806, and studied theology at Princeton. Mr. Smith was licensed October 21th, 1828, by the Second Presbytery of New York, immediately after which he went to Ohio, under a commission of the Board of Domestic Missions; supplied the churches of Middletown and Franklin for six months, and subsequently other churches for short periods. He was ordained as an evangelist, by Oxford Presbytery (Ohio), October 4th, 1832. Mr. Smith never was an installed pastor. He resolved early in his ministry "not to be bound to any church that could not promise him an adequate support," and his ministry was almost entirely in the West, serving as a supply. His principal fields of labor after his ordination were as follows: At Venice, Ohio, 1833-6; Mount Carmel, Ind., 1836-8; Camden, Ohio, 1840-7; St. Charles, Mo., 1846-50; in 1854 he removed to Illinois, and preached occasionally at Lewistown, and afterwards at Keithsburg and Pope's River; in 1858 he removed to Alton, Ill., where he resided in infirm health until 1865, preaching occasionally at Edwardsville and Moro when he was able. He removed to Gettysburg, Pa., August 19th, 1865, and here, in comfortable circumstances outwardly, but in infirm health, he resided until his death, which occurred May 23d, 1879, in the seventy-fourth year of his age, from chronic disease of the kidneys. Mr. Smith was a man of nervous temperament and of a positive character, steadfast in principle, steady in purpose, unwavering in faith, devoted to the Presbyterian Church, and an earnest defender of her doctrines and polity. His life was one of labor and privation, laying the foundations of churches in waste places. The highest sum he "ever received as a support in any one year was $100, while for the greater part of forty years it was only from $200 to $300 promised, and that only in part paid."

Smith, Samuel Stanhope, D. D., LL. D., President of Princeton College, and the son of Robert Smith, D.D., one of the most able theologians of his age, was born at Pequea, Lancaster county, Pa., March 16th, 1750, and graduated in 1769 at Princeton, where he was afterwards two years a tutor. Being an eloquent and popular preacher in Virginia, Hampden-Sidney College was instituted with the design that he should become its President. After being at the head of that college a few years, he was appointed, in 1779, Professor of Moral Philosophy at Princeton. In the absence of Dr. Witherspoon as a member of Congress, much of the care of the college devolved upon him, and after his death, in 1791, he was elected his successor, and discharged the duties of the position with great fidelity and success. In consequence of growing infirmities he resigned his office in 1812, and died August 21st, 1819, aged sixty-nine. Dr. Smith published an Essay on the "Causes of the Variety of the Complexion and Figure of the Human Species," in 1788, in which he ascribed all the variety to climate, the state of society, and the manner of living; "Sermons," octavo, 1801; "Lectures on the Evidences of the Christian Religion," duodecimo, 1809; on the "Love of Praise," 1810; a continuation of Ramsay's "History of the United States," from 1808 to 1817; "Lectures on Moral and Political Philosophy," "The Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion." One of his most splendid performances was his oration delivered at Trenton, on the death of Washington; the occasion roused his faculties, and the result was a production of great beauty and power.

"Dr. Smith," says the Rev. Philip Lindsley, D.D., who was Tutor in the College at Princeton and student of theology from 1807 to 1810, "throughout the Middle and Southern States was regarded as the most eloquent and learned divine among his contemporaries. . . . Of the government of the college, at this period of its greatest prosperity, I can hardly use language too favorable. . . . He was a diligent, persevering student through life. He was conversant with the literature, science, philosophy and politics of ancient and modern times. . . . His house was frequented by the good, the great, the wise, the intelligent, and humble merit was always welcome at his board and fireside. . . . He was not ambitious, except in the apostolic sense. . . . He was no bigot or dogmatist. In the General Assembly, Synod and Presbytery of his Church, he was confessedly primus inter pares, or at least second to none, if report and tradition may be credited. . . ." Referring to Dr. Smith, after he had passed the limit of threescore years, and was compelled, by ill-health, to relinquish all public employments, Dr. Lindsley observes, "the venerable figure, the saintly aspect, the benignant smile, the ethereal spirit, the tranquil resignation, the humble faith, the cheerful temper, the habitual meekness, the generous sympathy, the comprehensive charity, the modest, unpretending gentleness of his whole manner, all proclaimed the mature and gifted Christian, ready to depart, and calmly expecting his final translation to a more congenial world. He took great interest in the youthful candidates for the ministry. He delighted much in their society. His little parlor was often filled with them. And then, what words of wisdom, of kindness, of encouragement, of counsel, and the prayer; for he always concluded these meetings with prayer. . . . Thus blandly and peacefully passed away the latter years of the veteran invalid soldier of the Cross, doing what he could, still, as ever, faithful to his vows, and zealous in his Master's service."

Smith, Thomas Porter, was an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Paris, Ky., for forty-six years. He was born in Virginia, January 1st, 1793; ordained an elder, January 5th, 1822; and died November 12th, 1868. Mr. Smith was licensed Clerk of the County Court, in May, 1813, by Judges Boyle and Owsley, which place he retained for over forty years. He studied law, and was a wise counsellor, and often effected a reconciliation between parties at variance. He was remarkably conscientious, and would not enlist in the defence of the wrong side, if aware of it. He was a man of extensive reading, and thought more than he read. His favorite works were such as Coleridge's and Isaac Taylor's, and the deepest and most metaphysical works on Morals and Theology. He was one of the leaders in the organization of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church in Kentucky, and was a frequent contributor to the religious papers of the day. He was a man of the kindest disposition, very liberal to the poor and to the church, and of consistent and uniform piety.

Smith, Thomas W., a manager of the Presbyterian Hospital in New York, died in that city August 9th, 1875. Mr. Smith, as a business man, was remarkable for sagacity, energy and self-reliance. His integrity was beyond suspicion, and his kindness of heart and suavity of demeanor won the affectionate regard of a wide circle of friends, to whom he was ever ready to extend his sympathy in distress and his counsel and aid in difficulties. As a member and officer of the Presbyterian Church, his walk and conversation were uniformly consistent with his profession. His religious character was simple, yet decided, but never obtrusive. Being strong in his convictions, he was ever earnest and fearless in the advocacy of what he believed to be truth and duty, when called upon for their defence. His interest in the Hospital, to the Board of which he belonged, knew no abatement until death closed the scene, and his useful life and labor ended together.

Smith, Rev. William R., a brother of Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1776; was settled as pastor of the Second Church in Wilmington, Del., about 1786; resigned his charge in 1796, and became pastor of the Reformed Dutch Church of Harlingen and Shamock, N. J., in which relation he died, about the year 1820. Mr. Smith was a judicious and instructive preacher, a faithful pastor, and amiable and exemplary in his spirit and deportment.

Smylie, Rev. James, was one of the fathers of the Presbyterian Church in the Southwest, and the second minister of the Denomination who settled permanently in that region. He was born in North Carolina, of Scotch parentage, about the year 1780. He received his classical and theological education, which was unusually complete, at Guilford, under the care of Rev. Dr. Caldwell, and was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of Orange. Soon after his ordination, in 1805, he was sent by the Synod of North Carolina, as a missionary, to the Territory of Mississippi. Commencing his labors at the town of Washington, the capital of the Territory, in Adams county, six miles east of Natchez, he organized at that place a church, which bore the name of "Salem." The influences prevailing at such a political centre were not favorable to the growth of the church, and in the following year it was removed to a rural neighborhood, called "Pine Ridge." The "Pine Ridge Church" is still a vigorous organization, and is the oldest living Presbyterian church in the Southwest. Mr. Smyth continued to minister to this church till 1811, when he removed to Amite county, on the southern boundary of the Territory. Here he engaged actively in the work of the ministry, extending his labors in behalf of religion and education over a wide region of country, and organizing a number of churches in Mississippi and the contiguous parishes of Louisiana. He was a zealous Presbyterian, and untiring in his efforts to advance the interests of his Church. As the result of a journey which he made in 1811, on horseback, to Tennessee, he obtained from the Synod of Kentucky an ordinance creating the "Presbytery of Mississippi." And from his weight of character and familiarity with ecclesiastical law and usage, his influence in that Presbytery, throughout his life, was almost magisterial.

He died in 1853. His tall, spare, erect bodily frame was the index of the candor and integrity of his spirit. His firmness of temper and conviction was proverbial, but was at the same time mingled with a singular power of attracting the confidence and conciliating the minds of those with whom he had intercourse. His benevolent disposition was conspicuously shown in his labors for the religious instruction of the slaves, and in his boldness in urging their duty in this respect upon their masters.

Smyth, Anson, D.D., was born in Pennsylvania, although by blood and education he is a New Englander. After completing his collegiate and theological education at the East, he took early pastoral charge of a pioneer church in Michigan, and, after ten years of successful labor, was called, in 1817, to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church in Toledo, Ohio.

In the year 1850 he became providentially drawn into association with important educational measures then developing, and relinquished his pastoral duties to enter upon a department of public service, in which, for the next sixteen years, he achieved most honorable distinction. He became first Superintendent of the new school system of Toledo, and as a result of his success in that capacity, and his high reputation as Editor of the Journal of Education, was elected on the Republican ticket as Commissioner of Schools for the State of Ohio. Six years of laborious, faithful work, as indicated by his able and elaborate reports in this important office during two successive terms, left him high in the respect and confidence of the people. He then became for six years Superintendent of Instruction for the city of Cleveland, conducting its schools with pronounced acceptance and ability.

For the past twelve years Dr. Smyth has occupied no public post, although engaged with considerable regularity in preaching as supply for vacant churches and accomplishing much literary work. Gradually drawn into correspondence for the religious press, he has become widely and favorably known, of late years, through this channel of influence, one which his genial style and wide acquaintance with men and affairs well enable him to occupy.

Dr. Smyth is of large frame and agreeable presence, warm in his friendships, with a natural fund of spontaneous humor and a remaining capacity for vigorous work which make his more than three-score years rest lightly. His sympathies are broad and scholarly, while yet he is strictly evangelical and entirely loyal to the doctrines and polity of the Presbyterian Church. As a preacher, he is eminently instructive, earnest, biblical and edifying. His warm,

ANSON SMYTH, D.D.

Christian heart, sound judgment, ready aid and fraternal fidelity give him high station in the regard of his ministerial associates.

Smyth, Thomas, D. D., was born in Belfast, Ireland, June 11th, 1808, of English and Scotch parentage. He entered the Institute at Belfast, which was then connected with what is now the Queen's College, as a preparatory or High school, and was prominent among his fellow students, bearing off a prize at every examination. In 1827 he became a student at Belfast College, and there maintained his relative position, as primus inter pares, winning prizes in every branch of study. He prosecuted his theological studies at Highbury College, in London. He embarked with his parents for New York, in August, 1830, and soon after his arrival in this country he was taken under the care of Newark Presbytery, and entered the Senior class in Princeton Seminary. Before graduating, he received an invitation to supply the vacant pulpit of the Second Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C., which he accepted, and after preaching to the congregation with great acceptance for six months, he was unanimously elected their pastor, and was installed by the Charleston Union Presbytery, December 29th, 1831.

Dr. Smyth was, in an eminent degree, furnished by nature and mental training with those qualities which render the ministry brilliant and successful. He was a princely orator. He was gifted with a vigorous and brilliant imagination, a quick, poetic sensibility. He was a most diligent student and a thorough-going preacher, of the old school. The gospel trumpet, in his mouth, uttered no uncertain sound. He was a standard-bearer. He was not ashamed of his Confession of Faith and Church Catechism, or of the Westminster Assembly of Divines.

THOMAS SMYTH, D. D.

He was a bold and skillful defender, as well as an able and successful expounder, of the truth. His crowning excellence as a preacher, the chief inspiration of his eloquent discourses, was his absorbing love to the Saviour. He was eminently zealous in the cause of missions, and was, for many years, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Missions, in the Synod of South Carolina. He was also a devoted friend of the Sabbath school and the Bible Society.

Dr. Smyth was as much marked by fidelity and tenderness as a pastor, as by ability and power as a preacher. He ever felt and manifested a deep and affectionate interest in the colored people, who filled the gallery of his church, and largely composed his membership. As an ecclesiastic, he was thoroughly qualified to be a leader in the courts and councils of the Church. As a churchman, he was at once intensely denominational and intensely unsectarian. He was a learned author, and has left to the world about thirty valuable volumes, the most popular of which are: "The Well in the Valley," "Why Do I Live?" and the volumes on missions.

Dr. Smyth's health was greatly impaired during the later years of his life, but he bore his sufferings with remarkable patience, even with cheerfulness, and labored on with unflagging energy, working until his throbbing heart ceased to beat, and "the pulse of life stood still." His earnest, exemplary and useful life terminated at Charleston, August 20th, 1873. Death had no terrors for him. No act of his life was more positive than that of obeying the order of his great Captain to put off his armor and go up to receive his crown.

Snodgrass, Rev. James, was born near Doylestown, Bucks county, Pa. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1783, and was afterwards, for some time, a Tutor in the same Institution. He studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Nathanael Irwin, then pastor of the Church at Neshauniny, and was licensed to preach by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, in December, 1785. After preaching about a year and a half in destitute places, in the central and northern parts of the State of New York, he was installed, in May, 1788, pastor of the West Hanover congregation, in connection with the Presbytery of Carlisle, and continued in the active discharge of the duties of his office until the 25th of July, 1815, when he was attacked by a disease from which he never so far recovered as to be able to resume his labors. He died July 2d, 1846. Mr. Snodgrass was distinguished for sound judgment, great modesty, and eminent devotedness to his work. Though he rather shunned than courted the public gaze, he was held in high estimation by all who knew him. He was the father of the Rev. W. D. Snodgrass, D. D., now of Goshen, N. Y.

Snodgrass, William Davis, D. D., was born in West Hanover, Dauphin county, Pa., June 30th, 1796. He graduated at Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1815; after studying Hebrew in Philadelphia for six months, spent two and a half years at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, October 7th, 1818. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Fayetteville, N. C., July 30th, 1819, and installed pastor of Fayetteville Presbyterian Church on the same day, in which relation he continued till February, 1822. He was stated supply of the Independent Presbyterian Church, Savannah, Ga., from February, 1822, till August, 1823. Subsequently he was pastor of Murray Street Church, New York city, from October, 1823, till May, 1832; of the Second Church, Troy, N. Y., from October 3d, 1831, till April 28th, 1841; and of the Fifteenth Street Church, New York city, from March 15th, 1846, till October 29th, 1849.

On November 7th, 1849, he was installed pastor of the Church in Goshen, N. Y., of which he still has charge. For eighteen months, in 1832-33, he was agent for the Board of Home Missions.

Dr. Snodgrass has borne, through his long and useful life, the reputation of an able, faithful and successful minister of the gospel. His labors have been blessed with several extensive revivals—one in New York, in 1829, two during his residence in Troy, and two during his pastorate at Goshen. He was elected a Director of Princeton Theological Seminary in 1830, and not only has discharged the duties of that office with marked fidelity and acceptableness ever since, but has been honored with the position of President of the Board for several years. Dr. Snodgrass, in addition to his pulpit power, wields a vigorous pen. He has published a small but valuable volume on "Perfectionism," a duodecimo, containing thirteen able lectures on Apostolical Succession, a Sermon on the death of Rev. John M. Mason, D. D., one on Missions, which was preached before the General Assembly, and one on the Triumphs of the Redemption over the Apostasy, which appears in the "Murray Street Discourses." Amidst the infirmities of declining years he is active in doing good, and enjoys very justly the confidence and esteem, not only of his brethren in the ministry, but also of the entire Church to which his life-work has been devoted.

Snodgrass, William T., merchant, was born in Shippensburg, Pa., on September 17th, 1813. He was of Scotch-Irish descent. His father, William

Snodgrass, was an extensive merchant in Cumberland county, and was a man of precision and sterling integrity. At the age of thirteen he entered his father's store, to be initiated into the routine of business, where he learned that systematic and prompt management of business matters which characterized him through life. At fifteen he was left alone in Philadelphia, but, shunning evil associations, he spent his leisure time in study, and for five years it was his custom to devote three hours daily to mental culture. Starting with a capital of a few dollars, and refusing all aid from rich or poor relations, by the power of his own industry, energy and merit, he rose to the highly creditable position which he occupied in the mercantile world. The fine building at the northwest corner of Ninth and Market streets, Philadelphia, is a worthy monument to the ability of a man who carved out his own fortune, and educated to his business forty-nine young men.

Mr. Snodgrass was a member of the Board of Trade in the city in which he so long resided, and was a prominent and useful member of the Alexander Church, and subsequently of the West Arch Street Presbyterian Church. Whilst he was, by birth, training and conviction, a Presbyterian, his religious sentiments were liberal, and he was strongly disposed to fraternize with and aid all evangelical Christians. Exacting as an employer, he placed every young man upon his own merit, but his active sympathy with all that concerned them drew them near to him, and made them feel that in him they had more than a friend. To the world generally, he was a pleasant, courteous, and benevolent gentleman. He departed this life in the Autumn of 1874.

Snowden, Rev. Gilbert Tennent, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. On the 24th of November 1790, he was transferred to the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Cranbury, N. J. His ministry was a short one, but filled with labor and crowned with fruit. He died February 20th, 1797. Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, in preaching his funeral sermon, said, "The best eulogy of Gilbert Tennent Snowden would be a faithful history of himself."

Snowden, Rev. Nathanael Randolph, a graduate of Princeton College in 1787, was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in 1794; for a time was Tutor in Dickinson College, and was settled over the churches of Harrisburg, Paxton and Perry, Pennsylvania, in which he labored about three years, with zeal and success. After resigning these charges, he supplied many congregations, but made no permanent settlement. He died November 3d, 1850.

Snowden, Rev. Samuel Finley, a brother of Gilbert T. Snowden, of the class of 1783, at Princeton College, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 24th, 1791, and ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Princeton, on the 25th of November following. This charge Mr. Snowden resigned April 29th, 1801, on account of ill health. He was afterwards settled successively at Whitesboro, New Hartford, and Sackett's Harbor, in the State of New York. He died suddenly, in May, 1845.

Snyder, Rev. Henry, the son of Charles and Mary Snyder, was born in Stephensburg, Frederick county, Va., December 2d, 1811. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1838; studied theology privately; was licensed by Ohio Presbytery, and, in 1850, was ordained by that Presbytery as an evangelist. In 1841 he was appointed Adjunct Professor of Mathematics in Jefferson College, Pa. In 1843 he was appointed Professor of Mathematics. He resigned in 1850, and in 1851 he was Professor of Latin in Centre College, Ky., where he remained two years. In 1853 he removed to Bridgeton, N. J. The following year he removed to Winchester, Va., and in 1856 he was stated supply to the Church at Amelia Court House, Va. In 1857 he was elected Professor of Mathematics in Hampden-Sidney College, Va., and held the position until 1860. His death occurred February 22d, 1866. Mr. Snyder was well read in English literature, had a clear and logical mind, with a taste for metaphysical thought. He was quick in discernment of the character of others, a remarkable conversationalist, genial in his spirit, equable in his temper and animated by a very simple faith in the Redeemer.

Somerville, Hon. Henderson M., was born in Madison county, Virginia, March 23d, 1837. In the Fall of the same year his father emigrated to Alabama. He graduated at the University of Alabama in 1856, and in Cumberland University Law School, Lebanon, Tenn., 1859. He edited the Memphis Daily Appeal, 1860-62; was Tutor of Mathematics, Latin and Greek, in the University of Alabama, 1862-65, and Professor of Law in the same University, 1873-83. In 1880, he was appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and has distinguished himself by his eminent ability and learning in his profession, and by the clear, forcible and satisfactory character of his decisions.

In 1867 he was ordained and installed a ruling elder in the church at Tuskalooza, of which he had been for some time a member, and served acceptably and usefully in that office until his removal to another congregation in 1883. He was also, for a number of years, an efficient superintendent of the Sabbath school, and has been from its organization a valuable member of the General Assembly's Executive Committee of the Institute for training colored ministers.

Son of God. This title is continually given to the Lord Jesus Christ, and as appropriated by him it is a full proof of his divinity (Luke i, 32; xxii, 70, 71; Rom. i, 4).

The title was applied to Adam, who had no human father (Luke iii, 38). And there is a sense in which other men, as the creatures of God's hand, and still more as received into his reconciled family by adoption, may be called God's sons (Hos. i, 10; John i, 12; Acts vii, 28, 29; Rom. viii, 14; Gal. iii, 26; iv, 5-7; 1 John iii, 1, 2). But it was evidently with a much higher meaning that our Lord is termed "The Son of God." For the Jews rightly judged that by the assumption of this title he laid claim to equality with God, and, regarding it as blasphemy, and a breach of the first commandment, they determined to put him to death (John v, 17, 18; in fact, it was on this charge that ultimately they condemned him. And that it was not in the lower and common sense that Christ claimed God as his Father, is evident from the fact that he did not correct the Jews' opinion; which most unquestionably he would have done, had they been under a mistake in supposing him to have broken the great commandment of the law.

Whitby well observes, in his note on Luke xxii, 70, 71, that the Jews did not expect Messiah to be more than man. The title, therefore, "Son of God," was not recognized by them as appropriate to the Messiah. However clear to us may be the proof deducible from the Old Testament, of the plurality of persons in the unity of the Godhead, the Jews generally did not appreciate their force. And at a time, especially, when they were purged from their former tendencies to idolatry, they maintained, in the strongest way, the unity of the Most High God. Now, it was no offence against the law for any one to proclaim himself the Messiah. The evidences of his claim were to be looked at; and, according as they were trustworthy or not, the claim would be admitted or disallowed; but simply to have made it roused no indignation among his countrymen, although, in case of an individual obnoxious on other grounds, they might make it a ground of accusation before their Gentile rulers, that the claim was an act of treason against the Roman Cæsar (Luke xxiii, 2; John xix, 12). But this was not the charge on which our Lord was arraigned before the high priest, and which the Jewish law made capital. "We have a law," they said, "and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God." It was impossible to deny the reality of the miracles wrought. They were acknowledged by the people, who still doubted whether they were sufficient to establish the truth of His Messiahship (vii, 31; they could not be gainsaid by the very rulers (xi, 47). But then the case was provided for in the law, that, if a sign or a wonder was exhibited by any one who transgressed the fundamental principles of that law, he was to be dealt with as a false prophet (Deut. xiii, 1-5). Hence the keenness of the Jews to convict Jesus of what they supposed a denial of the first great truth of their religion. And with all their admixture of lower motives, we may fairly admit that they believed he was committing a grave crime and deserved the punishment of death. This the words of St. Peter (Acts iii, 17) and of St. Paul (1 Cor. ii, 8) imply. Hence their dissatisfaction on his trial with the false witness urged against him. It did not, if admitted, involve a capital offence. So that the high priest had to put him to the proof (Luke xxii, 70, 71). And in his judges' mind he was convicted by his own words, in open court, of the grossest blasphemy, when he declared, in answer to the adjuration made to him, that he was the Son of God. The whole of this proceeding would be unintelligible, if we did not allow that to Jewish ears this declaration distinctly claimed equality with God. And if we were, for argument's sake, to imagine that in the heat of discussion more was advanced than would, in cooler moments, be maintained, we cannot, for an instant, suppose that on this solemn occasion, on trial before the highest court of the nation, at a crisis on which so much depended, Jesus would let himself be misconceived and condemned to death for an assumption he did not really intend to make. The inference, then, cannot be evaded. Our Lord claimed to be one with the Father in a way in which no mere man could be; and the apostles, in propagating His religion, meant to claim for him this divine pre-eminence (Mark i, 50; John i, 18; Acts, iii, 13, 26; Heb. i, 2; 1 John i, 3). And here was the great mystery of Godliness. He that was the highest stooped to be the lowest, for the salvation of men.

We may hence see the force of the acknowledgments made by the devils whom Jesus cast out; they knew him, we are told, not merely that he was the Messiah, but that he was the Son of God (Matt., viii, 29; Mark ii, 24; Luke iv, 34, 41). Hence, too, the declaration to Peter that such a recognition could not have been made except by the gracious instruction of the Father (Matt. xvi, 16, 17), and the special commendation of Nathanael (John i, 49, 50). It is no sufficient objection that the disciples wavered in their faith; they were the rather likely to waver when they saw one whom they had begun to believe more than human apparently unable to deliver himself from a shameful death. It may be added that the peculiar difficulty of the Jews is thus quite evident when Jesus questioned them, "Whose Son is Christ?" They said at once, "David's." But, when he further enquired, how David then called him Lord, they, from their ignorance of Messiah's divine nature, could not answer (Matt. xxii, 41-46).

Son of Man. A phrase used to signify man generally (Numb. xxiii, 19; Job xxx, 6; xxxv, 8; Ps. viii, 4; cxlv, 3; Heb. ii, 6). It was the ordinary designation of the prophet Ezekiel, when God addressed him (i. g. Ezek. ii, 1, 3, 6, 8). It was also once given to Daniel (Dan. viii, 17). It seems to have been an Aramaic idiom, equivalent to "man," in common use in the region where Ezekiel and Daniel resided. Thus we find it perpetually occurring in the Syriac version; as for example, "The first son of man, Adam, was a living soul;" "The first son of man, earthly, of the earth, the second son of man, the Lord from heaven" (1 Cor. xv, 45, 47). It is, further, the phrase used in that remarkable vision in which Daniel saw One, "the Son of Man," brought to the Ancient of Days, and invested with a sovereignty that should include all nations, and that should never be destroyed (Dan. vii, 13, 14). That this had a Messianic reference cannot be doubted. And therefore, when our Lord so designated himself (Matt. viii, 20; ix, 6, and elsewhere) he announced himself as the Messiah, the Son of God manifested in human form, revealing the mystery of the two natures in one person. The Jews seem fully to have understood what he meant; they saw that he claimed an identity as "Son of man" with the Deity, the "Son of God" (Luke xxii, 69, 70; comp. John xii, 34). Stephen uses this title of Christ (Acts vii, 56); with this exception, in the gospels and apostolic history it is applied to him only by himself.

Soul. That sentient, rational, conscious, accountable part or principle in man which distinguishes his life from mere animal existence. Thus God formed the body of our first parents from the dust of the ground, and then "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen. ii, 7).

There are many curious questions on the nature, origin, powers and mode of existence of the soul, which have been debated with much earnestness by ingenious men. Discussion on these would be out of place in the present work. Neither need the pantheistic notion be dwelt on, that the soul is "a mere attribute of the universal substance and a correlate of extension," or "a vanishing point in the eternal process of the evolution of the absolute." It is enough to say that the pantheistic theory is opposed to our consciousness, because it denies our individual personality, and does not admit the freedom of the will, and, still worse, it is opposed to our moral and religious consciousness, for it denies moral distinctions, or, if it at all recognizes a difference between good and evil, it really ascribes to God all the error and crime under which men suffer. It must be sufficient to say here that such a theory contradicts not only Scripture, but the plain principles of reason.

It is doubted how far the earlier fathers of mankind understood the immortality or separate existence of the soul. Unquestionably, the later revelation disclosed much which had previously been veiled, so that Christ may most properly be said to have "brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. i, 10). But surely the ancients were not in perfect darkness on such a matter. The translation of Enoch, even if there had been no other kind of teaching, must have read thoughtful men a striking lesson (Gen. v, 24). And certainly, if "the sacrifices of the dead" were eaten, some notion must have been entertained of the conscious state of the dead (Ps. cvi, 28).

When the body dies the soul still lives; it has not immediately its final and complete position; for body and soul must be again united, in order that the whole man may have his suitable life. What the Scripture reveals of the separate state of the faithful is very interesting. This is described as "a state of rest, a state of consciously living to God, a state of being with Christ, a state of paradisaical bliss, a state of mutual recognition and of holy fellowship, a state of victory and of assurance of reward, a state of earnest expectation." The condition of those who have lived in ungodliness may be gathered from the awful parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 19-31).

At the Lord's coming all men shall rise again with their bodies, "some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. xii, 2; Matt. xxv, 46). The practical conclusion, and one of the weightiest importance, therefore, is that all care must be exercised, all means used, for "the salvation of the soul" (Matt. xvi, 26).

Southern Presbyterian Church, Foreign Missionary Work of. The foreign missionary work of the Southern Presbyterian Church antedates its own existence as a separate and independent branch of the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ. Its membership co-operated heartily with the general Presbyterian Church in promoting this great cause, from the time that that Church assumed the responsibility of conducting the foreign missionary work upon its own responsibility to the breaking out of the Civil War in 1861.

During this period of co-operation, extending over more than twenty years, Southern Presbyterians were in no respect behind their Northern brethren as to the zeal, energy and liberality with which the common cause was supported. The Church had in her bosom at the time of her separation many sons and daughters who had spent the prime of their lives in this great cause, as well as others who were still engaged in it. She was not a stranger, therefore, to the missionary work nor indifferent to its claims, when called by the providence of God to take a share in it upon her own responsibility.

At the breaking out of the Civil War, in 1861, the author of this sketch, who had been acting as Secretary of Foreign Missions for the General Presbyterian Church for a number of years, returned to his native home in South Carolina, and called upon the churches in that region to undertake the support of the Missions in the Southwestern Indian Territory. They had previously been supported by the joint contributions of the North and the South, but were now, as the results of the war, cut off from all communication with the Northern Board. This call was promptly and heartily responded to, and the work was carried on under the direction of a provisional committee, located in Columbia, S. C., until the meeting of the convention, in Augusta, Ga., in the following Autumn, for the purpose of organizing the Southern Presbyterian Church.

The Executive Committee of Foreign Missions is therefore contemporaneous with the history of the Church itself, though in its practical operations, as has just been shown, it really antedates the origin of the Church. The organization of the missionary work is, in fact, a part of the constitution of the Church itself. The Board of Foreign Missions, as it existed in the former united Church, was entirely rejected, and the whole responsibility of conducting the work was entrusted to an executive committee of eleven persons, which was responsible directly to the General Assembly, and not to any Board.

During the continuance of the war the operations of the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions were necessarily confined to the Southwestern Indian Territory, except that for a few years pecuniary aid was extended to such missionaries from the South as were laboring in the more distant field. The work in the Indian Territory, during the prevalence of the war, was extended to the four principal tribes occupying that territory, viz., the Cherokees, the Creeks, the Choctaws and Chickasaws; in fact, they not only sustained the work that had been previously conducted by the united Church, but enlarged it to a considerable extent. In the Summer of 1867, when the Southern people were still feeling the desolating effects of the war, Rev. Elias B. Inslee, who was a member of the Southern Church, and who had been a missionary in China for a number of years before the war, was sent back as our first representative to that land, to open a new mission. Miss Ronzone, a native of Italy, but residing at the South, a member of one of our Southern churches, was sent to Italy to open a school there in connection with the missionary work of the Waldensian Church. In the Summer of 1868 eight new missionaries were appointed to the missionary work, one of whom was sent to explore Brazil with reference to the establishment of a mission in that part of the world, whilst three newly-ordained missionaries were sent to reinforce the mission at Hangchow, established by Mr. Inslee the year before.

Thus the work went on, until missions were firmly established outside of our own country, at Matamoras, in Mexico; at Ceará, Pernambuco and Campinas, in Brazil; at Milan, in Italy; at Athens; at Volos and Salonica, among the Greeks; and in the three great cities of Hangchow, Soochow and Chinkiang, in the Chinese Empire.

The representatives of the Southern Presbyterian Church are, therefore, preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ to six separate nationalities, and in as many different languages. They occupy, outside of our own country, three principal stations in Mexico, viz.: at Matamoras, Jeminez, and Victoria; three in Brazil, viz.: at Campinas, Pernambuco and Ceará.

one in Milan, Italy; three among the Greeks, viz.: at Athens, Volo and Salonica; three in the Empire of China, viz.: at Hangeow, Soochow and Chinkiang. The whole missionary force employed in the work consists of fifty-two missionary laborers from this country, and fifty-six trained native laborers, making one hundred and eight in all. As many as forty-five individual churches have been organized, and there have been gathered into those churches, as far as can be ascertained, about 1800 native converts, of whom 150 were brought into the fold during the last year.

The educational operations comprise four boarding schools for boys, in which there are 130 pupils; six boarding schools for girls, in which there are 160 pupils; ten day schools with 200 scholars; and four theological training classes, in which there are twelve young men who are being trained for the immediate work of the ministry, making, in all, about 500 native youths who are being trained to help in the missionary work.

Our missionary brethren at most of the stations above mentioned have done important work in the way of translating and circulating religious intelligence among the people by whom they are surrounded, and in this way it is believed that thousands and hundreds of thousands of immortal beings have acquired some knowledge of the Christian salvation.

Sparrow, Patrick J., D. D., was born in Lincoln county, N. C., in 1802. His father dying when he was quite young, he was under the necessity of seeking work away from home to aid in the support of his mother and the other children. His industry and his fondness for books attracted the notice of his employer, who secured for him a place in the classical school of Rev. Samuel Williamson, in the adjoining district in South Carolina. Here he studied for eighteen months. Here ended all the literary instruction he ever received from teachers. He was received under the care of Bethel Presbytery, and began to teach, and to study privately for a few years. In 1826 he was licensed by his Presbytery, and transferred to Concord Presbytery, N. C., where he undertook the charge of several churches, successively, in his native county, and at the same time teaching in schools. In 1831 he took charge of the Presbyterian Church, in Salisbury, N. C., and preached with great acceptance for two years. In 1836, in conjunction with Rev. R. H. Morrison, he undertook to raise funds for the endowment of Davidson College, and meeting with eminent success, he was chosen the first Professor of Languages, in the infant college, and began his labors there in 1837. After two years' labor there, he became pastor, in 1841, of the College Church, at Hampden-Sidney, Va. A little later he became President of Hampden-Sidney College. Here he entered, with great ardor, into a fuller course of studies, spending whole nights with his books, and thus making up for the deficiencies of his early training. In 1847, he chose to resign the presidency, in consequence of the disordered state of the college. He removed to Alabama in 1848, and after preaching and teaching in several places, he died at Cahaba, Ala., November 10th, 1867. Dr. Sparrow possessed splendid natural talents, with great energy and vast capacity for labor, and courage to undertake the most difficult task and achieve success. While at Hampden-Sidney, in his pining days, he not only preached to a congregation made up of professors and students, governed the college and taught his classes, but also wrote out, in a few months, a full course of lectures on Moral Philosophy. He was always ready to preach, and few could enchain attention or sway an audience as he could.

The last years of his life were spent in a struggle with that fell destroyer, consumption. In his last illness he suffered great pain, but expressed the desire, like Newton, "to thank God for all, but mostly for the severe."

Spear, Samuel T., D. D., was born at Ballston Spa, N. Y., March 4th, 1812. He graduated at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, and studied theology with the Rev. Dr. Bemis, of Troy. He was ordained to the ministry in 1835, and the same year accepted the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of Lansingburg. In 1843 he was settled as pastor of the South Presbyterian Church Brooklyn, where he remained about twenty-seven years. Subsequently he became one of the editors of the Independent.

Dr. Spear is courteous in his manners and affable in conversation, and yet is characterized by a measure of reserve. He never for a moment lays aside his clerical character, and in all his social life exhibits much seriousness and reflection. No one can doubt his eminent piety, his earnest desire to be practically useful in his sphere, and his conscientiousness of word and deed. Always calm, thoughtful and wise, he is a safe guide to all who seek his counsel, and he is ever found changeless in principle and faithful to duty. His mind is deeply philosophical. He is a reader of large research, and altogether a most laborious student. As a writer, he is marked by vigor, originality and independence. Besides frequent contributions to Reviews, he has published a bound volume, entitled "Family Power," and a number of valuable sermons, among which are, "Conquest of the World by Faith," "The Law of Grace," "Christ in the Believer," "Religious Conversation," "The Future of Christianity," "The Retributive Power of Memory," etc., etc., etc.

Speece, Conrad, D. D. This name is well worthy a place among those whom the good would love to remember. "He who bore it," says one who knew him intimately, "was a true son of Virginia, was born, lived, and died in her bosom. He was great among the greatest of her preachers, few proclaiming the gospel more abundantly, or more powerfully. A man, too, of acknowledged genius and learning, of sincere piety, of warm friendships, of attractive social qualities, altogether making him the life of every company he entered."

Dr. Speer was born in New London, Bedford county, Va., November 7th, 1776; entered a grammar school near that place, then became a student of the Academy of Liberty Hall, since changed to Washington College. His teacher in theology was the Rev. William Graham. In the Spring of 1799, he became a Tutor in Hampden-Sidney College, and on April 9th, 1801, was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Hanover. In the Autumn of this year he was appointed as a kind of general missionary, in which character his labors were spread over a large part of Eastern Virginia, as well as along the extent of the great valley west of the Blue Ridge. In February, 1803, he commenced preaching to a church in Montgomery county, Md., called "Captain John," and was installed its pastor, April 22d, 1804, but impaired health led to the resignation of this relation in April, 1805. During 1806, he preached in the counties of Goochland and Fluvanna, and then, until 1812, in the counties of Powhatan and Cumberland, Va. In October, 1813, he was installed pastor of Augusta Church, to which he had received a unanimous call. Here was the field of his labors for about twenty-two years, and until his death, which occurred February 17th, 1836. In the final hour he expressed to all around him his entire confidence in the Saviour.

Dr. Speer was a sincere and good-hearted Christian, void of enthusiasm, and hence, not of the class called revival preachers. He may be said to have had a place among the more eminent preachers of his day. As a pastor, he was faithful and laborious. As a ruler in the Church of God, his services were of great value. He was specially active in promoting the benevolent operations of the day. The most considerable production of his pen is "The Mountaineer," a small volume, containing fifty-six papers, written in 1813-1816, and after the manner of "The Spectator." It is highly creditable to the writer, and some of the pieces are of great excellence. He also published a number of sermons, one of which was preached by appointment before the General Assembly, May 21st, 1810.

Speer, Rev. William, was born within the bounds of Upper Marsh Creek Church, in what is now Adams County, Pa. He graduated at Carlisle, at the age of twenty-four, in 1788, and remained there until 1791, in the only theological class taught by Dr. Nisbet, with whom he was a favorite student. His piety was of an ardent and self-denying type, and his style of preaching most searching and solemn. He was pastor of the Falling Spring Church, Chambersburg, Pa., from 1794 to 1797.

Being filled with a missionary spirit, he went with some excellent families to Chillicothe, the seat of the new government of the Northwest Territory, and thus became the first chaplain of the infant State of Ohio. Domestic afflictions compelled him to return to Pennsylvania. From 1802 till his death, in 1829, his life was spent in the united congregations of Greensburg and Unity. He was a friend of missions, and an earnest and effective advocate of sound and thorough education. For many years he was a Trustee of Washington College, and was the first Vice-President of the Board of Directors of the Theological Seminary at Allegheny. Mr. Speer was the first man to move in ecclesiastical opposition to the errors and moral evils of Free Masonry, and roused the Synod to adopt an able paper on the subject, in 1820. He was the grandfather of the Rev. W. Speer, D. D., for many years a foreign missionary, and for some time Secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church.

Speer, William, D. D., was brought up in Pittsburg, Pa., having been born in the adjoining county, Westmoreland, April 24th, 1822. He graduated at Kenyon College, Ohio, in 1840, after which he studied medicine till 1843. He studied theology at Allegheny Seminary, and was licensed to preach on April 21st, 1846. He obeyed an urgent call from the Board of Foreign Missions to go to Canton, China, and sailed for that port, July 20th, 1846. After learning the language and performing much arduous labor, his wife and child became victims to the climate, and his own health so suffered that, his physicians pronouncing it impossible for him to be cured in that tropical climate, he returned to the United States, in 1850. The Board of Education soon engaged his services in representing that cause in Western Pennsylvania, which he did with much success. When, in the years 1851-52, the Chinese from Canton province began to pour into California by thousands, in search of its gold, the Board of Missions, in the latter year, again called upon him to go to preach to them Christ in their own language. In this position he was eminently active and useful for several years. Exhausted in health, he spent eight years in efforts to recruit, which it pleased God to bless, and also in active missionary labor, partly in the Gulf States of the South, but chiefly in Wisconsin and Minnesota. In 1865 the Board of Education called him to the position of Corresponding Secretary, and at the reconstitution of the Board, by the union of it to the "Permanent Committee on Education," which was the organ of the late New School branch of the Church, he was unanimously elected to the same office under the reunited Church. Dr. Speer has written largely for the periodical press. He has also published a number of valuable volumes. He is a genial gentleman, an earnest Christian, and a forcible and popular writer.

Spencer, Rev. Elihu, D. D., was born at East Haddam, Conn., February 12th, 1721; commenced a course of literary study with a view to the gospel ministry, in March, 1740, and graduated at Yale College in September, 1746. After his graduation, on the recommendation of such men as David Brainerd and Jonathan Edwards, he undertook a mission among the Indians of the Six Nations, and with a special view to this mission, studied the language of the Indian tribes, and was ordained to the work of the ministry by an ordaining council in Boston, September, 1748. The leadings of Providence, however, appear to have been such as prevented his accomplishing what he and his friends had anticipated in this department of evangelical labor.

Mr. Spencer was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Elizabethtown, N. J., February 7th, 1750, in which relation he continued about six years. In 1752 he was elected one of the corporate guardians of the College of New Jersey, then temporarily placed at Newark, and held this office as long as he lived. In 1756 he became pastor of the Church at Jamaica, L. I., where he remained, acceptably and usefully, two years or more, when, although the congregation gave a reluctant consent to his leaving them, he accepted an appointment of Governor DeLancey, of New York, to the chaplaincy of the New York troops, then about to march and take their place in the French War, still raging. When his services as chaplain were closed, he labored several years in the contiguous congregations of Shrewsbury, Middletown Point, Shark River and Amboy, N. J. In the year 1761, the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, having reason to believe that a number of their congregations in the Southern parts of our country, and especially in North Carolina, were in an unformed and irregular state, sent Mr. Spencer and Rev. Alexander McWhorter, of Newark, N. J., to inform, counsel and guide them aright, and prepare them for a more orderly and edifying organization. This arduous service they rendered with much skill and efficiency.

Subsequently Mr. Spencer was pastor of the congregation of St. George's, in Delaware, for five years, greatly to the acceptance and benefit of the congregation. In October, 1769, he became pastor of the Church in Trenton, N. J., and continued so until his death, greatly popular, useful and beloved. In 1775, at the request of the Provincial Congress of that colony, he again visited North Carolina, accompanied by Dr. McWhorter, and their service to the cause of independence was very valuable in the influence they exerted upon several important settlements in that region which were in favor of the British Government.

Dr. Spencer's tomb stands in the cemetery connected with the church in Trenton and bears the following inscription:

"Beneath this stone lies the body of the Rev. Elihu Spencer, D. D., pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Trenton, and one of the Trustees of the College of New Jersey, who departed this life on the 27th of December, 1781, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Possessed of fine genius, of great vivacity, of eminent, active piety, his merits as a minister and a man stand above the reach of flattery. Having long edified the Church by his talents and example, and finished his course with joy, he fell asleep, full of faith and waiting for the hope of all saints."

Spencer, Ichabod Smith, D. D., was born in Suffield, Conn., February 23d, 1798. He graduated at Union College in 1822, with a high reputation for both talents and scholarship, took charge of the grammar school in Schenectady for three years, during which he acquired great distinction as a teacher, and then engaged in the study of theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Andrew Yates, Professor of Moral Philosophy in Union College. In 1825 he was chosen Principal of the Academy in Canandaigua, N. Y., which he raised to a commanding position among the primary educational institutions of the State. Licensed to preach, November 1826, by the Presbytery of Geneva, he continued his connection with the academy nearly two years after this, preaching frequently on the Sabbath in the neighboring pulpits, and devoting what time he could spare from his other engagements, to theological study.

In September, 1828, he was installed over the Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass., as colleague pastor with the Rev. Solomon Williams. Here he labored with remarkable success three years and a half. In March, 1832, he became pastor of a Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn, N. Y., which was his last field of ministerial labor. This Church, which was in its infancy when he took charge of it, grew under his ministrations, into one of the most prosperous and efficient churches in the Presbyterian Denomination. In 1836, he accepted the Professorship Extraordinary of Biblical History in the Union Theological Seminary in the city of New York, and retained it for about four years. He was also one of the founders and original directors of that Institution. He died, November 23d, 1851, passing away in perfect peace, and in the joyful hope of a blessed immortality.

Dr. Spencer excelled as a preacher. There was a large commingling of the "Son of Consolation" with the "Son of Thunder" in his character. Whilst he was often tender to weeping, he was fearless in his rebuke of wickedness. In his style and manner of preaching he was manly, strong, and energetic, rather than rhetorical. As a pastor, he was eminently faithful, and his life was peculiarly exemplary. His chief publications were: "A Pastor's Sketches, or Conversations with Anxious Inquirers respecting the Way of Salvation," and, "A Pastor's Sketches, Second Series," which have had a wide circulation at home and abroad.

Spencer, Rev. William Henry, was born in Madison, Conn., October 13th, 1813; graduated from the University of New York; studied theology at Auburn Seminary, and was ordained pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Utica, N. Y., in 1815, which he continued to be until 1850. He was subsequently pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Milwaukee, Wis., 1850-4; Secretary of the Assembly's Committee of Publication, Philadelphia, 1855-6; pastor at Rock Island, Ill., 1857-8, and of Westminster Church, Chicago, Ill., 1859-61. He was Trustee of Auburn Theological Seminary, 1849-51. He died at Chicago, February 17th, 1861.

Spilman, Rev. Benjamin F., the son of Benjamin and Nancy (Lice) Spilman, was born in Garrard county, Kentucky, August 17th, 1796. His parents were from Virginia, and emigrated to Kentucky among the early pioneers. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1822, and studied theology with Rev.

REV. BENJAMIN F. SPILMAN.

Dr. G. Wilson, of Chillicothe, Ohio. He was licensed by Chillicothe Presbytery, in 1823; ordained and installed, by Muhlenburgh Presbytery, pastor of Sharon Church, Ill., in 1824. Here he labored, dividing his time among the counties bordering on the Ohio and Wabash rivers, for two years, when he became an itinerant missionary in Middle and Southern Illinois. In 1826 he organized the Church at Shawneetown, Ill., and, having no house of worship, they occupied warehouses and private dwellings until 1832, when the "Old Log" Church was erected; this was followed, in 1842, by a neat brick church. Having labored for seventeen years as an itinerant, his health began to give way, and the people at Shawneetown prevailed upon him to settle and become their pastor, which he did, being installed by Kaskaskia Presbytery, in April, 1842. In 1844 he became pastor of Chester Church, where he remained until 1851; he also labored at Edwardsville, whence his old congregation at Shawneetown called him back, and he remained with them till his death, which took place May 3d, 1859. Mr. Spilman was a hard-working missionary; for over thirty years he labored faithfully; possessing a robust constitution, a warm heart and a holy zeal in the cause of Christ, he was never idle and seldom sick; his influence for good will long be felt in the southern part of Illinois.

Spining, George Lawrence, D. D., the son of George B. and Elizabeth (Monfort) Spining, was born in Dayton, O., May 15th, 1810. His classical course was taken at Hanover College, Wabash College and Highland University, the latter conferring on him the honorary titles of Master of Arts and Doctor of Divinity. He pursued his theological studies at the Seminary of the Northwest (Chicago). He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Chicago, in 1868, and was ordained and installed by the same Presbytery, in 1869, over the Church at Hebron, Ill. He spent eight years of his ministry as pastor of the First Church at Hannibal, Mo., and the First Church at Kalamazoo, Mich. He was called to the pastorate of the Woodland Avenue Church, Cleveland, O., in December, 1880, and accepted, as the impaired health of his family demanded a change of climate. Here he still continues. His present charge, with 650 members and 1600 children, presents a promising field for his pulpit power and pastoral fidelity.

Dr. Spining's ministry (from a human judgment) has thus far been eminently successful. His churches have been thoroughly organized. He seems to possess the secret of developing the activities and working forces of his church. He has few equals in the pulpit. His style of preaching is Scriptural and emotional, rather than philosophical or intellectual, and yet, on special occasions, he exhibits reserve forces, indicating great intellectual power. He has personal magnetism, grace of diction, and special gifts as an orator. He was a member of the General Assembly at Saratoga, N. Y., in 1883.

Spotswood, John Boswell, D. D., is a native of Virginia. He was born in Dinwiddie county, February 8th, 1808. He graduated at Amherst College, in 1828, after which he was for a time a teacher. He studied theology at the Union Seminary, Va., and Princeton Seminary, N. J. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of East Hanover, October 19th, 1833. He was stated supply at Sussex, Va., 1834, pastor, 1835-40; stated supply at Mt. Paran and Elliott's Mills, Md., 1840-2; and since 1842 has been pastor of the church at New Castle, Del. Dr. Spotswood's long pastorate at New Castle has been attended with the Divine blessing. He is a gentleman of sterling worth. As a preacher, he is instructive and solemn, and as a pastor, very attentive to his people, by whom, as well as by the community, he is held in high regard for personal and professional excellence.

Sprague, William Buel, D.D., LL. D., was born in Andover, Tolland county, Conn., October 16th, 1795. He graduated at Yale College in 1815; in 1816 entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after studying there over two years, was licensed to preach by the Association of Ministers in the county of Tolland, August 29th, 1818. As pastor of the Congregational Church of West Springfield, Mass., he labored with great assiduity and success from August 25th, 1819, until July 21st, 1829, when he accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church in Albany, N. Y., over which he was installed August 26th, 1829. In Albany he had a pastorate of forty years' duration, remarkable for the extraordinary steadfastness and warmth of attachment existing through all that protracted period between himself and his large and intelligent congregation, and even more remarkable for the vast and varied labors performed by him. He has been well and truly described as "an illustrious man, a cultivated, elegant, voluminous, useful and popular preacher; an indefatigable and successful pastor; an unselfish and devoted friend; loving, genial, pure, noble; an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile; one of the most child-like, unsophisticated and charitable of men."

While Dr. Sprague never relaxed his pulpit and pastoral duties, his added literary labors were prodigious, and their fruits exceedingly great. He preached nearly two hundred sermons on special public occasions, the most of which were published. He also produced a large number of biographies and other volumes on practical religious subjects. But the great literary work of his life was his "Annals of the American Pulpit," undertaken when he was fifty-seven years old, and finished in ten large octavo volumes.

On December 20th, 1869, Dr. Sprague was released, at his own request, from his pastoral charge in Albany, and retired to Flushing, L. I., where he passed his later years, which were a serene and beautiful evening to his industrious, useful and eminent life. Here he enjoyed the sunshine of the divine favor, and looked upon the approach of death with a strong and placid faith. He gently and peacefully passed away, May 7th, 1876, and his remains were taken to Albany for interment, the funeral services being held in the church of which he had been so long the beloved and honored pastor.

Sprecher, Samuel P., D. D., was born October 7th, 1839, in Harrisburg, Pa. He is of Lutheran parentage, and came from a family of ministers and professors through several generations. He was educated at Wittenberg College and Seminary, and was ordained in the Lutheran Church, in the year 1860.

SAMUEL P. SPRECHER, D. D.

In the year 1872 he changed his ecclesiastical relations, succeeding Dr. P. H. Fowler as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Utica, N. Y. In the year 1879 he succeeded Dr. James Eells as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Oakland, Cal. In December, 1882, he accepted a call to the pastorate of Calvary Presbyterian Church of San Francisco, and holds that position at the present time.

Dr. Sprecher is one of the most successful and popular of the living preachers of the Presbyterian Church. In the prime of manhood, with unimpaired physical health and energy, a mind expansive and vigorous, and a heart warm and loving, he lives to labor and labors to succeed. The marked features of his pulpit performances are a presentation of the subject in propositions which cover the ground without surplusage, a logical fairness in argument which disarms opposition and commands approval, and the use of illustrations which, for aptness and force, finish the matter and leave no doubt as to the correctness of the conclusions. Preaching without notes, he is free to search the countenances of his hearers with his kind and earnest eye, and has the eyes of all fastened upon him in return. With a voice full, clear and sympathetic, a delivery both deliberate and impassioned, an action graceful and appropriate, it is difficult to say what element is wanting to constitute Dr. Sprecher a model preacher. In private intercourse cheerful and entertaining, manifesting a personal interest in the individual members of his flock, and in all things acting wisely, he is equally successful as a pastor.

Spring, Gardiner, D.D., was the son of the Rev. Samuel Spring, D.D., and was born in Newburyport.

GARDINER SPRING, D. D.

Mass., February 24th, 1785. He graduated at Yale College, in 1805. He spent fifteen months as a classical and mathematical teacher, on the island of Bermuda, at the same time pursuing the study of law. For a short time he practiced law in New Haven, Conn. Determining to enter the ministry, he entered Andover Theological Seminary, and after eight months' study he was licensed to preach the gospel. On the 8th of August, 1810, he was installed pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church in the city of New York. There he continued for more than half a century, and by his pulpit ability, prudence, diligence and piety, always drew around him a wealthy, intelligent and devoted people, who labored with him in the gospel.

During his long and useful pastorate he continually used the press as an auxiliary to the preaching of the gospel. Among the more important works which he published are: the "Life of Samuel J. Mills" (1820); "The Sabbath a Blessing to Man;" "Internal Evidences of Inspiration" (1826); a "Dissertation on the Means of Regeneration" (1827); "Fragments from the Study of a Pastor," "The Obligations of the World to the Bible," "The Attractions of the Cross," "The Bible not of Man," "The Power of the Pulpit," "The Mercy-Seat," "The Contrast" (1855); "The Mission of Sorrow" (1862); and "Pulpit Ministrations" (1864). Dr. Spring was a graceful and vigorous writer, and some of his works, beside their popularity at home, were republished abroad.

Springer, Rev. John, was a native of Delaware. After graduating at Princeton College, in 1775, he acted as Tutor in the College, and in the early part of the Revolution was a Tutor in Hampden-Sidney College, Va. When Virginia became the seat of war, he removed to North Carolina and opened an academy, and from thence to South Carolina, where he taught, with distinguished success, at White Hall and Cambridge. On the 18th of October, 1788, he was licensed by Orange Presbytery, and supplied various churches until July 21st, 1790, when he was ordained by the Presbytery of South Carolina, and installed pastor of a church at Washington, Ga., the services taking place under the shade of a tall tree, there being no church edifice. Mr. Springer was the first Presbyterian minister ordained South of the Savannah river, and the first minister in the upper part of Georgia. Besides the charge of his church, he taught an academy. Mr. Springer was an attractive preacher, and delivered his discourses, which were unwritten, with uncommon ease and eloquence. He died September 30th, 1798.

Springfield (Ill.) First Presbyterian Church, was organized on the 30th of January, 1828, by the Rev. John M. Ellis, under the name of "Sangamon," with the following members: Mrs. Elizabeth H. Smith (widow of the Rev. John Blair Smith), in whose room the church was organized, John Moore, James White, Elijah Scott, John N. Moore, Samuel Reid, William Proctor, Andrew Moore, Josiah Skillman, Elizabeth Moore, Mary Moore, Margaret Moore, Catharine Moore, Jane Reid, Phoebe Moore, Jane Scott, Nancy R. Humphries, Ann Hles and Olive Slayton. Elders: John Moore, Samuel Reid, Isaiah Stillman, and John N. Moore.

The church thus organized was without a pastor or house of worship. The first effort was to secure a minister, and application was made immediately to the Home Missionary Society for assistance in this direction. The Society sent to the infant church the Rev. John G. Bergen, of the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, N. J. Mr. Bergen arrived about the middle of December, 1828. The church then had twenty-eight names on the roll of communicants. Services were held in the school-house, and alternated between Springfield and Indian Point. The bounds of the congregation included all the territory within a radius of twenty miles, some members attending from Irish Grove. After arriving in Springfield, and making the acquaintance of the community, Mr. Bergen announced his intention to stay, to labor and die with this people, and his first exhortation was, "Let us arise and build." The Church responded to the call, and resolved at once to undertake the building of a Presbyterian meeting-house. Dr. John Todd, Dr. Gershon Jayne, Elijah Slater, Washington Hes, David S. Taylor, John B. Moffit and Samuel Reid were appointed trustees. Mr. Bergen and Dr. Jayne canvassed the community. The result was a subscription of twelve hundred dollars. Several hundreds were added from abroad. It was determined to build of brick. A mason, who was also a brick-maker, was imported from Belleville. The house was finished and dedicated on the third Sabbath of February, 1831. It was the first brick church erected in Illinois. From this time the church rapidly increased. In 1834 an interesting revival occurred and over thirty were added.

Owing to the great distance from Springfield of those members living on Indian Creek and at Irish Grove settlement, a colony of thirty-two persons was dismissed in May, 1832, and organized, by Mr. Bergen, into the Church of "North Sangamon." In 1833 another church was formed at Sugar Creek, and still another at Lick Creek. In 1834 Farmington Church was formed. In May, 1835, thirty members were dismissed to form the Second Presbyterian Church of Springfield. In the same year a church was organized at Irish Grove.

Thus, during the first six years of his ministry, Mr. Bergen organized six churches in territory originally occupied by the mother church. November 25th, 1835, Mr. Bergen was installed pastor, on a salary of four hundred dollars, which was increased, in 1837, to six hundred. By 1840 the necessity of a larger church edifice became apparent. The ladies first moved, and raised one thousand dollars, which the gentlemen of the congregation increased to fifteen thousand. The corner-stone was laid on the corner of Third and Washington streets, May 23d, 1842, and the building dedicated, November 9th, 1843. In 1848 another revival of considerable interest ensued. In January, 1849, forty persons were dismissed and organized into the "Third Presbyterian Church of Springfield." After laboring for twenty years, and spending much time in missionary work, Mr. Bergen resigned the pastorate.

His successor was the Rev. James Smith, D. D., of Shelbyville, Ky., who was installed April 11th, 1849, and remained until December 17th, 1856. His successor was the Rev. John H. Brown, who was installed in January, 1857. His labors here were abundant and successful. There was no marked revival during his pastorate, but a steady, healthful growth. He remained until June, 1861. The next pastor was the Rev. Frederick H. Wines. He was installed in September, 1863, and resigned in June, 1869. The largest revival which the Church has experienced was under his ministry, in connection with the labors of Mr. Hammond, in 1866. Seventy persons were admitted at one communion, on profession. He resigned in 1869. The present pastor, the Rev. James A. Reed, D. D., was installed in February, 1870. He is greatly esteemed by his people, and under his ministry the church has enjoyed a large degree of prosperity. Steps were about to be taken for the erection of a new edifice, when the Third Church offered to dispose of their building, which was heavily encumbered with debt. The offer was accepted, and the Third Church transferred their edifice to the First. The organization, however, of the Third Church still continues.

Sproat, James, D. D., was a native of Scituate, Mass. He was born April 11th, 1722. He graduated at Yale College. Being converted under a sermon of Gilbert Tement, he resolved to enter the ministry. His first pastoral charge was the Congregational Church, of Guilford, Conn., where he remained for twenty-five years. On the decease of Gilbert Tement, he was called to succeed him in the Second Church, of Philadelphia, at the close of the year 1768. Here he remained till his death, October 1st, 1793, in the seventy-second year of his age. He fell a victim to the yellow fever, which was then desolating Philadelphia, and he would not desert his post.

Dr. Sproat was a ripe scholar, a well-read divine and an amiable man. He was highly esteemed in the judicatories of the Church as a weighty counselor, and his name is found on the most important committees. His only publication was a "Sermon on the Death of Whitefield." He was the last clergyman who appeared in public with cocked hat and wig.

Sprole, William Thomas, D. D., was born in Baltimore, Md. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Baltimore, March 27th, 1831, after studying theology at Princeton. In the course of his ministry he filled a number of prominent places, in which he displayed fitness for his work and an earnest zeal for the glory of the Master. He was pastor of the First German Reformed Church in Philadelphia, from 1832 to 1836, passing from that post to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa. He preached to the First Church, Washington, D. C., in 1843. He was Chaplain and Professor at West Point, N. Y., 1846-56. His pastorate in Newburgh, N. Y., 1856-72, was his last regular pastorate, but in the closing years of his life he served churches in Detroit and its vicinity very acceptably. He died in that city, June 9th, 1883. He had reached the seventy-fifth year of his age at the time of his death, and throughout his long life had been an honored and useful minister of Christ.

Sprunt, J. M., D. D., was born on the 14th of January, 1818, at Perth, Scotland, and in 1824, with his brother, Alexander, was sent to Edinburgh, where they obtained a liberal education. In 1835 he sailed for the West Indies, where he spent four years in mercantile engagements. In 1839 he arrived at Wilmington, N. C., and opened a classical school at Hallsville, in Duplin county, January, 1840; continued teaching in Duplin and Onslow counties for five years, when he became principal of Grove Academy, at Kenansville. In 1860 he was elected Principal of Kenansville Female Institute. In 1860 he was licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery to preach the gospel, and soon after was ordained pastor of Grove Church, which, with Union Church, in the same county, he has served (except with a short interval of absence on duty) continuously until the present time.

The personal piety of Dr. Sprunt, never obtrusive, is definite and always manifest. In it there is nothing of the rush of the torrent, but much of the placid beauty of the unruffled lake. As a religious teacher, in taste and habits, he is strictly conservative—looking with no toleration on any modification of the doctrines of the Westminster Confession, and scrupulously avoiding all new methods. As a preacher, he has few superiors. Fine natural ability, a liberal and accurate scholarship, together with a persuasive manner and a most mellifluous voice, make him one of the most attractive preachers in the Synod of North Carolina.

Dr. Sprunt is eminently fitted for distinguished position, and would have filled it long since, had he yielded to the wishes of others. But a constitutional aversion to notoriety, together with an unusual attachment to the people of his charge, have furnished a prompt negative to all inducements to change his pastoral relations. With his congregations at Kenansville and Faison was done his first work in the ministry, and with them, most probably, he will do his last and best work.

Squier, Miles Powell, D. D., was born in Cornwall, Vt., May 4th, 1792; graduated with honor at Middlebury College in 1811; finished his theological course at Andover in 1814, and was licensed that year by a Congregational Association. After being, for a season, stated supply at Oxford, Mass., and Vergennes, Vt., he became pastor, May 3d, 1816, of the First Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y. He was the first pastor, and the relation existed till 1824. In 1826 he accepted the Secretaryship of the Western agency of the American Home Missionary Society at Geneva, N. Y., and held this position eight years. After 1833 his time was occupied in superintending the affairs of the Geneva Lyceum, which he had founded, and, as health permitted, he supplied the churches at Junius, Newark, Castleton and West Fayette, N. Y., and the winter of 1839-40 in Philadelphia, Pa., where he took charge of a Presbyterian church in that city. He subsequently spent some time in New York city; for one year had charge of a Presbyterian church in New Bennington, Vt., and in 1851 entered upon his duties as Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy in the College at Beloit, Wis. He entered into rest June 22d, 1866.

Dr. Squier was frequently a contributor to the periodical press, and the author of several works on which he bestowed his maturest thoughts. He was one of the eminent ministers of our Church. The cast of his mind was not polemical; hence he never prolonged a controversy needlessly. He was too profound a thinker for that. What is truth? seemed to be an ever-present interrogatory, and in his researches amid the hidden mysteries of thought, he would find a basis for many peculiar and beautiful theories. He was fearless in expressing his opinions, and enjoyed the same style on the part of those who differed from him. His geniality secured him the friendship of all those with whom he came in contact.

Stacey, James, D. D., was born of pious parents, in Liberty county, Georgia, June 2d, 1830. He graduated at Oglethorpe College, Georgia, in 1849, sharing the first honor with a fellow classmate. He studied theology in Columbia, S. C., where he graduated in 1852. He was licensed the same year by Georgia Presbytery, and ordained by the same body the following year. After preaching as supply for four years at different places he removed to Newman, Ga., where he has been for twenty-six and a half years, since 1857. He has been Stated Clerk of the Presbytery to which he belongs, Atlanta, since 1866, and Stated Clerk of the Synod of Georgia, since 1876, succeeding the venerable John S. Wilson, D. D., in that office.

Dr. Stacey is a man of sterling integrity and irreproachable purity of life. He is so modest and retiring in his disposition, that to be fully appreciated he must be well known. To know him well, is to admire, esteem, honor and love him. As a presbyter, he is always polite, punctual, and well posted in the polity of his Church. As a writer, he is terse, lucid and logical. As a pastor, diligent, courteous and sympathetic. Being a close student, deep and fervent thinker and conscientious under-shepherd, his sermons are not only plain and polished, but deeply impressive and full of soul-saving instruction. He possesses that rich and rare combination of gifts and graces which make men prominent among their fellow-men. Dr. Stacey is the author of a small volume entitled "Water Baptism," which is full of pith, point and power, and the two hundred dollar prize "Essay on the Christian Sabbath."

Stanley, Rev. Frederick J., was born in Nashville, Tenn., December 27th, 1848. He graduated at Wabash College in June, 1873, bearing the second honor from the literary society with which he was connected as debater and orator. He graduated at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., in 1876, after which he spent a few months as Home Missionary, at Bloomington, Minn. For two years and four months he was pastor of the churches at Jordan and Belle Plain, Minn. In the Fall of 1879 he became pastor of the Church at Golden, Col., where he remained until called to the Church at Leadville, Col., in 1881. Here he is still serving as pastor, and under his ministrations the church has become united, and the results of his labors shown by the increased membership; enlarged church and full attendance, are witnesses of his successful work. In his intercourse with the masses he is winning and courteous. He is full of zeal, seizing every opportunity to advance the Master's kingdom. His sermons are practical, intended to develop a higher standard of Christian life and service.

Stanton, Rev. Benjamin Franklin, a son of Nathan and Anna Stanton, was born at Stonington, Conn., February 12th, 1789. He graduated at Union College, an excellent scholar, in 1811; commenced the study of law, but abandoned it in favor of the ministry; late in 1812, entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in April, 1815. He spent a short time in missionary labor in the western part of the State of New York, and was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hudson, where he continued a highly respectable and useful minister until the resignation of his charge, on account of ill health, April 20th, 1821. After leaving Hudson, he spent eighteen months in traveling in the Southern States, for the benefit of his health. In 1825, he became pastor of the Congregational Church, in Bethlem, Conn., resigning the charge in 1829. After this he supplied Dr. Wilson's church, in Philadelphia, for some time, and then went to Bridgeport, Conn., where he preached as a stated supply for a few months. Declining a call to the church at that place, he accepted one to the Hanover Church, Va., to which he preached, acting most of the time as its pastor, from May, 1829, until 1842. After the death of the Rev. Dr. John H. Rice, Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, he delivered a course of lectures on Theology, to the students of the Seminary, in Dr. Rice's place, and afterwards, during a vacancy in the presidency of Hampden-Sidney College, occasioned by the death of Mr. Cushing, he delivered lectures to the Senior Class in the college. After declining a call to the Presbyterian Church at Tuscaloosa, Ala., he returned to the North, and died, November 18th, 1843. Mr. Stanton was distinguished as a belles-lettres scholar, and a writer. Quiet and retiring in his study and social intercourse, in the pulpit he was always earnest, emphatic and courageous, not unfrequently impassioned and vehement, as often, perhaps, "a son of thunder" as "a son of consolation." He was always held in high esteem by his brethren in the ministry, wherever he resided. All felt that he had a commanding intellect and an honest purpose to serve his Master.

Stanton, Rev. Horace C., son of Professor Benjamin Stanton, of the Chair of Latin Language and Literature and Political Economy, Union College, N. Y., was born April 1st, 1849. He graduated at Union College in 1867, and was admitted to the Bar in 1870. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by Albany Presbytery, in June, 1874. He was stated supply at Batchellerville, N. Y., 1873-6. In November, 1876, he took charge of the Third Church, Albany, N. Y. His ministry has been attended by repeated powerful outpourings of the Holy Spirit. Mr. Stanton is a gentleman of great industry, perseverance, and absorbing love for scholastic pursuits, but above all, fond of studying the Scriptures. He is a ready debater, an active ecclesiastic, faithful and assiduous in devotion to his charge, and very careful and thorough in his preparations for the pulpit.

Stanton, Robert Livingston, D. D., is a native of Connecticut. He was born at Griswold, March 28th, 1810. He graduated at the Literary Department of Lane, in 1834, and was a student in the Theological Department of that Institution 1834-36. He was ordained, December, 1839 (Mississippi Presbytery); Blue Ridge, Miss., 1839-41; Woodville, 1841-3; New Orleans, La., 1843-51. From 1851 to 1854 he was President of Oakland College, Miss.; pastor at Chillicothe, Ohio, 1855-62; Professor of Pastoral Theology and Homiletics in the Danville Theological Seminary, 1862-66; President of Miami University, 1866-71; editor in New York city, 1871-2; editor at Cincinnati (Herald and Presbyterian), 1872-8, and now resides in Washington city. He received the degree of D. D. from the College of New Jersey and Washington College, Va., in 1852. Dr. Stanton takes high rank as a scholar and a writer. His life has been a busy and useful one. In 1866 he was honored with the Moderatorship of the General Assembly at St. Louis, Mo.

Staples, Rev. Moses Wilmington, like our most useful men in the State, is a self-made man. Born in Ulster county, N. Y., in 1827; left an orphan at fourteen. Working on a farm for a livelihood, studying nights; teaching a common school at sixteen, taking lessons in Latin and Greek of the Principal of an Academy, and reciting at 5 A.M. and 10 P.M., he painfully worked his way to usefulness. When converted, at fourteen, he began at once labor for Christ, establishing and conducting successfully, for a year, a prayer-meeting for boys. He pursued his studies at Union College and Madison University, N. Y.; was licensed to preach by a Baptist church in his eighteenth year, and was pastor, first in Amsterdam, N. Y., and subsequently in Milford, Conn. He afterwards preached as a Home Missionary in Tenn., and, for a time, had charge of classical schools in Cleveland and Memphis, Tenn. Changing his views touching the mode and subjects of baptism, he united, in 1819, with the Presbyterian Church, was licensed, and went as a Home Missionary to Texas. Here, with his devoted wife, he endured great hardships, preaching in private, in school and in court-houses, and in the open air. He was ordained in December, 1850, by the Presbytery of Texas, having travelled 300 miles for the purpose, the venerated Daniel Baker, being the Moderator of the body. In this new State there was, at this time, no church building, and but one Presbyterian minister in all Eastern Texas. Entering upon his work with his characteristic energy, he organized churches at Marshall, Jefferson, Golden Rule, Hickory Hill, Henderson and Gum Spring.

His health failing, through exposure and excessive labor, Mr. Staples turned his face Northward, in search of a more bracing climate. In March, 1855, he reached Janesville, Wis., and, under many discouragements, organized the First Presbyterian Church. In July, 1858, he removed to Kankakee, Ill. Here he reorganized the church, enlarged the church building and met with great success. While here, he represented the Presbyterian Church in what was known as the "Chiniquy Movement," which resulted in leading out of the Papal Church a large colony of French settlers. His health failing again, in consequence of the labor and care incident to this work, he was induced, in 1865, to take charge of, and reorganize the Bible work in the State of New York. Here he labored for six years, with eminent success. In 1871, the Virginia Bible Society wishing a man who, by virtue of his acquaintance with the South, could reorganize the work in that State, after the war, applied for, and secured Mr. Staple's services. He entered upon the work, and soon brought order out of confusion. Under his wise and energetic management, more than 1,500,000 people have been visited by the colporteurs of the Society, and 220,000 copies of the Bible distributed. At this present writing (1883), though greatly broken in health, he still lives, and labors energetically and efficiently in the Bible cause, his home being at Richmond, Va. To such men, under God, is the Church indebted for her victories, and the world for its true welfare. Let them be held in everlasting remembrance.

Starr, Rev. Frederick, Jr., was born in the city of Rochester, N. Y., January 26th, 1826. He graduated at Yale College in 1846, and three years later at Auburn Seminary. After spending a few weeks in missionary labor in St. Louis, Mo., he went to Weston, a place then doing the largest business of any city in Missouri, with the exception of St. Louis. Here he subsequently settled. The people among whom he labored were poor, and their church deeply involved in debt. His course was characteristic of the man, and showed that he was cast in no ordinary mould. Having raised all he could by subscription from his people, he insured his own life as a basis of credit, and boldly assumed the debt. Unable to procure any one to act as sexton, he made the fires and rang the bell, while his wife swept the house. With Paul, he could labor with his hands so that the gospel might be preached.

In 1856 Mr. Starr became the Secretary of the Western Education Society, and agent for the Seminary at Auburn, and the fruit of his labors appeared more and more every year. He elevated the cause of ministerial education in all that region, did much for the establishment of the Seminary on a secure financial foundation, and influenced many young men to enter the ministry, as well as helped to prepare the way for them. He next became pastor of the Church at Penn Yan, N. Y., where his labors were largely blessed. Subsequently, he accepted a call to St. Louis, where also the divine blessing signally accompanied his ministry. Here he was called to his reward. In his extreme illness he sent the following characteristic, beautiful message to his Church: "Tell them to be God's—to be God's—to be God's—every one of them; to stand up for Jesus all the time; to hate sin, and love righteousness."

The most striking feature of Mr. Starr's character was his strong convictions of principle and duty. He was a thorough man. He was a fearless man. He had untiring energy. He was a man of large heart. He had a sincere desire to do good. His own words expressed his desire and constant endeavor, "I want to leave every place I occupy better than I found it."

State, Intermediate, a term made use of to denote the state of the soul between death and the resurrection. The souls of men survive the dissolution of their bodies, and have an immortal subsistence. Some have held that death is the utter extinction of man's being; others, that the soul shall sleep between death and the resurrection, alike inactive and unconscious, as the body that is then dissolved into dust. In opposition to these notions, equally absurd and uncomfortable, our Confession affirms, and the Scripture clearly teaches, that the souls of men subsist in a disembodied state, after such a manner as to be capable of exercising those powers and faculties which are essential to them. "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul" (Matt. x, 28). These are the words of Him who made man, and who perfectly knows the constituent parts of his nature; and He affirms, not only that the soul is distinct from the body, not only that it does not, in fact, die with the body, but that it is impossible to kill the soul by any created power. Our Saviour taught the same doctrine in parabolical language: "It came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom. The rich man also died, and was buried; and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments" (Luke xvi, 22, 23). Both the beggar and the man of wealth died; both left their bodies in the dust; but the souls of both retained their existence and their consciousness after their separation from their bodies. No doubt the death of the righteous is frequently described in Scripture as a sleep; but such language is obviously figurative, and gives no countenance to the notion that the soul falls asleep when disunited from the body. When the dead are said to be asleep, a metaphor is used, founded upon the striking resemblance between death and sleep; and at the same time, by another figure of speech, a part is spoken of as the whole. They are said to sleep, and to be unconscious and inactive, because these things are true of their bodies.

The simple truth is that a soul without all life and motion, without all sense and perception, appears to be a contradiction in nature. It would be a kind of annihilation of a thinking substance to be deprived of all thought for so many ages, and it would be a sort of new creation to restore it to consciousness again.

The souls of the righteous, immediately after death, are admitted to a state of happiness. When Stephen said, with his dying breath, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit" (Acts vii, 59), he manifestly supposed that his soul should immediately pass into the presence of his Saviour. Our Lord's promise to the penitent thief, "To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise" (Luke xxiii, 43), implies, if words have any meaning, that ere that day was finished his soul should be in the same place with the soul of Christ, and should enjoy the blessedness which the word "paradise" suggests. In the fifth chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, Paul proceeds upon the supposition that believers, as soon as they leave this world, enter upon a happier state: "For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." (Verse 1; see also verses 6 and 8.) The one event immediately follows the other—the entrance into the heavenly house, the removal from the earthly. The same thing is implied when he says that he was "in a strait betwixt two," whether to remain upon earth, or "to depart and to be with Christ, which was far better" (Phil. i, 23). Certainly he believed, that as soon as he departed he should be with Christ, as is clear both from the words themselves, and from his strait; for if he had known that he was to remain in a state of insensibility for thousands of years, he could not have hesitated, for a moment, whether it would be better to sink into that state, or to continue in life, engaged in the most important services, and enjoying the delights of communion with God. (See also Luke xvi, 22.) It is impossible, indeed, to express in a clearer manner than is done in these passages, the immediate transition of the soul from its present habitation into the presence of Christ. What detains us from His presence is our continuance in the body. What introduces us into it is our departure from the body. Our presence with Him succeeds our absence from the body, without an interval.

As to the location of the place where the redeemed are now gathered, absolutely nothing is revealed, except that it is where the glorified humanity of Christ is. They are with Him, and behold His glory (2 Cor. v, 1-8). See, also, the scenes opened in the Apocalypse. And Christ at His ascension sat down at "the right hand of God," "the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Mark xvi, 19; Rom. viii, 31; Heb. i, 3; x, 12, etc.). This must be a locality, because, the humanity of Christ being finite, His presence marks a definite place; yet the phrase "right hand of God" evidently marks rather the condition of honor and power to which Christ is raised as mediatorial King. As to the location of the place in which Christ and His glorified spouse will hold their central home throughout eternity, a strong probability is raised that it will be our present earth, first burned with fire and then gloriously replenished. (See Rom. viii, 19-23; 2 Pet. iii, 5-13; Rev. xxi, 1.)

The souls of the wicked are at death cast into hell. Neither is the location of this place revealed. While some have maintained that the souls of the wicked shall never be tormented in hell, others have held that they shall not be adjudged to that place of torment till after the resurrection; but, according to the representation of our Saviour, as soon as the rich man died, "in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments" (Luke xvi, 23). The spirits of those who in the time of Noah were disobedient, were, when the Apostle Peter wrote his epistle, shut up in the prison of hell (1 Pet. iii, 19).

Beyond all question, the Scripture being our guide, the state of both classes—the righteous and the wicked—admits of no exchange or transfer, but their present condition is the commencement of an inevitable progression in opposite directions. The state of both classes is, indeed, intermediate in the sense that, in the case of the former, their happiness will be greater when their glorified bodies, which had been "instruments of righteousness," have, at the resurrection, been reunited with their spirits, which had, at death, been made "perfect in holiness," and in the case of the latter, the punishment will be greater when they are clothed again with their bodies, which had been "instruments of sin;" but in this sense only is the state of either class intermediate.

The Church of Rome maintains that the souls of the saints, on leaving their bodies, must pass for a time into a place called purgatory, that they may be purified by fire from the stains of sin which had not yet been washed out during the present life. That Church further teaches, that the pains and sufferings of purgatory may be alleviated and shortened by the prayers of men here on earth, by the intercession of the saints in heaven, and, above all, by the sacrifice of the mass, offered by the priests in the name of sinners; and that, as soon as souls are released from purgatory, they are immediately admitted to eternal happiness.

The notion of purgatory is so grossly and palpably false, that the common sense of every man would reject it, where it is not perverted and overpowered by authority and prejudice. Can a person have any idea in his mind when he talks of souls being purified by fire? Might he not, with equal propriety, speak of a spirit being nourished with bread and wine? The soul is supposed to be a material substance (upon which alone fire can act), contrary to the belief even of the abettors of purgatory, who admit, as well as we, the spirituality of its essence. Thus it is evident that purgatory is physically impossible. But there are other reasons, under the force of which the whole fabric tumbles to the ground.

The passages which Romanists allege as proofs of purgatory are, 2 Macc. xii, 43, 45; Matt. xii, 31, 32;

1 Cor. iii, 15; 1 Pet. iii, 19. "But it may be observed," says Dr. Watson, "1. That the books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration; therefore, quotations from them are not to be regarded. 2. If they were, the texts referred to would rather prove that there is no such place as purgatory, since Judas did not expect the souls departed to reap any benefit from the sin-offering till the resurrection. The texts quoted from the Scriptures have no reference to the doctrine, as may be seen by consulting the context and any just commentator upon it. 3. The Scriptures in general speak of departed souls going immediately, at death, to a fixed state of happiness or misery, and give us no idea of purgatory (Isa. lviii, 2; Rev. xiv, 13; Luke xvi, 22; 2 Cor. v, 8). 4. It is derogatory from the doctrine of the satisfaction of Christ. If Christ died for us, and redeemed us from sin and hell, as the Scripture speaks, then the idea of further meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of His sacrifice, and places merit still in the creature; a doctrine exactly opposite to the Scriptures."

Of these Institutions of higher learning, Ohio had the greatest number, 36; Illinois had 28; New York and Pennsylvania had 27 each. No other State had 20, and only 7 other States had more than 10. The only States east of the Mississippi having but one such Institution were Delaware, Rhode Island and New Hampshire.

In 1881 there were 143 theological seminaries in the United States, having a total attendance of 4782 students, with 612 professors.

Stearns, Rev. Jonathan F., D.D., the son of the Rev. Samuel Stearns, was born in Bedford, Mass., where his father was pastor of the Congregational Church, his only charge for a period of forty years. He graduated at Harvard College, in 1830, and studied theology partly at Andover Theological Seminary and partly under the direction of his father. He was licensed to preach by the Woburn Association in Massachusetts, in October, 1834, and was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Newburyport, Mass., by the Presbytery of Londonderry, in the Synod of Albany, September 16th, 1835. Beneath the pulpit of this church repose the remains of George Whitefield.

In 1836 he was a commissioner from the Presbytery of Londonderry to the General Assembly in Pittsburg. His ministry at Newburyport continued fourteen years. He was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J., in December, 1849. At present he is the honored pastor emeritus of this important and ancient charge. He received the degree of S.T.D. from the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in 1850. Dr. Stearns was Moderator of the General Assembly which met in Harrisburg in 1868. He was a member of the "Reunion Committee," and is a member of several of the committees of the General Assembly for prosecuting the work of the Church. He is also connected with literary and benevolent institutions in Newark and other places, and is widely known as a foremost man in the Church in promoting every good work.

Stedman, James Owen, D.D., son of Elisha and Mary (Owen) Stedman, was born in Fayetteville, N. C., October 31st, 1811; was graduated from the University of North Carolina, June, 1832; entered Princeton Seminary a few months after, where he remained four years (1832-36); was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 20th, 1836; was stated supply to the First Church, Baltimore, Md., for six months, 1836; labored for some time in missionary work at Waynesboro, N. C.; was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Tuscumbia, Ala., by the Presbytery of North Alabama, November 1st, 1837, in which charge he remained until 1845. From 1845 to 1851 he was stated supply of the Church of Wilmington, N. C., when, his wife's health failing, he removed to Philadelphia for medical treatment. During the years 1852 and 1853 he was stated supply of the First Church in Chester, Pa. While at Chester he received a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn. Before accepting it he went to Memphis and served the church as stated supply, from May 10th, 1854, until his installation, May 7th, 1856. This relation was dissolved July 2d, 1868. In July, 1868, he organized the Alabama Street Presbyterian Church, in Memphis, and took charge of it as pastor elect. He never consented to be installed, but served the church faithfully, as stated supply, until April, 1880, when his failing health constrained him to retire from the active work of the ministry. He had repeatedly offered to give up the care of the church, but such was the devotion of its members that they would not consent to it until this time. As a preacher, Dr. Stedman was earnest, able, sound and effective. He loved to preach the gospel at all times and in all places. The old, old story of Jesus and His love was ever new and ever refreshing to him. As a pastor, visiting from house to house, especially when sickness and sorrow had entered the abodes of his people, his ministrations were abundant, welcome and effective. Dr. Stedman was a sufferer for several years, and at the last a very great sufferer. But he endured his sufferings as seeing Him who is invisible. He died April 28th, 1882.

Steel, Rev. John, was a native of Ireland. In 1711 he was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle to the work of the ministry. Soon after, he was elected one of the trustees of the school, under Alison and McDowell, for the education of young men for the ministry, which afterwards was transferred to Newark, Del., and in 1715 he was appointed by Synod on an important committee, to report a plan of union with the Synod of New York. While he was a licentiate (1713) he was sent to Virginia and to Conestoga, and after his ordination he was probably settled for about seven years at New London, Chester county, Pa. In the year 1752, possibly earlier, he removed to West Conococheague, in what is now Franklin county, where he had charge of two congregations, which were in the midst of the perils of Indian depredations. The people never ventured to assemble for worship without being fully equipped and watched by sentries against surprise. One of the meeting houses in which Mr. Steel preached was fortified as a fort, and after a while was burned to the ground. A number of whole families under his charge were barbarously murdered. Such was his coolness, courage and skill, that he was chosen to be the captain of the company formed among the settlers, and in 1755 the government commissioned him as a captain of the provincial troops, and he was for many years active in the service. Under such circumstances it was impossible to hold his congregations to regularity in worship, and in the end his churches were broken up, and he was obliged to seek a residence elsewhere.

In 1754 we find Mr. Steel preaching at Nottingham, and then at York and Shrewsbury. In April, 1759, he was installed pastor of the two churches of Upper and Lower Pennsborough, Pa. These congregations prospered under his ministry. He was instructive as a preacher, and faithful in catechising and training the young. During the pendency of measures for asserting the rights of the colonies against the mother country, he sympathized ardently with the patriots, and took the command of one of the military companies formed in Carlisle. His common title of "Reverend Captain" was never a reproach, for he was never known to act unworthily of either part of the designation. Mr. Steel died in August, 1779, leaving a reputation for stern integrity, zeal for what he deemed truth and righteousness, and a high sense of honor. His remains lie interred in the Old Cemetery of Carlisle.

Steel, Robert, D.D., was born near Londonderry, Ireland, January 9th, 1794. He received a pious home education, and some measure of classical training in his native land. Coming to this country in boyhood, he entered the famous academy of "Gray and Wiley," in Philadelphia, whence he passed into the College of New Jersey, graduating in the class of 1814. He pursued his theological studies in the Associate Seminary, in New York, of which Dr. John M. Mason was President, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York. After laboring for a brief period as a missionary in Philadelphia, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Abington, Pa., where he was ordained and installed, November 9th, 1819. In that venerable church he spent his entire ministerial life, dying in great peace, September 2d, 1862.

Dr. Steel was "a good man and a just," of active intellect, warm heart, and tireless energy in the work of the Lord. As a preacher, he was direct, earnest and pungent. He was noted for the propriety andunction of his prayers. He was abundant in charity and good works, and fearless in upholding his principles and in supporting every good cause. He was widely known, and was held in universal respect.

Stephens, Hon. Alexander Hamilton, was born in Taliaferro county, Ga., February 11th, 1812, and was named for his grandfather, Alexander Stephens, the founder of the American branch of the family, who was an adherent of the Chevalier Edward (the Pretender), and for the Rev. Alexander Hamilton Webster, afterwards his instructor, and a favorite preacher in Georgia. His mother died while he was yet an infant, and his father in 1826. His life-long feeble health was doubtless due, in some measure at least, to the lack of a mother's care in infancy. After his father's death, his parental home was sold for distribution, and the portion for each child was $111. His uncle, Aaron W. Grier, offered him a home. His extraordinary capacity, strict morality and piety attracted the attention of Charles C. Mills, the Superintendent of the Sabbath school he attended. Mr. Mills offered the means for securing a better education than he could otherwise have secured. This offer Master Stephens accepted, with the distinct understanding that he should consider it only as a loan, and he entered the Academy at Washington, Ga., then under the care of Rev. Alexander H. Webster. He soon after was received into the Presbyterian Church, and at Mr. Webster's suggestion, partially decided to study for the ministry. Mr. Webster's sudden death changed his prospects, but other kind friends came forward and enabled him to complete a collegiate education at Franklin College, in 1832. He obtained a situation as teacher, and in two years had paid off the indebtedness incurred during his school days, and, in 1831, began the study of law, free of debt and with a small sum of money in his pocket. He pursued his studies unaided. He was admitted to the Bar July 23d, 1834, after an examination before Hon. William H. Crawford, conducted by Joseph H. Lumpkin, and was complimented by these jurists upon his success. Within ten days he was employed on an important suit, which he gained against one of the veterans of the Bar. As soon as possible, he bought back the home of his childhood, near Crawfordsville, and when not absent on public business always resided there. Early in life he turned his attention to politics. He served in the Legislature of his native State from 1836 to 1841. In 1842, he was elected to the State Senate. In 1843

he was elected to a seat in Congress, and, by successive elections, retained it till 1859. During this time he served on many important committees, and participated in the debates of that interesting period.

After the war, in 1872, Mr. Stephens was elected to Congress, and again in 1874, almost without opposition. He remained in the House, as an eloquent and useful member, till he was chosen Governor of the State, in 1882. Among his literary productions have been a "History of the United States" for the use of schools, "A Constitutional View of the Late War between the States, its Causes, Character, Conduct and Results," and several speeches. At one time he was editor of the Augusta Constitutionalist. Whatever diversity of opinion may exist as to Mr. Stephens' political career, he is entitled to the credit of sincerity, and it is conceded that as a man and as a Christian he maintained an unblemished character. From childhood he was prepared to look calmly upon the approach of death which, at last, March 4th, 1883, relieved him from the chains of suffering. Many were his deeds of kindness, and it has been remarked by one who knew him well, and whose judgment is entitled to the highest respect, "Perhaps there never was a heart in more perfect accord with the great popular heart, and hence in full sympathy with human nature, than his."

Stephenson, Rev. James White, of Scotch-Irish extraction, was a native of Virginia, but his early years were spent in the neighborhood of Waxhaw Church, in Lancaster District, South Carolina. Little is known of his childhood, but his education was probably conducted under the direction of Dr. McCaule, at Mount Zion College, Winnsborough, S. C. For some years subsequent he had charge of a classical school in the same neighborhood, and Andrew Jackson was one of his pupils. In the scenes of the Revolutionary conflict he took an active part, and after the close of the war commenced his preparation for the ministry. In 1789 he was licensed by the Presbytery of South Carolina, and shortly after accepted a call to the pastoral charge of Bethel and Indiantown churches, in Williamsburg District. Here, in difficult and trying circumstances, he was remarkably blessed in his ministry. In every department of ministerial labor he was especially diligent, and his churches grew proportionally in numbers and in spirituality. But at length his attention, as well as that of a portion of his people, was directed to the favorable openings in the great fields beyond the mountains, and they determined together to carry the gospel into the almost unbroken wilderness. Accompanied by about twenty families, Mr. Stephenson migrated to Maury county, Tenn., and the company jointly purchased a large tract of land belonging to the heirs of General Greene, of Revolutionary fame.

In March, 1808, the company set out upon their journey. They reached the place of their destination, and began the foundation of the "Frierson Settlement." As years passed by, the kind and degree of influence exerted by Mr. Stephenson upon the young community became more distinctly marked. His preaching was solid and instructive, and sometimes highly impressive. His good sense, consistent life, gravity of deportment and devoted piety, were reflected in the manners and character of the people. Few churches in the State maintained thenceforth so enviable a reputation, particularly for the faithful public and private instruction of the colored people. The pastor possessed in a high degree the missionary spirit, and was especially intent upon evangelical labors among the Indian tribes. Under his training a Christian colony was established, and the tree he planted was known by its fruits. To the ripe age of seventy-six years he continued his labors among a people, a portion of whom had been his parochial charge for forty-two years. He died in 1832, in the hope and triumph of a Christian faith.

Sterling, Rev. William, was born in County Down, Ireland, August 18th, 1808. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1832, and was ordained by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, December 23d, 1835. He sustained the pastoral relation to the First Church, Reading, Pa., 1835-44; to the Fifth Church, Pittsburg, 1845-46; and to the Second Church, Williamsport, Pa., 1846-71. He still resides at Williamsport. In all his fields of labor Mr. Sterling has been diligent and faithful. He is a minister of earnest Christian spirit, preaches with great plainness and direct aim at spiritual results, and by his judiciousness and zeal has won the confidence and esteem of the congregations over which he has been placed, in the Lord.

Stevens, George Barker, A. B., A. M., Ph. D., the youngest child of Thomas J. and Weltha B. Stevens, was born at Spencer, N. Y., July 13th, 1854. He graduated from the Ithaca (N. Y.) Academy in 1874, from the University of Rochester in 1877, and from the Yale Divinity School in 1880. In 1879 he was licensed to preach by the New Haven Central (Congregational) Association, and on July 18th, 1880, he became pastor of the First Congregational Church, Buffalo, N. Y. In December, 1882, the First Presbyterian Church of Watertown, N. Y., extended him a call, which was accepted, and on February 1st, 1883, he was installed over his new charge. During 1883 Mr. Stevens received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Syracuse University, after submitting to a searching examination on two years' special work in Christian Evidence, Historical Philosophy and Metaphysics.

Doctor Stevens has published numerous essays and reviews. Among these are "The Rational Grounds of Theism," "The Moral and Spiritual Elements of the Atonement," translation of Ulrich on "The Soul's Relation to God," etc., in the Baptist Quarterly Review, "The Authority of Faith," "Review of Phelp's Theory of Preaching," "The Old Testament in the Christian Church," translation of Rothe on "The Atonement," and review of Harris' "Philosophical Basis of Theism," in the New Englander. Besides these weighty and scholarly articles, he has made many contributions to the columns of The Advance, The Evangelist, and The Sunday School Times.

Dr. Stevens is a facile and vigorous writer, a clear and cogent reasoner, and a scholar of various and solid attainments. His preaching is marked by strong grasp on fundamental principles, and by a pungent directness of utterance that compels attention. By all who know him, he is recognized as a courteous, cultivated Christian gentleman.

Stevens, Joseph, D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., October 26th, 1819. He graduated from Lafayette College in the class of 1842, and remained one year afterward as tutor in the college. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia. Soon after this he was elected to the Chair of Mathematics in Oakland College, Miss., then under the control of the Presbyterian Synod of that State. In 1845 he was ordained, "sine titulo," at Natchez, Miss. He continued to occupy his position in Oakland College for six years. In 1851 he accepted a call to the Church of Jersey Shore, Lyncoming county, Pa., of which he still is the honored and useful pastor. Dr. Stevens has devoted the energies of his life to his high calling. As a preacher, he is argumentative, logical and instructive. His pastoral visits to each member of his congregation at least once a year, in regular order, attest the faithfulness of his labors in this capacity. He has an unusually warm regard for the stated meetings of his Presbytery and Synod, and is always ready to act as well as speak on subjects closely connected with the progress of the cause of Presbyterianism and the moral and religious education of the people, and, from his long experience and earnest interest, his addresses exert a marked influence among his brethren.

Stevenson, John McMillan, D. D., son of Rev. Joseph Stevenson and grandson of Rev. Thomas Marquis, was born 14th May, 1812. He was the subject of religious impressions in early childhood, and his determination to be a minister dates from that period. He entered Miami University in 1832, remaining there upwards of two years, and then entering Jefferson College, whence he was graduated in 1836. After a period of study in Lane Theological Seminary, he became Principal of the Senior Preparatory Department of Kenyon College, where he enjoyed the friendship of the late Bishop McIlvaine. In 1841 he was made Professor of Greek in the Ohio University. In 1842, was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Troy, Ohio. Resigning his charge in 1846, on account of ill-health, he entered the service of the American Tract Society, and remained in it until 1849, when he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, New Albany, Indiana. On the 20th June, 1857, he entered upon his duties as Corresponding Secretary of the American Tract Society, the position which he still holds. During the period of his pastorate Dr. Stevenson took a prominent part in the proceedings of Church courts, and as a valued member of college and seminary Boards was closely identified with the cause of education in the west. His scholarly tastes, pulpit power and practical sagacity have been repeatedly recognized in the form of invitations to leave his present position for other posts of honor and usefulness. But these, however tempting, did not alter his deliberate conviction that his best work for Christ could be done in the position which he has now held for more than twenty-five years, in the service of the American Tract Society, of which, since the death of the Rev. Dr. Hallock, he has been the Senior Secretary. Dr. Stevenson has found full scope for his best powers, representing the Society with great ability in the pulpit, on the platform and through the press, as well as in the discharge of the specific duties of his office, and bringing to its service the combined advantages of fine presence, clear thought, judicial temper, great organizing and executive ability, and an enthusiasm that spends itself in incessant labor. Dr. Stevenson has published but little. Aside from some printed sermons, "A Memoir of Rev. Thomas Marquis" (Sprague's Annals), a monograph on women preaching (Princeton Review), and a small volume "Toils and Triumphs of Colportage," his chief literary work is to be seen in the editorial columns of The American Messenger and The Illustrated Christian Weekly.

JOHN M. STEVENSON, D. D.

Steward, Rev. William, was received by the Synod as a probationer, September 1-sth, 1718, and, being called to Monokin and Wiconico, was ordained in June, 1719. For several years he waited, in the hope of forming a Presbytery in the Peninsula, but in 1723, by order of Synod, he joined New Castle Presbytery. A new meeting-house was built at Monokin, on land conveyed by deed, in 1720. The congregation had then eight elders. Mr. Steward died in 1731.

Stewart, Calvin Wilfred, D. D., was born in Lower Chanceford, Pa., July 4th, 1830. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1854; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Donegal, June 24th, 1858, and installed pastor of the Union Presbyterian Church, Coleraine, Lancaster county, Pa. Here he has remained ever since, and the advance of the congregation during his pastorate, in all the elements of prosperity, has been most satisfactory. In the year following his installation a manse was built. In June, 1865, there came a great revival, when one hundred and forty members were added, and the pastor's salary was raised to $1000. In 1864 the absorption into this church of the Free Presbyterian Church of Coleraine removed the last fading vestiges of alienation. In 1869 the old church was torn down and a larger one built. The manse was enlarged, and the salary of the minister again raised the succeeding year. In the year 1882 the church was renovated, and the entire property is now without debt. Under his ministry four hundred and seventy-six persons have been gathered into the church, and the benevolent gifts of the congregation have been increased manifold. All this is due to faithful work, and to the constant preaching of the gospel of Christ, accompanied by the united efforts of the people of the church. It is a record over which any pastor might rejoice, and give unceasing thanks to God. Dr. Stewart is an able preacher, a faithful presbyter, and an active and useful member of the Church courts.

Stewart, Charles Samuel, D. D., was born in Flemington, N. J., 1795. He was the son of Samuel Robert Stewart, and the grandson of Charles Stewart, Commissary General on Washington's staff, and one of the prominent patriots of New Jersey. Graduated from Princeton College, in 1815. He was converted in the great revival there in the Winter of 1815. He first studied law, and afterwards theology. In 1823 he went as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands, but the failure of his wife's health compelled his return in 1825. In 1828 the first of his valuable books appeared, "Residence at the Sandwich Islands," which passed through six American editions, and was republished in London, Edinburgh and Dublin, being recognized as a standard authority on the early history of that mission. The same year he received the appointment of chaplain in the U. S. Navy. This position enabled him to visit nearly all parts of the world, and furnished material for several works. On account of failing health he was retired in 1862. He died at Cooperstown, N. Y., December 15th, 1870, aged 75. At the time of his death he was the senior chaplain in the navy, in which capacity he had performed more active duty than probably any other chaplain connected with the service. His warm-heartedness and genial manners made him a great favorite with the officers and men. He left a great many manuscripts, which infirmities prevented him from publishing. For many years he was a correspondent of the New York Observer, and edited the U. S. Naval Magazine, 1836-7.

Stewart, Daniel S., D.D., the son of John and Catharine Monteith Stewart, was born, July 17th, 1811, in Amsterdam, N. Y. After graduating at Union College, in 1833, and finishing his theological course at Princeton, in 1838, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Amsterdam, February 20th, 1839. In 1840 he took charge of the Presbyterian Church of Ballston Spa, and in 1844 was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, New Albany, Ind. From 1849 to 1853 he filled the Chair of Biblical Literature and Hebrew in the Theological Seminary at New Albany. In the years following his services were given successively to the following churches: First Church, Camden, N. J.; Johnstown, N. Y.; Second Church, New Albany, Ind.; the Andrew Church, Minneapolis; and for the last six years of his active ministry, to the First Church of Minneapolis.

Dr. Stewart is a cultivated Christian gentleman, of very lovely spirit and winning address. With a high order of scholarship, he has been a close student through his entire ministry, so that he made himself an instructive preacher of the pure gospel of Jesus Christ. The fruit of his labors bore testimony to his ability and fidelity. Each of the churches which he served was largely built up and strengthened under his pastoral care. The record of his life is one which will bear scrutiny and command the respect and esteem of those who know him best. Several of his sermons were published during his ministry.

Stewart, George Dillion, D.D., was born in Jenkintown, Pa., December 30th, 1821. He was graduated at Lafayette College in 1845, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1849. After laboring a short time at Conquest, N. Y., he became pastor of the Church at Bath, N. Y., where he remained until 1859. Going west, he was settled over the churches at West Point and Sharon, Iowa; then over the Church at Burlington, Iowa, whence he removed to the pastorate of the First Church, Omaha, Neb. He is now pastor of the Church at Fort Madison, Iowa.

Dr. Stewart is a man of clear, vigorous mind, of excellent scholarship and great energy. He has been very successful in building up the churches over which he has been placed, and has given a great deal of labor to Church extension, particularly in the West. He has special aptitude for the practical work of the Church, and as a presbyter has few superiors.

Stewart, John B., D.D., was born in Allegheny county, Pa., May 7th, 1825; graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1848 and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1851; was licensed in the same year by the Presbytery of Ohio. In 1851 he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Wooster, Ohio. Owing to a serious bronchial affection, he was compelled to resign in 1856. The few years which followed, though greatly embarrassed by ill health, were profitably employed in laboring among feeble churches. In 1862 he became pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, and remained until 1870. In 1872 he accepted a call from the Calvary Presbyterian Church, Milwaukee. This relation was dissolved in 1881, and he was transferred to his present charge, the Presbyterian Church of Des Moines, Iowa. Dr. Stewart is a forcible and impressive preacher, and faithful in the discharge of his duties as a presbyter. His ministry has been blessed, and he enjoys the confidence and affection of his brethren.

Stewart, John Stevens, D.D., was born in Jenkintown, Pa., April 1st, 1835. He graduated with high rank at the College of New Jersey, in the class of 1856. After teaching two years in Virginia he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and there graduated in 1861. During his seminary course he was chosen as Tutor of Rhetoric in the College. On the 12th day of February, 1862, he was ordained and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Greenwich, Cumberland county, N. J., and remained there until he removed to Towanda, Pa., where he was installed pastor, March 8th, 1870. This relation still continues. Dr. Stewart is a most scholarly, polished and impressive speaker. His rich, cultured vocabulary, graceful and classic style, powerful imagination, deep intellectual grasp and warm Christian heart, all combine to make his name and influence widely known and deeply felt. In addition to a careful attention to the duties of his pastorate, keeping pace with recent advances in theological scholarship, homiletical cultivation and Biblical criticism, Dr. Stewart has given much time to literary pursuits, and made numerous valuable contributions to the current religious and secular publications of the day.

Stewart, Rev. Robert Laird, third son of Z. G. Stewart, M. D., and Jane (Laird) Stewart, and grandson of Rev. Francis Laird, D. D., was born August 11th, 1840, in Murrysville, Westmoreland county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, in the class of 1866, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1869. He was licensed to preach April 28th, 1868, and July 6th, 1869, was installed pastor of the churches of Conneautville and Harmonsburg, Pa. He was pastor at Golden, Col., 1873-9. October 1st, 1880, he was installed over the Mahoning Presbyterian Church, Danville, Pa., of which he still has charge. Mr. Stewart is a diligent student, and an earnest, conscientious and tireless worker in the Master's cause. His sermons are carefully prepared and earnestly delivered. He takes a great interest in the children and youth of his congregation, and is blessed in his labors as preacher and pastor.

Stewart, Rev. Thomas Calvin, was the eldest child of John Gemmill and Elizabeth (Steinman) Stewart, and was born in Alexandria, Pa., July 28th, 1839. Entered the Tuscarora Academy in 1857, and united with the Presbyterian Church under the pastorate of G. W. Thompson, D. D., while at the Academy. Entered Jefferson College in 1859, and graduated in 1863, and the same year entered the middle class in the Western Theological Seminary in Allegheny, Pa. After finishing the course of study in the Western Theological Seminary, he entered the Seminary in Princeton, N. J., and spent a year in review, as post-graduate. Was licensed by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, January 9th, 1866, at Tyrone, Pa. Was called to the pastorate of the united churches of Niles and Liberty, in the State of Ohio, and was ordained by Presbytery of New Lisbon, June 19th, 1867, in the Church of Madison, and installed July 11th, of the same year. In February, 1878, he became pastor of the Solon Church, Presbytery of Cleveland, and on March 19th, 1881, became pastor of the Church of Brazil, Ind.

Mr. Stewart has ever been esteemed as a very popular preacher, eloquent in his address, systematic in his work, a devoted pastor and a successful minister. Many of his published sermons rank high, not only as fine specimens of literary productions, but eminently orthodox and spiritual in tone, and his labors have been abundantly blessed.

Stiles, Joseph Clay, D. D., LL. D., son of Joseph Stiles and Catharine Clay, was born in Savannah, Ga., December 6th, 1795. He graduated at Yale College in 1814; studied law at Litchfield and practiced his profession a few years in his native city, with brilliant success and promise. In 1822 he determined to devote his life to the ministry, and, after laboring a few months among the negroes on his father's plantations, returned North and took a theological course at Andover.

In April, 1825, at Lexington, Ga., he was licensed to preach by Hopewell (now Augusta) Presbytery, and in August, 1826, was ordained an evangelist at Milledgeville. For three years, as evangelist of his Presbytery, and afterward, from 1829 to 1835, laboring, chiefly at his own charges, in the low country of Georgia and in Florida, he worked with untiring zeal and great success, reviving old churches and organizing new ones—among the latter Milledgeville and Macon. These labors of Mr. Stiles gave a new impetus to Presbyterianism in his native State.

In 1835 he removed to Kentucky and spent nine years in the West, and during this period, which covered the rise of Campbellism and the division of his own Denomination, was frequently selected as the representative of his Church in the public theological discussions which were then the order of the day, while still devoting himself, with characteristic ardor, to the more congenial preaching of the Word.

In 1844 he accepted a call to the Shockoe Hill (now Grace Street) Presbyterian Church, of Richmond, Va., where he labored with earnest devotion and was greatly beloved and honored. In 1846 the degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Transylvania University.

In 1848 Dr. Stiles was called to the Mercer Street Church of New York city. He soon won the hearts of his new flock, but impaired health forced him to resign, and in 1850 he accepted a general agency for the American Bible Society in the South, in the prosecution of which he did, perhaps, some of the most effective work of his life.

In 1853, his health being somewhat restored, he was called to the charge of the South Church, New Haven, Conn. During and just at the close of this pastorate, he engaged in another enterprise, dear to his own soul and, as he always believed, to his Master—the organization of the Southern Aid Society, by whose contributions many feeble Southern churches were sustained and strengthened.

In November, 1859, he was invited by the Synod of Georgia to become co-evangelist with Rev. W. M. Cunningham, and in 1860 these brethren performed glorious service for the churches and people of that State. During this year he received the degree of LL. D. from the University of Georgia.

During the last years of his life Dr. Stiles labored as an evangelist in Virginia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Missouri and Maryland, preaching his last sermon at Union, Monroe county, West Va., June 28th, 1874. He died in calm, happy serenity, March 27th, 1875.

Dr. Stiles was a much gifted and much loved servant of God, and of the Church. He stood in the front rank of preachers. His intellect, which was of a high order, was, perhaps, most strongly characterized by analytical power; yet his emotional nature was grand, and no man was ever more impassioned or impetuous, or tender in utterance than he, while he was also endowed with a daring and gorgeous imagination. In character, he was the very soul of courage, of generosity, and of sympathy. Spiritually, he was blessed with a wondrous love for God and human souls, with an amazing access and power in prayer, and with unsurpassed knowledge of and insight into the Word of God. He was indeed "mighty in the Scriptures." Such had God made him, and these glorious endowments he had developed in the highest degree by the loftiest aims and the intensest efforts. As might have been predicted of such a man, he was rather a speaker than a writer. His published works are few—one or two sermons, one or two speeches in Church assemblies, and one or two tracts. It is a matter of regret with the Church, that a series of sermons, prepared during the latter part of his life, and delivered in many parts of the country, with a great harvest of souls, should not be reconstructed from the notes he left, and put in permanent form.

Stillman, Charles Allen, D.D., was born in Charleston, S. C., March 14th, 1819. He graduated at Oglethorpe University, Ga., in 1841, and at the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C., in 1841. The same year he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Charleston; and in 1845 he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Eutaw, Ala., by Tuscaloosa Presbytery. In 1853 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Gainesville, Ala., and from 1870 to the present time he has been pastor of the Presbyterian Church in the city of Tuscaloosa, Ala.

His degree was conferred by the University of Alabama in 1863. He was Moderator of the General Assembly, South, at its meeting in New Orleans, 1877. He has been Superintendent of the Institute for Training Colored Ministers, under the care of the Southern Presbyterian Church, in Tuscaloosa, from its organization in 1860, to the present time. And for more than thirty years he has been Stated Clerk of Tuscaloosa Presbytery.

Dr. Stillman is marked for his genial temperament and fine social qualities, and conversational powers. He is endowed with a clear, strong, practical mind, and a judgment whose decisions command universal respect. His preaching is of a high order. It is addressed to the reason and conscience, rather than the emotions, but delivered with warmth and animation. He expresses his thoughts with clearness and precision, and in language singularly apt and forcible. In prayer, he is eminently gifted. For appropriateness to varying occasions and circumstances, and for freshness and unction, his approaches to the mercy seat are rarely equaled.

He has published a number of sermons and essays; for several years he has contributed the leading editorials to one of the religious journals of the Church; and an occasional article to the Presbyterian Quarterly Review. In all departments of ministerial work his labors are abundant.

Stillman, Timothy, D. D., the second son of Captain George and Martha Deming Stillman, was born in the town of Wethersfield, Conn., March 21st, 1802. He graduated at Yale College with the class of 1822, and at the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., with the class of 1830. In April of 1830, he went to Chautauque county, as the representative of five classmates who desired to settle in some neighborhood where they could be associated in their future labors, and he, desiring an untried field, visited Dunkirk, where there was then no organized church of any denomination. There he spent six weeks and prepared the way for the organization of a Presbyterian Church, which was consummated May 21st. May 12th of that year he was ordained by Buffalo Presbytery, on whose roll his name has continued to have a place, then at the foot of the roll, now but one name above his.

In 1833 he was elected Stated Clerk of Presbytery, which office he held forty-seven years. In 1839, at a meeting of Presbytery, attention was called to the necessity of having something done to elevate the character and improve the condition of the thousands who were employed on the lakes, rivers and canals of our growing inland commerce. Dr. Stillman being the son of a sailor, and always ready to manifest a deep interest in this class of our population, was, on recommendation of Presbytery, appointed by the American Bethel Society their Corresponding Secretary and Superintendent of their Missionary work. In this service he continued till 1868, when the Bethel Society was merged in the American Seaman's Friend Society, since which time he has been a minister at large, using his gifts as Providence gave him opportunity. In 1851 he was elected a trustee of Auburn Theological Seminary, and still holds that office, mainly because he can always be relied upon to be present at every Commencement season.

St. Louis, Mo., Presbyterianism in. Early in March, 1801, Amos Stoddard, a captain of artillery in the service of the United States, arrived in St. Louis. He had been constituted the agent of the French Republic for receiving from the Spanish authorities the possession of Upper Louisiana (of which St. Louis had become the capital), and also to make the transfer of the province to the United States Government, whose representative he was. These transfers were made in due form on the 9th and 10th of March, and Captain Stoddard became, temporarily, the Governor, with all the powers and prerogatives of the Spanish Lieutenant-Governor, in Upper Louisiana. St. Louis contained, at this time, about one hundred and eighty houses, and a population estimated at a little over one thousand.

Under the Spanish government the Roman Catholic faith was the established religion of the province, and no other religion was tolerated by the laws of Spain. Yet, by the connivance of the commandants, many Protestant families settled in the province, and remained undisturbed in their religious principles. Itinerant Methodist and Baptist ministers sometimes passed over from Illinois and preached in the log cabins of the settlers, with no other molestation than an occasional threat of imprisonment in the calabozo at St. Louis. The only church was a structure of hewn logs planted upright in the ground and covered with a roof, the eaves of which projected beyond the body of the building, and formed a kind of gallery or promenade around it. There was no regular priest, and the spiritual interests of the people were very little cared for.

After the cession to the United States the population of St. Louis so increased that in about ten years it had nearly doubled. In 1813 there were forty American families in the city, containing about three hundred persons. There was at that time no religious worship, save the occasional service in the old Roman Catholic church, and although there were many Presbyterian families scattered about in the Territory, no Presbyterian Church had been organized in either Missouri or Illinois.

In 1814 the Rev. Samuel J. Mills and David Smith visited St. Louis, whilst on an exploring tour to the West and South. They preached the first Presbyterian sermons ever heard in the Territory. These brethren were gladly received, and the people earnestly solicited one of them to remain, proffering all needed support. Their engagements, however, rendered it necessary that they should complete their tour, and the statements made by them, subsequently, to the Eastern churches, no doubt matured the supplies for the far West.

For fifteen months succeeding the departure of Messrs. Mills and Smith, there appears to have been no Presbyterian preaching in the territory. In February, 1816, the Rev. Gideon Blackburn, of Tennessee, made a visit to the city and preached several times, to large congregations. Two months afterwards the Rev. Salmon Giddings, under a commission from the Connecticut Missionary Society, settled in the territory, and commenced his labors in St. Louis. The Rev. Timothy Flint, from the same Society, followed soon after, and during a temporary absence of Mr. Giddings, on the 21st of July, administered for the first time the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to a Presbyterian congregation, though no church had as yet been organized in the territory.

The organization of a Presbyterian Church was effected on the 23d of November, 1817, by Mr. Giddings. It consisted of ten members, eight of whom were females, Stephen Hempstead, Sr. (justly accounted the father of the Presbyterian Church in St. Louis), and Thomas Osborn, the only male members of the church, were chosen ruling elders and duly ordained. From its organization until June, 1825, the church worshiped in the school room of Mr. Giddings. At this time they removed to their new building, on the corner of St. Charles and Fourth streets, then regarded as a very bad location, being almost out of town. Over this church Mr. Giddings was installed by the Presbytery of Missouri, the 19th of November, 1826, and on the 1st of February following closed a laborious life, esteemed and lamented by all who knew him. The Presbytery of Missouri at this time embraced the two states of Missouri and Illinois, and was connected with the newly erected Synod of Indiana; its previous connection had been with the Synod of Tennessee.

After the death of Mr. Giddings the pulpit was temporarily supplied by the Rev. William F. Cochran, who came to the State the preceding Fall, and was in charge of the Church at Franklin, on the Missouri river. But the necessities of the church and the importance of an immediate supply were communicated by Mr. John Naylor, an elder of a neighboring church, to Dr. Asbel Green, President of the Assembly's Board of Missions. The Board immediately despatched William S. Potts, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, who reached St. Louis May 14th, 1828. He at once commenced laboring in the church, and on the 26th of October following was ordained and installed pastor by the Presbytery of Missouri. The church then consisted of sixty-seven members.

There was at this time but one other Protestant church in the city, a small frame building occupied by the Methodists. A small Episcopal congregation worshiped in a temporary frame house that had been used for a court-house. An unsightly and unfinished brick structure occupied the site of the old Roman Catholic church, in which a parish priest officiated regularly. The Sabbath was little respected. The few Protestant professors of religion assembled in their places of worship, but the population generally pursued either their business or amusement. Among the members of the Presbyterian Church there were but two or three men of influence in the community, and the congregation was composed, in a great measure, of persons whose predilections were for other Protestant denominations, but who worshiped with the Presbyterians until churches of their own order should be established.

During the first four years of Mr. Potts' ministry the increase of the church was slow but steady. In the beginning of the year 1832 a spirit of earnest prayer was poured out upon the church, and on the 22d of January a very remarkable work of grace commenced, which continued, with more or less power, until arrested by the ravages of the cholera, in October of that year. Within three weeks about two hundred persons died, out of a population of about six thousand. During the continuance of this revival one hundred and twenty-eight persons were added to the church. A large proportion of these were active business men, and many of them of commanding influence in the community. Nor was this the only advantage consequent upon this work of grace; the church was, as a body, baptized with a new spirit, and became eminent in prayer and in every good work.

At the close of the revival the church numbered about two hundred and fifty communicants, and in order to extend its influence measures were taken to form a colony. For this purpose the Rev. Edwin L.

Hatfield was solicited to come to the city, and after laboring with the pastor of the church for a couple of months, on the 23d of November a Second Presbyterian church was organized, consisting of twenty-nine members. With the same view, several members of the church resident in the county were encouraged to form a separate church near their residences, which resulted in the organization of the Church of Des Peres, fourteen miles west of the city.

During the winters of 1833 and 1834 the two churches in the city enjoyed seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. Owing to the difficulty experienced in obtaining suitable ministers to supply the rapidly multiplying churches of the State, it became a matter of extreme solicitude to provide the means, as early as possible, for an Institution in which our own young men might be trained on the ground. With this end in view the foundation of a literary Institution was laid in Marion county, and a charter obtained from the Legislature, as early as 1830, by the Rev. David Nelson, and in June, 1835, Mr. Potts was dismissed from his charge in St. Louis, in order to his accepting the presidency of Marion College. At his instance the church called the Rev. William Wisner, of Ithaca, on the 23d July, who entered upon his labors in November following.

In the Spring of 1835 Mr. Hatfield accepted a call to the Seventh Presbyterian Church, in the city of New York, and the colony with which he had labored in St. Louis, after several unsuccessful attempts to obtain a pastor, returned, in February, 1837, and was again merged in the original church.

Mr. Wisner continued his labors in the First Church without being installed, until May, 1837. His short ministry was efficient, and the church experienced, on one or two occasions, the special quickening of the Holy Spirit. But the climate proved to be ungenial to his health, and he felt constrained to return to his native State. After the departure of Mr. Wisner the church depended upon temporary supplies until the 27th of June, 1838, when the Rev. Artemas Bullard was installed as pastor.

In the Spring of 1838 several members of the First Church, who had formerly been under his pastoral care, suggested to the Rev. W. S. Potts that, in view of the state of Marion College, he should return to the city, and proposed, on that condition, the organization of a colony from the First Church and the erection of a building that should be an ornament to the city. This colony was organized on the 10th of October, 1838, by a committee of the Presbytery of St. Louis, and called the Second Presbyterian Church of St. Louis. It was composed of sixty members from the First Church and two from other churches. The congregation worshiped, at its first organization, in a temporary building erected at the corner of Pine and Fifth streets, but early in the following Spring commenced the erection of a building on the corner of Fifth and Walnut streets. In February, 1839, they called the Rev. W. S. Potts, who, having resigned the presidency of the college at the close of the academic year, entered upon his duties in July, and was installed pastor on the 5th of October following. The congregation removed to their new house of worship in January, 1840.

From this point, at which the unfortunate division of the Church, in 1837, took effect in St. Louis, the FIRST and SECOND Churches became, as it were, landmarks by which all the subsequent history of Presbyterianism in the city is largely to be traced.

SECOND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, ST. LOUIS.

The FIRST Church identified itself with the branch known as the "New School," while the Second was of the Old School, and so they remained until, by the reunion in 1869-70, the distinction of old and new was happily obliterated.

Rev. Dr. Bullard served the First Church with great ability and efficiency until his lamented death, in the Gasconade disaster, in 1855. Few men have been more loved and appreciated while living, or more sincerely mourned when dead.

His successor in the pastorate was Rev. H. A. Nelson, D. D., who took charge in October, and was installed November 23d, 1856. He resigned in 1868, to accept the chair of Pastoral Theology in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, O. Rev. C. A. Dickey, of Allegheny City, began pastoral work in the church in May, 1869, and was installed July 4th, of the same year. He resigned in October, 1875, to accept a call to Philadelphia. In 1875 Rev. H. D. Gause, of New York, became pastor, and served the church until 1883, when he resigned, to assume the duties of Secretary of the Board of Aid. The church is at present (January, 1884) without a pastor.

In addition to the Second Church, already noticed as a colony from the First, there have been formed from it the Walnut Street Third (now the First Congregational), and the North Church. The building now occupied by the First Church was dedicated October 21st, 1855.

THE SECOND CHURCH was served by Dr. Potts, from July, 1839, till the time of his death, which occurred March 28th, 1852. During these thirteen years more than nine hundred persons, four hundred and seventy of them on profession, united with this church. Rev. Robert P. Farris supplied the pulpit for a year. Rev. N. L. Rice, D. D., of Cincinnati, was called to the pastorate January 26th, and the call repeated March 9th, 1853, and accepted. Dr. Rice entered upon his duties April 25th, 1853, was installed October 9th following, and resigned September 15th, 1857, to take the chair of Theology, in the Seminary of the Northwest. Rev. James H. Brooks served the church as pastor-elect from February, 1858, to July, 1861, when he became pastor-elect of the colony that formed the Walnut Street Church.

Rev. Samuel J. Nicolls, D. D., of Pennsylvania, was called October, 1861; began his work January 1st, and was installed March 5th, 1865. He is still pastor (1884).

The congregation worshiped for the last time in the building corner of Fifth and Walnut streets, June 28th, 1868, and occupied the chapel of the new edifice, corner Seventeenth and Lucas place, December 27th, 1868. The main building was dedicated December 25th, 1870. It is an elegant structure of stone, and cost one hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

This church has sent out the following colonies: Central Church, in 1844; Westminster (afterwards Pine Street), in 1846; Park Avenue (afterwards Chautau Avenue), —; First German, 1863; Walnut Street, 1864; and Grace Church (afterward united with Chautau Avenue), in 1868; and the South Church. The church supports four Sabbath schools, aggregating an attendance of about two thousand scholars; it also sustains a city missionary and two missions, for which houses of worship have been erected almost wholly by this church, the Kossuth Avenue, near the Fair Grounds, and Benton Station, in the suburbs. It also supports a missionary in Siam.

GRAND AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was formed by the union of the Washington Avenue, a colony from the First Church, organized in 1844, and Westminster, from the Second Church, organized in 1846. The united church adopted the name of Pine Street, and identified itself with the Old School. Its first pastor was Rev. W. C. McPheeters, D. D. In 1872 the church united with the Independent Synod of Missouri, which formed, two years later, ecclesiastical connection with the Southern General Assembly.

Its pastors succeeding Dr. McPheeters have been Rev. J. C. Thom, elected July, 1865, died November 28th following; Rev. B. T. Lacey, D. D., 1866-70; Rev. A. P. Foreman, D. D., 1871-2; Rev. E. H. Ruthford, D. D., 1874-81; Rev. F. L. Ferguson, supply for six months, and the present pastor, Rev. A. Neilson Hollifield, called in January and installed in April, 1882. In 1879 the congregation purchased a site for a new church on the west side of Grand Avenue, opposite Washington Avenue. A chapel was completed and dedicated on the 7th of November, 1880, in which the congregation still worships, pending the erection of a large and elegant edifice. At the removal the name was changed from "Pine Street" to "Grand Avenue."

CENTRAL PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized April 18th, 1844, by Rev. W. S. Potts, D. D., and Rev. William Galbreath, as the Fourth Presbyterian Church, with thirty-two members, nearly all of whom had obtained letters for this purpose from the Second Church. Rev. Joseph Templeton first supplied the pulpit, but on May 12th, 1845, Rev. Alexander Van Court was chosen pastor, and served until his death, of cholera, in July, 1849. In the Spring of 1846 the name of the church was changed to that of the Central Presbyterian Church, which it still retains. During eighteen months subsequent to the death of Mr. Van Court, the church was supplied by Rev. S. Pettigrew, Rev. John N. Hall and Rev. W. M. Ruggles. In December, 1850, Rev. S. J. P. Anderson, of Virginia, was called to the pastorate and entered upon his duties, January 20th, 1851. Under his ministry the church was greatly prospered. Dr. Anderson's health failing, he resigned May 25th, 1868. Rev. R. G. Brank, D. D., of Lexington, Ky., the present pastor, signified his acceptance of a call from the church May 31st, 1869. In 1873 the congregation removed to its present location, corner of Lucas and Garrison avenues, occupying a temporary chapel until 1876, when their beautiful edifice was completed. The church is connected with the Southern General Assembly.

THE NORTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was composed of a colony of eight members from the First Church and nine others, and organized March 27th, 1845. It is located on the corner of Eleventh and Chambers streets. The building was erected in 1857. The following persons have occupied the pulpit of the North Church since its organization: Revs. William Howes, Joshua T. Tucker, George Clark, W. H. Parks, H. E. Niles, John Maclean, Frederick Starr, Jr., S. M. Morton, C. H. Foote, D. D., W. C. Falconer, D. D., and H. S. Williams, the present pastor.

THE CARONDELET PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized in 1850. Its successive pastors have been Revs. H. P. Goodrich, D. D., R. S. Finley, J. T. Cowan, S. A. Mutchmore, D. D., C. H. Dunlap, Samuel Hay, R. A. Condit, H. S. Little, and the present pastor-elect, Rev. J. H. Shields, called in 1879. It sustains Hope Mission Chapel and two flourishing Sabbath schools.

WASHINGTON AND COMPTON AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. In June, 1864, the Rev. J. H.

Brookes, D.D., pastor of the Second Church, and one hundred and fifty members of the church, withdrew, and July 4th, 1864, were organized by a committee of the St. Louis Presbytery in connection with the Northern Assembly as the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, the Second Church making over to them the property which had been secured in 1859, consisting of a lot and partially completed building on the northwest corner of Sixteenth and Walnut streets. Within three months one hundred members of the Second Church joined them, and on the 25th of December, 1864, they first occupied the completed church, the erection of which they had begun immediately after their organization. In 1866 this church united with others in organizing the Independent Synod of Missouri, but in 1875 again placed itself in ecclesiastical connection with the Northern General Assembly.

The location of the church becoming unsuitable, a colony of about a hundred members went out and was organized as the Lafayette Park Church.

On the 1st of May, 1879, the lecture-room of the new edifice, erected by the present church, on the corner of Washington and Compton avenues, was occupied by the congregation. On the 5th of December, 1880, the first services were held in the completed building. This is a large, convenient and beautiful structure, with seating capacity in the auditorium for fifteen hundred persons. The church, under the pastoral care of Dr. Brookes, enjoys great prosperity, and exhibits a vigorous life in both home and foreign evangelistic efforts.

GLASGOW AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized on the 22d of March, 1874, as the "Garrison Avenue Church." Rev. Thomas Marshall, who gathered the church, became its first pastor, and was installed July 5th, 1874. In 1875 the church removed from the Hall occupied on Garrison avenue to its present location, at the southeast corner of Glasgow avenue and Dickson street, and held services in the basement of the present chapel. On the 14th of November, 1880, the completed chapel was dedicated. Rev. T. Marshall, having been elected Synodical Missionary for the Synod of Missouri, resigned, November, 1881, and was succeeded by Rev. W. R. Henderson, in March, 1882, who was installed May 21st. Mr. Henderson resigned in 1883, and the church is at present supplied by Rev. H. F. Williams, formerly Synodical Evangelist of the Synod of Missouri. The church has several efficient societies, and a large and prosperous Sabbath school.

THE WESTMINSTER PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, corner of Pestalozzi and Lux streets, was organized December 31st, 1873, the preliminary work having been done by Rev. W. Howell Buchanan and a few scholastic helpers. The congregation worshiped in rented rooms, first on Carondelet avenue, then on Arsenal street, till the 5th of March, 1876, when the completed basement of the present building was occupied. Mr. Buchanan was installed pastor on the 14th of January, 1877, having served the church as stated supply from the beginning. He resigned in 1879, and was succeeded by Rev. J. G. Reaser, D.D., the present pastor, who began his work April 1st, and was installed in May following. This church occupies a field of peculiar difficulty, and is doing good work. It became self-sustaining at the beginning of the present pastorate. It has several active societies, and a large and flourishing Sabbath school.

THE SOUTH PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized in May, 1875, and was really a colony from the Second Church. It has never had an installed pastor, but has been supplied by Rev. J. R. Dunn, Rev. P. S. Van Nest, Rev. H. B. Holmes and others.

LAFAYETTE PARK PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, situated on Missouri avenue opposite the west entrance to the park, was organized in 1878, as a colony from Walnut Street Church, now Washington and Compton avenue. This organization also absorbed most of the scattered members of the Chateau Avenue Church, which was dissolved in 1875. The first pastor was Rev. D. C. Marquis, D.D., who resigned in the Spring of 1883, to accept a professorship in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest at Chicago. The church has called Rev. George P. Wilson, of Kentucky, who expects to enter upon his work in February, 1884.

The beautiful and commodious building erected by this church was completed in the Spring of 1883. The membership has rapidly increased, the congregations are large, and the entire work of the church is carried forward with efficiency and success.

MEMORIAL TABERNACLE, growing out of the celebrated Biddle Market Mission, under the care of Mr. Thomas Morrison, was organized July 12th, 1861, by Rev. H. C. McCook, and known as the "First Independent Church of St. Louis." After passing through various changes in its ecclesiastical relations, it finally united with the Presbytery of St. Louis, in connection with the Northern Assembly, in the year 1870. Its pulpit was supplied for a time by Rev. William Porteus. In 1881 Rev. William Claggett was called to its pastorate. He ministered in this church until the Fall of 1883. Rev. Mr. Brandt is now the pastor elect.

FIRST GERMAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized May 18th, 1863, in the basement of the Second Presbyterian Church, then on the corner of Fifth and Walnut streets. The congregation held its meetings at first in the South Mission Sabbath-school building, on Marion and Ninth streets. In 1866 the buildings now occupied, on the corner of Autumn and South streets, were commenced, and the completed church was dedicated September 17th, 1871. The Rev. A. Van der Lippe, D.D., was elected pastor, October 23d, 1863, and still continues in that relation. This church has an important work, and does it faithfully and with a good measure of success. It has several associations, and contributes liberally in proportion to its means.

THE SECOND GERMAN PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH was organized in 1776, and has been supplied by Rev. Frederick Auf der Heide from the beginning. It owns and worships in a neat and comfortable brick chapel on Grand avenue and Thirteenth street. Its membership is small, but active, and its Sabbath school prosperous.

Stockton, John, D. D., descended from Scotch-Irish ancestors. His great-grandfather, his grandfather and his father were ruling elders in the Presbyterian Church, while many of his near relatives were ministers and elders in the same church. He was born in the Valley of Chartiers, near Washington, Pa., November 18th, 1803; graduated at Washington College, Pa., October 3d, 1820; studied theology with seven others, under the direction of Dr. John Anderson, of Upper Buffalo, and the Hebrew Language and Church History with Dr. Andrew Wylie, President of Washington College, for three years; was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Washington, April 20th, 1825, and afterwards spent a year at Princeton Theological Seminary. He accepted a call from Cross Creek Church in April, 1827; began to preach stately on the first Sabbath of May, and was ordained and installed as pastor on the 20th of June following. He continued in charge of this congregation fifty years.

Dr. Stockton's labors were greatly blessed among this people. In 1827-28, again in 1835-36-37, again in 1840-41-42, again in 1853-54, the congregation was visited with powerful and precious revivals, from which the church received very large accessions. After that time, in 1857-58 and '59, gentle showers of grace distilled on this hill of Zion, and with only one or two exceptions, there were some added to the church at every communion season. The number received into membership during his ministry was one thousand five hundred and forty-five, and forty ministers of the gospel, and more than one hundred ruling elders were raised up.

Dr. Stockton was greatly beloved by his congregation. When, in 1877, under the infirmities of age, he decided to resign his charge, the church "Resolved, That in advance of the solemn crisis of separation now contemplated, we do not hesitate to assure our beloved pastor that he shall carry with him into his chosen retirement the unabated confidence and warm attachment of his people." They also made him Pastor Emeritus. He was also ardently loved by his Presbytery, which, in a minute adopted at the dissolution of his pastoral relation, expressed its attachment to him as one who "by God's guidance had been enabled to befriend every good cause, promote every form of Christian activity and benevolence, and strengthen every instrumentality for the advancement of Christ's kingdom."

Dr. Stockton was an eminent Christian man, and his name will ever occupy a conspicuous place in the list of successful preachers and pastors in Western Pennsylvania. He was distinguished as a scholar, educator, theologian and presbyter. His preaching was earnest, Scriptural, pungent; quickening Christians and arousing the impenitent. He was very animated in the pulpit, and wielded great influence in the community and in the Church courts. His piety was not of the negative kind, but was a life in the soul, a principle that regulated all his actions, an embodiment of all the truths he so ably preached.

A few weeks before his death he attended the funeral of the last survivor of those whose names were on the roll of membership at the beginning of his pastorate, and on that occasion he contracted the cold which brought on his last illness. He came down to death in a manner altogether in harmony with the life which he lived in Christ, "like as a shock of corn cometh in its season." He died at Cross Creek, Pa., May 5th, 1882.

Stockton, Rev. Joseph, was the son of Robert and Mary (McHenry) Stockton, of Franklin county, Pa. He was born near Chambersburg, February 25th, 1779. In 1784, he removed with his father's family to the neighborhood of Washington, Pa. He pursued his classical studies at the Canonsburg Academy, in which he was also for a time an instructor; studied theology under Dr. John McMillan, and was licensed to preach the gospel, June 26th, 1799. On June 24th, 1801, he was installed pastor of the Church at Meadville, in connection with that of Little Sugar Creek, and continued this relation until June 27th, 1810. During this pastorate he had charge of the Meadville Academy, and conducted it with ability and success. In 1809 Mr. Stockton was elected Principal of the Pittsburg Academy, which was subsequently merged into the "Western University of Pennsylvania." In this position he continued to labor with great success until 1820. During these years he published several valuable educational works. In 1827 he was one of the instructors in the Western Theological Seminary. Subsequently, he preached to the church of Pine Creek, where his labors were greatly blessed, and devoted some time to missionary labor, in connection with the Church in Allegheny city. He died, October 29th, 1832. His end was peace.

Stockton, Hon. Richard. No name stands higher among the lawyers and statesmen of America than that of Richard Stockton. He was the son of John Stockton, and was born in Princeton, N. J., October 1st, 1730. After graduating, he studied law, and soon became prominent in his profession. In 1766 he visited Europe, where he was received with flattering marks of friendship and respect by many eminent noblemen, gentlemen and men of letters. In 1774 he was appointed Judge of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and in 1776 was offered the Chief Justiceship, which he declined. The same year he was elected to the Continental Congress, and was one of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence. While a member of Congress, during a visit to the house of a friend in Monmouth city, N. J., he was captured by a party of royalists and thrown into prison in New York city. He obtained his release through the interference of Congress.

Mr. Stockton had an unrivaled reputation at the Bar, and it was said that he always refused to engage in any cause which he knew to be unjust. From 1757 till his death, February 28th, 1781, he was a trustee of New Jersey College, and for many years a member and trustee of the Presbyterian Church in Princeton. An estimate of the high tone of his Christian character can be formed by reading the following extract from his last will: "As my children will have frequent occasion of perusing this instrument, and may probably be peculiarly impressed with the last words of their father, I think proper here, not only to subscribe to the entire belief of the great leading doctrines of the Christian religion, such as the being of a God, the universal defection and depravity of human nature, the divinity of the person and completeness of the redemption purchased by the blessed Saviour, the necessity of the divine Spirit, of divine faith, accompanied with an habitual virtuous life, and the universality of divine Providence, but also in the bowels of a father's affection, to charge and exhort them to remember that the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom."

Stoddard, Charles Augustus, D. D., pastor and editor, is a lineal descendant of Anthony Stoddard, who emigrated to Boston, from England, in 1639. His son was the Rev. Solomon Stoddard, who was pastor of the church in Northampton, Mass., for sixty years, and the father-in-law of Rev. Jonathan Edwards, President of Princeton College. His son was Colonel John Stoddard, an officer in His Majesty's service, one of the Governor's council, and Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, also Judge of Probate. These ancestors were graduates of Harvard College; the two succeeding ancestors were graduates of Yale. Rev. David T. Stoddard, the missionary to Persia, was a brother of Dr. Stoddard's father. The Rev. Charles A. Stoddard, D. D., the subject of this sketch, and the son of Charles and Mary A. Stoddard, was born in Boston, Mass., May 28th, 1833; was educated at the Boston Latin School; graduated at Williams College, in 1851. After graduation he taught at Phillips Academy, Andover, and traveled through Europe and the East. He spent one year in the study of theology, at the Free Church College, Edinburgh, Scotland, and three years at Union Seminary, New York. In 1858-9 he supplied the Manhattanville Presbyterian Church. In September, 1859, he was ordained pastor of the Washington Heights Presbyterian Church, New York city, which had just been organized, and he continued in that pastorate till January, 1883. He was employed in editorial work upon the New York Observer, from the commencement of his ministry in New York, and in 1873 he became an editor and proprietor of that paper. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Williams College, in 1871.

Stoddard, Prof. O. N., LL. D., is a native of New York, and graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1836. He taught school two and a half years in Smithfield, Isle of Wight county, Va., and then removed to Washington city, taking charge of "Capitol Hill Female Seminary." In September, 1841, he accepted appointment to the Presidency of "Bardstown Female Academy" Kentucky, a school founded by Rev. N. L. Rice, D. D. In 1845 he was elected Professor of Natural Sciences in Miami University, Ohio, where he continued till 1870, when he accepted a like chair in the University of Wooster. This position he has occupied up to the present time. He was Vice-president of Miami University from 1852 until his resignation in 1870. During a part of 1854 he was President pro-tem of the University. In 1863 he was made President of the Board of Directors of "Oxford Female College," and held the office until 1875. He was appointed a delegate to the General Assembly in 1860 and 1866. He was a Commissioner from the Synod of Cincinnati in the establishment of the "Northwestern Theological Seminary" at Chicago. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him in 1865, by Monmouth College, Illinois.

Prof. Stoddard has written largely upon scientific and other subjects for his classes. An extended discussion of the "Relations of Mind to Matter," and upon special relations of Science, has formed part of his yearly instructions. He has contended earnestly, for years, with pen and voice, against the secular views of government; and some half a dozen carefully written addresses upon various relations of the State to the Bible and Christianity have been delivered at Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburg and Philadelphia, and published by the secular and religious press. Two addresses upon literary subjects have been issued in pamphlet form; and two articles touching certain relations of Science to Revelation were published in the Danville Review, in 1864. The great volume of Nature has to him been second only to the greater volume of Revelation.

Stone Church, Augusta county, Virginia. On the great paved road from Winchester to Staunton, beyond the eighty-third mile-stone, on the right (about eight miles from Staunton), in a grove of ancient oaks, stands a stone building of antique and singular appearance. The east end is towards the road, with a large doorway for folding doors about midway from the corners of the house, and on one side of this large entrance is a low, narrow door, according with no known architecture or proportion. Near the ridge of the roof the gable slants a number of feet, as if the corner of the roof and gable had been cut off and the vacancy covered with shingles. A little above the great door is a window of modern construction. On the north side of the house is an appendage, a small room with walls and chimney of stone. Diverging from the road, in the path long trod by the generations assembling here, and at a small distance from the house, are traces of a ditch and the remains of an embankment, drawn quite round the house, in a military style. This is the oldest house of worship in the Valley of Virginia. It has seen the revolution of years carrying away generations of men, and their habitations and their churches. The light pine doors speak at once their modern origin, swinging in the place of the massive oaks that hung upon the solid posts, in unison with the walls that now, after the storms of a century have left their marks, give no signs of speedy decay. Reared before Braddock's war, this house was to the early emigrants a place for the worship of Almighty God and a retreat from the inroads of the savages; the dwelling-place of mercy and a refuge from the storm. That ditch was deep, and that bank had its palisade, and that little door was the wicket-gate, and that room was the kitchen, when the alarm of approaching savages filled the house and closed the massive doors. Thus secured, the courageous women and children could defend themselves from any savage attack, while the strong men went to their fields, or to drive off the intruding foe. On the other side of the great road is the place where these adventurous emigrants were laid to repose till dust has returned to dust, in close assemblage, as in the House of God or the palisaded fort. These first settlers of this beautiful country were, like those of Opeceon, from the North of Ireland, the blended Scotch-Irish, and in search, as they said, of freedom of conscience, with a competence, in the wilderness; and for these they cheerfully left their homes and kindred in Ireland. Before the year 1738 they located themselves in large numbers on the prairie hills and vales of the "Triple Forks of Shenandoah."

The old stone church, with the graveyard near, was the centre of a cluster of neighborhoods in which families had settled who chose their residence according as they fancied a spring of water, a running stream, a hill, a piece of woods, a prairie, or extensive range for cattle and horses, or abundance of game that gathered in some valleys.

Missionaries speedily followed these emigrants. The Rev. James Anderson, of the Presbytery of Donegal, visited them in 1738, and the Rev. Mr. Thompson of the same Presbytery, in 1739. The same year Mr. John Craig, a licentiate, was sent by the Presbytery to visit "Opeceon, the High Tract, and other societies of our persuasion in Virginia, at his discretion." The next Spring, June 17th, Mr. Craig accepted a "call from the inhabitants at Shenandoah and the South river," and in September, 1740, passed his trials for ordination. In view of the peculiar interest of the occasion, an appointment was made of "a day of solemn fasting and prayer, to be observed by all parties concerned, in order to implore the Divine blessing and concurrence in the great undertaking." The Rev. Mr. Sankey preached, from Jeremiah iii, 15. Mr. Craig was the first Presbyterian minister regularly settled in the Colony of Virginia.

The old stone church is blended with many thrilling and interesting associations. The remains of the fortifications in the Indian wars, wasting away by the constant tread of the assembling congregations, are eloquent memorials of the early age of Augusta county. The venerable structure has seen generations pass; it has heard the sermons of the Virginia Synod in its youthful days. Could its walls re-echo the sentences that have been uttered there, what a a series of sermons! Its three pastors, for about a hundred years, taught from the same pulpit. There the famous Waddell was taken under the care of Hanover Presbytery, as a candidate for the ministry, in 1760; there the venerated Hoge was licensed in 1781; and there the Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander passed some of his trials in preparation for the ministry. There were the teachings of the first settled minister in Virginia, and there have been heard the voices of the worthies of the Virginia Presbyterians for more than a century. There has been treasured their testimony for God, to be heard again in the Judgment Day.

It is a matter for regret that so few of the mounds in the old burying ground, where lie so many of the first settlers in that beautiful region, have inscriptions, to tell where those emigrants sleep. But the congregation has not been forgetful of the graves of their three pastors, who, for nearly a century, were examples of patient labors of ministers, and the stability of the Church. Near the middle of the yard is a slab with a headstone. On the stone is the short record, expressing volumes:—

"ERECTED BY G. C. SON TO J. C."

On the slab,

"In memory of Rev. John Craig, D.D., commencement of the Presbyterian service in this place, Anno Domini, 1740, and faithfully discharging his duty in the same to April the 21st, Anno Domini, 1774; then departed this life, with fifteen hours' affliction from the hand of the great Creator, aged sixty-three years and four months. The Church of Augusta, in expression of their gratitude to the memory of their late beloved pastor, having obtained liberty of G. C. of the expense of this monument, 1798."

Towards the gate on the west end, on a white marble slab, is the inscription:—

"Sacred to the memory of Rev. William Wilson, second pastor of Augusta Church. Born August 1st, 1734; died December 1st, 1815."

A little nearer the gate, upon a white marble slab, is to be read:—

"Sacred to the memory of Rev. Daniel Speer, D.D., for more than twenty-two years pastor of Augusta Church; born November 7th, 1770; died February 14th, 1846. He consecrated a mind to the genius and learning to the service of his Synod, in the great work of the gospel ministry, and here sleeps with his people, till they stand before the judgment seat of Christ. Reader—if in his life he tried in vain to save, hear him at last, O! hear him from the grave. This stone is erected in the most affectionate and judicious manner."

Rev. William Brown succeeded Dr. Speece in the Autumn following his death and remained pastor for about twenty-five years, when he resigned to take editorial charge of the Central Presbyterian. After conducting this paper with singular ability in troublous times, an honor to himself and a benefit to the Church, he was compelled, a few years since, by the enfeebled state of his eyesight, to surrender it to others. Rev. Francis Bowman succeeded him in charge of Augusta Church for a few years, when he accepted a call to the First Church, in Memphis, where he fell a prey (1873) to the malignant yellow fever. His successor was Rev. L. W. K. Handy, D.D., who remained pastor, though for several years in feeble health, till his death, in July, 1878. After a vacancy of a few years, Rev. Alexander Sprunt was settled pastor and still remains. The venerable church edifice has been refitted and the long used pews, through generations, have given place to more modern structures, and the interior of the building beautifully arranged. The roof has been remodeled so as to present a pleasing shape and yet not destroy the unimpaired venerable appearance of the stone walls, which for nearly a century and a half have remained unaffected by storms or time's corroding hand.

Strain, Rev. John, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, May 29th, 1759, and ordained in 1761. He settled in York county, Pa. Dr. Archibald Alexander said of him, that he was a preacher of uncommon power and success, and his manner awfully solemn. He was called to succeed Gilbert Tennent, in Philadelphia, but declined the call. He died May 21st, 1774.

Stratton, Rev. Daniel, the son of Daniel P. and Jane (Buck) Stratton, was born in Bridgeton, N. J., September 28th, 1811. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1833, taught for a year in Salem, N. J., and entered the Seminary at Princeton, but failing health requiring a warmer climate, he finished his theological course at Union Seminary, Va., in 1837. On April 13th, of that year, he was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery. Subsequently he was installed pastor at Newbern, N. C., where, for fifteen years, he faithfully preached the Word of God, while with a holy example he illustrated its power. In August, 1854, he became pastor of the Church in Salem, N. J., and for the space of fourteen years went in and out before this people. He died at his residence in Salem, August 24th, 1866. Mr. Stratton had a vigorous and cultivated mind. There was a massive force and a luminous wisdom in his utterances, a pertinence in his matter, a gracefulness in his style, and an intonation in his tone, which made him a preacher of no common order. His popularity, for a series of years in Newbern and Salem, is sufficient evidence of this. He was an eminently consecrated man, loved the work of the ministry, wrought in it with an unusual simplicity of faith and tenderness of love, and was successful in winning many souls to the Saviour.

Stratton, Joseph Buck, D.D., now in the fortieth year of his pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Natchez, Miss., was born at Bridgeton, N. J., December 21th, 1815. He was graduated at Princeton College, in September, 1833, and after a course of study for the profession of the Law, at Philadelphia, he was admitted to the Bar of that city. But in 1840, without any discouraging distrust of his fitness for the profession, or insensibility to its allurements, he yielded to the supremacy of religious convictions, left the Bar, and entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he completed the course of study, and for a time filled the place of Tutor. In 1842 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia. On December 31st, 1843, he was ordained and installed, by the Presbytery of Mississippi, as pastor of the church of which he has ever since had charge. It was with diffidence that he consented to fill a position which had been occupied by the gifted and eloquent Rev. Drs. George Potts and Samuel G. Winchester, but he has proved himself worthy to be their successor, by his marked pulpit ability, his pastoral fidelity, his sound judgment and discretion, his admirable social qualities, and his earnest and exemplary Christian character. The test of twoscore years has only served to enlarge his usefulness, inspire his people with increased confidence and affection, and augment his popularity and influence in the city and region in which he has so long and so faithfully and successfully labored.

JOSEPH BUCK STRATTON, D.D.

When not abroad for duty, as a member of the judicatories of the Church, or for necessary recreation. Dr. Stratton has rarely been absent from his pulpit. Though slender in stature, and apparently frail and delicate, the rule of dependence for strength of mind upon body has seemingly been reversed in him. He has wonderful physical vigor, in connection with tireless mental energy. Of the published productions of his pen may be mentioned a sermon entitled "Truth in the Household," preached before the General Assembly of 1857, in behalf of the Board of Publication; his "Report on Beneficiary Education," to the General Assembly (South) of 1877, occasional sermons to his charge, a manual for inquirers, entitled "Confessing Christ," and addresses on several occasions. His contributions to the religious press have had attractions extending beyond the circle of partial readers. Dr. Stratton is highly esteemed by his ministerial brethren, and whilst agreeably characterized by the amenities of social life, is nevertheless firm and decided in his adherence to and maintenance of his convictions of truth and duty.

Stratton, Rev. William O., was born in Baltimore, Md., November 19th, 1798; when a little boy worked at morocco dressing; at the age of twelve was a cabin boy; engaged for a time in mercantile business in New York; united with the Presbyterian Church; studied at the Academy in Bloomfield, N. J., three years; was licensed to preach the gospel in 1825; labored successfully for three years in New Jersey and Western New York; went to Ohio as a licentiate in 1828; was pastor of the Church of Canfield, until 1841; was pastor of the Church of North Benton, twenty-four years, where there were wonderful revivals under his ministry; and subsequently resided in Warren, admired and beloved by all, and occasionally preaching in the absence of the pastor. He died at Warren, Ohio, January 27th, 1881. Mr. Stratton was a man of great personal integrity and of most earnest Christian belief. He was active and zealous as a pastor and held in the highest esteem by all who knew him.

Strickland, William P., D.D., was born in Pittsburg, Pa., August 17th, 1809. He was a student in the Ohio University, at Athens, and in after years received from that Institution the degree of D. D. His first ministry was in the Methodist Church, in which he filled some prominent appointments. He served five years as agent of the American Bible Society, after which he became Associate Editor of the Christian Advocate Journal, New York. In 1865 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church, Bridgehampton, L. I. After nine years in this position he was unanimously chosen its pastor and duly installed. In consequence of ill health he was obliged to resign after serving three years. He now sustains the relation of Evangelist in the New York Presbytery. Dr. Strickland is the author of a number of popular works, among which are the "History of the American Bible Society," "Manual of Biblical Literature," "Christianity, Demonstrated," etc., etc. He has also made large and valuable contributions to encyclopedias, reviews, magazines, and papers.

Strong, Addison Kellogg, D. D., was born in Aurora, N. Y., March 27th, 1823, and graduated from Hamilton College in 1842. He was ordained and installed at Otisco, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Onondaga, December, 1846. His pastoral relations continued until 1855. His subsequent fields of labor have been: Monroe, Mich., 1855-63; Galena, Ill., 1863-6; Park Church, Syracuse, 1866-70; Pine Street Church, Harrisburg, Pa., 1870-4; First Presbyterian Church, Kalamazoo, Mich., 1874-6; Clyde, N. Y., 1877-9; Hoboken, N. J., 1879-82. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Hamilton College in 1869. Dr. Strong's ministrations have been marked with ability and attended with success. He is earnest in his work, and shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God.

Strong, William, LL. D., is one of the most eminent jurists of our country. His life has been signally marked with honor and usefulness. He was born at Somers, Conn., May 6th, 1808. His father was the Rev. William L. Strong, who for twenty-five years was pastor of the Congregational Church at Somers, succeeding Rev. Dr. Backus, and subsequently pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Vienna, N. Y. He graduated from Yale College in 1828, and taught school three years, during which he studied law, part of the time at the New Haven Law School. He commenced legal practice at Reading, Pa., in 1832; in 1843 was chosen an elder of the Presbyterian Church there; in 1846 was elected to Congress, and again in 1848. Declining a re-election, he returned to his legal practice. In 1857 he was elected a Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and then removed to Philadelphia, connecting himself with Calvary Presbyterian Church, of which he was immediately chosen an elder.

Judge Strong resigned his judicial commission October 1st, 1868, and commenced the practice of the law in Philadelphia. In January, 1870, he was appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, when he removed to Washington. He continued in that Court until the close of the year 1880, faithfully meeting the demands of the position, and then resigned. He has been an elder of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Washington, from a short time after his removal there. He was for many years a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. M., and until the union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church. He was a member of the committee that prepared and reported the plan of union. He has been many years a Vice-president of the American Bible Society and of the American Sunday School Union, and for some years has been President of the American Tract Society. He has been honored with the degree of LL.D. by his Alma Mater, Yale College, by Princeton, and by Lafayette. He was a member of the Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, which convened at Philadelphia, September, 1880. He is highly esteemed for his dignity, uprightness, social qualities and intellectual ability, and in the judicatories of the Church and other spheres of Christian activity exerts a commanding influence.

Stryker, Peter, D. D., is a son of the Rev. Herman B. Stryker, and grandson of the Rev. Peter Stryker. He was born in Fairfield, N. Y., April 8th, 1826; spent two years in the University of Pennsylvania; graduated at Rutgers College, and from the Theological Seminary, New Brunswick, N. J., in 1848. After being settled for eight years in Reformed churches of Raritan, N. J., and Rhinebeck, N. Y., he became pastor of Broome Street Reformed Church, New York city, in 1856, and continued in this relation twelve years. In 1868 he was installed over the North Broad Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and resigning this charge in 1870, on account of the health of two members of his family, assumed the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, Rome, N. Y. In 1876 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Saratoga, N. Y. In 1884 he took charge of Andrew Church, Minneapolis, Minn.

Dr. Stryker is of a genial and cheerful spirit; he has written much for religious journals, published a number of sermons and tracts, and is the author of a little volume, entitled, "Little Gems from the Saviour's Crown," and a number of published hymns. He is much interested in the Temperance reform, and has been one of the Vice-presidents of the National Temperance Society, and Chairman of the Board of Managers of the New York State Temperance Society. He frequently preaches and lectures on this subject. He loves to work, and all that he attempts is done with judgment and energy, and hence generally with success. He is a fluent and practical preacher. He is also logical and argumentative, and whatever he has to say, does not hesitate to say it fearlessly and to the point. Instead of traveling along the beaten track of his pastoral duties, he puts his shoulder to the wheel wherever he thinks he can do his fellow-man a service.

Stuart, Joseph, although a native of the North of Ireland, was a citizen of New York city for nearly half a century. He possessed many excellent qualities, was highly gifted as a financier, which qualified him to sustain many important positions of usefulness and responsibility in various monetary and beneficent institutions. Blending gentleness with firmness in an eminent degree, he was quiet and unostentatious in business relations, genial and amiable in deportment, and ever ready by aid or counsel to assist others in any walk of life. As a member of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, his love and reverence for the institutions of religion shone with a calm and steady lustre. As a practical philanthropist, recognizing the claims imposed by the varied necessities of a common humanity, he deeply sympathized in the objects of the Presbyterian Hospital in New York, of which he was a manager, and from its projection to the close of his life (November 18th, 1874) was unremitting in his efforts to promote its interests.

Stuart, Robert, born in Perthshire, Scotland, in 1784, the son of upright parents; he came to America in his 23d year; connected himself with John Jacob Astor in the organization of "The Pacific Fur Company;" sailed for that coast by way of Cape Horn, in 1810, and aided in founding Astoria; returned to New York by land about 1812. In 1817, he went to the island of Mackinaw, where he conducted the business of the American Fur Company for seventeen years, where, in 1828, he was converted; removed to Detroit, Mich., in 1835, and in 1837 he was elected a ruling elder of the First Presbyterian Church. He died suddenly, on the 29th of October, 1848. A funeral discourse was delivered by his pastor, Rev. George Duffield, D. D., in which he was shown to be, in life, character and example, "the faithful Christian." He was a man of great business ability and energy, and of incorruptible integrity. A man, in appearance and manner, of stern and severe disposition, but his heart was large and tender, and gentle at times as a little child's. His character was that of a noble and consistent Christian, and an exemplary man of business.

Studdiford, Peter O., D. D., was born at Readington, N. J., January 11th, 1799; graduated with the highest honor at Rutgers College in 1816; finished his theological course at Princeton, September

29th, 1821; was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 27th, 1819, and began his labors in the neighborhood of Bristol and Tullytown, Pa. He commenced his labors at Lambertville, N. J., December 2d, 1821, alternating for one year with the Solebury Church in Pennsylvania. In June, 1825, he was installed pastor of these churches. In the same year he opened a classical school in his own house, and from that time onward he labored as pastor and teacher with this people. He died June 5th, 1866. Dr. Charles Hodge, who knew Dr. Studdiford long and well, said of him: "We all esteemed him as an eminently wise, judicious and able theologian. In the course of fifty-five years I never heard him speak evil of any man, and I never heard any man speak evil of him. In the discharge of his pastoral duties he was instructive, faithful and laborious. In the judicatories and boards of our Church he was uniformly kind and courteous, and his opinions were always received with the greatest deference. Very few men lived a more honored and useful life; few men more lamented in death."

Sugar Creek Church, Mecklenburg county, North Carolina. About three miles north of Charlotte is the plain brick meeting-house of the Sugar Creek congregation. This is the present place of worship of part of the oldest Presbyterian congregation in the upper country, in some measure the parent of the seven congregations that formed the Convention in Charlotte, in 1775, by which the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence was framed and adopted. The Indian name of the creek which gave name to the congregation was pronounced Sugar or Sogaar, and in the early records of the church was written Sugaw; but for many years it has been written according to the common pronunciation, ending the word with the letter e instead of w. This brick church is the third house of worship used by the congregation: the first stood about half a mile west from this, and the second a few steps south, the pulpit being over the place now occupied by the pastor's grave.

Previous to the year 1750 the emigration to this beautiful but distant frontier was slow, and the solitary cabins were found upon the borders of prairies and in the vicinity of canebrakes, the immense ranges abounding with wild game and affording sustenance the whole year for herds of tame cattle. Extensive tracts of country between the Yadkin and the Catawba, now waving with thrifty forest, then were covered with tall grass, with scarce a bush or shrub, looking, at first view, as if immense grazing farms had been at once abandoned, the houses disappearing, and the abundant grass luxuriating in its native wilderness and beauty, the wild herds wandering at pleasure, and nature rejoicing in undisturbed quietness.

From about the year 1750, family after family, group after group, succeeded in rapid progression, led on by reports sent back by the adventurous pioneers, of the fertility and beauty of those solitudes, where conscience was free and labor all voluntary. By the time that the Rev. Hugh McAden visited the settlements, in 1755 and 1756, they were in sufficient numbers to form a congregation in the centre spot. Many of the early settlers were truly pious, many others had been accustomed to attend upon and support the ordinances of God's House. Intermingled were some that delighted, in these solitudes, to throw off all restraint, and live in open disregard of the ordinances of God, and as far as was safe, in defiance of the laws of man. The pious and the moral united in the worship of God, and formed the congregation of Sugar Creek, which knew no other bounds than the distance men and women could walk or ride to church, which was often as much as fifteen miles, as a regular thing, and twenty for an occasional meeting. A visit to the localities of this congregation will reward the traveler.

Turning westward from this brick church, about half a mile through the woods, you find, on a gentle ascent, the first burying-ground of this congregation, and probably the oldest in Mecklenburg county. A few rods to the east of the stone wall that surrounds it stood a log church, where the Rev. Alexander Craighead preached, and where were congregated, from Sabbath to Sabbath, many choice spirits, that, having worshiped the God of their fathers, in this wilderness, far from their native land, now sleep in this yard. The house, to its very foundation, has passed away, and with it the generation that gathered in it upon the first settlement of the land. Their deeds remain. The children of that race have passed away too, and with them is passing, fast passing, to oblivion, the knowledge of things and men and deeds, which posterity will vainly dig from the rubbish of antiquity, and shall dig for in vain. The generation has passed, without a history, and almost without an epitaph.

These little breaches you see in the time-defying wall, reared by the emigrants around the burial place of their dead, were made by gold diggers, when the excitement first spread over the land, upon the discovery that these adventurous people had lived and died, and were buried here, ignorant that there was, or could be, in their place of worship and sepulchre, any deposit more dear to posterity than the ashes of their ancestors. Entering by the gateway at the northwestern corner, through which the emigrants carried their dead, a multitude of graves, closely congregated, meet the eye. You cannot avoid the impression, as you move on, that you are wading upon the ashes of the dead, and as you read some of the scanty memorials reared by affection to mark the burial places of friends, that you are among the tombs of the first settlers, who lie in crowds beneath your feet, without a stone to tell whose body is resting there in expectation of the resurrection.

The first head-stone, a little distance from the gate on the right, is inscribed—

"MRS. JEMIMA ALEXANDER SHARPE, Born January 30th, 1727, Died September 1st, 1797, a widow thirty-eight years"

An elder sister of the Secretary of the Convention, one of the earliest emigrants to this country. She used to say that in the early days of her residence here her nearest neighbor northward was eight miles, and southward and eastward fifteen; that the coming of a neighbor was a matter of rejoicing, and that her heart was sustained in her solitude by the doctrines of the gospel and the creed of her Church.

In the southwest corner is an inscription to JANE WALLIS, who died July 31st, 1792, in the eightieth year of her age; the honored mother of the Rev. Mr. Wallis, minister of Providence, some fifteen miles south of this place, the able defender of Christianity against infidelity spreading over the country at the close of the Revolution, like a flood. His grave is with his people.

Near the middle of the yard is the stone inscribed to the memory of DAVID ROBINSON, who died October 12th, 1808, aged eighty-two, an emigrant, and the father of the Rev. Dr. Robinson, who served the congregation of Poplar Tent about forty years, and ended his course in December, 1843. It was at a spring on this man's land, and near his house, that the congregation of Sugar Creek and Hopewell used to meet and spend days of fasting and prayer together, during the troublesome times of the early stages of the French Revolution. From the peculiar formation of the ravine around the spring, the pious people were willing to believe that it was a place designed of God for his people to meet and seek his face.

The oldest monument, but not the monument of the oldest grave, is a small stone thus inscribed:—

Body of ROBERT
MCKEE, who deceased
October the 19th, 1775,
Aged 73 years.

Around lie many that were distinguished in the Revolution, without a stone to their graves, and not one with an epitaph that should tell the fact of that honorable distinction. Perhaps the omission may have arisen from the circumstance, honorable to the country, that, with few exceptions, the whole neighborhood were noted for privations and suffering, and brave exploits in a cause sacred in their eyes.

The most interesting grave is at the southeast corner, without an inscription or even a stone or mound to signify that the bones of any mortal are there. It is the grave of the Reverend Alexander Craighead, the first minister of the congregation, and of the six succeeding ones (Steel Creek, Providence, Hopewell, Centre, Rocky River and Poplar Tent), whose members composed the entire Convention in Charlotte, in May, 1775. Tradition says that the two sassafras trees standing the one at the head and the other at the foot of the grave sprung from two sticks on which, as a bier, the coffin of this memorable man was borne to the grave in March, 1766. Mr. Craighead was distinguished by his aspirations for liberty, and the community which assumed its form under his guiding hand had the image of democratic republican liberty more fair than any sister settlement in all the South, perhaps in all the United States. And his religious creed as to doctrines, and also as to experience, has been the creed of the Presbyterians of Mecklenburg. Besides this double influence of the man, living and speaking after him, much of his spirit has been inherited by his descendants, and with it the affections of the people.

The immediate successor of Mr. Craighead was Joseph Alexander, a connection of the McKnitt branch of Alexanders, a man of education and talents, of small stature, and exceedingly animated in his pulpit exercises. His installation took place on the third Friday in May, 1768. On February 21st, 1792, the Rev. Samuel C. Caldwell became pastor of Sugar Creek and Hopewell churches. Of great self-command, clear in his conception of truth, and plain in his enunciation, both in style and manner, amiable in his disposition and manners, kind from his natural feelings, and from the benevolence of the gospel he loved and preached, he passed his whole ministerial life, after his ordination, in connection with the prominent congregation that had called him to be pastor. Entering the burial-ground of Sugar Creek by the roadside, on the south, the first white stone that meets the eye marks his grave, directly beneath the communion table of the log church he long occupied as minister, the spot where he stood when he took his ordination vows, and where he chose to be buried when he should have finished his course. His epitaph is:—

to the memory of the late REV. SAMUEL C. CALDWELL, who departed this life
Oct. 3d, 1826,
in the 59th year of his age, and the 35th of his pastoral office of Sugar Creek Congregation.
His long and harmonious continuance in that relation is his best Eulogium.

The Rev. Hall Morrison, his successor, became the pastor of the church in 1827, and continued for ten years, preaching a fourth of his time at Charlotte-town. In 1837 he was removed to the Presidential chair of Davidson College. His successor was Rev. John M. M. Caldwell, the son of the Rev. S. C. Caldwell, who resigned his office in 1845.

Stepping a little further into the middle of the yard, under the shade of these old oaks, we may read on an humble stone the name of one who will never be forgotten in Carolina, a magistrate of the county, the Chairman of the Convention of 1775, and of the Committee of Public Safety and an elder of the church.

Sunderland, Byron, D. D., was born November 22d, 1819, in Shoreham, Addison county, Vt. He graduated at Middlebury College, in his native State, in 1838. After teaching for some time, he studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, from 1841 to May, 1843. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Batavia, N. Y., in the Autumn of 1843. In 1851 he was called to the pastorate of Park Presbyterian Church, Syracuse, N. Y., where, declining installation for a time, he labored as pastor elect until the beginning of 1853, when he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., over which he was installed the following April, and of which he still has charge.

In July, 1861, Dr. Sunderland was elected Chaplain of the United States Senate, which office he resigned in May, 1864, on account of impaired health, and with a view of taking charge of the American Chapel, at Paris, France, to which he had been appointed for the term of four years, by the Board of Directors of the American and Foreign Christian Union, of New York city. He arrived, with his family, in Paris, September 13th, 1864, and immediately assumed the charge of the chapel there, which he held until December, 1865, when, on the restoration of his health, he resigned the charge, and returned to his pastoral labors in the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C. On December 8th, 1873, he was again chosen Chaplain of the United States Senate, and held this office till superseded by the Rev. Dr. Bullock, in March, 1879. He still continues actively in a pastorate extending over thirty years, the thirtieth anniversary of which was commemorated by his people February 6th, 1883. Dr. Sunderland stands among the foremost preachers of the Presbyterian Church. He is an eloquent speaker, a ready debater, rigid in his adherence to sound doctrine, and self-sacrificing in his labors.

Susquehanna Presbytery, the earliest Presbyterian organization in Northeastern Pennsylvania, grew out of the Luzerne Association of Congregational ministers and churches.

The name of Presbytery, with the appellation of Susquehanna, was assumed September 16th, 1817, at a meeting of the Association in Colesville, a village of Windsor, N. Y. The change was simply that of name. Connection with the Synod of New York and New Jersey was not sought until September 18th, 1821.

The Presbytery then consisted of six ministers able to labor and two unable, and had under their care twenty-four feeble churches, covering nearly one hundred miles square and embracing about forty thousand inhabitants. It had Wilkesbarre as its southern limit and Binghamton, N. Y., as its northern. It was received by Synod on the "Plan of Union." The eight ministers were Ebenezer Kingsbury, Cyrus Gildersleeve, Simeon R. Jones, Oliver Hill, Lyman Richardson, Salmon King, Joel Chapin and Joseph Wood. The twenty-four churches were Wilkesbarre, Kingston, Wyalusing, Orwell and Warren, Wysox, Braintrim and Windham, Athens, Smithfield, Wells, Hartford, Bridgewater, First and Second, Springville, Middletown, Salem and Palmyra, Lawsville, Gibson, North Windsor, South Windsor, Great Bend, Ararat, Pike, Silver Lake and New Milford.

In 1832 the Presbytery had grown to twenty-nine churches and thirteen ministers, when, owing to its "wide and inconvenient extent of territory," the Synod of New Jersey, in answer to petition, set off from it the Presbytery of Montrose. There were left nine ministers and fifteen churches, included in the counties of Bradford and Luzerne, Pa.

In 1843 the formation of the Presbytery of Luzerne detached several churches and ministers. Susquehanna, when at the time of reunion, in 1870, it was merged in the new Presbytery of Lackawanna, numbered thirteen ministers and sixteen churches. It was, through all its history, a missionary body, and its members were distinguished for their self denial and zeal in religious work. In course of time the churches all changed their congregational form, and became thoroughly Presbyterian. They were highly evangelized. Faithfulness and discipline distinguished them. They believed in prayer and in keeping the Sabbath holy. Its testimony for Temperance was of the strongest kind. Great harmony usually distinguished the meetings of the brethren in Presbytery. Rev. C. C. Cross had been Stated Clerk for many years previous to the dissolution, in 1870, and the only minister in it at that time who had been in it in 1843. Mr. Cross joined it in 1836. He still lives, hale and hearty, a member of the Presbytery's successor, having accomplished nearly fifty years of ministerial labor in the one region.

Sutherland, Rev. John Ross, is a native of Ontario. He was born in Kirk Hill, November 7th, 1846; studied at Knox College, Toronto, in the class of 1870. He pursued his theological studies at the seminaries of Auburn and the Northwest, and had the degree of D. D. conferred upon him by Howard University, in 1879. He was pastor of the Eighth Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., 1874-5. In 1875, he took charge of the Church at Grand Haven, Michigan, retaining it until 1880. From that date he has been pastor at Jacksonville, Ill. Dr. Sutherland is a faithful and acceptable minister, and earnest in his efforts to do good.

Sutphen, Rev. Morris Crater, D. D., was born December 1st, 1837, in Bedminster township, Somerset county, N. J. He graduated at Princeton College in 1856; taught nearly a year in Virginia; entered Princeton Seminary in 1857, where he graduated in 1860. In both the college and seminary he attained high distinction as a scholar. He was licensed April 19th, 1859, by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown; May 1st, 1860, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and installed as collegiate pastor of the Spring Garden Church, in that city, to serve as co-pastor with the venerable Rev. John McDowell, D. D., at whose death, February 13th, 1863, he became sole pastor. After a pastorate of marked fruitfulness and popularity of six years' duration, he accepted an invitation to become collegiate pastor with the venerable Rev. J. McLeroy, D. D., of the Scotch Church, in New York city, and was installed April 28th, 1866. Because of his failing health, this relation was dissolved November 4th, 1872. Afterwards he spent a Winter at Jacksonville, in Florida, and endeavored there to supply the pulpit, but was obliged soon to relinquish the effort. Returning to the North, his health continued to fail, and he died June 18th, 1875, in the thirty-eighth year of his age.

Dr. Sutton was a popular and successful preacher, a man of amiable spirit, a Christian gentleman, a laborious pastor, a diligent student, and eminently successful in all the varied work of the ministry. The presidency of at least three colleges was offered to him, and at one time a place in one of our theological seminaries was within his reach, but to no one of these positions did he consider his health adequate. During the last months of his life he was engaged upon a "Manual of Family Worship." He was eminently a devout man, and lived very near to Christ. In very many hearts his memory will be sacredly cherished.

Sutton, John, the second son of Thomas and Rebecca Sutton, was born in the town of Indiana, Indiana county, Pa., May 20th, 1814. With only the advantages of such limited education as could be obtained in those early days in a small country village, he entered into the mercantile business, on the death of his father, at the early age of nineteen, and continued therein for a period of about forty years.

He united with the Presbyterian Church when about thirty-five years of age, and was elected to the office of ruling elder in May, 1851. For more than twenty-five years before his death, he was superintendent of the Sabbath school, and a portion of the time teacher of a young men's Bible class. He was also a Director of the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, for several years prior to his death, which occurred June 9th, 1877. As a private citizen, for he never aspired to any political preferment, Mr. Sutton was well known throughout Western Pennsylvania. In every enterprise tending towards the advance and improvement of his native place, whether financially or morally, he was among the leading spirits. It was largely through his exertions and influence that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was induced to construct a branch road to Indiana. The last great enterprise of his life was the projection of a State normal school, for which he labored earnestly and unceasingly, giving largely of his private means towards its success, and was the President of the Board of Trustees from its organization. His administrative capacity was remarkable. As President of the First National Bank, he attended to his trust with fidelity and zeal. He believed that whatever was worth doing at all was worth doing well, and therefore was found true to all his trusts. In all the multifarious transactions of his life he was recognized as an upright, honest man, faithful to family and friends, true to his Christian principles, benevolent, liberal, sympathetic, kind and charitable. His great delight, however, was in the growth and prosperity of his church and Sabbath school, and during his long connection with the latter, he was never once absent from his post, when at home, until his last illness. His life closed in joy and peace, almost his last words being "a sinner saved by grace."

Swan, Rev. William, was a native of Cumberland, now Franklin county, Pa.; was educated at Canonsburg Academy, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Redstone, December 22d, 1791. On the 16th of October, 1793, he was installed pastor of the united congregations of Long Run and Sewickley. Here he labored for a period of twenty-five years. In the year 1804, and for some years afterwards, his congregations were visited with special outpourings of the Spirit of God during the great revival, and considerable numbers were added to the church. On October 1st, 1818, he resigned the pastoral charge of his congregations, but in the Spring following, April 20th, 1819, he was recalled to Long Run, and resumed the pastorate of that church. After three years the pastoral relation was dissolved, in consequence of declining health, at his request, April 17th, 1822. Mr. Swan fell asleep in Jesus, November 27th, 1827. His last hours were peaceful and happy. Mr. Darby states that Mr. Swan succeeded James Ross, Esq., as teacher at Dr. McMillan's "Log Cabin."

Swaney, Alexander, D. D., was born in the county of Derry, Ireland, March 20th, 1813. When he was six years old his father brought the family to America, first settling in Chester county, Pa., and then removing to Knox county, Ohio. He graduated at Jefferson College, in 1839, and while a student was Tutor in Latin. After graduating he taught in several academies five years, studying theology privately. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Richland, in 1844. His first charge, for a year, was Big Spring and Kilgore. In 1845 he was installed pastor of the Big Spring Church, with preaching stations at Fairmount and New Cumberland. In 1848 he became pastor at Carrollton, and remained in that capacity ten years, having a successful pastorate, amid the good-will of the people. Then he was pastor at New Hagerstown seventeen years. In 1875 he became pastor of the churches of Annapolis and Unionport, and so he continues.

Dr. Swaney is a man of fine abilities. He is a clear, logical, earnest preacher, and an able presbyter.

He is a man of great prudence, thorough integrity and much business capacity. He is a warm-hearted and true friend. His ministry has been marked rather by a regular steady growth in his churches than by great ingatherings. He has always fostered the missionary spirit among his people, and also the spirit of liberal giving, both by precept and example. He is much respected and beloved by his brethren in the ministry.

Swezey, Samuel J. C., son of Rev. Samuel Swezey, a Presbyterian clergyman of Central New York, and Harriet, his wife; was born October 6th, 1831. He graduated at the New York State Normal School at Albany; studied law in New York city, and was there admitted to the Bar. He did not, however, enter the practice of his profession, but accepted the position of Professor of Mathematics in the University of Alabama, then the leading educational institution of the southwest. Thence he came to California in 1862, taking charge of the Citizens' Gas Company, until that corporation was consolidated with others. For the last twelve or thirteen years he was Secretary and Treasurer of the Pacific Rolling Mills. For four years he was a member of the State Board of Education. For many years he was Secretary and Treasurer of the Home Missionary enterprise on this coast. He was elected elder and clerk of session of Howard Presbyterian Church, in March, 1864, and superintendent of Sunday school, February 17th, 1869, and held those offices until his death, October 23d, 1877. Mr. Swezey was stalwart in person, mind and faith. Of clear, pure mind, large hearted and liberal to a fault, untiringly industrious, with strong will, good judgment and definite opinions; yet he had no irrational and perverse obstinacy of his opinion; there was nothing of the dogged about him, and nothing of the domineering temper. Keenly appreciating the pleasures of this life, he was consecrated to the Lord in soul, mind, body and estate, and used them all fully in His service. The Sunday school under him was a model, and his imprint upon it remained long after his death.

Swift, Elisha P., D.D., was born in Williamstown, Mass., August 12th, 1792. His parents were Rev. Seth and Lucy Elliot Swift. His father was pastor of the Congregational Church of Williamstown. Through his mother he was descended from Rev. John Elliot, the Apostle to the Indians. He received his collegiate education at Williams College, Mass., his theological at Princeton, N. J.; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 24th, 1816, and was ordained by a Congregational council in Boston, September 3d, 1817, with a view to the Foreign Missionary work. The American Board, having been compelled to delay his departure, employed him for a time as an agent in the collection of funds. In 1818 he performed pastoral service for the Presbyterian churches at Dover and Milford, Del., and in 1819 he took charge of the Second Presbyterian Church, Pittsburg, and continued its pastor for thirteen years. From 1831 to 1835 he was Secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society, the location of which was in Pittsburg. For several years he served the Society in this capacity, while retaining his pastorate, but in March, 1833, he resigned his charge, and devoted his whole time to the interests of the society. As the conception of it had originated in his own mind, so his tact, energy and eloquence had given it shape. It was the child of the Synod of Pittsburg, and after several changes, both in title and location, it became the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

In the Summer of 1835 Dr. Swift resigned his position as Secretary, and became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, and he continued to sustain this relation for twenty-nine years and a half. For some five years before his death, his strength beginning to fail, the congregation called his son, Rev. Elliott E. Swift, then pastor of the church of New Castle, Pa., to relieve their faithful servant. Under this arrangement, the father was enabled to occupy the pulpit with more or less frequency, until within six months of his death. April 3d, 1865, his spirit passed from earthly scenes to the heavenly rest.

ELISHA P. SWIFT, D. D.

In 1821, Dr. Swift published "The Sacred Manual, containing a series of Questions, Historical, Doctrinal and Preceptive, on the Sacred Scriptures." In 1833 he commenced the publication of the Western Foreign Missionary Chronicle, as the organ of the Missionary Society of which he was Secretary, and he continued it for two years. Some fourteen of his sermons and addresses on various occasions have been given to the press. He entered with great decision and earnestness into the early question of the location of the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny; was a member of its Board of Directors from its organization, and from 1861 till his death he was President of the Board.

Dr. Swift was an unusually eloquent and impressive preacher. His large, penetrating eye, when fixed upon the hearer, gave to some of his searching addresses an almost irresistible power. In the commencement of his morning discourses he was usually deliberate, occasionally hesitating, as the result would show, for the most suitable and expressive word among several at his command. As he advanced, however, his delivery would become more rapid, and for fifteen minutes before he closed he would hold the listener in the most fixed and solemn attention. The conclusions of many of his sermons were among the grandest specimens of effective pulpit oratory to which the people in the region where he lived had ever listened. His public prayers were remarkable for fluency of utterance, comprehensiveness of petition, elegance of style and fervor of feeling. This, no doubt, has its explanation in his habits of private devotion. For many years he had four seasons of secret prayer, which he sacredly observed each day. Often, on Sabbath evenings, after his labors were completed, he would spend long periods in the retirement of his study, in audible intercession for his people. Dr. Swift belonged to a race of men now seldom found, but sometimes read about in the annals of the past.

Swift, Elliott E., D. D., was born in Pittsburg, Pa., September 5th, 1824. His parents were Rev. Elisha P. and Eliza D. Swift. Through his father, he was descended from Rev. John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, who came from England and settled in Roxbury, Mass., in 1631. Mr. Swift was received into full communion in the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, in April, 1843. He was graduated at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, in September of the same year, and having spent three years in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, under the instruction of Rev. Drs. David Elliott, Alexander T. McGill and Lewis W. Green, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, in the Church of Montours, June 16th, 1846. Having supplied the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Pittsburg, for five months, while its pastor, Rev. William A. Passavant, D. D., was in Europe, he visited Annapolis, Md., in December, 1846, and labored for three months in the feeble church then recently organized there, and worshipping in the public hall-room. In July, 1847, he commenced his labors in Xenia, O., where he was ordained, June 6th, 1848. Being called to the original Second Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, located on lots Nos. 55 and 57 Washington street, he commenced his work there March 3d, 1850. After three years and a half he resigned this position, and the church was soon after dissolved. With a view to December 25th, 1853, he entered upon the pastoral work in the First Presbyterian Church of New Castle, Pa., and after seven years and two months, he was called to be co-pastor with his venerated father, who had then been for more than twenty-seven years pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny. In about two years and a half the death of the father occurred, and the whole pastoral work devolved upon the son. In this position he has continued for more than twenty-two years.

Dr. Swift was stated Clerk of the Synod of Allegheny, from its organization, October 19th, 1854, until the consolidation of the Synods of Allegheny and West Pennsylvania, in 1870. He has been a member of the Board of Colportage since its organization by the Synod of Pittsburg, in 1850. In 1854 he was elected a Director of the Western Theological Seminary, and in November, 1880, he became Secretary of its Board of Directors. During the whole of his ministry he has taken an active interest in Temperance reform, and in 1880, he became one of the officers of the Constitutional Temperance Amendment Association of Pennsylvania. He is an instructive and impressive preacher, a diligent pastor, a valuable presbyter, greatly beloved by his people, and held in high esteem by his brethren for his genial spirit, excellent character and eminent usefulness.

Symmes, Joseph Gaston, D. D., was born at Hamilton, Ohio, January 21th, 1826. He graduated at Hanover College; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 7th, 1854. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Madison, November 3d, 1854; pastor of the First Church, Madison, Ind., 1854-7; since which date he has been pastor of the First Church, Cranbury, N. J. Here his labors have been largely blessed, several precious revivals having occurred under his ministry. Dr. Symmes is a solid and instructive preacher and a devoted pastor, enjoying the confidence and affection of his people. He is a faithful presbyter, and has published a very satisfactory and interesting history of the Presbytery of Monmouth. He received the degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater, in 1879.

Synodical School at New London, Chester County, Pa. In these times, when the attention of the Presbyterian Church is again strongly turned to the too much neglected duty of educating her children in schools and seminaries under her own maternal supervision, it is well to look back sometimes to the efforts which she put forth when she was but a young mother, when her hands were weak and her means were small.

Among the earliest of our institutions was the ancient Synodical School at New London. In its outer equipments, its locality, a retired farm in a new settlement, its buildings, most probably of logs, the meagre salaries of its Principal and Usher, it was plain and unpretending, and in our days such an establishment would excite no feeling except that of contempt. But within this rude casket lay hid diamonds of sterling worth. There was the grammar-school, the college, the theological seminary, all combined in one. On these walls hung out the broad and noble banner on which was inscribed, "All persons who please may send their children and have them instructed, gratis, in the languages, philosophy and divinity." On this altar of education the weak and scattered congregations of the Presbyterian Church laid their annual offerings, the fruits of patient, self-denying toil, that no worthy but needy student might turn away with the bitter thought that no man cared for him. There labored Francis Alison, as Principal; born in the North of Ireland, educated in the University of Edinburgh, next a Tutor in this country, in the family of Governor Dickinson, of Delaware, then ordained and installed pastor over the congregation of New London; whom Bishop White, one of his pupils, declared to be "a man of unquestionable ability in his department," and of whom another minister wrote, "that he was the finest Latin scholar in America;" a man who earned for himself the distinguished name of "the Bushy of America." And around these rude benches were seated lads and youth, plain and simple in their dress and manners, "alike unknowing and unknown," but who in after years played well their parts, and made their marks upon the age. There, under the master's hand, the rude materials received the polish that fitted them to stand as noble pillars in the Church and State. There were preparing, for the time of need, the men who thundered in the Forum, graced the Bench, or triumphed in the field; who filled the chairs of colleges, subscribed their names to our country's Magna Charta, or who eloquently pleaded in the pulpit the cause of the Divine Redeemer.

"I recently trod," said the late Rev. Dr. Dubois, long a pastor at New London, "upon the site of this almost forgotten school. I had long known that it had stood upon a certain field, but exactly where, no one could tell. One uniform green sward covered the surface, and the only relic of the things that were was a venerable lilac bush, spared as a memento of other days. But a few months since, the soil being newly turned up, the plough-share revealed the old foundations, in all their just proportions, of a moderate-sized dwelling, and not many yards distant one much smaller, doubtless the base of the school-house. It was a place for thought. Here lived and taught, surrounded by his pupils, that man of God. Here studied and struggled McKean, and Read, and Smith, who all signed that perilous but immortal document, the Declaration of Independence; here Ramsey, the historian, Charles Thomson and Hugh Williamson, distinguished in their country's annals; here Provost Ewing and Latta, the faithful and beloved ministers of Christ. Here our beloved Church trained up her sons to battle for the rights of their country and the truths of their God. But where are they now? All gone, but not forgotten. Their names, their worthy deeds remain, to stimulate the men of the present and the youth of the coming age.

"And that school, commenced by Alison in 1741, and adopted by the Synod as its own in 1744, though long since leveled to the dust, does still survive. In the Delaware Academy and College, at Newark, it has always had a lineal descendant, and, for the last quarter of a century, in name and locality, it has had a worthy successor in the New London Academy. Apart from these, it has served, and still serves, as a watchword with which to rouse the energies of our Presbyterian Zion in the great work of educating her sons. When her zeal in this noble cause begins to flag, the watchmen on the walls have but to shout, 'Remember the worthy deeds of your worthy sires! Remember the old Synodical School of New London.'"

Synod of New York and Philadelphia, Members of, from 1758 to 1788 inclusive. The years, as given in the list, indicate the first appearance of the names of the new members on the Minutes, which was in many cases some years after their ordination. The letter P is placed after the names of the graduates of the college at Princeton, N. J.; Y after those of the graduates of Yale; and H after the graduates of Harvard. The word "received," is placed after the names of those who were admitted as ordained ministers from other churches, and the place whence they were received is mentioned, whenever it was stated on the minutes.

Synod of Philadelphia. The history of the Presbyterian Church as an organism of congregations, in the United States of America, commences with the year 1705 or 1706, when seven ministers, who were laboring as pastors and missionaries in Maryland, Delaware and Philadelphia, with the country surrounding it in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, associated themselves together as a Presbytery.

The General Presbytery, thus constituted, continued in form and name until 1716, when it resolved itself into a Synod, and divided into three subordinate meetings or Presbyteries. The body, under its new designation, met September 17th, 1717. The Rev. Jedediah Andrews was its first Moderator, and the Rev. Robert Witherspoon its first Clerk.

The number of ministers in the organization had increased to seventeen, of whom thirteen, with six ruling elders, were present at the constitution of the body. The territory occupied by them extended along the Atlantic slope from Long Island to Virginia.

The Synod grew slowly in numbers and extent. After an existence of seventy-two years, during which it was, in 1745, unhappily divided into two rival bodies, but happily reunited in 1758 as the Synod of New York and Philadelphia—blessed by the great revival of the last century and injured by the storm of the Revolution, but coming out of it crowned with honor—it transformed itself, in 1788, into a General Assembly, and constituted the four subordinate Synods of New York and New Jersey, Philadelphia, Virginia and the Carolinas.

A hundred years ago, therefore, the Synod of Philadelphia, in the position which it occupies in our fully-developed ecclesiastical system, did not exist. When the Revolutionary war broke out, there was in the country the one General Synod of New York and Philadelphia, with its eleven subordinate Presbyteries of New York, New Brunswick, Philadelphia First, Philadelphia Second, New Castle, Donegal, Lewes, Hanover, Orange, Dutchess and Suffolk. The number of congregations and communicants who were under the care of those Presbyteries cannot be given. They had about one hundred and thirty-five ministerial members. Verily, the colonists who were precipitated into the weary and harassing eight years' contest were but sparingly provided with spiritual leaders. From Massachusetts to the Carolinas, among three millions of people, there were scattered not many more Presbyterian preachers than now dwell in the midst of the seven or eight hundred thousand inhabitants of the city of Philadelphia. If our country were to-day supplied only in the same proportion as the struggling colonies were, it would have less than two thousand Presbyterian ministers, instead of the five thousand seven hundred who are upon the denominational rolls North and South, which were one, and ought to be one again.

The numerical force of the whole body in 1788, when its various organizations were developed into their present form and relation, was sixteen Presbyteries, one hundred and seventy-seven ministers, one hundred and eleven probationers, and four hundred and nineteen congregations, of which two hundred and four, or nearly one-half, were destitute of pastors, and many of them were only the shadow of a name.

Of this force the Synod of Philadelphia had under its jurisdiction, at its organization, sixty-seven ministers, two probationers, and one hundred and thirty-one congregations, forty of which were destitute of pastors, while a large proportion of the others were associated as collegiate charges. It embraced five of the Presbyteries: Philadelphia, with thirteen ministers and twenty-one congregations; New Castle, with sixteen ministers and twenty-four congregations; Lewes, with six ministers and nineteen congregations; Baltimore, with six ministers and twelve congregations; and Carlisle, with twenty-six ministers and fifty-five congregations. It covered the State of Pennsylvania east of the Allegheny Mountains, the southern part of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and a small slice of Virginia.

The first meeting of the Synod was held in the First Church, Philadelphia, on the third Wednesday, the 15th of October, 1788. Only sixteen ministers and seven ruling elders were present. The Rev. John Ewing, pastor of the First Church, and Provost of the University of Pennsylvania, preached the opening sermon, from 2 Cor. iv, 5. The Rev. James Sproat, pastor of the Second Church, Philadelphia, was chosen Moderator; and the Rev. George Duffield, pastor of the Third Church, was appointed Stated Clerk. The first Treasurer of the body was Isaac Snowden, who was elected in 1789.

The closing decade of the last century and the opening decade of the present century did not witness any decided advance of our forces. In 1807 there were in the whole Synod eighty-one ministers, one hundred and twenty-eight congregations, seven licentiates, and five thousand six hundred and fifty-two communicants, and the reported benevolent contributions were $1412. Thus in the nineteen years that followed the organization of the body there was a gain of only fourteen ministers and a loss of three congregations.

It took the country a long time to recover from the desolating influence of the Revolutionary war. The churches especially had been in every way injured by it; and the Presbyterian pastors and edifies had been assailed with peculiar venom by the royalists. "It was a great object with the British officers to silence Presbyterian preachers, as far as possible, and with this view they frequently despatched parties of light horse into the country to surprise and take prisoners unsuspecting clergymen." Infidelity, too, through the French associations of the government, had become fashionable, and was blighting in its influence on the country. Moreover, the tide of emigration was to the western part of the State, and to the regions west and southwest of it. The increase of population there, with the growth of the Denomination, led to the formation, in 1802, of the Synods of Pittsburg and Kentucky. But the legitimate progress in our portion of the vineyard was temporarily checked. The western and northwestern section of the Synod was, however, a sharer in the growth; and, therefore, in 1791, the Presbytery of Huntingdon was formed out of the Presbytery of Carlisle. Three years later, in 1811, the Presbytery of Northumberland was also erected.

The next decade was more favorable in its exhibition. In 1817 there were in the Synod one hundred and one ministers, ten licentiates, one hundred and sixty-four churches, and nine thousand one hundred and fifty-five communicants, whose reported collections for benevolent causes were $1532. This was an increase of one-fourth in the number of ministers and congregations, and more than three-fifths in the rolls of communicants.

In 1827 one hundred and thirty-one ministers, two hundred and six congregations, and twenty thousand communicants were reported. In the course of the year, one thousand one hundred and seventy-seven new communicants had been added to the churches, and two hundred and thirty-one adults and one thousand six hundred and thirty-nine infants had been baptized. The moneys reported for benevolent objects amounted to $5082.

In that decade the membership of the churches had more than doubled.

Ten years more bring us to the threshold of our divided house. The Synod still covered substantially the same territory. The Presbyteries of Philadelphia Second, Philadelphia Third, and Wilmington, appeared as some of the fruits of the divisive controversy which was raging. But scarcely any solid growth was exhibited. On the rolls in 1837 were one hundred and eighty-two ministers, two hundred and twenty-four congregations, and twenty thousand and sixteen communicants—an increase in nine years of only fifty ministers, eighteen churches, and sixteen communicants.

In this respect, though not in as great a degree, this section of the Denomination exhibited the condition of the body at large. "The growth of the Presbyterian Church in this country has never been more rapid than during the first half" of the septennate from 1830 to 1837. "In the preceding five years there had been an advance until then unprecedented; but even this was exceeded by the results set forth in the Assembly's reports for some years subsequent to 1829. . . . But the rapid increase during the earlier portion of the period was largely offset by an actual decrease of membership from 1831 to 1837."

Internecine war, excited controversy, unhappy personal alienations, consumed much of the spiritual power of the Church. Even a good man, working in a good cause, cannot, while unduly excited, properly concentrate his powers and accomplish the largest results. Much more is an organized body of men, whose councils are disturbed by questions that affect its fundamental position, crippled by an inherent weakness. In the Church of Christ, periods that have been marked by doctrinal and ecclesiastical conflicts, however necessary those conflicts may have been for the maintenance and development of the truth, have not been times of peculiar spirituality and saving growth. And on the field of this Synod were waged some of the sharpest struggles in a contest which none of us desire to reopen.

The figures that we have given for 1837 indicate the strength of the Synod in the troublous days which preceded the division, and the force which broke itself into two for a generation.

A few temporary changes had been made in the constitution of the body. In 1823 the Presbytery of the District of Columbia was formed out of the Presbytery of Baltimore. In 1833 the Synod of the Chesapeake was constituted partially out of this Synod, embracing the Presbyteries of the District of Columbia, Baltimore and East Hanover; but it was dissolved in the following year. In 1834 the Second Philadelphia, Wilmington and Lewes Presbyteries were erected into the Synod of Delaware; but it also was dissolved in 1835, and its Presbyteries re-annexed to this Synod.

In 1838, as one of the movements resulting from the division of the Church, the ministers and congregations belonging to the Presbyteries of Wilmington, Lewes, Philadelphia Second, Philadelphia Third, Carlisle, Huntingdon and Northumberland, adhering to the so-called New School branch, were set off from the Synod of Philadelphia and constituted as the Synod of Pennsylvania. It met in the Eleventh Church, Philadelphia, on the 11th of July, 1838, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. E. W. Gilbert, who was also chosen Moderator. The Rev. John L. Grant was elected its Stated Clerk, and the Rev. Robert Adair Permanent Clerk. Its constitution, however, was afterward changed so as to embrace the Presbyteries of Wilmington, Lewes, Philadelphia Second, Harrisburg, Pittsburg and Erie.

The strength of this organization when first reported, in 1840, was seventy-five ministers, eighty-seven congregations, and nine thousand seven hundred and seven communicants.

The same year the membership of the Synod of Philadelphia was one hundred and fifty-seven ministers, one hundred and ninety-eight congregations, and seventeen thousand three hundred and thirty-seven communicants.

The new Synod of Pennsylvania, it will be observed, extended beyond the limits of the Synod of Philadelphia, crossing the Alleghenies and reaching to the western border of the State. But in 1843 the ministers and congregations in the Presbyteries of Erie, Meadville and Pittsburg were detached from it and formed into the Synod of West Pennsylvania, the first meeting of which was ordered to be held in Meadville, Crawford county, on the third Tuesday of October, and to be opened with a sermon by the Rev. D. H. Riddle.

That withdrew from the Synod of Pennsylvania nineteen ministers, thirty-five congregations, and two thousand three hundred and sixty-six communicants, and left in its bounds sixty-six ministers, sixty-eight churches, and ten thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine communicants.

After this off-set the Synod of Pennsylvania of the one branch, and the Synod of Philadelphia of the other, were, in their territorial extent, substantially coterminous.

But the latter body grew to be unwieldy, and was materially changed.

Within its bounds the Presbytery of West Jersey was, in 1839, formed out of the Presbytery of Philadelphia. In 1842 the Presbytery of Donegal was constructed out of the Presbytery of New Castle. In 1850 the Presbytery of the Eastern Shore was set off from the Presbytery of Baltimore. Then, in 1851, the Synod of Baltimore was formed largely out of the Synod of Philadelphia. It was composed of the ministers and congregations in the Presbyteries of Carlisle, Baltimore and Eastern Shore, which had belonged to this Synod, and the Presbytery of Winchester, from the Synod of Virginia. It took away from this Synod seventy-one ministers, eighty-four congregations, and seven thousand eight hundred and forty-four communicants, leaving on our rolls six Presbyteries, one hundred and sixty-three ministers, one hundred and eighty-two churches, and twenty-five thousand three hundred and forty-two communicants.

The two Synods of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania continued without any further lessening of their territory during the rest of the days of their separation. In 1870, the year of their reunion, the latter reported five Presbyteries (the District of Columbia, Harrisburg, Philadelphia Third, Philadelphia Fourth and Wilmington), one hundred and eighteen ministers, ninety-six churches, and seventeen thousand nine hundred and thirty-four communicants; and the former, eight Presbyteries (Donegal, Huntingdon, New Castle, Philadelphia, Philadelphia Central, Philadelphia Second, and Shanghai), two hundred and forty-four ministers, three hundred and twenty churches, and thirty-two thousand three hundred and ninety-eight communicants.

The reunited Assembly reconstructed its Synods and Presbyteries almost invariably by State and county lines. Blending together the main portions of the Synods of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, it reconstituted them in the present Synod of Philadelphia, as their legal successor, but limited it in territory to the eastern quarter of the State of Pennsylvania, so as to embrace the ministers and congregations in the counties of Bradford, Sullivan, Luzerne, Schuylkill, Lebanon, York, Wayne, Pike, Monroe, Northampton, Lehigh, Bucks, Montgomery, Chester, Delaware and Philadelphia. To it was also attached the missionary Presbytery of Western Africa.

This detached the important portions of the old Synods that were embraced in the Presbyteries of the District of Columbia, Harrisburg, Wilmington, Huntingdon and New Castle, and placed them, with several churches in New Jersey that had been connected with the Philadelphia Presbyteries, in the reconstructed Synods of Harrisburg, Baltimore and New Jersey. On the other hand, it included the ministers and churches in the northeastern portion of Pennsylvania, which in the Presbyteries of Montrose, Susquehanna, Luzerne and Newton, had been in the old Synods of New Jersey, and of New York and New Jersey.

Our Synod, thus materially altered in its bounds and modified in its membership, met for the first time in the Spring Garden Church, Philadelphia, on the 21st of June, 1870, and was opened with a sermon by the Rev. Calvin W. Stewart, on Matt. xxviii, 19. The Rev. Elias J. Richards was chosen Moderator, the Rev. W. E. Moore, Stated Clerk, the Rev. W. M. Rice, Permanent Clerk, and the Hon. J. Ross Snowden, Treasurer.

That meeting in June was held under the order of the Assembly, merely to reconstruct the Presbyteries and to organize the body for its future operations. Having performed these duties, it adjourned to meet in the First Church of Scranton, on Tuesday, October 18th, 1870, when the Rev. James W. Dale was chosen Moderator.

The first reported strength of the Synod, in its new form, was made in 1871. It had then eight Presbyteries, three hundred ministers, twenty licentiates, fifty-three candidates for the ministry, two hundred and sixty-one churches, and forty thousand two hundred and ten communicants. Its Sabbath-schools numbered forty-nine thousand three hundred and sixty members. The additions to the communion rolls during the year had been, on examination and profession, two thousand six hundred and sixty-six, and on certificate, one thousand six hundred and seventy-six. The baptisms had been, of adults, seven hundred and thirty-seven, and of infants, one thousand seven hundred and forty-one. The moneys raised for congregational purposes amounted to $757,421, and for benevolent causes, $310,793, or $1,068,214 in all.

Under an amendment to the Constitution which was adopted by the General Assembly of 1880, approved by a majority of the Presbyteries, and finally enacted in 1881, the General Assembly of 1881 consolidated the Synod of Philadelphia, with the Synods of Erie, Harrisburg and Pittsburg, into the Synod of Pennsylvania. The new organization held its first meeting in Harrisburg, in October, 1882, the Rev. Henry S. Butler, of Clearfield, its Convener, by Assembly appointment. Prof. S. J. Wilson, D. D., LL. D., was chosen Moderator; Thomas H. Robinson, D. D., Stated Clerk; James Roberts, D. D., Permanent Clerk; and John Watt, Esq., Treasurer. Its strength was 23 Presbyteries, 870 ministers, 61 licentiates, 117 candidates, 929 churches, 3622 elders, 722 deacons, 132,251 communicants, 118,176 Sunday-school members. During the year 5677 new communicants had been added on profession, 1320 adults and 5009 infants had been baptized, and $1,919,955 raised for Church purposes. A new plan of delegation for the future, from the Presbyteries, was agreed upon. That was ratified by the Presbyteries. It goes into effect in 1884. The Synod will, under it, meet as a delegated body of about two hundred and fifty members, in October, in Philadelphia.—R. M. Patterson, D. D.

Synods and Councils. Our Confession of Faith says, chapter xxi:—

SECTION I. For the better government and further edification of the Church, there ought to be such Assemblies as are commonly called synods or councils;¹ and it belongeth to the overseers and other rulers of the particular churches, by virtue of their office, and the power which Christ hath given them for edification, and not for destruction, to appoint such assemblages;² and to convene together in them, as often as they shall judge it expedient for the good of the Church.³

¹Acts xv, 2, 3, 6. ²Acts xv. ³Acts xv, 22, 23, 25.

"In opposition to the Independents, who maintain that every congregation has an independent power of government within itself, and deny all subordination of judicatories," says Mr. Shaw, "our Confession asserts that, 'for the better government and further edification of the Church' (that is, for attaining the end better than can be accomplished in smaller meetings of church officers), 'there ought to be such assemblies as are commonly called synods or councils.' Of this we have an example in the Synod which met at Jerusalem to settle the question about circumcision. The question, whether or not the Gentiles who had made a profession of the Christian religion were bound to submit to circumcision, was of common concern, and could only be settled by the judgment and decision of office-bearers, delegated from the Church as a whole; and we find that the judgment or decision of these office-bearers, when met judicially to consider the question, was considered as binding upon the whole Church. Nor is it any valid objection to this court forming a model for the imitation of the Church in after ages, that it was composed partly of apostles; for the apostles were also elders, as every higher office in the Church includes the official power belonging to inferior offices; and we do not find that, in the whole discussion, the apostles, as judges, claimed any superiority over their brethren, who are called elders. At any rate, the decision was promulgated as the joint decision of both (Acts xv, 21-31).²

SECTION II.—It belongeth to synods and councils ministerially to determine controversies of faith and cases of conscience; to set down rules and directions for the better ordering of the public worship of God and government of His Church; to receive complaints in cases of mal-administration, and authoritatively to determine the same; which decrees and determinations, if consonant to the Word of God, are to be received with reverence and submission, not only for their agreement with the Word, but also for the power whereby they are made, as being an ordinance of God, appointed thereunto in His Word.

SECTION III.—All synods or councils since the apostles' times, whether general or particular, may err, and many have erred; therefore they are not to be made the rule of faith or practice, but to be used as a help in both.¹

SECTION IV.—Synods and councils are to handle nothing but that which is ecclesiastical; and are not to intermeddle with civil affairs which concern the commonwealth, unless by way of humble petition in cases extraordinary; or by way of advice for satisfaction of conscience, if they be thereunto required by the civil magistrate.¹

These Sections, says Dr. A. A. Hodge, state—(1) The different subjects which come before these Church courts for decision. (2) The grounds upon which, and the conditions under which, their decisions are to be regarded as requiring submission, and the extent to which that submission is to be carried.

1st. Negatively. Synods and councils have no right whatever to intermeddle with any affair which concerns the commonwealth, and they have no right to presume to give advice to, or to attempt to influence the officers of the civil government in their action as civil officers, except (a) in extraordinary cases, where the interests of the Church are immediately concerned, by the way of humble petition, or (b) by way of advice for satisfaction of conscience, if they be thereunto required by the civil magistrate.

2d. Negatively. The powers of synods and councils are purely ministerial and declarative; i. e., relate simply to the declaration and execution of the will of Christ. They are, therefore, wholly judicial and executive, and in no instance legislative.

3d. Positively. It belongs to synods and councils (a) at proper times to form creeds and confessions of faith, and to adopt a constitution for the government of the Church. (b) To determine particular controversies of faith and cases of conscience. (c) To prescribe regulations for the public worship of God, and for the government of the Church. (d) To take up and issue all cases of discipline, and in the case of the superior courts, to receive appeals and complaints in all cases of mal-administration in the case of individual officers or subordinate courts, and authoritatively to determine the same.

4th. Positively. While ecclesiastical courts have no right to handle or advise upon matters which belong to the jurisdiction of the civil magistrate, they, on the other hand, evidently possess an inalienable right of teaching church members their duty with respect to the civil powers, and of enforcing the performance of it as a religious obligation. "The powers that be are ordained of God. . . . Wherefore ye must need be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake." (Rom. xiii, 1-7.) That is, obedience to the civil authorities is a religious duty, and may be taught and enforced by Church courts upon church members.

5th. Negatively. All synods and councils, since the apostles' times, whether general or particular, may err, and many have erred; therefore, they are not to be made the rule of faith or practice, but to be used as a help in both. That is, these synods and councils, consisting of uninspired men, have no power to bind the conscience, and their authority cannot exclude the right, nor excuse the obligation, of private judgment. If their judgments are unwise, but not directly opposed to the will of God, the private member should submit, for peace sake. If their decisions are opposed plainly to the Word of God, the private member should disregard them and take the penalty.

6th. Positively. But in every case in which the decrees of these ecclesiastical courts are consonant to the Word of God, they are to be received by all, subject to the jurisdiction of said court, not only because of the fact that they do agree with the Word of God, but also because of the proper authority of the court itself as a court of Jesus Christ, appointed by Him, and therefore ministerially representing Him in all of its legitimate actions.

"The Church," says Dr. Dick, "is the depository of the Scriptures; she is appointed to interpret them, and performs this duty by public and private instruction, oral and written; but has no power to make articles of faith; and, as she is not infallible, every man retains the right of private judgment, or the right to examine the Scriptures for himself, and to follow them, either by joining in the profession of the Church or by dissenting from it. This view of the power of the Church accords with the sentiments stated in our Confession of Faith." The Church of England expresses the same sentiments in the article concerning general councils: "When they be gathered together, forasmuch as they be an assembly of men, whereof all be not governed with the Spirit and Word of God, they may err, and sometimes have erred, even in things pertaining unto God. Wherefore things ordained by them as necessary to salvation have neither strength nor authority, unless it may be declared that they be taken out of holy Scripture."

Tabernacle Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. In the year 1804, God, in his providence, disposed a number of persons in Philadelphia to unite in the erection of a house of worship, to be occupied by a society of Christians under the Independent form of Church government. With this in view, they agreed to subscribe certain sums of money as voluntary contributions, and afterwards solicited aid from the citizens of Philadelphia and others friendly to the Redeemer's kingdom. Their success equaled their most sanguine expectations, so that in a short time they purchased a lot and built a house of worship, which, as to situation, neatness and convenience, was not surpassed at that time by any church in the city. The "Independent Tabernacle" (as the church was called), was situated up a court from Fourth street, between High and Chestnut streets. It was built in the years 1805-6.

The first pastor of the church was the Rev. William Hey. He was succeeded by the Rev. John Joyce, an Independent minister from Europe, who was introduced to the church by the Rev. Dr. John Rodgers. Mr. Joyce labored for more than five years, with much acceptance, after which, his health becoming impaired, he resigned his charge, April 1st, 1815. After his resignation, it was deemed expedient by a majority of the congregation to endeavor to effect a union with some other religious body of the same faith and order, even if there should be some unessential difference in the form of church government. After serious consideration of the subject, a way seemed to be open, by the providence of God, which finally led to a union with the Reformed Dutch Church.

The people of the First Reformed Dutch Church, in Crown street, had determined to build another place of worship, and a subscription was raised towards it. It therefore occurred to some of the members of the Tabernacle Church that perhaps this was a door opened by Providence by which the views of both might be promoted. A congregational meeting was held, and it was resolved that "overtures be made to the people of the First Reformed Dutch Church, on Crown street, to unite with the body to which they belonged."

The negotiations as to this matter of change of connections proceeded with much harmony, and, as the result, the following persons were constitutionally elected elders and deacons, and having been ordained according to the rules of the church, held their first meeting October 17th, 1816, after notice in the church, and constituted themselves by the name of the Consistory of the Second Reformed Dutch Church in the city of Philadelphia, viz:—

William Shuttlebottom, Abraham P. Fearing, Dr. Casper Shaffer, William Sheepshanks and John Willis—Elders.

Rev. Dr. John Brounhead, Pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church, was requested to preside as Moderator until they should obtain a stated minister. All of these elders and deacons had been communicants in the Tabernacle Church, with the exception of Dr. Caspar Shaffer, John Willis and Abraham P. Fearing, who obtained certificates of dismission from the First Reformed Dutch Church, with a view of serving as officers in this church.

It is worthy of mention that at this first meeting of the Consistory, it was resolved, "That the Elders begin as soon as convenient the catechising of the children." At their second meeting, October 17th, it was resolved, "That notice be given next Sabbath that Wednesday evening next be appropriated to prayer for Divine direction in the choice of a pastor." And on October 19th, 1816, Rev. David Parker was invited to supply the pulpit every alternate Sabbath for three months. On November 29th, 1816, the number of communicants on the roll of the church was 51. The Rev. Mr. Parker was called to be pastor, January 31st, 1817, and was installed into that office April 13th, 1817.

On the 18th of October, 1819, the pew holders and communicants of the church requested the Consistory to apply to the Classis of Philadelphia for the dismissal of this church and congregation to the Presbytery of Philadelphia. Eventually, the Presbytery of Philadelphia received the church and congregation under its care, with the name of the Seventh Presbyterian Church. This occurred on the 9th of November, 1819, and the Rev. Drs. Nicoll, Ely and Janeway, with elders John McMullin and Robert Ralston, were appointed a committee duly to organize the church under its new relation. Accordingly, it was so organized as the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, November 18th, 1819, and the following persons elected as ruling elders and deacons:

Wm. Andon, William Sheepshanks, Robert Remell and William Shuttlebottom—Elders.

John P. Schott, Thomas Whitaker, William Taylor, Jr., and Jacob Egler—Deacons.

On the 25th day of November these persons were set apart to their respective duties, with the exception of William Taylor, Jr., and Jacob Egler, who declined serving. The sermon on the occasion was preached by the Rev. Dr. William Niell, from 1 Thess. v, 21, "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." Rev. Dr. Janeway proposed the constitutional questions, and Rev. Dr. Ely then delivered a charge to the elders and deacons, and pronounced said officers, in connection with the communicants, and all baptized persons in regular standing in the congregation, to be duly organized as the Seventh Presbyterian Church in the city of Philadelphia.

The Rev. Dr. William M. Engles was elected the first pastor of this church, under its organization as a Presbyterian Church. His election occurred June 15th, 1820, and he was ordained and installed July 6th, 1820. The relation then instituted continued, with great harmony and with much blessing to the church, until September 4th, 1831, when it was dissolved by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, at the request of Dr. Engles, who then devoted himself to the enterprise of conducting the Presbyterian. The Rev. Samuel D. Blythe was next called, on September 24th, 1831, to be the pastor of the church, and having accepted the call, he was installed February 23d, 1835. This relation continued till the year 1839.

In April, 1840, the Seventh Presbyterian Church, previously under the pastoral care of the Rev. S. D. Blythe, and the Assembly Church, previously under the pastoral care of the Rev. W. L. McCalla, were, at their request, by the act of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, united under the style and title of the Seventh Presbyterian Church. Immediately after that union was consummated, the Rev. Willis Lord was installed pastor.

In the year 1842 the congregation sold their house of worship in Raunstead Court, and erected their present church on Broad street, above Chestnut, which was dedicated to the worship of God on the last day of that year. The 1st of January, 1843, being the Sabbath, the church was regularly opened for Divine worship.

The Rev. Dr. Lord resigned his pastoral charge of this church in October, 1850, and accepted a call to the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. After a vacancy of nearly a year, the congregation extended a call to the Rev. William Henry Ruffner, at that time serving as chaplain to the University of Virginia. This being Mr. Ruffner's first pastoral charge, he was ordained and installed at the same time as pastor of this church, in the Fall of 1851. This relation continued till the Spring of 1853, when Mr. Ruffner was constrained to resign his charge, in consequence of a serious affection of the throat. The Rev. E. P. Rodgers, D. D., the next pastor of the church, was installed on May, 3d, 1854, and continued in this relation until October, 1856. After a vacancy of nearly six months, the Rev. James M. Crowell was installed into the pastoral care of this church, May 10th, 1857, and had charge of it until May 5th, 1869. Dr. Crowell was succeeded by the Rev. Henry C. McCook, who was installed pastor in 1870, and still con-times so to be. During his pastorate the name "Tabernacle Church" was assumed.

The congregation, feeling the necessity of a change of location, on account of the encroachment of business houses in the region of their present place of worship, purchased, in 1883, an eligible lot at Thirty-eighth and Chestnut streets, on which they intend to erect a new and handsome church edifice during the year 1884.

Tables of The Law. Those that were given to Moses upon Mount Sinai were written by the finger of God, and contained the decalogue, or ten commandments of the law, as they are rehearsed in Exodus xx. Many questions have been started about these tables; about their matter, their form, their number, him who wrote them, and what they contained. Some Oriental authors make them amount to ten in number, others to seven; but the Hebrews reckon but two. Some suppose them to have been of wood, and others of precious stones. Moses observes (Exod. xxxii. 15) that these tables were written on both sides. Many think they were transparent, so that they might be read through; on one side toward the right, and on the other side toward the left. Others will have it that the lawgiver only makes this observation, that the tables were written on both sides, because generally, in writing tables, they only wrote on one side. Others thus translate the Hebrew text: "They were written on the two parts that were contiguous to each other;" because, being shut upon one another, the two faces that were written upon touched one another, so that no writing was seen on the outside. Some think that the same ten commandments were written on each of the two tables, others that the ten were divided, and only five on one table and five on the other. The words which intimate that the tables were written by the finger of God, some understand simply and literally; others, of the ministry of an angel; and others explain them merely to signify an order of God to Moses to write them. The expression, however, in Scripture always signifies immediate divine agency. —See Ten Commandments.

Taggart, Rev. Samuel B., was born in Canonsburg, Pa., March 31st, 1833. Entered Jefferson College, and graduated in 1856, standing well in his class. He studied theology at Princeton, graduating in 1861. Was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. His first charge was Sullivan, Ind., where he was ordained and installed in 1862. His second charge was that of Brazil, Ind. Coming to Illinois, he was pastor at El Paso, and for several years pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Bloomington. He is now at Upper Alton, where he is stated supply, and living on his farm. He is a good preacher, and faithful as a pastor.

Tait, Rev. Samuel, was of Scotch descent. He was born near Shippensburg, Pa., February 17th, 1772. Whilst yet in his youth, his father removed with his family to Ligonier, Westmoreland county, Pa. After his conversion, and whilst engaged in the occupation of a farmer, a Committee of Presbytery, much to his astonishment, waited upon him and urged him to seek preparation for preaching the gospel. He repaired to Canonsburg Academy, afterwards studied theology with Dr. McMillan, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Ohio, June 25th, 1800.

Mr. Tait was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Cool Spring and Upper Salem, Mercer county, Pa., November 19th, 1800. The young pastor resided at Cool Spring, in a log cabin that he had got raised and clap-boarded. During his absence on a preaching tour, his wife chinked and daubed the cracks between the logs with mortar made by her own hands. This pastoral relation continued until June 25th, 1806, when he relinquished the charge of Upper Salem and gave half his time to the newly organized church of Mercer. In June, 1813, the people of Cool Spring agreeing to worship at Mercer, he gave part of his time once more to Salem, and finally, in 1826, he relinquished Cool Spring and gave all his time to Mercer. His pastorate at Mercer continued until his death, which occurred June 2d, 1841, in the seventieth year of his age and forty-first of his ministry. On his deathbed he literally spent his dying breath in praying for a revival of religion among the dear people for whose salvation he had so long labored. And when his end drew nigh, to a minister and friend who inquired if he found comfort now in the doctrines he had so long preached to others, his answer was: "All is peace—peace through the blood of Christ." After his tongue had ceased to discharge its functions, when he was again asked by the same pious friend if all was well, having made a fruitless effort to reply, he raised his hands to heaven, whilst a beam of inexpressible delight played upon his countenance. And thus he fell asleep in Jesus.

Mr. Tait was in appearance most commanding. He was full six feet two inches in height, erect in his bearing, with a firm, grave cast of countenance. He was a kind and sympathizing friend, and had a melting tenderness, as he pointed men to the Saviour; yet he was firm and immovable when the path of duty was plain. The enemy of all species of vice and immorality, he sometimes exposed himself to the wrath of evil doers by his opposition to their evil courses. He was most emphatically a man of prayer, and was distinguished for his common sense, discriminating judgment and familiar acquaintance with the human heart. As a preacher, he was often eloquent, and had great power over an audience, and at times could sway them with wondrous influence. As a pastor, he was faithful. In dealing with "cases of conscience," as the early fathers called them, he was most judicious and successful. As a member of the ecclesiastical courts, he stood high for wisdom and good judgment. He was called to the Moderator's chair more frequently than any other member of Presbytery.

Mr. Tait had the great satisfaction of laboring in numerous revivals of religion. The first was during the "Falling Exercise," which was shared in by his churches. Again, in 1831, his churches were greatly blessed. Another was in 1836. Yet, in the history of his labors, there was almost a constant ingathering of souls to the kingdom of Christ. Appointed by the Synod of Pittsburg, October 3d, 1822, superintendent pro tempore of a mission among the Indians at Sandusky, or on the Maumee river, in Ohio, he proceeded to the field and labored faithfully for a period of seven months, when he returned home. He was one of the original members of the Presbytery of Erie, and in 1818 Moderator of the Synod of Pittsburg.

Talbot, Charles N., an honored and useful citizen of New York; died in that city, November 29th, 1874, aged seventy-two years. His character was adorned with many estimable traits. His stainless integrity, sound judgment, genial deportment and loving, charitable spirit, were his best eulogy. A devout member of the Presbyterian Church, no difference of creed or country stood between him and the suffering. Wherever known in his extended commercial career, he was honored for those qualities which ennoble success. Though long retired from active business, with ample means, his labors were unremitted for the benefit of his fellow-men. Especially were his relations to the Presbyterian Hospital, of whose Board he was a corporate member, characterized by earnest efforts for its prosperity. His example was an inspiration to others, and largely contributed to the success of the institution.

Talmage, T. De Witt, D. D., was born near Bound Brook, N. J., January 7th, 1832. He graduated at the University of the City of New York in 1853, and at the New Brunswick Theological Seminary in 1856. During the Summer of the same year he was called to Belleville, N. Y., where he was duly ordained and installed, and continued three years. In 1859, he was called to the Second Reformed Church, of Philadelphia, where he commanded marked public attention, and his congregation grew in numbers and influence. In April, 1869, he was installed pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, located on Schermerhorn street, Brooklyn. Here his labors were a decided success, attracting audiences to the utmost capacity of the building. In 1870 a large edifice was erected for the use of the congregation, on a site of six lots, on Schermerhorn street, not far from the old church. It was known by the name of the "Tabernacle," and was crowded at each service. It was destroyed by fire December 22d, 1872, rebuilt 1873, and dedicated February 23d, 1874. This is one of the largest public buildings in Brooklyn. The original church building has been fitted up for a reading room, and room for social gatherings of the congregation. It is also used for the Free Lay College, an institution for the instruction of persons in the lay ministry, established by Dr. Talmage, and of which he is the President. The Tabernacle has adopted the free-pew system.

Dr. Talmage has great vivacity of spirit and energy of character. His social qualities are attractive. He is an original, terse, bold and eloquent writer, and a fluent, impassioned speaker. He has the most complete command of language, which takes forms of expression which are not less new than graphic and impressive. He draws very large audiences. He is very popular as a lecturer, and is a contributor to many of the periodicals of the day, his articles always glowing with genius, and sometimes abounding in humor. He has published a volume of Sermons, and "One Thousand Gems; or, Brilliant Passages, Anecdotes, Incidents, Etc.," edited by Professor Larabee, and for a time he was the editor of the Christian at Work.

Tappan, Rev. David Stanton, son of Dr. Benjamin and Oella (Stanton) Tappan, was born in Steubenville, Ohio, April 24, 1845. He received his classical education at Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, graduating with the highest honor of his class, in 1861. In the Fall of the same year he entered the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., graduating in 1867. In April, 1866, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Allegheny.

In October, 1867, he received a call from the Presbyterian Church of Chariton, Iowa, and was ordained the following April by the Presbytery of Des Moines. Here he remained until February, 1871, when, having been called to the First Presbyterian Church of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, he removed thither. He was installed pastor of this church in May of the same year, a position which he still continues to occupy (November, 1883). From 1871 to 1882 he was Permanent clerk of the Synod of Iowa, South. Upon the reconstruction of the Synods, in 1882, he was made Stated Clerk of the newly erected Synod of Iowa. He is an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor and a valuable presbyter.

Tate, Rev. Joseph, was received as a licentiate by Donegal Presbytery, April 1st, 1748, and was sent to Lower Pennsborough (Silver Spring), Marsh Creek and Conewago. On the 11th of June he was called to Donegal, they giving him seventy pounds to buy a plantation and seventy pounds salary. He was ordained, November 23d, 1748. He spent eight Sabbaths, in the following Fall, in Virginia. Mr. Tate joined the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1768. He was sent by the Synod to Western Virginia and North Carolina, and in the following March he was called to Caddle Creek. He died October 11th, 1774. He is said to have been eccentric, but fearless in reproving vice and the errors of the day.

Taylor, Archibald Alexander Edward, D.D., was born in Springfield, Ohio, in 1834. He graduated at Princeton College in 1851; studied theology at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Cincinnati in 1857. He was shortly afterwards ordained and settled as pastor over the Presbyterian Church of Portland, Ky., where he remained two years. Thence he was called to the charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Dubuque, Iowa, in which he labored successfully for six years. During this period he became a regular correspondent of The Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, over the signature of "Hawkeye," the familiar soubriquet of the people of Iowa. In 1865 he was called to the Bridge Street Presbyterian Church, of Georgetown, D. C. From this field he was called, in 1869, to the pastorate of the Mt. Auburn Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, a new and promising organization. After a four years' pastorate, during which the membership of the church was very largely increased, he was unanimously elected by the Board of Trustees, as successor to the Rev. Willis Lord, D. D., as President of the Synodical University at Wooster, Ohio, and entered upon the duties of the position in September, 1873. This position he retained till 1883, with evidence of his fitness for it in the prosperity of the Institution. Dr. Taylor is a man of kindly aspect, of fine talent and impressive address, of unusually genial temperament. He has been a member of the Board of Education and Church Extension, a Director of the Western Theological Seminary and the Northwestern Theological Seminary, and was a member of the General Assembly at which the reunion of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church was consummated, in 1869.

Taylor, H. Knox, Esq., was born at Canajoharie, N. Y., May 14th, 1830. He is the son of John Taylor and Catharine Knox, his mother being the sister of the venerable John J. Knox, recently deceased. He is thus closely allied to that family of distinguished and earnest Christians by which the Church of the present age is so much enriched, and is every way worthy of the kinship.

In 1856 he removed from Knoxville, Ill., the later home of his father, to St. Paul, Minn., where he engaged in business. At the present time (1883) he is National Bank Examiner for Minnesota, Dakota and Northern Wisconsin.

Mr. Taylor has held many positions of importance and influence. He has been a ruling elder in the House of Hope Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, for twenty years, and a Sunday-school superintendent most of that time; he has been President of the Young Men's Christian and of the Library Associations; he has been four times a member of the General Assembly—the last time serving as Chairman of the Mileage Committee.

But the usefulness and influence of Mr. Taylor cannot be shown by any such enumeration. He commands universal respect and affection by his genial manners, his broad sympathies and his indefatigable perseverance in every good work. Few men make themselves so generally useful. His hand appears in every Christian enterprise and wherever there is work to be done. One of Mr. Taylor's principal characteristics is the willingness to give careful attention to details, and it will be long remembered, to his great credit, that he was willing to do what others had not patience or the disposition to attempt.

Taylor, Rev. Nathanael, was probably ordained in Scotland, in 1702 or 1703, and came immediately to Marlborough, on the Patuxent. The settlement was made in 1690, by Col. Ninian Beall, who purchased a large tract on the Potomac, and drew thither his friends and neighbors from Fifeshire. The month of Patuxent was a great commercial emporium. Mr. Taylor was a punctual attendant on every meeting of Presbytery till his death, in 1710. His elder in 1707 was William Smith, and in 1708 and 1709, James Bell (Beall?).

Taylor, Stephen, D. D., was born in Tyringham, Mass., February 26th, 1796. He graduated at Williams College, with the highest honors, in 1816; was preceptor of the Academy at Westfield, Mass., for one year; was Tutor in Williams College, 1817-19, with uncommon acceptance and success; commenced his theological studies at Andover Seminary; for some time taught an Academy at Boylton, Mecklenburg county, Va.; then completed his theological course under the direction of Dr. Griffin, President of Williams College. He was licensed to preach by the Hanover Presbytery in 1824, and shortly afterward became pastor of a church in Halifax county, Va., where he was eminently useful and greatly beloved. In 1826, he took charge of the Shockoe Hill Church, Richmond, and having labored here about nine years, with great fidelity and acceptance, he accepted an appointment, in 1835, to the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History in the Union Theological Seminary, which position he resigned in 1838, and shortly after became pastor of a church in Abingdon, Va. In 1843 he took the pastoral charge of the High Street Church, Petersburg; after a residence there of between three and four years, returned to Richmond; in 1847 engaged in teaching, and in 1850 was elected pastor of the Duval Street Church of that city, and continued in charge of it until his death, which occurred March 4th, 1853. Dr. Taylor excelled as a pastor. As a preacher, he was instructive, practical, direct and earnest, always leaving the impression that he was intent upon accomplishing the great ends of the ministry, and that he utterly ignored all considerations of personal popularity. Whilst in Richmond, as pastor, he frequently visited the Almshouse, the State Penitentiary, and the Orphan Asylum, where he, who once had the honorable position of a Professor in a Theological Seminary, was now familiarly known and greatly revered, as "Father Taylor." His life was marked by fidelity, and his death was one of peace, even of triumph.

Taylor, Rev. William M., is the oldest child of Mr. Samuel and Mrs. Charity (Mercer) Taylor, and was born March 4th, 1834, near Enon Valley, Beaver (now Lawrence) county, Pa. He graduated at Jefferson College, in the class of 1858, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1861. He was licensed to preach the gospel, April 19th, 1860, by the Presbytery of Beaver (now Shenango), and was ordained and installed pastor of the Westfield church by the same Presbytery, June 12th, 1861. This has been his only charge, and under his ministrations this church has become one of the foremost in Western Pennsylvania, for size, zeal and activity in good works. During his pastorate the church has erected two houses of worship. For twenty-three years Mr. Taylor has been steadily growing in his usefulness among the churches in all the regions around him. His sermons are Scriptural and practical, carefully prepared, and delivered in an impressive manner. He is an exemplary pastor, winning the young and the old. He has a pleasing address, a sound judgment and a warm heart. He is a hard worker, and a man of devoted piety. A few of his sermons and addresses, and a number of his letters on foreign travel have been published and widely read.

Teaching the Truth, Vast Importance of.

"This," says the Rev. John Hall, D.D., "is the great function of the Church. The Church is a mighty civilizer. She keeps intellect awake. She is a grand reformer. Science flourishes most where her testimony is clearest and best heard. Commerce lives in the security and confidence she begets. Crime is kept mainly outside her territory. But all those incidental and collateral benefits are attained, not when directly aimed at, but as the results of the Church's fidelity to her main duty—the duty of witnessing to the truth. When these objects are aimed at as primary, the consequence is often enough a failure; when the salvation of men is directly aimed at, the minor benefits come in their place as consequences. There is, indeed, no true social or moral improvement in which the churchman may not take his place. There is no honest human effort in which he may not, if it be otherwise suitable, bear a part; but his main power to do good, his special and distinctive 'talent,' is setting forth the Christian truth. To use a bad instrument when a good is at hand, to employ an old flint gun when the newest and best can be had; such a course is, by common consent, foolish, either in peace or in war. Why, then, should men armed with that which is 'the power of God unto salvation' turn to weaker weapons? Is human ingenuity to succeed where the power of God is ineffectual? Is human speculation to avail where divine revelation fails? Will good be done by ingenious essays on petty side issues, if 'the cross of Christ' be impotent? He who loves Zion may well pray and labor that the Church of his affection may be ever distinguished by her decided, upright, downright, thorough evangelicalism. Let her ministers be 'gospelers.' The gospel of Jesus Christ is the shapenoting instrument with which they are to clear away trees and crimes. 'If the iron be blunt,' says the wise man, 'and he do not whet the edge, then must he put to more strength.' And many a strong man is toiling with a blunt axe, when the sharpest possible is within his reach. 'For the Word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart.' Let the Presbyterian Church of the future be marked, above all, by this, that her ministers are teachers of the Word, in Sabbath schools, in Bible classes, in the pulpit; let her people be thorough in their knowledge of the Scriptures; let her prayers, her sermons, her literature, be rich in Scripture truth, and her energies will be little wasted and her time little consumed in the temper-trying discussions of such petty crochets as have all too often vexed the community.

"We make no apology for adverting at this point to the imperative necessity that exists for securing for our children thorough Scriptural instruction in the Sunday schools. It is pleasant to think of the homage done to God's Word by its being read in our common schools, but if the American churches persuade themselves that anything approaching to real Scriptural knowledge is thus given to any considerable proportion of our population, we fear it is a mischievous delusion. Thousands have passed through them with no more knowledge of the Word than suffices for a flippant allusion or a profane reference. The Church must see to it that the Word of her God be taught her young members, or they will be practically ignorant of it. Nor is it at all certain that their attendance on the Sabbath school is an adequate remedy. Many teachers are incompetent as teachers, and much of the Sunday-school literature, which is superseding the reading of the Bible, is worse than useless, it is mischievous. What can be the effect of giving children mere stories, with just enough spice of religion to make them 'Sunday books,' but to drive them to novels? For novelists many of these volumes are, and often poor as such. There is little reading, and no study of Scripture on week-days, and on Sabbath it is supposed to be as it should if the children are engaged with their Sunday-school books; and so they grow to maturity with only the most superficial ideas of the holy oracles. The years roll on, and they go West, or to Europe, or to social circles at home where indifference or skepticism reigns, or where some human 'ism' is in the ascendant, and they have no definite knowledge to the contrary, and go with the tide. All this must be considered by the Church, if her children are to be safe.

"And at this point let us not suppress the hope that the Catechism of the Church will receive increased attention in the training of the young. If the vows which parents make in the act of dedicating their children to God mean anything, the parents bind themselves to teach their offspring the doctrines of the Christian religion. Do they? Were we to ask thousands of professing Christians, 'What doctrines of the Christian religion have you taught your children?' we should get no satisfactory answer. If our young people were left to learn arithmetic and grammar in the hap-hazard way in which they are left to learn these doctrines, these unambitious attainments would be much rarer than they are. No wonder that a speculation cannot be propounded among us so silly that it shall not find followers. Multitudes, and that where the population is the least affected by the tide of emigration, have no anchor in definite religious knowledge, and are consequently blown about by every wind. True, it is easy to make flippant statements about the difficulty of learning our Catechism, and its obscurity to the young mind. The young mind finds the multiplication table hard, learns it as a mere matter of memory, and finds the use of it afterwards.* It is so with the education of every one of us. Common sense, observation, and fidelity to our vows all combine to urge upon parents the right and conscientious use of a help so valuable in giving the young members of the church a competent knowledge of the doctrines of the Christian religion."

Templeton, Rev. James, received his license from the Presbytery of Hanover, October 26th, 1775, soon after which he removed to North Carolina. In 1791 he became stated supply of Nazareth Church, in South Carolina, and continued so for nearly eight years. Mr. Templeton took a great interest in the general business of the Church. In 1797 he was at the head of the "Philanthropic Society," organized with the view of advancing and perpetuating an academy of high order. This Society was incorporated by the Legislature of South Carolina, in 1797.

* The late Rev. John Cumming, D.D., of London, thus bears testimony to the truth here presented by Dr. Hall—

"The deep engraving of truth upon the heart of the young is never altogether effaced. Those impressions of divine truth that are made on our hearts in youth often emerge in after years with all the freshness and beauty of yesterday. Silenced they may be, extinguished they rarely are, overshadowed they may be, but obliterated they cannot be. I know, when I learned that Scripture had extremely abstruse work—perhaps more so than need be—The Shorter Catechism, I did not understand it. In those days education was not so well comprehended, and it was not thought so necessary to explain to the understanding what was to be stored in the memory, as it is now, but my memory was stored with the truths of that precious document, and when I grew up I found those truths, which had been laid aside in its cells as propositions which I could neither understand nor make use of, become illuminated by the sunshine of after years and, like some hidden and mysterious writing, reveal in all their beauty and their fullness those precious truths which I had neither seen nor comprehended before, and which have been so long and are now preached in the Church of my fathers, and no less so, I trust, in every section of the Evangelical Church of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Templeton, Rev. Milo, was born near West Alexander, Washington county, Pa., March 28th, 1819; graduated at Washington College; studied theology at the Western Seminary, Allegheny, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington. He was pastor of the Church at Troy, Ohio, from 1846 to 1851, preaching part of his time in Salem Church, in the country. He next spent four years as pastor of St. Mary's, county-seat of Auglaize county, also preaching to several missionary points in the county. His last charge was the church of Marselles, where he labored for nearly eight years from 1855, and where he died March 25th, 1863. He was an able and earnest preacher, a successful pastor, much beloved in all the social relations of life. He spent and wore out his life in his Master's work.

Templeton, Rev. Samuel McClain, the son of Alexander and Charity (McClain) Templeton, was born near West Alexander, Pa., December 11th, 1816. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1836; studied theology at the Western Seminary, Allegheny, and was licensed by Washington Presbytery in 1842. He commenced his labors in Mansfield, Ohio, but on account of the state of his health, declined a call. He was for some time pastor of the church in Millersburg, Ohio, having been ordained by Coshocton Presbytery. He was pastor of the Church in Middleboro, Ohio, for eight years. In the Spring of 1856 he removed to Delavan, Ill., where he succeeded in gathering a large and active congregation, erecting a substantial house of worship, and exerting an influence for good in all that region. He died May 13th, 1867. Mr. Templeton was greatly beloved by his brethren in the ministry, by whom he was honored and trusted as a good man and a good preacher. As a presbyter he deservedly held the first rank, as faithful and efficient. His voice was often raised in earnest and pungent appeals in behalf of all the great schemes of the Church for the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Templin, Rev. Terah, having been licensed by the Hanover (Va.) Presbytery, in 1780, went to Kentucky shortly after, where he received ordination, in 1785. He settled in Washington county, on the south side of the Kentucky river, and there organized several churches and labored faithfully as an evangelist. He extended his labors, in the way of supplying destitute churches and forming new ones, into Livingston county also. He died October 6th, 1818, at the age of seventy-six. His talents were respectable, his manner was solemn and impressive, and his character every way irreproachable.

Ten Commandments, The. The precepts of the decalogue—Deut. iv, 13, more properly expressed as the "ten words"—Exod. xxiv, 38, marg.; Deut. x, 1, marg.; the solemn authoritative utterance of the Deity, originating, as no other words have originated, from Him alone. They were proclaimed from the top of Sinai, amid mighty thunders and lightnings (Exod. xx, 1-22) and were graven on tablets of stone by the finger of God (xxxii, 18; xxxiii, 15, 16; xxxiv, 1, 28). Ten was a significant number, the symbol of completeness; and in these "ten words" was comprised that moral law to which obedience forever was to be paid. On these, summed up as our Lord summed them up, hung all the law and the prophets (Matt. xxii, 36-40). There were two tables, the commandments of the one more especially respecting God, those of the other, man. These are usually divided into four and six. Perhaps they might better be distributed into five and five. The honor to parents enjoined by the fifth commandment is based on the service due to God, the Father of His people. And it is observable that Paul, enumerating those which make up love to a man's neighbor, includes but the last five (Rom. xiii, 9).

The following rules are important for understanding the commandments: 1. Every command requires many duties and forbids many sins which are not expressly named in it. 2. Wherever a duty is required, the contrary sin is forbidden, and wherever a sin is forbidden, the contrary duty is required. 3. Wherever a sin is forbidden, all sins of the same kind, and all occasions, causes or appearances of those sins, are forbidden; and wherever any duty is commanded, all duties of the same kind, and all the means of performing them, are commanded. 4. Whatever we ourselves are bound to do, we are obliged to do what in us lieth to cause others to do the same. 5. That which is forbidden may never be done; but actions required are only to be performed when God gives opportunity. 6. The same sin is forbidden, and the same duty required, in different respects, in many commandments. 7. In a command partly moral and partly positive, as in that relating to the Sabbath, obligation to the duties of the second table often supersedes our obedience to that command of the first table. 8. The connection between the commands is so close and intimate that whosoever breaks one of them is guilty of all (James ii, 10). 9. The commands are spiritual, reaching to the thoughts and motions of the heart, as well as to the words and actions of the life. Our Saviour was particular in inculcating this. He taught that causeless anger is a breach of the sixth commandment, and impure desire a violation of the seventh. (See Tables of the Law.)

Tennent, Rev. Charles, the fourth son of the Rev. William Tennent, Sr., was born at Coleraine, in the county of Down, May 3d, 1711, and therefore, at the time of his father's emigration from Ireland, was a boy of seven years of age. He, as well as his older brothers, received his education under the paternal roof, or rather in the Log College. He appears, however, to have been less distinguished than either of his brothers, but seems to have been a respectable minister of the gospel.

Mr. Tennent was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle, September 20th, 1736, and was settled in the Presbyterian congregation of Whiteclay Creek, Del. Soon after his settlement in this place the great revival under the preaching of Whitefield commenced, and was very powerful in this congregation. During this remarkable season of divine influence, Mr. Whitefield spent some days with Mr. Charles Tennent, and assisted him in the administration of the Lord's Supper, preaching to vast multitudes of people every day of the solemnity, which continued four days, according to custom. Some years before his death, Mr. Tennent removed from Whiteclay Creek to Buckingham Church, in Maryland, where he ended his days, in 1771, and where, it is presumed, his remains are interred. Of his latter days, and of the circumstances of his decease, there is no authentic information.

bloody persecutions of Charles II, were shipped from Scotland, to be sold as slaves in the Colonies. But their captain died, and his successor determined to take his cargo to Virginia, as likely there to find the best market. But a tempestuous voyage drove them into Perth Amboy, and being set free by the authorities, they determined to locate in New Jersey. Many of them settled in Monmouth county. True to their extraction and education, they gave immediate attention to religious privileges. They formed themselves into a church as early as 1692, and probably had built a house of worship before that time. They called their church Freehold. Among their number was John Boyd, who was possibly licensed to preach in Scotland. At least he appears as ministering to that people in 1706. In December of that year he was ordained, in his own public meeting house, by the newly-formed Presbytery of Philadelphia, the first minister ordained by this first Presbytery. After two years, steps were taken to have him regularly installed, when he died.

Then, for twenty years, Rev. Joseph Morgan ministered to that people, though it is not certain when remarkable brothers. Immediately a parsonage farm was purchased, where William Tennent, Jr., resided during his nearly half-century pastorate, and which was in part the scene of the battle of Monmouth.

Such was the prosperity attending the labors of the two Tennents, that in 1750 it was deemed necessary to build a larger house of worship. And the present edifice was erected, almost precisely as it is to this day. It is to be hoped that before this building is too far decayed it may be hermetically sealed up in a glass case, to be seen by future generations, a landmark, and a monument of the early days of Presbyterianism. It stands not only as a monument of the Church, but is also to be venerated for having seen the clash of arms in one of the most important battles in the war of Independence.

This church, blessed with an unusual succession of able and godly men for pastors, still brings forth fruit in old age—a green old age.

Succeeding the nearly half century of Tennent, came another half century pastorate under Dr. John Woodhull, not only a teacher of the people, but also a distinguished teacher of teachers. Then came briefer pastorates, under Job F. Halsey, D. D., June 14th, 1826, to March 5th, 1828; Rev. Robert Roy, February 1st, 1829, to March 15th, 1832; Daniel V. McLean, D. D., October, 1832, to November 8th, 1836; James Clark, D. D., November 8th, 1837, to October 2d, 1839; Rev. Luther H. VanDoren, June 17th, 1840, to July 5th, 1856; Rev. Donald McLaren, July 1st, 1857, to November 5th, 1862; Rev. Archibald P. Cobb, August 8th, 1863, until his death, February 26th, 1881. Very shortly after Mr. Cobb's settlement he had purchased the parsonage property and refitted and enlarged it, when, before the furniture was arranged in it, a fire consumed the whole, and with it all the records of the church. The present pastor is the Rev. George G. Smith.

For more than one hundred and fifty years called "Freehold," the name of this church was changed not many years since, and now it bears most appropriately the name of "Tennent Church." It embraces within its broad bosom more than four hundred and fifty souls.

Tennent, Rev. Gilbert, the oldest son of Rev. William Tennent, of Neshaminy, was born in the county Armagh, February 5th, 1703; was educated by his father, and was licensed by Philadelphia Presbytery in May, 1725. He received in the Fall the degree of A. M., from Yale. In the Autumn of 1726, he was installed pastor of the Church at New Brunswick, N. J. For some time he was the delight of the pious, and was honored by those who were destitute of religion. But when God began to bless his faithful labors to the awakening of secure sinners, and to their conversion from darkness unto light, he presently lost the good opinion of false professors, his name was loaded with reproaches, and the grossest immoralities were attributed to him. But he bore all with he was installed. On his leaving them, the people were sadly divided, and "there seemed no hope of their ever settling a minister." But a marked providence sent them John Tennent, certainly the most saintly of the five of that name who made such a deep impression upon the early history of Presbyterianism in this country. He was settled at Freehold in 1730, and was probably the first pastor. A decided change immediately followed. In that same year steps were taken for the building of a new house of worship. It was near the site of the present building.

John Tennent died in two years, and was succeeded by his brother William, the most famous of the four patience. Though he had sensibility to character as well as other men, yet he was willing to encounter disgrace rather than neglect preaching the Truth, however offensive to the sinful, whom he wished to reclaim.

Towards the close of the year 1710, and in the beginning of the year 1711, he made a tour in New England, at the request of Mr. Whitefield. An astonishing efficacy accompanied his labors. Visiting various towns, he was everywhere remarkably useful. In this tour, the dress in which he commonly entered the pulpit was a great coat, girt about him with a leathern girdle, while his natural hair was left undressed. His large stature and grave aspect added a dignity to the simplicity, or rather rusticity, of his appearance.

REV. GILBERT TENNENT.

In 1711 he removed to Philadelphia and took charge of the Second Congregation. "Here," says Webster, "his feet were blistered in traversing the streets and visiting such numbers of distressed souls. He called on Franklin to point out suitable persons from whom to solicit aid in erecting a house of worship. The philosopher told the 'enthusiast' to call on everybody; he did so, and built the church." In 1753, Mr. Tennent, at the request of the Trustees of New Jersey College, went to England to solicit funds for that Institution. After a life of great usefulness, he died, in much peace, about the year 1765.

For more than forty years, Mr. Tennent had enjoyed a habitual, unshaken assurance of his interest in redeeming love. In his manner, he was affable, condescending and communicative. He was endeared by his frankness and undisguised honesty; eminent for public spirit and great fortitude; his mind was enriched by much reading, and his heart was laden with a rich experience of divine grace. As a preacher, he was equaled by few; his reasoning was strong, his language forcible, and often sublime, his manner warm and earnest. With admirable dexterity he exposed the false hope of the hypocrite, and searched the corrupt heart to the bottom. He said of some of his earliest sermons that he begged them, with tears, of the Lord Jesus. Among Mr. Tennent's numerous publications were two volumes of sermons.

Tennent, Rev. John, the third son of Rev. William Tennent, Sr., was born in the county of Armagh, in Ireland, November 12th, 1707. The whole of his education he obtained under the paternal roof, and in the Log College which his father had founded at Neshaminy. After passing the usual trials before the Presbytery of Philadelphia, he was licensed to preach the gospel. November 19th, 1730, he was ordained pastor of the Church at Freehold, N. J., where his labors were attended with prudence, diligence and success.

Mr. Tennent died April 23d, 1732, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. A few minutes before he expired, holding his brother William by the hand, he broke out into the following rapturous expressions: "Farewell, my brethren, farewell father and mother, farewell world, with all thy vain delights. Welcome, God and Father—welcome, sweet Lord Jesus! Welcome death, welcome eternity. Amen." Then, with a low voice, he said, "Lord Jesus, come, Lord Jesus!" And so he fell asleep in Christ, and obtained an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of his God and Saviour. He was buried in the graveyard near to the church where he preached, and where his tombstone may yet be seen.

As far as can be judged from the accounts which have come down to us, there is reason to believe that, both in piety and talents, Mr. Tennent was not inferior to any of his brothers, and that if he had lived to the usual period of human life, he would have been a "burning and a shining light" in the Church. The people of his charge were greatly attached to him, and exceedingly lamented his death. There is still extant the fragment of an old manuscript book, kept by the Session of his church, in which is contained the following entry:—

"A mournful providence and cause of great humiliation to this poor congregation, to be bereaved, in the flower of youth, of the most laborious, successful, well qualified and pious pastor this age afforded, though but a youth of twenty-four years, five months and eleven days."

Tennent, Rev. William, Sr., was born in Ireland, in 1673. He received a liberal education, but at what college or university is not known. It is probable, however, that he obtained his learning at Trinity College, Dublin, as he belonged originally to the Episcopal Church of Ireland, in which he took orders. After entering the holy ministry, he acted as chaplain to an Irish nobleman, but there is no evidence that he was settled over a parish in that country. He remained in Ireland until he was past middle age. With the hope of enjoying more liberty of conscience, and having greater facilities for doing good than in his own country, he removed to America, landing at Philadelphia, September 6th, 1718, with his family, consisting of his wife, four sons and one daughter.

Soon after his arrival in this country, Mr. Tennent applied to the Synod of Philadelphia to be received as a minister into their connection. The Synod, after "due deliberation," agreed to receive him. This was done September 17th, 1718. Being thus introduced into the Presbyterian Church, he went, in November following, to East Chester, N. Y., where he continued, probably as a stated supply, for about eighteen months. In May, 1720, he removed from thence to Bedford, Westchester county, N. Y., and took charge of the church at that place, of which he was pastor till August, 1726. After leaving Bedford, he went to preach at Bensalem and Smithfield, in Bucks county, Pa. Subsequently, and soon after, but at what precise date it is not easy to decide, he accepted a call from the Church at Neshaminy, in the same county, where he remained till the close of his life. He had two congregations, distinguished as the Upper and Lower. Soon after his removal to Neshaminy, being deeply impressed with the importance of a well educated as well as pious ministry, he established a school at which young men might acquire the requisite qualifications for the sacred office (See LOG COLLEGE). Whitefield, who had visited this institution, wrote to a friend in Philadelphia, July 15th, 1740: "I rejoice you have been at Neshaminy. I can say of Mr. Tennent and his brethren, as David did of Goliath's sword: 'None like them.'"

Mr. Tennent was, by his position at Neshaminy, a member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, but when the division of the Synod took place, he attached himself to the New Brunswick Presbytery, to which his sons, Gilbert and William, belonged. For some time before his death his health was so feeble that he was unable to perform the duties of the pastoral office, and his pulpit was supplied by the Presbytery. He died at his own house in Neshaminy, May 6th, 1745, aged seventy-three, coming to the grave in a good old age, like a shock of corn, fully ripe. He was buried in the Presbyterian burying-ground, where his tomb may yet be seen.

A writer in the May number of the Assembly's Magazine, for the year 1805, says of Mr. Tennent: "He was eminent as a classical scholar. His attainments in science are not so well known, but there is reason to believe that they were not so great as his skill in language. His general character appears to have been that of a man of great integrity, simplicity, industry and piety." "To William Tennent, above all others," says Rev. Richard Webster, "is owing the prosperity and enlargement of the Presbyterian Church. Other men were conservative, and to their timely erection of barriers we owe our deliverance from the 'New Light' of Antrim; others were valiant for the truth, and exerted by the pen a wide influence on the age; many were steadily and largely useful in particular departments and in limited spheres; but Tennent had the rare gift of attracting to him youth of worth and genius, imbuing them with his healthful spirit, and sending them forth, sound in the faith, blameless in life, burning with zeal, and unsurpassed as instructive and successful preachers.

Tennent, Rev. William, Jr., the second son of the Rev. William Tennent, Sr., was born June 3d, 1705, in the county of Armagh, in Ireland, and was just turned of thirteen years when he arrived in America. He applied himself, with much zeal and industry, to his studies, and made great proficiency in the languages, particularly in the Latin. Being early impressed with a deep sense of divine things, he soon determined to follow the example of his father and elder brother, by devoting himself to the service of God in the ministry of the gospel. He studied theology under the direction of his brother Gilbert, who had pastoral charge of the Church at New Brunswick, N. J.

In October, 1733, he was installed pastor of the Church at Freehold, N. J. After a life of great usefulness, he died at Freehold, March 8th, 1777, aged seventy-one. He was the friend of the poor. The public lost in him a firm asserter of the civil and religious rights of his country. Few men have ever been more holy in life, more submissive to the will of God under heavy afflictions, or more peaceful in death.

Mr. Tennent was well skilled in theology, and professed himself a moderate Calvinist. The doctrines of man's depravity, the atonement of Christ, the necessity of the all-powerful influence of the Holy Spirit to renew the heart, in consistency with the free agency of the sinner, were among the leading articles of his faith. With his friends, he was at all times cheerful and pleasant. He once dined in company with Governor Livingston and Mr. Whitefield, when the latter expressed the consolation he found in believing, amidst the fatigues of the day, that his work would soon be done, and that he should depart and be with Christ. He appealed to Mr. Tennent whether this was not his comfort. Mr. Tennent replied: "What do you think I should say, if I was to send my man, Tom, into the field to plow, and at noon find him lounging under a tree, complaining of the heat and of his difficult work, and begging to be discharged of his hard service? What should I say? Why, that he was an idle, lazy fellow, and that it was his business to do the work that I had appointed him."

In The Assembly's Missionary Magazine, in 1806, the Hon. Elias Bondinot, L.L.D., who was well acquainted with all the members of the remarkable Tennent family, published a memoir of the Rev. William Tennent, Jr., in which the following interesting incident of his history is related:—

"After a regular course of study in theology, Mr. Tennent was preparing for his examination, by the Presbytery, as a candidate for the gospel ministry. His intense application affected his health, and brought on a pain in his breast and a slight hectic. He soon became emaciated, and at length was like a living skeleton. His life was now threatened. He was attended by a physician, a young gentleman who was attached to him by the strictest and warmest friendship. He grew worse and worse, till little hope of life was left. In this situation his spirits failed him, and he began to entertain doubts of his final happiness. He was conversing one morning with his brother, in Latin, on the state of his soul, when he fainted and died away. After the usual time he was laid out on a board, according to the common practice of the country, and the neighborhood were invited to attend his funeral on the next day. In the evening his physician and friend returned from a ride in the country, and was alighted beyond measure at the news of his death. He could not be persuaded that it was certain, and on being told that one of the persons who had assisted in laying out the body thought he had observed a little tremor of the flesh under the arm, although the body was cold and stiff, he endeavored to ascertain the fact. He first put his own hand into warm water, to make it as sensible as possible, and then felt under the arm, and at the heart, and affirmed that he felt an unusual warmth, though no one else could. He had the body restored to a warm bed, and insisted that the people who had been invited to the funeral should be requested not to attend. To this the brother objected, as absurd, the eyes being sunk, the lips discolored, and the whole body cold and stiff. However, the doctor finally prevailed, and all probable means were used to discover symptoms of returning life. But the third day arrived, and no hopes were entertained of success but by the doctor, who never left him, night nor day. The people were again invited, and assembled to attend the funeral. The doctor still objected, and at last confined his request for delay to one hour, then to half an hour, and finally to a quarter of an hour. He had discovered that the tongue was much swollen, and threatened to crack. He was endeavoring to soften it by some emollient ointment, put upon it with a feather, when the brother came in, about the expiration of the last period, and mistaking what the doctor was doing for an attempt to feed him, manifested some resentment, and, in a spirited tone, said: 'It is shameful to be feeding a lifeless corpse;' and insisted, with earnestness, that the funeral should immediately proceed. At this critical and important moment the body, to the great alarm and astonishment of all present, opened its eyes, gave a dreadful groan, and sunk again into apparent death. This put an end to all thoughts of burying him, and every effort was again employed, in hopes of bringing about a speedy resuscitation. In about an hour the eyes again opened, a heavy groan proceeded from the body, and again all appearance of animation vanished. In another hour life seemed to return with more power, and a complete revival took place, to the great joy of the family and friends, and to the no small astonishment and conviction of very many who had been ridiculing the idea of restoring to life a dead body.

"Mr. Tennent continued in so weak and low a state for six weeks that great doubts were entertained of his final recovery. However, after that period he recovered much faster, but it was about twelve months before he was completely restored. After he was able to walk the room, and to take notice of what passed around him, on a Sunday afternoon, his sister, who had staid from church to attend him, was reading in the Bible, when he took notice of it and asked her what she had in her hand. She answered that she was reading the Bible. He replied: 'What is the Bible? I know not what you mean.' This affected the sister so much that she burst into tears, and informed him that he was once well acquainted with it, on her reporting this to the brother, when he returned, Mr. Tennent was found, upon examination, to be totally ignorant of every transaction of life previous to his sickness. He could not read a single word, neither did he seem to have any idea of what it meant. As soon as he became capable of attention he was taught to read and rite, as children are usually taught, and I never learned the Latin language, under the tuition of a schoolmaster. One day, as he was reciting a lesson in Cicero's Nepos, he suddenly started, clapped his hand to his head, as if some thing had hurt him, and made a pause. His brother asking him what was the matter, he said that he felt a sudden shock in his head, and now it seemed to him as if he had read that book before. By degrees his recollection was restored, and he could speak the Latin as fluently as before his sickness. His memory was completely revived, that he gained a perfect knowledge of the past transactions of his life, as if no difficulty had previously occurred. This extraordinary state, made a considerable noise, and attracted not only matter of serious contemplation to the day at Christian, especially when connected with what follows in this narration, but furnished a subject of deep investigation and learned inquiry to the real philosopher and curious and inquisitive.

"The writer of these memoirs was greatly interested by these uncommon events, and, on a favorable occasion, earnestly pressed Mr. Tennent for a minute account of what his views and apprehensions were while he lay in this extraordinary state of suspended animation. He discovered great reluctance to enter into any explanation of his perceptions and feelings, at this time, but being importunately urged to do so, he at length consented, and proceeded, with a solemnity not to be described.

"'While I was conversing with my brother,' said he, 'on the state of my soul, and the fears I had entertained for my future welfare, I found myself, in an instant, in another state of existence, under the direction of a superior being, who ordered me to follow him. I was accordingly wafted along, I know not how, till I beheld at a distance an ineffable glory, the impression of which on my mind it is impossible to communicate to mortal man. I immediately reflected on my happy change, and thought, Well, blessed be God! I am safe at last, notwithstanding all my fears. I saw an innumerable host of happy beings surrounding the inexpressible glory, in acts of adoration and joyous worship; but I did not see any bodily shape or representation in the glorious appearance. I heard things innumerable. I heard their songs and hallelujahs of thanksgiving and praise, with unspeakable rapture. I felt joy innumerable and full of glory. I then applied to my conductor, and requested leave to join the happy throng on which he tapped me on the shoulder, and said, 'You must return to the earth.' This seemed like a sword through my heart. In an instant, I recollect to have seen my brother standing before me, disputing with the doctor. The three days during which I had appeared lifeless seemed to me not more than ten or twenty minutes. The idea of returning to this world of sorrow and trouble gave me such a shock, that I fainted repeatedly.' He added, 'Such was the effect on my mind of what I had seen and heard, that if it be possible for a human being to live entirely above the world and the things of it, for some time afterwards I was that person. The ravishing sound of the songs and hallelujahs that I heard, and the very words uttered, were not out of my ears when awake, for at least three years. All the kingdoms of the earth were in my sight as nothing and vanity; and so great were my ideas of heavenly glory, that nothing which did not in some measure relate to it could command my serious attention.'"

Tennent, Rev. William, a son of Rev. William Tennent, of Froehold, N. J.; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1761, and ordained the next year. Soon after he went to Virginia on a missionary tour, by order of the Synod, where he remained six months. In 1765, he became pastor of a Congregational Church at Norwalk, Conn., but retaining his connection with the Presbytery. In 1772 he accepted a pressing call to an Independent Church in Charleston, S. C., where he was received with great favor, and soon wielded a commanding influence, both in the pulpit and out of it. Mr. Tennent was an active and flaming patriot, and a noble preacher. He died August 11th, 1777.

Tennent, William Mackay, D. D., was a son of Rev. Charles Tennent, of Delaware, and a nephew of William and Gilbert Tennent. He was ordained June 17th, 1772, as pastor of the Congregational Church in Greenfield, Conn. In December, 1781, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Abington, Pa., where he continued until his death, December, 1810. In 1797 Dr. Tennent was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. A. Alexander, who knew him personally, represents him as a man of great sweetness of temper and politeness of manner, and as distinguished for his hospitality. In his last hours he was blessed with an uninterrupted assurance of the favor of God.

Ter-centenary Celebration. An overture from the Synod of Toledo, and also one from the Presbyterian Historical Society, Philadelphia, came before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, at its sessions in Chicago, A. D., 1871, asking the Assembly to take order for the celebration, during the year 1872, of the three hundredth anniversary of the completion of the work and life of John Knox in Scotland, the organization of the first Presbytery in England, and the martyrdoms of St. Bartholomew's Day in France. The Assembly recommended the observance of this Ter-centenary year to all the Synods, Presbyteries and congregations, and a committee of three, the Moderator (Rev. Z. M. Humphrey, D. D.) being chairman, was appointed to secure an address or addresses, to be delivered during the sessions of the Assembly of 1872. The purpose of this action was to revive in the hearts of the clergy and awaken in the hearts of the people an intelligent interest in the noble army of martyrs and confessors who, from the very earliest ages, have professed, defended and suffered for the Scriptural doctrine and order known as Presbyterianism. The ultimate aim was to deepen the attachment of Presbyterians to their Church and its pure and apostolic principles of faith and government.

The arrangements for carrying out the provisions of the General Assembly were most heartily entered upon. In the Assembly of 1872, convened in the city of Detroit, a special meeting was held, at which admirable addresses were made by Rev. Edward P. Humphrey, D. D., of Louisville, Ky., and Rev. Samuel M. Hopkins, D. D., of Auburn, N. Y. The meeting was marked by the most profound enthusiasm and interest. The theme of Dr. Humphrey's address was "JOHN KNOX," that of Dr. Hopkins, the "HUMAN EXORS."

During the year, similar celebrations were held by Synods, Presbyteries, communities and congregations throughout the entire bounds of the Church. Never before had there been so many and so well-used opportunities to spread among the people intelligence of the noble men, the historic deeds, and the Scriptural principles of the Presbyterian Church. The people responded to the efforts of the clergy with a heartiness that oftentimes swelled into enthusiasm. In every case, so far as was ascertained, the Ter-centenary celebrations were attended by large audiences, whose interest in the subjects discussed was, without exception, not only equal to, but far beyond the expectation of managers and speakers. The several families of Presbyterians forgot their minor differences, and met, sang, prayed, rejoiced, wept and applauded together, moved by a common reverence for their common spiritual ancestors, devotion to their evangelical principles, and gratitude to the covenant-keeping God, who had blessed the Church and the world with the priceless gifts of such memories and such men. Multitudes of hearts, young and old, received a new impulse in the path of duty and devotion, while they followed, through their lives of conflict, suffering, triumph, death, those old Knights of the Evangel, Defenders of the Faith, Martyrs and Confessors of Christ, Heroes and Saints of the Church Militant, "of whom the world was not worthy."

Among the many Ter-centenary meetings above referred to, that which was held by the Synod and city of Philadelphia deserves special mention. It was the most complete in its arrangements, remarkable for its success, and far-reaching in its influence. Indeed, if assumed, although such was not the original thought, a national character, and became, in fact, representative of the whole Church.

This meeting, by the recommendation of a committee of ministers and elders, appointed by the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of Philadelphia, and of which the Rev. William P. Breed, D.D., was chairman, took place on Wednesday, November 20th, in the Seventh Presbyterian Church, Broad street and Penn Square, above Chestnut, the Rev. Henry C. McCook, pastor. It was largely attended by clergymen from New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania. At ten o'clock the ministers and elders present, with others of official or personal distinction who had been invited, to the number of near four hundred, assembled at the Presbyterian House, and marched in procession to the Seventh Church, Rev. William E. Schenck, D.D., acting as Marshal, assisted by Rev. Drs. R. H. Allen and Alfred Nevin. They were welcomed to the church by the organ and choir, and occupied the platform and seats which had been reserved for them. The house was already filled to its utmost capacity, and so continued during the entire services of morning and afternoon.

The meeting was called to order by the Hon. William Strong, Associate Justice of the United States Court. The opening devotional services were: Reading of the Scriptures, Psalm forty-sixth, by Rev. T. W. J. Wylie, D. D., of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia; prayer by the Rev. Z. M. Humphrey, D. D., Moderator of the Assembly of 1871, and pastor of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, and singing, by the congregation, of the Old Hundredth Psalm. The Memorial Discourse was then delivered by the Rev. Samuel J. Wilson, D. D., Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, and so deep an impression did it produce on the vast congregation, that at the close of the meeting the desire was expressed on all sides that it should be repeated in the Academy of Music. This desire was subsequently consummated, on the evening of January 22d, 1873, in the presence of four thousand people, fully as many more, it was estimated, being prevented from attending by inability to secure tickets.

The services of the morning of the Ter-centenary celebration closed with the benediction by the venerable Dr. Musgrave.

At three o'clock in the afternoon the services were resumed, Rev. W. P. Breed, D.D., presiding. After prayer by the Rev. Herrick Johnson, D.D., a historical sketch of Presbyterianism in Philadelphia was read by Rev. Robert M. Patterson, pastor of the South Church, Philadelphia. The Rev. J. B. Dales, D.D., pastor of the Second United Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, followed with a historical paper on "Presbyterianism in the United States," after which Rev. James McCosh, D.D., LL.D., President of the College of New Jersey, read a paper on "Presbyterianism in Foreign Countries."

On motion of Ex-Governor Pollock, the thanks of the meeting were rendered to the speakers of the day for their addresses. On motion of George H. Stuart, Esq., thanks were rendered, by a rising vote, to the pastor, elders, trustees and congregation of the Seventh Church, for the welcome which had been extended to the audience, and for the additional interest and pleasure that had been given to the occasion by the beautiful and appropriate decorations with which the platform and walls were adorned. At the request of many in the audience, the Rev. H. C. McCook, by whom these decorations had been prepared, being called upon by the chairman, gave the key to the historical designs which the decorations embodied. After the doxology, the benediction was pronounced by Rev. Thomas Murphy, D.D., pastor of the Frankford Church.

The evening exercises of the celebration were held in the new Presbyterian Publication House, at No. 1331 Chestnut street, and in connection with the formal opening of that building. The house was crowded to its utmost capacity. The Assembly Room was the centre of attraction, and was closely packed with ladies and gentlemen, many of whom were obliged to stand from seven to ten o'clock, listening to the addresses and the music. Large numbers being unable to get in, a second meeting was organized in the rooms of the Board of Education.

The services in the Assembly Room were full of interest. The Rev. Alexander Reed, President of the Board of Publication, presided. After an opening piece of music from the choir, which had kindly volunteered its services, the opening address was made by the Rev. W. E. Schenck, D.D., Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Publication, who extended a warm welcome to the audience, and gave some account of the house, its cost, and the uses to which its several parts were to be applied. The Rev. Herriek Johnson, D.D., followed, speaking on behalf of the Board of Education, which was here generously accommodated by the Board of Publication with fine apartments, without charge for rent, fuel or light. The Rev. Cyrus Dickson, D.D., of New York, one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Board of Home Missions, tendered his congratulations on behalf of the Presbyterians of New York, and warmly alluded to what his eyes had seen of the usefulness of the colporteurs and publications of the Board of Publication, as diffused in the distant Territories and on the Pacific coast of the United States. The Rev. Henry M. Field, D.D., of New York, Editor of the New York Evangelist, next addressed the audience, eloquently alluding, among other subjects, to the painful absence on this occasion of the "lost tribes" of our Presbyterian Israel—the Southern portion of our Church. The Rev. John Leyburn, D.D., of Baltimore, who was twenty years previously the Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Publication, responded kindly to the allusion of Dr. Field in regard to the Southern brethren, and entertained the audience with humorous reminiscences of the Board in its early days. Further brief and appropriate remarks were made by the Rev. John W. Dulles, D.D., Editorial Secretary of the Board; the Rev. James McCosh, D.D., LL. D., and the Rev. Henry E. Niles, of York, Pa. These addresses were interspersed with delightful music from the volunteer choir. At the close thanks were voted to the committee of ladies who had arranged the decorations—Mrs. S. C. Perkins, Mrs. Strickland Kneass, Miss Mary Sutherland and Mrs. S. B. Stitt, and the meeting adjourned, after a season of thorough enjoyment.

At the meeting extemporized by those who could not enter the Assembly Room, which was held in the rooms of the Board of Education, the Rev. Thomas Murphy, D.D., presided. Short addresses, but earnest, eloquent and brimful of the happy spirit that pervaded the multitude that thronged all parts of the house, were made by Dr. George P. Hayes, President of Washington and Jefferson College, Dr. William O. Johnstone, Dr. Alfred Nevin and Ex-Governor Pollock.

Thus ended the formal celebration of the Tercentennial of the great events in the history of the Presbyterian Church which are naturally grouped about the life and death of John Knox, the sufferings of the Huguenots and the establishment of Presbytery in England. Perhaps no event ever so fully aroused and united the Presbyterians of Philadelphia. And the interest was carried into the general community by the excellent reports which appeared in leading newspapers of the city, which were ably represented in the various sessions of the meeting. That the influence of the memorable occasion will be permanently and extensively useful, it is impossible to doubt.

Terry, Rev. Shadrack Howell, was born on Long Island in 1795. He received his collegiate education at Yale, and his theological at Princeton. He settled at an early day at Somerset, Pa., as pastor of the united congregations of Somerset and Jenner-ville, in which his labors were much blessed. From the organization of the Church in Johnstown, Pa., December 14th, 1832, until the Spring of 1835, Mr. Terry was its stated supply one-fourth of his time. November 13th, 1835, he was installed pastor of the churches of Armagh and Johnstown. Owing to a failure of health in the Spring of 1840, the pastoral relation to the former church was, at his own request, dissolved, and he then gave his whole time to Johnstown, where he was greatly beloved and eminently successful in his ministry. He departed this life, in the full triumph of Christian faith, June 3d, 1841. Mr. Terry was possessed of a fine intellect, finely cultivated. He was a kind-hearted, devoted, conscientious Christian, and an earnest workman, too, in the vineyard of the Lord. His decease, in the midst of great usefulness, was deeply lamented by his brethren, his congregation and the whole community. During a part of his ministry he taught a classical school, some of the students of which have since attained distinction in the learned professions.

Testimony and Testimonies, are terms often used by the Scriptural writers to denote the whole revelation which God has graciously given to the children of men, as the rule of their faith and practice. (Ps. xix, 7). In this extensive sense the Psalmist uses the latter term throughout the whole of the 119th Psalm. (See verse 2, 11, 22, 24, 31, 36, 46, 59, 79, 99, 111, 119, 125, 129, 138, 141, 157, 167, 168, etc.). The two tables of stone on which the law or ten commandments were written are also called the testimony (Ex. xxv, 16, 21; xxxi, 18), because they were a witness of the covenant between God and his people, and hence the ark in which they were deposited is termed "the ark of the testimony" (Ex. xxv, 22). And in the New Testament, the gospel is frequently called "the testimony." It is the testimony of God, for it contains that which He has testified of His Son, namely, that in Him He is well pleased, as the substitute and representative of all His guilty people, and as delivered for their offences, and raised again for their justification (Matt. iii, 17; xvii, 5; John iii, 32). It is the testimony of Christ also, and of His Apostles (1 Cor. i, 6; 2 Thess. i, 10; 2 Tim. i, 8).

Testimony of Christ to Christianity. Eighteen hundred years ago there lived, among a despised nation and in a remote country, a man by the name of Jesus, a carpenter's son, who had no political power, no social position, no secular learning or art, no wealth, no shelter to call His own, and who, after a very brief public career, was crucified in His youth, by His own countrymen, as a blasphemer. Yet this humble Rabbi, by the force of His doctrine and example, without shedding a drop of blood, save His own, has silently accomplished the greatest moral revolution on record, founded the mightiest and the only stable empire, and is now recognized and adored by the most civilized nations of the globe, as the Son of God and the Saviour of mankind.

This fact is astounding, and stands out alone, unapproached and unapproachable in its glory. It overthrows all other historic events, and throws the achievements of heroes, sages, poets, scholars and statesmen of ancient and modern times far into the shade.

This fact is undisputed, and admitted even by skeptics and infidels. To deny it would be as unreasonable as to deny the sun in heaven, or the existence of man on earth. Let us hear but a few voices of men of acknowledged genius and culture, who widely dissent from the humble faith of Christians, yet testify to the unsurpassed and unsurpassable greatness of Jesus. Goethe, who characterized himself as a decided non-Christian, and as a "child of the world between two prophets," in one of his last utterances expressed the conviction that the human mind, no matter how much it may advance in intellectual culture and in the extent and depth of the knowledge of nature, will never transcend the height and moral culture of Christianity, as it shines and glows in the canonical Gospels. Napoleon the Great, after he had subdued and lost again the half of Europe, said, among other striking things: "I search in vain in history to find one equal to Jesus Christ; anything which can approach the gospel. Neither history, nor humanity, nor the ages, nor nature offer me anything with which I am able to compare it or explain it." Strauss, the keenest antagonist of the gospel history, is constrained to admit that "Jesus represents, within the sphere of religion, the culmination point, beyond which posterity can never go, yea, which it cannot even equal; . . . that He remains the highest model of religion within the reach of our thought; and that no perfect piety is possible without His presence in the heart." Renan, the more brilliant, but less learned Strauss of France, concludes his "Life of Jesus" with the following eloquent prediction: "Whatever may be the surprises of the future, Jesus will never be surpassed. His worship will grow young without ceasing; His legend will call forth tears without end; His sufferings will melt the noblest hearts; all ages will proclaim that among the sons of men there is none born greater than Jesus."

This deepest and broadest fact in the history of the race, which surrounds us like an ocean from every direction, calls for an explanation. The explanation must be reasonable. The cause assigned must correspond with the effect produced.

Such an explanation we find in the history of Christ and His testimony concerning Himself, as recorded by the Evangelists, and believed by Christians of all creeds.

THE INFIDEL EXPLANATIONS OF CHRISTIANITY.

The gospel history must either be true or false.

If false, it must be, in its essential, supernatural features, either a willful lie, or an innocent fiction; in other words, the product of imposture or of delusion.

In both cases the responsibility may be fastened either on Christ Himself or on the Apostles and Evangelists.

Consequently, we may conceive of four infidel constructions of the life of Christ which exhaust the range of logical possibility. They have all been tried, from the days of Celsus to those of Renan; and the resources of talent, learning, ingenuity and skill are well nigh exhausted in the attempt to disprove the truth and to prove the falsehood of the story of Jesus of Nazareth. No new phase of infidelity can be expected which is not of necessity a repetition or modification of one of the four exploded theories. But unbelief, like belief, will go on in the Church militant to the end of time, and every new assault upon the old fortress will be repulsed by the defenders, and in its defeat, furnish a fresh proof of the truth of Christ's prophecy, that the gates of Hades shall never prevail against His Church. A brief examination of the infidel theories must suffice for our purpose.

THE CHRIST OF IMPOSTURE.

The imposture may be traced either directly to Christ or to His disciples.

I. The oldest enemies of Christ, the Pharisees and Hierarchs of His day, followed by a few obscure infidels of later times, charged Christ Himself with being an impostor and a blasphemer, who made His credulous disciples believe that He was the Son of God and the Saviour of mankind, while He knew Himself to be a mere man. In this case we must pronounce Him a consummate hypocrite, who falls under the condemnation of His own terrible rebuke of hypocrisy. And yet, it is now universally acknowledged, even by infidels themselves, that He preached the purest code of morals and lived the purest life, crowned with the noblest death.

How, then, can one and the same character be at once the very best and the very worst? The contradiction is as monstrous as that white is black and black is white. How could He play the hypocrite in view of poverty, persecution and crucifixion, as His certain and only reward in this life? How could He keep up the play without even for a moment falling out of His role and showing His true colors? How could such a wicked scheme find universal acceptance and produce greater and better results than any which human wisdom and goodness before or since has been able to achieve, or even to conceive?

These questions are unanswerable. The hypothesis is logically so untenable and morally so revolting that its mere statement is its condemnation. No scholar has seriously endeavored to carry it out.

II. Others fasten the fraud upon the first disciples of Christ, and represent them as the cunning intriguers and successful deceivers, who manufactured the story of the resurrection and persuaded the world into it, at the sacrifice of their very lives.

But the first and last impression which the Gospels irresistibly make upon every fair-minded reader is that of the artless simplicity and honesty of the writers. We may contest their learning, critical sagacity and worldly wisdom, but it is impossible to deny their good faith; it shines forth from every line; it is even strengthened by the many discrepancies in minor details, and it was sealed with their own blood. Goethe, as good a judge of literary productions as ever lived, deliberately said: "I consider the Gospels as thoroughly genuine (durchaus ächt), for there is reflected in them a majesty and sublimity which emanated from the person of Christ, and which is as truly divine as anything ever seen on earth."

We can conceive of no motive which might have induced these simple-hearted Galileans to engage in such a dangerous intrigue before all the world. And how could they keep the secret of the conspiracy? And what must we think of the intelligence of the Jews, Greeks and Romans of that age, that they could be duped by a handful of illiterate fishermen? Was Saul of Tarsus the man to be so easily fooled into a life of martyrdom by a cunning lie of the very men whom he once so bitterly persecuted? Such questions present insuperable difficulties, which no learning or ingenuity has been or ever will be able to solve.

The hypothesis of willful deception, in either of its two possible forms, is an insult to the dignity of human nature itself, which instinctively shrinks from it. Unable to maintain this ground, infidelity has of late confined itself to the conjecture of innocent fiction.

THE CHRIST OF FICTION.

Here, again, the delusion may be traced either to CHRIST HIMSELF, or to HIS DISCIPLES.

1. The first alternative assumes that JESUS was an EXTRANEUS, who deceived himself, a noble dreamer, and imagined that He was the Son of God and the promised Messiah, and died a victim to this delusion.

But the Christ of the Gospels shows not the faintest trace of fanaticism, or self-delusion. On the contrary, He discouraged and opposed all the prevailing carnal ideas and hopes of the Messiah, as a supposed political reformer and emancipator. He is calm, self-possessed, uniformly consistent, free from all passion and undue excitement, never desponding, ever confident of success, even in the darkest hour of trial and persecution. To every perplexing question He quickly returned the wisest answer; He never erred in His judgment of men or things; from the beginning to the close of His public life, before friend and foe, before magistrates and people, in disputing with Pharisees and Sadducees, in addressing His disciples or the multitude, while standing before Pontius Pilate and Caiaphas, or suspended on the cross, He shows an unclouded intellect and complete mastery of appetite and passion; in short, all the qualities the very opposite to those which characterize persons laboring under self-delusion or any mental disease.

II. But may not HIS DISCIPLES have been SELF-DECEIVED and unduly carried away by the exemplary life and death, the words and deeds of their Master, so as to work up their imagination to the honest belief that He was really the promised Messiah of the Old Testament, and a supernatural being, that came down from heaven?

In other words, the gospel history is put on a par with heathen myths (by Strauss), or Christian legends (by Renan), and thus turned into a poem or fiction of a pious excited imagination, on the basis of a small capital of actual fact.

This is the least discredit able of all false theories, because it leaves room for a high estimate of the moral character of Christ and His apostles. Christ must have been a very extraordinary person to account at all for the extraordinary impression He made, and the Apostles may escape with the complimentary censure, of an excess of pious imagination and admiration.

But the Evangelists are singularly free from imaginative coloring. They are the most objective of all historians; they abstain from every intrusion of their own feelings and reflections, even when they record the most exciting scenes, the bitterest persecution and the deepest sufferings of their Master. Their individuality is lost in the events which are supposed to speak best for themselves without note or comment. How different in this respect from the Apocryphal gospels, which abound in the crude inventions of a morbid imagination. We are, moreover, at a loss to conceive that the Apostles and Evangelists, gifted, as they were, with as clear eyes and as sound common sense as other observers, could make such a radical mistake as is here supposed. How could so many deceive themselves at the same time and in the same way? Is it at all likely that five hundred persons, to whom the risen Christ is said to have appeared at the same time, should dream the same dream? And all this is not in a period of childlike simplicity and ignorance, but in a period of high culture and skeptical criticism, in a land and a people where the story of Jesus was everywhere known, and surrounded by bitter hostility eager to dispel and expose the delusion. How could the keen, sharp and persecuting Paul be so thoroughly converted to an empty fiction? How incredible that some illiterate fishermen should have invented a far higher and more perfect life and character than the poets, philosophers and historians of Greece and Rome! The poet in this case, as Rousseau, himself an unbeliever, well said, must have been greater than the hero. It takes more than a Jesus (i. e., a greater than the greatest, which is an impossibility) to invent a Jesus. And how could an imaginary resurrection, which took place only in the visionary faith of the disciples, or, as Renan says, "in the passion of a hallucinated woman," lay the foundation of such a rock-like institution as the Christian Church?

Just here the mythical and legendary hypothesis breaks down completely, and is driven to the only alternative of truth or fraud. Innocent fiction will not do in the case of the resurrection of Christ, or even the resurrection of Lazarus, of which Spinoza remarked that, if he could believe it, he would embrace the whole Christian system, because, as the greatest of Christ's miracles, it involves the less.

In this case Renan, unable to find a better solution, departs from his own theory, and is not ashamed to resort to the wretched hypothesis of a fraud, contrived by Lazarus and his two sisters, and weakly connived at by Jesus himself, in the vain hope of producing a revolution in his favor among the unbelieving Jews. And such a Jesus, who could willingly play the charlatan, and thus outrage the principle of ordinary honesty, Renan would make us believe, nevertheless, to have been the greatest and purest of men who ever walked on earth, and who will never be surpassed in time to come! Credat Judæus Appella.

The false theories, then, are perfect failures, as far as an explanation of the great fact of Christ is concerned. They put a severer tax on our credulity than orthodoxy itself. Instead of solving or diminishing difficulties, they increase them, and substitute a moral monstrosity in the place of a supernatural miracle. They are calculated to shake the faith in man as well as in God. They contradict each other, and one has in turn refuted the other. After completing its course, infidelity in its latest phase, when brought to the test of the resurrection miracle, is forced to resort to its first and most disreputable form, and thus to fall under its own sentence of condemnation, which it pronounced upon the wretched scheme of fraud.

And, indeed, this is the only alternative; the gospel history is either true, or it is a shameless, wicked fraud, in which Christ himself was the chief actor. The shrewd, cunning Pharisees and Sadducees, who watched his movements with the vigilance of intense jealousy and hatred, felt this; they heard his amazing speeches with their own ears; they witnessed his miracles with their own eyes; how gladly would they have denied them and resorted to the mythical or legendary fiction-theory of modern times; but being unable to contradict the testimony of their senses and the common observation of the people, they derived his miracles from Beelzebub, and crucified Christ as an impostor and blasphemer. But the resurrection and the triumph of Christianity on the ruins of the Jewish theocracy was the triumphant answer to this wicked calumny.

The latest critical examination of the records of Christ's history, written by a Unitarian—"Jesus," by W. H. Furness, Philadelphia, 1870, p. 223, comes to this irresistible conclusion: "Wonderful is the character of Jesus. And hardly less wonderful is the manner in which it is portrayed in the Gospels, undesignedly, by brief, sketchy narratives of a variety of incidents, strung together with only the slightest regard to their right order and connection, and yet yielding a result of unequalled moral beauty and of a world-saving power, a result, self-consistent, all-consistent and spontaneous, because, let me reiterate, the incidents narrated are true."

Verily, the history of Jesus, his words and miracles, his crucifixion and resurrection, witnessed by the rulers and the people, friend and foe, Herod and Pilate, Jews and Romans, related by his disciples with unmistakable simplicity and honesty, proclaimed from Jerusalem to Rome, believed by contemporaries of every grade of culture, sealed by the blood of martyrs, producing the mightiest results, felt and demonstrated in its power from day to day wherever his name is known, is the best authenticated history in the world.

THE CHRIST OF HISTORY.

The more we examine the Christ of the Gospels, the more we find that He carries in himself his own best evidence, like the sun in heaven which proves its existence and power by shining on the firmament to all but the blind. "I am one," He says, "that bear witness of myself."

Much as the Evangelists differ in minor details and in their standpoint and aim, they nevertheless present only the various aspects of the one and the same Christ. Matthew, writing for Jewish readers, sets Him forth as the new Lawgiver and King of Israel, in whom all the prophecies are fulfilled; Mark paints Him, in fresh, rapid sketches, for the world-conquering Romans, as the mighty Son of God and worker of miracles of power; Luke, the physician and Hellenist, describes Him to Greek readers as the Healer of diseases, the Friend of sinners, the Saviour of the lost, the sympathizing and ideal Son of Man; John, who wrote last, and wrote for Christians of all nations and ages, gives us the Gospel of the incarnate Logos, the only Begotten of the Father, who became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth. But these are not contradictory, but complementary pictures of one and the same person.

The essential identity of the Christ of the Synoptists is universally conceded. As to the identity of the Synoptic and the Johannean Christ, it has indeed been disputed by a small class of modern critics; but the Church at large has never doubted it, and the common reader of the gospels can perceive no difference affecting, in the least degree, the character and authority of Christ. Certainly in all the features of His moral character and the object of His mission, as well as in the principal events of his earthly life, there is the most perfect agreement among the canonical gospels. He is in all of them the same original, consistent, sinless and perfect being, from the beginning to the close of His public life.

His character is, in the first place, original beyond all other men who have a just claim to originality. History furnishes no parallel to Jesus of Nazareth. The fertile imagination of poets has never conceived a character like His. No system of moral philosophy among the ancient Greeks and Romans set up such a standard of purity and perfection as Christ not only taught but practiced. All the other great teachers fell confessedly behind their own standard of virtue; Christ was more than his doctrine; His doctrine is but a reflection of His life. His character cannot be explained from any resources of his age; neither the orthodoxy of the Pharisees, nor the liberalism of the Sadducees, nor the mysticism of the Essenes could produce it; on the contrary, He stands in antagonism to all. He came out from God, and taught the world as one who owed nothing to the world, its schools, its libraries, its wise and good men. Though living in the world and for the world, He was not of the world, but far above it as the heaven is above the earth.

Christ's character is uniformly consistent. There is no man, however wise and good, who is not more or less inconsistent, who does not occasionally fall out of his role, yield to the pressure of circumstances, allow himself to be carried away by passion or excitement, betray his native weakness, falter in the path of virtue. But Christ is the same in doctrine and conduct from the beginning to the close, before friend and foe, in private and public life, in action and suffering. He had never to retract a word, never to regret a deed, never to ask the pardon of God or man. His calmness and serenity was never disturbed; He never felt unhappy or desponding and when at the close of His ministry, He could say to his heavenly Father, in the presence of His intimate friends and disciples: "I have glorified Thee on the earth; I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do."

This leads us to the third characteristic of Christ's character, His sinless perfection. This is an amazing fact, and nothing less than a moral miracle in the midst of a sinful world. Since the fall of Adam there never has been a human being that was free from the contamination of sin and guilt. Those who are the humblest, and know themselves best, are most ready to feel and to admit their own imperfections. I need only name Moses, David, St. Paul, St. Augustine, St. Bernard, Luther and Calvin, who tower so high above ordinary men by the profound conviction of their own imperfections and guilt before God, no less than by their genius and piety. Even the noblest among the heathen, as Socrates, Plato, Seneca, Epictetus, Plutarch and Marc Aurelius, prove the same fact.

But Jesus forms one absolute exception to a universal rule. Endowed with the keenest moral sensibilities and tenderest sympathies, moving in a corrupt age of this wicked world, and tempted as we, yea, more than we are, by unbelief, ingratitude, malignity, denial and treason, He yet maintained a spotless innocence to the last; He never harmed a human being, never failed in word or deed, never fell out of harmony with His Heavenly Father; He was ever true to His mission of mercy, lived solely for the glory of God and the good of mankind; united, in even symmetry, the opposite graces of dignity and humility, strength and gentleness, severity and kindness, energy and resignation, active and passive obedience, even to the death on the cross, and furnished an exemplar of perfect humanity for universal imitation.

If this was the character of Jesus—and who will deny it?—how can we, in the name of consistency, deny His testimony concerning His person and work, and refuse to admit His stupendous claims, which from any other mouth would be universally condemned as wicked blasphemy, but which from His lips sound with all the force of self-evident truth. If He was the wisest and holiest of men, He must truly be what He professes to be, the Son of God, the promised Messiah, the Saviour of the world.

THE CHRIST OF PROPHECY.

Though descended from heaven, Christ stands firmly on earth, and as the universal man, "most human, and yet most divine," intertwined with all the fortunes of the race. He casts his lustre back through the long ages of the past to the very beginning of the race, and forward to all ages of the future.

It is an undeniable fact that at the time of Christ the Jewish nation was filled with Messianic expectations, which, though carnally misunderstood and perverted, had their roots in the Scriptures of the Old Testament and bear testimony to them. A long series of prophecies and types runs in unbroken line from the fall of man to the advent of Christ, and looks steadily towards a final redemption, not only of the chosen people, but of the whole human family. Though varied in form and admitting of a growing fulfillment, they are yet one and consistent in spirit and aim, and were wonderfully confirmed at last by actual fulfillment. The proto-gospel of the serpent bruiser, the promises given to Noah, to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to David and his royal house, the symbol of the brazen serpent in the wilderness for the healing of the people, the daily sacrifices and the pregnant symbolism of the tabernacle and the temple, the prediction of a future great prophet and lawgiver, the meek and lowly King of Zion, His sufferings for the sins of the people, and his exaltation and everlasting reign, apply, in their highest and deepest sense, to Jesus of Nazareth, and to no other person in history. Isaiah, the prince and evangelist among the prophets, in the last twenty-seven chapters of his book, unrolls a picture of the Messiah so complete that none but those blinded by dogmatic prejudice can fail to find here the lineaments of our Saviour with His atoning death and glorious triumph. And finally to make certainty doubly sure, immediately before Christ appeared His great forerunner (whose historical existence no one denies), as the personal embodiment of the Old Testament, leading his own pupils to Jesus as the Lamb of God, and then disappearing like the dawn of the morning in the glory of the risen sun.

Christ knew and confessed Himself to be the promised Messiah of whom Moses wrote and the prophets; He claimed all the prerogatives and exercised all the functions of the Messiah; He read Himself on every page of the book of God. And, truly, He is the light and the life of the Old Testament; without Him it is a sealed book to this day, in Him it is revealed.

The wonderful harmony between the Christ of prophecy and the Christ of history has at all times justly been regarded as one of the strongest proofs of His divine character and mission, and led to the conversion of many thinking and inquiring minds. It is impossible to resolve this harmony into accident or to trace it to human divination and sagacity. It is the exclusive privilege of the divine mind to foreknow the distant future and to read the end from the beginning.

But the Christ of prophecy and type is not confined to the Jewish religion; He may be traced, in a modified form, even in the providential currents of the heathen world before his advent on earth. He is the desire of all nations. The civilization and literature of Greece, the political power and law of Rome, prepared the way for His coming, as well as the theocracy of the Jews. The noblest mission of the Greek language was to become the silver basket for the golden apple of the gospel. The chief aim of Alexander's conquests and the consolidation of nations under the Roman rule was to break down the partition walls between nations and to prepare them for a universal religion. The Greek Fathers justly recognized in the scattered truths of the ancient poets and philosophers sparks of the light from the Logos before His incarnation. Plato almost prophesied Christ when he described "the righteous man as one who, without doing any injustice, yet has the appearance of the greatest injustice, and proves his own justice by perseverance against all calumny unto death," and when he predicted that, if such a righteous man should ever appear on earth, "He would be scourged, tortured, bound, deprived of His sight, and, after having suffered all possible injury, nailed to a post." Even amidst the blundering symbols, allegories and fictions of heathen mythology, the Avatars and Grand Llamas and Absorptions and Nirvanas of Brahminism and Buddhism, the divine incarnations and the human dedications of Greece and Rome, we may see caricatures and carnal anticipations of the great mystery of godliness: "God manifest in the flesh." They are irrepressible longings of the human mind and heart after union with the divine, the groping in the dark after the unknown God who became known in Christ. The prodigal son of idolatry, after wasting his substance in riotous living, remembered his father's house and prepared to return to him in penitence and faith, when the father met him more than half way, and received him to his loving heart. Tertullian speaks, with reference to the nobler heathen, of the testimonia animarum naturaliter Christianarum, of the testimonies of the soul which is constituted and predestinated for Christianity, and which, left to its truest and noblest instincts, turns to the one true God, as the flower to the sun, as the needle to the magnet.

Thus Christ sums up the whole meaning of ancient history, fulfilling the unconscious as well as the conscious prophecies and types of the past, the preparatory revelations of God and the aspirations of the human heart. In the widest sense it is true that He came not to destroy but to fulfill.

CHRIST AND CHRISTENDOM.

As Christ stands at the end of the Old World, so He stands also at the beginning of the New. He is at once the ripest fruit of history before, and the fertile seed of history after, His coming. He is the turning point in the biography of our race, the glory of the past and the hope of the future. Christ and Christianity are inseparable; the achievements of Christianity are the achievements of Christ, its founder and ever present head; and if Christianity cannot perish, it is because Christ lives, the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

For eighteen centuries the Christian Church has stood firm and unshaken, assailed, indeed, by winds and storms from all directions, yet ever growing stronger and spreading wider; a perpetual testimony to Christ, feeding on His words, living of His life, singing His praise in every zone, commemorating His life-giving death in every communion service, and celebrating His resurrection on every returning Lord's Day. Christianity has taken the lead in all the great movements of modern history; it has regenerated the tottering Roman empire, civilized the Northern barbarians, produced the Reformation of the sixteenth century, abolished cruel laws, mitigated the horrors of war, restrained violence and oppression, infused a spirit of justice and humanity into governments and society, advocated the rights of the poor and suffering, stimulated moral reform and progress, and is the chief author and promoter of all that is good and praiseworthy and enduring in our modern civilization.

Human nature is, indeed, still as depraved as ever, stained with the same vices, vexed with the same cares, saddened with the same sorrows, as in times of old; but, taking even the lowest utilitarian view, we may say with Benjamin Franklin, in his wise letter to Tom Paine, "Man is bad enough with Christianity, he would be far worse without it; therefore, do not unchain the tiger." Whatever is bad and deplorable exists in spite of Christianity; whatever is pure and holy and tends to promote virtue, happiness and peace, is due chiefly to the direct or indirect influence of Christ and His Gospel. And whatever hopes we may and must entertain for the future progress and amelioration of the race, they depend upon Him who alone can bring about, by His good and holy Spirit, that millennium of peace when

"Earth is changed to heaven, and heaven to earth,
One kingdom, joy and union without end."

Yet, in the midst of abounding corruptions, Christ continually acts and reacts, and fulfills His mission of peace and good will to mankind. Who can measure the restraining, ennobling, cheering, sanctifying impulses which are, from day to day and from hour to hour, proceeding from the example of Christ, as preached from the pulpit, taught in the school, read in the Bible and illustrated in the lives of his followers. Much as Christians are divided on points of doctrine, polity and ceremonies, they are united in devotion and love to their heavenly Master, derive the same holy motives from Him, and endeavor, however feebly, to attain the same standard of perfection set up by Him.

This unity of Christendom is strikingly illustrated in the vast treasure house of hymnology whose power for good cannot be easily over-estimated. As I said in another place: "The hymns of Jesus are the Holy of Holies in the temple of sacred poetry. From this sanctuary every doubt is banished; here the passions of sense, pride and unholly ambition give way to the tears of penitence, the joys of faith, the emotions of love, the aspirations of hope, the anticipations of heaven; here the dissensions of rival churches and theological schools are hushed into silence; here the hymnists of ancient, mediæval and modern times, from every section of Christendom—profound divines, stately bishops, humble monks, faithful pastors, devout laymen, holy women—unite with one voice in the common adoration of a common Saviour. He is the theme of all ages, tongues and creeds, the divine harmony of all human discords, the solution of all dark problems of life. What an argument this for the great mystery of God manifest in flesh, and for the communion of saints. Where is the human being, however great and good, that could open such a stream of grateful song, ever widening and deepening from generation to generation to the ends of the earth?"

CHRIST AND THE HUMAN HEART

The experience of the Christian Church for these eighteen hundred years is repeated day by day in every human soul which is seriously concerned about the question of personal salvation. We are placed by divine Providence in a world of sin and death; we are made in God's image, endowed with the noblest faculties, destined to be the prophets, priests and kings of nature, filled with unsatisfied longings and aspirations after truth, holiness and peace; yet bound to this earth, ever drawn away from our own ideals by sensual passions, selfish desires and surrounded by temptations from within and without. We who are born to the freedom of the sons of God, are slaves of sin; we who are destined for immortality and glory must suffer and die; descended from heaven, we end in the tomb and return to dust.

Who solves this mysterious problem of life? Who breaks the chains of darkness? Who removes the load of guilt? Who delivers us from the degrading slavery of sin? Who secures peace to our troubled conscience? Who gives us strength against temptation and enables us to realize our noble vocation? Who inspires our soul with love to God and man? Who, in the midst of abounding corruption and depravity, upholds our faith in man, as the image of God and special object of his care? Who keeps up our hope and courage when earthly prospects vanish, the dearest friends depart, and the future looks dismal and threatening? Who dispels the terrors of the tomb and bids us hail death as a messenger that summons us to a higher and better world where all the problems of earth are solved in the light and bliss of heaven?

To all these questions, which may be hushed for a while by the follies of passion, the intoxication of pleasure, the eager pursuit of wealth or knowledge, but which sooner or later irresistibly press themselves upon the attention of every serious mind, there is but one answer: "Lord, where shall we go but to Thee? Thou alone hast words of eternal life, and we know and believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Apostles and evangelists, martyrs and confessors, fathers and reformers, profound scholars, and ignorant slaves, mighty rulers and humble subjects, experienced men and innocent children—all, all point, in this great and all-absorbing question of salvation, not to Moses, not to Socrates, not to Mohammed, not to philosophy, art or science, but to Christ, as the Way, the Truth and the Life. He and He alone has a balm for every wound, a relief for every sorrow, a solution for every doubt, pardon for every sin, strength for every trial, victory for every conflict. He and He alone can satisfy the infinite desires of our immortal mind. Out of Christ life is an impenetrable mystery; in Him it is gloriously solved. Out of Him there is nothing but skepticism, nihilism and despair; in Him there is certainty and peace in this world, and life everlasting in the world to come. Our hearts are made for Christ, and "they are without rest until they rest in Christ."

"In joy of universal peace, or sense
Of sorrow over sin,
Christ is His own best evidence,
His witness is within.

No fable old, nor mythic lore,
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No doubtful fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivions years,—

But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
A present helps He;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And love its Galilee.

The Healing of His seamless dress
Is by our beds of pain;
We touch Him in life's throng and press,
And we are whole again.

Through Him the first fond prayers are said
Our lips of childhood frame,
The last low whispers of our dead
Are burdened with His name.

O Lord and Master of us all!
What'er our name or sign,
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by Thine.

Apart from Thee all gain is loss,
All labor vainly done;
The solemn shadow of Thy cross
Is better than the sun.

Alone, O love ineffable?
Thy saving name is given;
To turn aside from Thee is hell,
To walk with Thee is heaven.

Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord,
What may Thy service be?
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word,
But simply following Thee.

The heart must ring the Christmas bells,
Thy inward alms arise,
Its faith and hope Thy canticles,
And its obedience praise"—P. Schaff, v. 6.

Tetard, John Peter, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister, a graduate of the Academy of Lausanne, Switzerland. He was called, about the year 1753, to be pastor of the French Church, in Charleston, S. C. This charge he resigned, in 1756, to come to New York. Upon the departure of John Carle, pastor of the French Church in that city, Tetard was invited to fill his place provisionally. He afterwards taught a school, and was Professor of the French language in Columbia College, N. Y., from 1784 to 1787, when he died.

Thanksgiving is the expression of our gratitude to God for the favors which we have received from Him. They are bestowed without the expectation of a recompense; and, indeed, as He stands in need of nothing, so we have nothing to give; but nature itself dictates, and religion demands, that we should entertain a lively sense of His goodness, and should give utterance to our feelings on appropriate occasions. Devout men of former times have set us an example: "Bless the Lord, O my soul," says the Psalmist, "and all that is within me, bless His holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits; who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowmeth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies" (Ps. ciii, 1-11). Thanksgivings naturally are associated with petitions, for it is impossible, when we present ourselves before a benefactor, to solicit him to befriend us again, not to recall former tokens of his kindness; and we shall have the surer hope of success in our new application, when we show that we have been duly impressed by the past. We find the Apostle Paul repeatedly mingling thanksgivings with his prayers.

The blessings for which we should be thankful are: 1. Temporal, such as health, food, raiment, rest, etc. 2. Spiritual, such as the Bible, ordinances, the Gospel and its blessings. 3. Eternal, or the enjoyment of God in a future state. Also for all that is past, what we now enjoy, and what is promised, for private and public, for ordinary and extraordinary blessings, for prosperity, and even adversity, so far as rendered subservient to our good.

The excellency of this duty appears, if we consider, 1. Its antiquity: it existed in Paradise before Adam fell, and therefore prior to the graces of faith, repentance, etc. 2. Its sphere of operation, being far beyond many other graces which are confined to time and place. 3. Its felicity: some duties are painful, as repentance, conflict with sin, etc., but this is a source of sublime pleasure. 4. Its reasonableness. And 5. Its perpetuity. This will be in exercise forever, when other graces will not be necessary, as faith, repentance, etc.

The obligation to this duty arises: 1. From the relation we stand in to God. 2. The Divine command. 3. The promises God has made. 4. The example of all good men. 5. Our unworthiness of the blessings we receive. And 6. The prospect of eternal glory.

The Children of the Church. The following propositions embody a condensed statement of the ecclesiastical relation of the children of the Church, and the general principles which should govern our dealing with them:—

1. The children of Christian believers, as well as others, are by nature born in sin, and need to be regenerated by the Holy Spirit in order to their everlasting salvation. But

2. Under the providence and grace of God they are introduced, through their parents' faith, into the visible Church of Christ. "Now are they holy?" says Paul. They are in their birth consecrated to God by His own act. They have as much right to be included with their parents in the census of the Church as in that of the State. They belong to the particular congregation in which their parents are enrolled. Hence a list of the baptized members, as well as of the communicating members, should be kept by each Session, and should be reported from year to year. When parents remove from one charge to another, and are dismissed and recommended as members, their children should also receive their appropriate certificates. They have a divinely established claim on the care and consideration of the particular church in which their lot is cast.

3. The Church relation into which the children are thus introduced is the same as that which is assumed on a profession of faith by adults. It entitles them, first and at once, to public recognition as members of the church by the administration of baptism, the badge of that relationship; and, then, to every right or privilege as soon as they exhibit the requisite qualifications for it. And it imposes upon them every duty which is assumed by a profession of faith. Their membership is as direct and absolute, though not as full, as that of the adult professor. What God imposes is no less authoritative and binding than what men voluntarily assume. The child born in the United States comes as unequivocally under the laws of this government, with its duties and privileges, as does the foreigner who voluntarily emigrates hither and applies for naturalization.

4. The members of the invisible Church, the elect and redeemed, are infallibly known only to God; but as a credible profession of faith by adults raises the belief, at the bar of human judgment, that they belong to the number, so the birth of the children of believers is to be accepted as ground for the belief that they also are in the number, and they should be regarded and treated accordingly, until their own deliberate and persistent conduct destroys the belief. They should be taught that the Father loves them; that Christ has redeemed them; that the Spirit is theirs to fit them for the holiness and happiness of the glorious presence; and that "the feelings, acts, habits and manners which Christ enjoins alone befit their position, as truly as if they were adult professors."

Sin is peculiarly heinous in their case. The obligations to obedience are peculiarly strong. They should be made to feel this from the first.

The spirit of the instruction and exhortations which a baptized child of the Church should receive is expressed by the true words which Frederick William Robertson uttered in a sermon that contains much untruth: "You are God's child. And now, because you are His child, live as a child of God; be redeemed from the life of evil, which is false to your nature, into the life of light and goodness, which is the truth of your being. Scorn all that is mean; hate all that is false; struggle with all that is impure. Love whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; certain that God is on your side, and that whatever keeps you from Him keeps you from your own Father. Live the simple, lofty life which befits an heir of immortality."

Dr. Arnold would not believe that his Rugby boys would lie to him; thereby he educated them in truthfulness. While watching against the development of innate sin in the children of the Church, and educating them under the fact of its existence, show them, from the beginning, that they are not considered as of the world, that you do not act on the probability of their willingly living in iniquity, but that they are holy in state, and are designed to be holy in heart and in life, and that to live otherwise will be shamefully degrading to their birthright, and you are thereby under the grace of God, training them as the heirs of heaven. For

5. Such nurture and admonition will ordinarily, if not invariably, be accompanied by the evidences of regeneration.

"It is in Zion that the children of the Church are born to newness of life. Since God has promised to be their God, it is in training them as if they were his, as if it were alone congruous with their position to walk as his children in faith, love and all holy obedience, that we are to look for that inworking Spirit and outworking holiness, commensurate with their years, which shall seal them as sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty."

They can be regenerated at the time of their natural birth, or between that and their baptism, or at the time of their baptism, or afterwards.

As the baptism of a person is, according to our standards, a "sign and seal of the covenant of grace, of his engrafting into Christ, of regeneration, of remission of sins, and of his giving up unto God through Jesus Christ to walk in newness of life;" as by the right use of the ordinance, the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's will, in his appointed time;" as it also "confirms our interest in Christ;" parents ought, in the act of baptismal presentation, to believe that, even then, the Spirit of God can exert his mighty power, and they should, with a strong faith, wrestle in prayer for it. We do not believe in baptismal regeneration. But we do hold to the possibility of regeneration at the time of baptism, and faith should petition earnestly for it.

The important point, however, is not to determine the time when the saving change is produced in any soul, but to deal with it in such a way as to bring out the evidences and effects of the change.

"The only proper evidence of a work of the Spirit is the fruits of the Spirit in all holy dispositions and conduct." The theory of Christian experience which invariably insists upon knowing the day, and almost the moment of regeneration, is unphilosophical, unscriptural and dangerous in its practical tendency. Especially in reference to the children of the Church, we should proceed upon "the possibility of true Christian feeling, inwrought by the Holy Ghost, and developed gradually by Christian nurture, so as sometimes to preclude distinct statements of any time before which it was not, or of the manner and order of its progress in the soul." As a part of this, they should be taught to look forward to the reception of the Lord's Supper as an event for which they ought earnestly to seek preparation; and, in the words of our Decorum for Worship, "when they come to years of discretion, if they be free from scandal, appear sober and steady, and have sufficient knowledge to discern the Lord's body, they ought to be informed that it is their duty and privilege to come to it." They have no right to take a seat at the sacred board if they are ignorant, if they have become profane or scandalous, or if they are secretly indulging themselves in any known sin. They must show that they have become sensible of their lost and helpless state by sin, and are dependent upon the atonement of Christ for pardon and acceptance with God. It must be evident, before they can properly appear as "worthy receivers," that they are striving to lead a holy and godly life. The officers of the church should examine them as to their knowledge and piety; and the credible evidences of a change of heart, and of practical religion in the outward life, should be as decided as those which are demanded of a professing convert from the world. The essential qualifications for the Supper are the same in both classes. But the Church should not deal with its children as if they were to be expected first to go off from it in active sin, and then be suddenly converted before obeying their Lord's command.

6. Nothing but a known death in continued and unrepented of sin should destroy the hope that a child of the Church is a saved child of God.

As, when an adult professor falls into inconsistencies, we do not hastily conclude that he is a hypocritical or false professor, and unregenerate, nor quickly cast him out of the Church, but follow him with the earlier processes of discipline, for the purpose of evoking more strongly the gracious principle and overcoming the remains of sin, so when a child of the Church falls into sinful acts, under sudden temptation, and through the original depravity of our fallen nature, which in this life is never completely overcome, we should not hastily conclude that he is certainly unregenerate.

As nothing but the outspoken denial of his profession, or a persistent and flagrant course of transgression which points to total apostasy, should lead to the excommunication of a professor; nothing but the deliberate cutting off of themselves can place any of the children of the Church out of its province during their life.

They are under its government and discipline from the beginning to the end. In their earlier years this must be exercised mainly, though not exclusively, through their parents; not exclusively, for the Church has its direct as well as indirect bearing on them. The object of this government and discipline is by nurture to prevent transgression and by necessary censures to correct transgression. The baptized members ought, therefore, to be followed with instruction, advice, warning, reproof and remonstrance, and by suspension from the various privileges of the Church, if they deliberately refuse to yield to its obligations when they reach the age at which they can understand them. Our Standards assume that those who come to "years of discretion" indisposed or unqualified to sit at the sacred table, should be specially dealt with, so as to make them feel that this is in itself a grievous sin, and to constrain them to seek the preparation of the heart without which, if not fitted to commune with the Lord at the feast, they are still less prepared to meet him in judgment. "Baptized members have no right to come to communion until they make a profession of personal faith. Until they do this they are like citizens under age, with their rights held in suspension, as a just punishment for their refusal to believe. These suspended rights are those of communing, and having their children baptized." Dr. A. A. Hodge, Com. on Conf., 475.)

But it would be assuming a great responsibility for any officers in the visible Church to excommunicate a person who, by his birth, had been placed in the organization, and by that act of excommunication to declare that the presumption of his being among the redeemed is finally destroyed. God alone, who places the child in the Church, can remove him from it.

It is, we are inclined to think, the failure to make this Scriptural ideal the actual of the Church in its dealings, and the dealings of parents with the young, which produces the apparent godlessness that may be found among the children of the covenant. Its actualization in the education of the home, the school, and the congregation, would, under God's covenant promise, predominantly exhibit the children holy in life, as well as holy in consecration.—R. M. Patterson, D. D.

The Church and the Ministry. (Sermon preached by the Rev. Howard Crosby, D. D., before the Synod of New York, 1883, on Eph. iv. 12: "For the edifying of the body of Christ.") Apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers are given to the Church by Christ, to edify His body. That is the divine declaration. This edification is the ultimate aim of this divine gift to the Church. The adjustment (kathartismos) of the saints and the ministerial work among them, mentioned in this same clause, are subsidiary ends. It becomes, then, of the utmost importance to the Christian minister to understand what the edification of Christ's body is, that he may regulate his own life and conduct in accordance with the divine plan; for we are all sadly aware that, when God gives gifts to His Church in the form of human agents, the divine favor may be greatly thwarted by the unfaithfulness of the agents.

1. The body of Christ is the Church. This we are expressly told. "He is the head of the body, the Church" (Col. i, 18); "the Church, which is his body" (Eph. i, 22, 23). The figure is readily interpreted. It is one of life, unity in variety, and mutual dependence of membership, and, above all, of union with a guarding and governing head. But the Head, which is Christ, is invisible. So also is the body. To have an invisible head and a visible body would be contrary to the symmetry of the figure. The Church that is Christ's body is an invisible Church. That is, it cannot be seen and measured by the world from any outward signs, any more than Christ can so be seen and measured. The whole worth and value of the Church is so completely the worth and value of Christ that the Church and Christ are identified in some representations. The temple on Moriah was a type of Christ, as our Saviour showed when He said: "Destroy this temple and in three days I will build it up." But the temple was also a type of Christ's Church, for the Church is represented as "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the grand sub-foundation, in whom all the building, fitly framed together, groweth unto a holy temple." This complete temple is perfect for the eternity of heaven. It can have no flaw in it. Hence its identification with Christ himself. Of course, therefore, it is a spiritual Church that is signified. To suppose that this temple, or this body, signifying the Church, is a visible thing—what we call the visible Church—is to confound all the imagery used by the divine revealer. The body of Christ is not a visible collection of men and women, who may call themselves a church, nor is it an historical visibility which inherits outwardly the name of church. That external church existed when a nation was selected by God to hear His oracles, but when the Church became the body of Christ it became invisible, and had no external outline. Men had to be treated by ministry and ordinances in an external way. Rules and methods had to be established for these external ordinances. Our bodily condition and men's inability to read the soul rendered this necessary; but all this did not alter the spiritual character of Christ's true Church, to whom the promises were made. The spiritual Church had to take on a material form, to a certain extent, but we see how from the beginning the apostles were careful to make as little as possible of these material forms, that the spiritual character might be most prominent in the thoughts and efforts of God's people. It was human weakness and human sin that magnified the material forms, that erected hierarchies, made long metaphysical creeds which cursed all who would not adopt them, multiplied ceremonies and insisted on a compact and consolidated unity of outward shape, by means of which all spirituality was lost, and the so-called Church became the devil's own net to catch and ruin souls.

The visible Church was in that period not the white horse of purity, carrying the Saviour as the crowned conqueror, but the livid horse of corruption, carrying death, and leading the polluted host of Hades. Such a Church was not the body of Christ in any sense. The body of Christ, in all those evil days, as now, was composed solely of those who exercised a true and humble faith in the Redeemer. They only were the people of God, and to them only belonged the promises. With this view of the Church, we see how erroneous is our common use of the word Church history. We apply it to the history of outward organization, no matter how utterly corrupt, which is not the history of Christ's Church at all, but the history of Satan's burlesque. Church history has yet to be written. It will be the tracing of the course of piety from the apostolic day, and will have very little to do with thrones and cathedrals. It will treat of humble corners and persecuted saints, who were styled heretics, and of simple, self-denying souls who hated show and prevailed in prayer. A large part of what is called Church history treats of the falsehood which wore the name of truth, and gives the history of corrupt human institutions which sacrilegiously appropriated to themselves the divine promises. This false notion of Church history has helped to emphasize externals in the minds of many and to perpetuate the evil. It has given rise to debate on succession and rubric and rite, to the exclusion of spiritual life, and has overshadowed God's truth with architectural splendors and ecclesiastical dignitaries. We need to go back to the simplicity that is in Christ, from which the apostle shows us how easy it is to be corrupted. We need to know Christ no more after the flesh. We need to know that Christ's body partakes of Christ's life and purity, and is not a decaying carcass. We need to distinguish between the true and the false, and to be assured that greed and display and sensuality cannot be sanctified by a mere name. The outward organizations which we are obliged to have for the sake of order may contain false members, bad fish with good, tares with the wheat, but the spiritual Church, the only true Church, the Church which is Christ's mystical (or hidden) body, can have no such members. To any outward organization we can be loyal only so long as it is conformable to the life of the spiritual Church. When it proves false to that life, its abandonment is our duty, when our protest cannot rectify the evil. All such action should, of course, be sober, well weighed, and prayerful, not rash, impulsive and captious; but no conservatism will justify our continuance in a corrupt organization which calls itself the Church. This would not be to edify, but to destroy the body of Christ. Because the body of Christ has an earthly habitat, there is a constant danger of error concerning it; and laws, methods and persons may be recognized as belonging to that body which have no real and legitimate connection with it. They have been imposed by pride, selfishness and fanaticism, upon the outward organization, and obtain the current title of "ecclesiastical." Even with the old Jewish Church, which had a national element, God was continually expostulating, because they thought their churchship dwelt in the nation and that the national life was thus the godly life. So, since Messiah came, the corresponding error of confounding the outward church with the body of Christ has led to the fearful enormities both in creed and conduct which have crushed the lives of saints in cruel bondage and driven lofty minds into skepticism and infidelity.

It is for us, as Christians and Christian teachers, to keep the distinction now dwelt upon constantly before our minds, and to make all our ecclesiastical machinery as simple as possible and thoroughly conformed to the spirit of the gospel. We should be jealous of any magnification of outward ceremony, as in such case only providing perches where worldliness can roost, and should emphasize the life hid with Christ in God, as the characteristic of the true believer. We should, so far from imitating the ritual of the old Jewish Church, be thankful that we are freed from those (then) necessary fetters which led to spiritual lameness and the turning of many out of the way of God. The divine authority for a typical ritual before Christ is the divine authority for its abolition after Christ. The aid to faith which was found in the ancient ceremony is now found far more fully in the divine record of the life and death and teachings of the long-expected Messiah, and this aid, moreover, is free from the perils which of necessity, as human nature is constituted, were attached to the former.

II. Having now glanced at the spiritual character of Christ's body, the Church, let us consider what the edification of this Church must be.

Edification is building. The Greek oikodome is the Latin edificatio.

The spiritual Church is represented as a temple built on Christ, the apostles and prophets forming the first courses of ascending stones. It will be a complete structure, when, with the shouts of "Grace, grace!" the top stone will be laid on the heavenly towers, and the Redeemer shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. Our text declares that the Christian minister's aim is to be the development of this spiritual temple. He is to be the agent of the divine grace, the co-worker with God in rearing the holy and eternal fane. We rightly then infer:—

(1) That he is not to seek to please men, but God. The Church is not a human but a divine idea. Its growth to perfection is the divine end to be accomplished by divine means, although man may administer them. It is God's good and holy pleasure that the minister of Christ subserves; with which man's pleasure (unless sanctified) is never in accord. Hence the minister is not to confer with flesh and blood, but with the Word and Spirit of God, in the performance of his sacred work. He will take godly men into his counsel, men who know the Word and Spirit; but he will refuse the advice of worldly men, who have no spiritual discernment and know nothing of the mind of Christ.

(2) We infer that he is not to seek an external development. That there will be an external development, a movement and growth visible to the world from a true spiritual upbuilding, is undoubtedly true, but the mind of the minister should be on the spiritual upbuilding, and no thought of how the thing will look should enter his head, except as a subordinate matter of decency and order. The increased knowledge of divine things in his people, and the addition to that people of souls converted from the world, should be the one goal (in two forms) of his aim and energy. And

(3) We infer that he is a teacher of morals only as morals are connected with the heart renewed by the Spirit of God. He is not a civilizer, but a Christianizer. He is a philosopher, only so far forth as a prophet of God is a philosopher. He is not a former of theories, or a metaphysician, but a preacher of Christ to make souls Christly by bringing them into personal connection with Christ. He is not a Pythagoras or a Francis of Assisi, with systems and rules to correct living, but a voice ambassadorial from God to offer life in Christ, which will, when accepted, make its own rules. To consider the minister of Christ as a mere teacher of morals is to degrade him from the high position to which his calling gives him a claim. He is not called to edify society, but to edify the body of Christ. That society should be benefited by his edification is to be expected, but nevertheless the minister's work is on a far higher plane.

With these inferences from our text we may draw a few practical applications:—

(1) The preaching of a Christian minister is not to be of the same stuff or for the same end as a lyceum lecture. The object and material of the two are as far asunder as the poles. If a congregation is gathered by a minister to be instructed in history or science, the instructing is not preaching, and the minister is not exercising his calling. Much more is this true of the minister who seeks to amuse. The use of the pulpit for such a purpose is the betrayal of a high trust and the polluting of holy things. The Church is by these means brought down to the level of the world, and, with the circus and theatre, poses before the reporter and the newspaper. God's judgments begin at his own house, and when the crisis comes the fearful whirlwind of his indignation will sweep away those who have trifled with the holy office of the ministry and courted the applause of the vulgar. The preacher has the Word of God as his inexhaustible armory, and from that source he is to find weapons fitted for every assault upon the soul of man. He is to substitute nothing for that Word. The preacher who wanders away from the Bible for a theme declares by that act his utter unfitness for his duties, and practically allies himself with the philosophers of ethical culture or the moral teachers of the histrionic profession. The revelation of God's grace in Jesus Christ—this is the one theme of the Christian ministry, a theme which has infinite variety of presentation in its exclusive unity.

(2) The worship of a Christian congregation should be as simple as is consistent with decency and order, the two principles inculcated in externals by the Word. Any adornment of the building which should naturally call the attention from the worship should be avoided. The supposed aids to faith are too often only aids to artistic enjoyment and complete stoppels to spiritual contemplation. A choir of singers who are listened to for their sweet sounds is a complete bar to worship. A minister who calls in this accessory in order to fill his church has relinquished the edification of the body of Christ, and has become a pleaser of men. There are fit places for the ear and mind to be enchanted with exquisite music, but the Church of Christ is not one of them. Let us leave to the Apostate Church of Rome the transformation of the places of holy convocation into picture galleries and concert halls, and keep our holy places for a spiritual service. The great need of the Christian soul is a more constant contemplation of the unseen and eternal realities, and the aesthetic sense is a trap where the contemplation is arrested and external beauty is taken for heavenly truth. The aesthetic Christian is the hardest to edify, for he is perfectly satisfied with his present attainments; since, confounding art with Christ, and its enjoyment for spirituality, he has reached a high grade of piety. All this is accomplished in him most subtly, and he has no suspicion even of his self-deception. It is for the reason of this insidious character of the peril, that we who are ministers of Christ should be careful not to foster the world's demand for artistic display in our churches; and should strive to preserve a pure spiritual worship in the use of those simple appliances which do not divert the mind, either by excessive adornment on the one side, or by baldness and deformity on the other.

(3) The body of Christ being a spiritual body, and its edification being the promotion of spiritual life, the example of the minister, whose great duty is to edify the body of Christ, should be an example of godly living. Any habit or manner which suggests to the world a hypocritical life should be avoided, even though the inference be a false one. The minister should have the respect of all, as an honest and true man. To the believer he should be known as a man whose walk is close with God. Trifling with sacred things in the pulpit or out of it; irreverent uses of the holy name of God; intimacies with men of marked worldliness; identification with worldly society in its system of gaiety and self-indulgence; engagement in money speculation—these utterly cancel the value of a preacher's preaching, and lead the mass of men to consider him a hypocrite, and to look upon the ministry as a mere technical profession, like that of the stage.

In order that the Christian minister should appear a true and godly man, he must be a true and godly man. There must be no effort at acting. He should have tastes so pure and a mind so high that the allurements and opinions of the world should alike be unobserved by him. He should be immersed in the Word of God and instant in prayer, with heaven's light upon his soul, seeking in his whole life to shed that heavenly light upon the souls of others. Such a life in a Christian minister will always make his ministry effective in the edification of the body of Christ.

I have now, brethren, briefly sketched a view of the Church as suggested by our text. It is not a popular view. The popular view would have a large amount of ecclesiasticism and worldliness contained in it. But Christ never intended his Church to be popular. It could only be popular when a holy heart and a holy life are popular. The world has not yet arrived at that stage of sentiment. It will only reach it by conversion, and then popularity will be a mark of the truth. But now it is not so. The world, represented by its literature, has no relish for holiness. A true church will surely be unpopular, and those whose business it is to cater to the popular taste will always have a sneer ready for its faithful ministry and ministrations. Our danger is lest ministers of Christ should forget themselves and forget their holy mission, and attempt some practical compromise with the scoffing world. Wealth, refinement, society, political position, are all heavy weights on the wrong side of the scale, and it is only a self-denying godliness that can outweigh them and keep the Christian minister in his God-appointed place as the edifier of the body of Christ. May God grant unto us the fervor of Paul and the courage of Elijah in maintaining the truth of Christ against the oppositions and enticements alike which Satan is ever preparing, to destroy therewith the spirituality of the Church. Nehemiah and his co-laborers had Sanballats without Jerusalem, and Noadiah within, but yet the wall went up to completion, while the zealous workmen held each a trowel in one hand and a spear in the other. And so shall the Church of Christ (His own spiritual body) be edified to its completion, notwithstanding foes without and foes within, by its faithful ministry teaching on one hand the revealed truth of Scripture, and resisting on the other the insidious assaults of masked enemies.

The Confession of Faith. The Westminster Assembly of Divines who were employed in the preparation of the Confession of Faith, which forms a material part of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church in this country, were men alike distinguished for their piety and erudition. In every part of the work the evidences of their extreme caution and wisdom are apparent. All the doctrines admitted into it were subjected to the severe test of the only infallible rule of faith, and the phraseology in which they were clothed was chosen with the nicest discrimination. While the matter is remarkably condensed, the style is so lucid as seldom to justify controversy as to its true meaning and intent. Its chief excellence, however, is that it presents a scheme of doctrine which is admirably perfect and consistent with itself, while in each particular it confidently appeals to the Word of God for its confirmation. The Committee appointed by the Westminster Assembly (a brief historical sketch of which is given under the head—Catechisms, Larger and Shorter), for the composition of a Confession of Faith, and which consisted of Dr. Hoyle, Dr. Gouge and Messrs. Herle, Gataker, Tuckney, Reynolds and Vines, at first wrought at the work of preparing the Confession and Catechisms simultaneously. "After some progress had been made with both, the Assembly resolved to finish the Confession first, and then to construct the Catechism on its model." They presented in a body the finished Confession to Parliament, December 3d, 1646, when it was recommitted, that the "Assembly should attach their marginal notes to prove every part of it by Scripture." They finally reported it as finished, with full Scripture proofs of each separate proposition attached, April 29th, 1647.

The Shorter Catechism was finished and reported to Parliament, November 5th, 1647, and the Larger Catechism April 14th, 1648. On the 22d of March, 1648, a conference was held between the two Houses, to compare their opinions respecting the Confession of Faith, the result of which is thus stated by Rushworth:—

"The Commons this day (March 22d), at a conference, presented the Lords with a Confession of Faith passed by them, with some alterations (especially concerning questions of discipline), viz.: That they do agree with Their Lordships, and so with the Assembly, in the doctrinal part, and desire the same may be made public, that this kingdom and all the Reformed Churches of Christendom may see the Parliament of England differ not in doctrine."—Hetherington's History of the Westminster Assembly, p. 245.

The Confession of Faith, Directory of Public Worship and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms were all ratified by the Scotch General Assembly as soon as the several parts of the work were concluded at Westminster.

The original Synod of our American Presbyterian Church, in the year 1729 solemnly adopted the Confession of Faith and Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly, as "The Confession of Faith of this Church." The record is as follows:—

"All the ministers of Synod now present, which were eighteen in number, except one, that declared himself not prepared (but who gave his assent at the next meeting), after proposing all the scruples any of them had to make against any articles and expressions in the Confession of Faith and Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Assembly of divines at Westminster, have unanimously agreed in the solution of those scruples, and in declaring the said Confession and Catechisms to be the confession of their faith, except only some clauses in the twentieth and twenty-third chapters, 'concerning the civil magistrate.'

The following are the passages in the Westminster Confession which are altered in our Confession: Chap. xx, sec. 1, of certain offenders it is said, "they may be proceeded against by the censures of the Church, and by the power of the civil magistrate." Chap. xxiii, sec. 3, "The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the Word and Sacraments, or the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, yet he hath authority, and it is his duty, to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all ordinances of God duly settled, administered and observed. For the better effecting whereof he hath power to call synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God."

In the act preliminary to the Adopting Act, the General Synod, whilst in the act of enforcing the adoption of the Confession upon office-bearers, yet in regard to private members declares itself willing to "admit to fellowship in sacred ordinances all such as we have grounds to believe Christ will at last admit to the kingdom of heaven." See Book i, § 7. In 1839, the General Assembly put forth a similar statement. See Book vii, § 2, b.

No apology is needed for the insertion of the Confession of Faith in an Encyclopedia of American Presbyterianism.

THE CONFESSION OF FAITH.

CHAPTER I.—OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURE.

Although the light of nature, and the works of creation and providence, do so far manifest the goodness, wisdom, and power of God, as to leave men inexcusable,¹ yet are they not sufficient to give that knowledge of God, and of his will, which is necessary unto salvation;² therefore it pleased the Lord, at sundry times, and in divers manners, to reveal himself, and to declare that his will unto his church;³ and afterwards for the better preserving and propagating of the truth, and for the more sure establishment and comfort of the church against the corruption of the flesh, and the malice of Satan and of the world, to commit the same wholly unto writing;⁴ which maketh the Holy Scripture to be most necessary,⁵ those former ways of God's revealing his will unto his people being now ceased.⁶

⁵ 2 Tim. iii, 15. ⁶ Heb. i, 1, 2.

II. Under the name of Holy Scripture, or the Word of God written, are now contained all the books of the Old and New Testament, which are these—

OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Genesis.	Chronicles, II.	Daniel.
Exodus.	Ezra.	Hosea.
Leviticus.	Nehemiah.	Joel.
Numbers.	Ester.	Amos.
Deuteronomy.	Job.	Obadiah.
Joshua.	Psalms.	Jonah.
Judges.	Proverbs.	Micah.
Ruth.	Ecclesiastes.	Nahum.
Samuel, I.	The Song of Songs.	Habakkuk.
Samuel, II.	Isaiah.	Zephaniah.
Kings, I.	Jeremiah.	Haggai.
Kings, II.	Lamentations.	Zechariah.
Chronicles, I.	Ezekiel.	Malachi.

OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

The Gospels according to Matthew.	Galatians.	The Epistle of James.
Mark.	Ephesians.	The first, and second Epistles of Peter.
Luke.	Philippians.	The first, second and third Epistles of John.
John.	Colossians.	The Epistle of Jude.
The Acts of the Apostles.	Thessalonians, I.	The Revelation.
Paul's Epistles—To the Romans.	Thessalonians, II.
Corinthians, I.	To Timothy, I.
Corinthians, II.	To Timothy, II.
	To Titus.
	To Philemon.
	The Epistle to the Hebrews.

All which are given by inspiration of God, to be the rule of faith and life.¹

III. The books commonly called Apocrypha, not being of divine inspiration, are no part of the canon of the Scripture; and therefore are of no authority in the Church of God, nor to be any otherwise approved, or made use of, than other human writings.¹

IV. The authority of the Holy Scripture, for which it ought to be believed and obeyed, dependeth not upon the testimony of any man or church, but wholly upon God (who is truth itself), the author thereof; and therefore it is to be received, because it is the word of God.¹

V. We may be moved and induced by the testimony of the church to a high and reverent esteem for the Holy Scripture; and the heaviness of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrine, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole (which is to give all glory to God), the full discovery it makes of the only way of man's salvation, the many other incomparable excellencies, and the entire perfection thereof, are arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the Word of God; yet notwithstanding, our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth, and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit, bearing witness by and with the word in our hearts.²

¹ 1 Tim. iii, 15. ² 1 John i, 20, 27.

VI. The whole counsel of God, concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man's salvation, faith, and life, is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture; unto which nothing at any time is to be added, whether by new revelations of the Spirit, or traditions of men.¹ Nevertheless, we acknowledge the inward illumination of the spirit of God to be necessary for the saving understanding of such things as are revealed in the word; and that there are some other things concerning the worship of God, and government of the church, common to human institutions, which are to be ordered by the light of nature and Christian prudence, according to the general rules of the word, which are always to be observed.²

VII. All things in Scripture are not alike plain in themselves, nor alike clear unto all; yet those things which are necessary to be known, believed and observed, for salvation, are so clearly propounded and opened in some place of Scripture or other, that not only the learned, but the unlearned, in a due use of the ordinary means, may attain unto a sufficient understanding of them.²

VIII. The Old Testament in Hebrew (which was the native language of the people of God of old), and the New Testament in Greek (which at the time of the writing of it was most generally known to the nations), being immediately inspired by God, and by his singular care and providence kept pure in all ages, are therefore authentic; and so in all controversies of religion the church is finally to appeal unto them.¹ But because these original tongues are not known to all the people of God who have right unto and interest in the Scriptures, and are commanded, in the fear of God, to read and search them;² therefore they are to be translated into the vulgar language of every nation unto which they come; that the word of God dwelling plentifully in all, they may worship him in an acceptable manner,³ and, through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, may have hope.⁴

IX. The infallible rule of interpretation of Scripture is the Scripture itself; and therefore, when there is a question about the true and full sense of any scripture (which is not manifold, but one), it may be searched and known by other places that speak more clearly.¹

X. The Supreme Judge by which all controversies of religion are to be determined, and all decrees of councils, opinions of ancient writers, doctrines of men and private spirits are to be examined, and in whose sentence we are to rest, can be no other but the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scripture.¹

OF GOD AND OF THE HOLY TRINITY.

There is but one—only¹ living and true God,² who is infinite in being and perfection;³ a most pure spirit,⁴ invisible,⁵ without body, parts,⁶ or passions;⁷ immutable,⁸ immense,⁹ eternal,¹⁰ incomprehensible,¹¹ almighty,¹² most wise,¹³ most holy,¹⁴ most free,¹⁵ most absolute,¹⁶ working all things according to the counsel of his own immutable and most righteous will,¹⁷ for his own glory;¹⁸ most loving,¹⁹ gracious, merciful, long suffering, abundant in goodness and truth, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin;²⁰ the rewarder of them that diligently seek him;²¹ and withal most just and terrible in his judgments;²² hating all sin;²³ and who will by no means clear the guilty.²⁴

II. God hath all life,¹ glory,² goodness,³ blessedness,⁴ in and of himself; and is alone in and unto himself all-sufficient, not standing in need of any creatures which he hath made;⁵ nor deriving any glory from them;⁶ but only manifesting his own glory in, by, unto, and upon them; he is the alone fountain of all being, of whom, through whom and to whom are all things;⁷ and hath most sovereign dominion over them, to do by them, for them, or upon them, whatsoever himself pleaseth.⁸ In his sight all things are open and manifest;⁹ his knowledge is infinite, infallible, and independent upon the creature;¹⁰ so as nothing is to him contingent or uncertain.¹¹ He is most holy in all his counsels, in all his works, and in all his commands.¹² To him is due from angels and men, and every other creature, whatsoever worship, service, or obedience, he is pleased to require of them.¹³

III. In the unity of the Godhead there be three persons of one substance, power, and eternity; God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost.¹ The Father is of none, neither begotten nor proceeding; the Son is eternally begotten of the Father,² the Holy Ghost eternally proceeding from the Father and the Son.³

CHAPTER III

OF GOD'S ETERNAL DECREE.

God from all eternity did by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass;¹ yet so as thereby neither is God the author of sin;² nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established.³

¹ Eph. i, 11. ² Jam. i, 13, 17. ³ Acts ii, 23.

II. Although God knows whatsoever may or can come to pass, upon all supposed conditions;¹ yet hath he not decreed anything because he foresaw it as future, or as that which would come to pass upon such conditions.²

III. By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels¹ are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.²

IV. These angels and men, thus predestinated and fore-ordained, are particularly and unchangeably designed; and their number is so certain and definite that it cannot be either increased or diminished.¹

V. Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen in Christ, unto everlasting glory,¹ out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto;² and all to the praise of his glorious grace.³

¹ Eph. i, 4, 9, 11. ² Rom. ix, 11, 13, 16. ³ Eph. i, 6, 12.

VI. As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, fore-ordained all the means thereunto.¹ Wherefore they who are elected being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ,² are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his Spirit working in due season; are justified, adopted, sanctified,³ and kept by his power through faith unto salvation.⁴ Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only.⁵

VII. The rest of mankind God has pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by, and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice.¹

VIII. The doctrine of this high mystery of predestination is to be handled with special prudence and care,¹ that men attending the will of God revealed in his word, and yielding obedience thereunto, may, from the certainty of their effectual vocation, be assured of their eternal election.² So shall this doctrine abound with matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God;³ and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to all that sincerely obey the gospel.⁴

¹ Rom. ix, 20, and xi, 33. ² 2 Pet. i, 10. ³ Eph. i, 6. ⁴ Rom. xi, 5, 6, 20, and viii, 38.

CHAPTER IV

OF CREATION.

It pleased God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,¹ for the manifestation of the glory of his eternal power, wisdom and goodness,² in the beginning, to create or make of nothing the world, and all things therein, whether visible or invisible, in the space of six days, and all very good.³

¹ Heb. i, 2. ² Rom. i, 20. ³ Gen. 1st chap. throughout; Col. i, 16.

II. After God had made all other creatures, he created man, male and female,¹ with reasonable and immortal souls,² endued with knowledge, righteousness and true holiness, after his own image;³ having the law of God written in their hearts,⁴ and power to fulfil it;⁵ and yet under a possibility of transgressing, being left to the liberty of their own will, which was subject unto change.⁶ Besides this law written in their hearts, they received a command not to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; which while they kept they were happy in their communion with God,⁷ and had dominion over the creatures.⁸

CHAPTER V.

OF PROVIDENCE.

God, the great Creator of all things, doth uphold,¹ direct, dispose and govern all creatures, actions and things,² from the greatest even to the least,³ by his most wise and holy providence,⁴ according to his infallible foreknowledge,⁵ and the free and immutable counsel of his own will;⁶ to the praise of the glory of his wisdom, power, justice, goodness and mercy.⁷

II. Although in relation to the foreknowledge and decree of God, the first cause, all things come to pass immutably and infallibly,¹ yet, by the same providence, he ordereth them to fall out according to the nature of second causes, either necessarily, freely or contingently.²

III. God, in his ordinary providence, maketh use of means;¹ yet is free to work without,² above,³ and against them, at his pleasure.⁴

¹ Acts xxvii, 24, 31. ² Hos. i, 7. ³ Rom. ix, 19, 20, 21. ⁴ 2 Kings vi, 6.

IV. The almighty power, unsearchable wisdom and infinite goodness of God so far manifest themselves in his providence that it extendeth itself even to the first fall, and all other sins of angels and men,¹ and that not by a bare permission, but such as hath joined with it a most wise and powerful bounding,² and otherwise ordering and governing of them in a manifold dispensation to his own holy ends;³ yet so, as the sinfulness thereof proceedeth only from the creature and not from God; who being most holy and righteous, neither is nor can be the author or approver of sin.⁴

V. The most wise, righteous and gracious God doth oftentimes leave for a season his own children to manifold temptations and the corruption of their own hearts, to chastise them for their former sins, or to discover unto them the hidden strength of corruption and deceitfulness of their hearts, that they may be humbled;¹ and to raise them to a more close and constant dependence for their support upon himself, and to make them more watchful against all future occasions of sin, and for sundry other just and holy ends.²

VI. As for those wicked and ungodly men whom God, as a righteous judge, for former sins, doth blind and harden,¹ from them he not only withholdeth his grace, whereby they might have been enlightened in their understandings, and wrought upon in their hearts;² but sometimes also withdraweth the gifts which they had,³ and exposeth them to such objects as their corruption makes occasion of sin;⁴ and withal, gives them over to their own lusts, the temptations of the world, and the power of Satan;⁵ whereby it comes to pass that they harden themselves, even under those means which God useth for the softening of others.⁶

VII. As the providence of God doth, in general, reach to all creatures, so after a most special manner, it taketh care of his church, and disposeth all things to the good thereof.¹

CHAPTER VI

OF THE FALL OF MAN, OF SIN, AND OF THE PENITENT THOROUGH.

Our first parents, being so created by the subtilty and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit.¹ This their sin had was pleased, according to his wise and holy counsel, to permit, having purposed to order it to his own glory.²

Gen. iii, 13. ² Rom. xi, 32.

II. By this sin they fell from their original righteousness, and communion with God,¹ and so became dead in sin² and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body.³

III. They being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed,¹ and the same death in sin and corrupted nature conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation.²

IV. From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled and made opposite to all good,¹ and wholly inclined to all evil,² do proceed all actual transgressions.³

V. This corruption of nature, during this life, doth remain in those that are regenerated;¹ and although it be through Christ pardoned and mortified, yet both itself and all the motions thereof are truly and properly sin.²

¹ Rom. vii, 14, 17, 18, 23. ² Rom. vii, 5, 7, 8, 25.

VI. Every sin, both original and actual, being a transgression of the righteous law of God, and contrary thereto,¹ doth, in its own nature, bring guilt upon the sinner,² whereby he is bound over to the wrath of God,³ and curse of the law,⁴ and so made subject to death,⁵ with all miseries, spiritual,⁶ temporal⁷ and eternal.⁸

CHAPTER VII.

OF GOD'S COVENANT WITH MAN.

The distance between God and the creature is so great that, although reasonable creatures do owe obedience unto him as their Creator, yet they could never have any fruition of him as their blessedness and reward, but by some voluntary condescension on God's part, which he hath been pleased to express by way of covenant.¹

¹ Job ix, 32, 33.

II. The first covenant made with man was a covenant of works,¹ wherein life was promised to Adam, and in him to his posterity,² upon condition of perfect and personal obedience.³

¹ Gal. iii, 12. ² Rom. x, 5. ³ Gen. ii, 17.

III. Man, by his fall, having made himself incapable of life by that covenant, the Lord was pleased to make a second,¹ commonly called the covenant of grace; wherein he freely offered unto sinners life and salvation by Jesus Christ, requiring of them faith in him, that they may be saved,² and promising to give unto all those that are ordained unto life, his Holy Spirit, to make them willing and able to believe.³

IV. This covenant of grace is frequently set forth in the Scripture by the name of a testament, in reference to the death of Jesus Christ, the testator, and to the everlasting inheritance, with all things belonging to it, therein bequeathed.¹

¹ Heb. ix, 15, 16, 17.

V. This covenant was differently administered in the time of the law, and in the time of the gospel:¹ under the law it was administered by promises, prophecies, sacrifices, circumcision, the paschal lamb, and other types and ordinances delivered to the people of the Jews, all fore-signifying Christ to come,² which were for that time sufficient and efficacious, through the operation of the Spirit, to instruct and build up the elect in faith in the promised Messiah,³ by whom they had full remission of sins, and eternal salvation; and is called the Old Testament.⁴

¹ 2 Cor. iii, 6, 7, 8, 9. ² Heb. viii, ix, x, chapters; Rom. iv, 11. ³ 1 Cor. x, 1, 2, 3, 4. ⁴ Gal. iii, 7, 8, 9, 14.

VI. Under the gospel, when Christ the substance¹ was exhibited, the ordinances in which this covenant is dispensed are, the preaching of the word, and the administration of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's supper;² which, though fewer in number, and administered with more simplicity and less outward glory, yet in them it is held forth in more fullness, evidence, and spiritual efficacy,³ to all nations, both Jews and Gentiles;⁴ and is called the

New Testament.⁵ There are not, therefore, two covenants of grace, differing in substance, but one and the same, under various dispensations.⁶

CHAPTER VIII.

OF CHRIST THE MEDIATOR.

It pleased God, in his eternal purpose, to choose and ordain the Lord Jesus, his only begotten Son, to be the mediator between God and man,¹ the prophet,² priest,³ and king,⁴ the head and saviour of his church,⁵ the heir of all things,⁶ and judge of the world;⁷ unto whom he did, from all eternity, give a people to be his seed,⁸ and to be by him in time redeemed, called, justified, sanctified and glorified.⁹

II. The Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, being very and eternal God, of one substance, and equal with the Father, did, when the fullness of time was come, take upon him man's nature,¹ with all the essential properties and common infirmities thereof, yet without sin,² being conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost in the womb of the Virgin Mary, of her substance.³ So that two whole, perfect, and distinct natures, the Godhead and the manhood, were inseparably joined together in one person, without conversion, composition, or confusion.⁴ Which person is very God and very man, yet one Christ, the only mediator between God and man.⁵

III. The Lord Jesus in his human nature thus united to the divine, was sanctified and anointed with the Holy Spirit above measure;¹ having in him all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge² in whom it pleased the Father that all fullness should dwell;³ to the end that being holy, harmless, undefiled and full of grace and truth,⁴ he might be thoroughly furnished to execute the office of a mediator and surety.⁵ Which office he took not unto himself, but was therunto called by his Father;⁶ who put all power and judgment into his hand, and gave him commandment to execute the same.⁷

IV. This office the Lord Jesus did most willingly undertake,¹ which, that he might discharge, he was made under the law,² and did perfectly fulfill it;³ endured most grievous torments immediately in his soul,⁴ and most painful sufferings in his body;⁵ was crucified and died,⁶ was buried and remained under the power of death, yet saw no corruption.⁷ On the third day he arose from the dead,⁸ with the same body in which he suffered;⁹ with which also he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth at the right hand of his Father,¹⁰ making intercession;¹¹ and shall return to judge men and angels at the end of the world.¹²

V. The Lord Jesus, by his perfect obedience and sacrifice of himself, which he through the eternal Spirit once offered up unto God hath fully satisfied the justice of his Father;¹ and purchased not only reconciliation, but an everlasting inheritance in the kingdom of heaven for all those whom the Father hath given unto him.²

VI. Although the work of redemption was not actually wrought by Christ till after his incarnation, yet the virtue, efficacy and benefits thereof were communicated unto the elect, in all ages successively from the beginning of the world, in and by those promises, types and sacrifices wherein he was revealed, and signified to be the seed of the woman, which should bruise the serpent's head, and the lamb slain from the beginning of the world, being yesterday and to-day the same and forever.¹

VII. Christ, in the work of mediation, acteth according to both natures; by each nature doing that which is proper to itself;¹ yet by reason of the unity of the person, that which is proper to one nature is sometimes, in Scripture, attributed to the person denominated by the other nature.¹

VIII. To all those for whom Christ hath purchased redemption, he doth certainly and effectually apply and communicate the same;¹ making intercession for them;² and revealing unto them, in and by the word, the mysteries of salvation;³ effectually persuading them by his Spirit to believe and obey; and governing their hearts by his word and Spirit;⁴ overcoming all their enemies, by his almighty power and wisdom, in such manner and ways as are most consonant to his wonderful and unsearchable dispensation.⁵

OF FREE WILL.

God hath endued the will of man with that natural liberty, that it is neither forced, nor by any absolute necessity of nature determined to good or evil.¹

II. Man, in his state of innocency, had freedom and power to will and to do that which is good and well-pleasing to God;¹ but yet mutably, so that he might fall from it.²

¹ Eccl. vii, 29. ² Gen. ii, 16, 17.

III. Man, by his fall into a state of sin, hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation;¹ so as a natural man, being altogether averse from that good,² and dead in sin,³ is not able, by his own strength, to convert himself, or to prepare himself thereunto.⁴

¹ Rom. v, 6. ² Rom. iii, 10, 12. ³ Eph. ii, 1, 5. ⁴ John vi, 44, 65.

IV. When God converts a sinner, and translates him into the state of grace, he freeth him from his natural bondage under sin,¹ and by his grace alone, enables him freely to will and to do that which is spiritually good;² yet so as that, by reason of his remaining corruption, he doth not perfectly, nor only, will that which is good,³ but doth also will that which is evil.³

V. The will of man is made perfectly and immutably free to good alone, in the state of glory only.¹

OF EFFECTUAL CALLING.

All those whom God hath predestinated unto life, and those only, he is pleased, in his appointed and accepted time, effectually to call,¹ by his word and Spirit,² out of that state of sin and death in which they are by nature, to grace and salvation by Jesus Christ;³ enlightening their minds, spiritually and savingly, to understand the things of God,⁴ taking away their heart of stone, and giving unto them an heart of flesh;⁵ renewing their wills, and by his almighty power determining them to that which is good;⁶ and effectually drawing them to Jesus Christ;⁷ yet so as they come most freely, being made willing by his grace.⁸

¹ Rom. viii, 30. ² 2 Thess. ii, 13, 14. ³ Rom. viii, 2. ⁴ Acts xxvi, 18. ⁵ Ezek. xxxvi, 26. ⁶ Ezek. xi, 19. ⁷ John vi, 44, 45. ⁸ Cant. i, 4.

II. This effectual call is of God's free and special grace alone, not from anything at all foreseen in man,¹ who is altogether passive therein, until, being quickened and renewed by the Holy Spirit,² he is thereby enabled to answer this call, and to embrace the grace offered and conveyed in it.³

¹ 2 Tim. i, 9. ² 1 Cor. ii, 14. ³ John vi, 37.

III. Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit,¹ who worketh when and where, and how he pleaseth.² So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the word.³

¹ Luke xviii, 15, 16. ² John iii, 8. ³ Acts iv, 12.

IV. Others, not elected, although they may be called by the ministry of the word,¹ and may have some common operations of the Spirit,² yet they never truly come to Christ, and therefore cannot be saved; much less can men not professing the Christian religion be saved in any other way whatsoever, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature and the laws that religion they do profess,³ and to assert and maintain that their may is very pernicious, and to be detested.⁵

OF JUSTIFICATION.

Those whom God effectually calleth, he also freely justifieth;¹ by infusing righteousness into them, but by pardoning their sins, and by accounting and accepting their persons as righteous; not for anything wrought in them, or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone; not by imputing faith itself, the act of believing, or any other evangelical obedience to them, as their righteousness; but by imputing the obedience and satisfaction of Christ unto them;² their receiving and resting on him and his righteousness by faith; which faith they have not of themselves, it is the gift of God.³

II. Faith, thus receiving and resting on Christ and his righteousness, is the alone instrument of justification;¹ yet is it not alone in the person justified, but is ever accompanied with all other saving graces, and is no dead faith, but worketh by love.²

¹ John i, 12. ² Jam. ii, 17, 22, 26.

III. Christ, by his obedience and death, did fully discharge the debt of all those that are thus justified, and did make a proper, real, and full satisfaction to his Father's justice in their behalf.¹ Yet isasmuch as he was given by the Father for them,² and his obedience and satisfaction accepted in their stead,³ and both freely, not for anything in them, their justification is only of free grace;⁴ the both the exact justice and rich grace of God might be glorified in the justification of sinners.⁵

¹ Rom. v, 8, 9, 10, 19. ² Rom. viii, 32. ³ 2 Cor. v, 21. ⁴ Rom. iii, 24. ⁵ Rom. iii, 26.

IV. God did, from all eternity, decree to justify all the elect, and Christ did, in the fullness of time, die for their sins, and rise again for their justification;¹ nevertheless, they are not justified until the Holy Spirit doth, in due time, actually apply Christ unto them.²

V. God doth continue to forgive the sins of those that are justified;¹ and although they can never fall from the state of justification,² yet they may by their sins fall under God's fatherly displeasure, and not have the light of his countenance restored unto them until they humble themselves, confess their sins, beg pardon, and renew their faith and repentance.³

VI. The justification of believers under the Old Testament was in all these respects, one and the same with the justification of believers under the New Testament.¹

CHAPTER XII.

OF ADOPTION.

All those that are justified, God vouchsafeth, in and for his only Son Jesus Christ, to make partakers of the grace of adoption;¹ in which they are taken into the number, and enjoy the liberties and privileges of the children of God;² have his name put upon them; receive the Spirit of adoption;³ have access to the throne of grace with boldness;⁴ are enabled to cry, Abba, Father;⁵ are pitied, protected,⁶ provided for,⁷ and chastened by him as by a father;⁸ yet never cast off,⁹ but sealed to the day of redemption,¹⁰ and inherit the promises,¹¹ as heirs of everlasting salvation.¹²

CHAPTER XIII.

OF SANCTIFICATION.

They who are effectually called and regenerated having a new heart and a new spirit created in them, are further sanctified, individually and personally, through the virtue of Christ's death and resurrection,¹ by his word and Spirit dwelling in them;² the dominion of the whole body of sin is destroyed,³ and the several lusts thereof are more and more weakened and mortified,⁴ and they more and more quickened and strengthened in all saving graces,⁵ to the practice of true holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.⁶

II. This sanctification is throughout in the whole man,¹ yet imperfect in this life: there abideth still some remnants of corruption in every part,² whence ariseth a continual and irreconcilable war, the flesh lusting against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh.³

¹ 1 Thess. v, 23. ² 1 John i, 10. ³ Gal. v, 17.

III. In which war, although the remaining corruption for a time may much prevail,¹ yet, through the continual supply of strength from the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, the regenerate part doth overcome,² and so the saints grow in grace,³ perfecting holiness in the fear of God.⁴

OF SAVING FAITH.

The grace of faith, whereby the elect are enabled to believe to the saving of their souls,¹ is the work of the Spirit of Christ in their hearts;² and is ordinarily wrought by the ministry of the word;³ by which also, and by the administration of the sacraments, and prayer, it is increased and strengthened.⁴

¹ Heb. x, 39. ² 2 Cor. iv, 13. ³ Rom. x, 14, 17. ⁴ 1 Pet. ii, 2.

II. By this faith, a Christian believeth to be true whatsoever is revealed in the word, by the authority of God himself speaking therein;¹ and aceth differently, upon that which each particular passage thereof containeth; yielding obedience to the commands,² trembling at the threatenings,³ and embracing the promises of God for this life, and that which is to come.⁴ But the principal acts of saving faith are, accepting, receiving, and resting upon Christ alone for justification, sanctification and eternal life, by virtue of the covenant of grace.⁵

III. This faith is different in degrees, weak or strong;¹ may be often and many ways assailed and weakened, but gets the victory;² growing up in many to the attainment of a full assurance through Christ,³ who is both the author and finisher of our faith.⁴

CHAPTER XV.

OF REPENTANCE UNTO LIFE.

Repentance unto life is an evangelical grace,¹ the doctrine whereof is to be preached by every minister of the gospel, as well as that of faith in Christ.²

II. By it a sinner, out of the sight and sense, not only of the danger, but also of the filthiness and odiousness of his sins, as contrary to the holy nature and righteous law of God, and upon the apprehension of his mercy in Christ to such as are penitent, so grieves for, and hates his sins, as to turn from them all unto God,¹ purposing and endeavoring to walk with him, in all the ways of his commandments.²

¹ Ezek. xviii, 30, 31. ² Psa. cxix, 6, 59, 106.

III. Although repentance be not to be posted in as any satisfaction for sin, or any cause of the pardon thereof,¹ which is the act of God's free grace in Christ;² yet is it of such necessity to all sinners, that none may expect pardon without it.³

IV. As there is no sin so small but it deserves damnation;¹ so there is no sin so great that it can bring damnation upon those who truly repent.²

V. Men ought not to content themselves with a general repentance, but it is every man's duty to endeavor to repent of his particular sins, particularly.¹

VI. As every man is bound to make private confession of his sins to God, praying for the pardon thereof,¹ upon which, and the forsaking of them, he shall find mercy;² so he that scandalizeth his brother, or the church of Christ, ought to be willing, by a private or public confession and sorrow for his sin, to declare his repentance to those that are offended;³ who are there-upon to be reconciled to him, and in love to receive him.⁴

CHAPTER XVI.

OF GOOD WORKS.

Good works are only such as God hath commanded in his holy word,¹ and not such as, without the warrant thereof, are devised by men out of blind zeal, or upon any pretence of good intention.²

II. These good works, done in obedience to God's commandments, are the fruits and evidences of a true and lively faith;¹ and by them believers manifest their thankfulness,² strengthen their assurance,³ edify their brethren,⁴ adorn the profession of the gospel,⁵ stop the mouths of the adversaries,⁶ and glorify God,⁷ whose workmanship they are, created in Christ Jesus thereunto,⁸ that, having their fruit unto holiness, they may have the end, eternal life.⁹

¹ James ii, 18, 22. ² Psa. cxvi, 12, 13. ³ 1 John ii, 3, 5. ⁴ 2 Cor. ix, 2. ⁵ Tit. ii, 5. ⁶ 1 Pet. ii, 15. ⁷ 1 Pet. ii, 12. ⁸ Eph. ii, 10. ⁹ Rom. vi, 22.

III. Their ability to do good works is not at all of themselves, but wholly from the Spirit of Christ.¹ And that they may be enabled thereunto, besides the graces they have already received, there is required an actual influence of the same Holy Spirit to work in them to will and to do of his good pleasure;² yet are they not hereupon to grow negligent, as if they were not bound to perform any duty unless upon a special motion of the Spirit; but they ought to be diligent in stirring up the grace of God that is in them.³

IV. They who, in their obedience, attain to the greatest height which is possible in this life, are so far from being able to supererogate and to do more than God requires, that they fall short of much which in duty they are bound to do.¹

V. We cannot, by our best works, merit pardon of sin or eternal life, at the hand of God, by reason of the great disproportion that is between them and the glory to come, and the infinite distance that is between us and God, whom by them we can neither profit, nor satisfy for the debt of our former sins;¹ but when we have done all we can, we have done but our duty, and are unprofitable servants;² and because, as they are good, they proceed from his Spirit;³ and as they are wrought by us, they are defiled and mixed with so much weakness and imperfection, that they cannot endure the severity of God's judgment.⁴

VI. Yet notwithstanding, the persons of believers being accepted through Christ, their good works also are accepted in him,¹ not as though they were in this life wholly unblamable and unreprovable in God's sight;² but that he, looking upon them in his Son, is pleased to accept and reward that which is sincere, although accompanied with many weaknesses and imperfections.³

VII. Works done by unregenerate men, although for the matter of them they may be things which God commands, and of good use both to themselves and others,¹ yet because they proceed not from a heart purified by faith;² nor are done in a right manner, according to the word;³ nor to a right end, the glory of God,⁴ they are therefore sinful, and cannot please God, or make a man meet to receive grace from God.⁵ And yet their neglect of them is more sinful and displeasing unto God.⁶

CHAPTER XVII.

OF THE PERSEVERANCE OF THE SAINTS.

They whom God hath accepted in his Beloved, effectually called and sanctified by his Spirit, can neither totally nor finally fall away from the state of grace; but shall certainly persevere therein to the end, and be eternally saved.¹

II. This perseverance of the saints depends not upon their own free will, but upon the immutability of the decree of election, flowing from the free and unchangeable love of God the Father;¹ upon the efficacy of the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ;² the abiding of the Spirit and of the seed of God within them;³ and the nature of the covenant of grace;⁴ from all which ariseth also the certainty and infallibility thereof.⁵

¹ 2 Tim. ii, 19. ² Heb. x, 10, 14. ³ John xiv, 16, 17. ⁴ Jer. xxxii, 40. ⁵ 2 Thess. iii, 3.

III. Nevertheless they may, through the temptations of Satan and of the world, the prevalency of corruption remaining in them, and the neglect of the means of their preservation, fall into grievous sins;¹ and for a time continue therein;² whereby they incur God's displeasure,³ and grieve his Holy Spirit;⁴ come to be deprived of some measure of their graces and comforts;⁵ have their hearts hardened,⁶ and their consciences wounded;⁷ hurt and scandalize others,⁸ and bring temporal judgments upon themselves.⁹

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF THE ASSURANCE OF GRACE AND SALVATION.

Although hypocrites, and other unregenerate men, may vainly deceive themselves with false hopes and carnal presumptions of being in the favor of God and estate of salvation;¹ which hope of theirs shall perish;² yet such as truly believe in the Lord Jesus, and love him in sincerity, endeavoring to walk in all good conscience before him, may in this life be certainly assured that they are in a state of grace,³ and may rejoice in the hope of the glory of God; which hope shall never make them ashamed.⁴

¹ Job viii, 14. ² Matt. vii, 22, 23. ³ 1 John ii, 3. ⁴ Rom. v, 2, 5.

II. This certainty is not a bare conjectural and probable persuasion, grounded upon a fallible hope;¹ but an infallible assurance of faith, founded upon the divine truth of the promises of salvation,² the inward evidence of those graces unto which these promises are made,³ the testimony of the Spirit of adoption witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God;⁴ which Spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, whereby we are sealed to the day of redemption.⁵

¹ Heb. vi, 11, 19. ² Heb. vi, 17, 18. ³ 2 Pet. i, 4, 5, 10, 11. ⁴ Rom. viii, 15, 16. ⁵ Eph. i, 13, 14.

III. This infallible assurance doth not so belong to the essence of faith, but that a true believer may wait long, and conflict with many difficulties before he be partaker of it;¹ yet, being enabled by the Spirit to know the things which are freely given him of God, he may, without extraordinary revelation, in the right use of ordinary means, attain therunto.² And therefore it is the duty of every one to give all diligence to make his calling and election sure;³ that thereby his heart may be enlarged in peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, in love and thankfulness to God, and in strength and cheerfulness in the duties of obedience, the proper fruits of this assurance;⁴ so far is it from inclining men to looseness.⁵

¹ Isa. i, 10. ² 1 Cor. ii, 12. ³ 2 Pet. i, 10. ⁴ Rom. v, 1, 2, 5. ⁵ Rom. vi, 1, 2.

IV. True believers may have the assurance of their salvation divers ways shaken, diminished, and intermitted; as, by negligence in preserving of it; by falling into some special sin, which woundeth the conscience, and grieveth the spirit; by some sudden or vehement temptation; by God's withdrawing the light of his countenance, and suffering even such as fear him to walk in darkness, and to have no light;¹ yet are they never utterly destitute of that seed of God, and life of faith, that love of Christ and the brethren, that sincerity of heart and conscience of duty, out of which, by the operation of the Spirit, this assurance may in due time be revived,² and by the which, in the meantime, they are supported from utter despair.³

CHAPTER XIX.

OF THE LAW OF GOD.

God gave to Adam a law, as a covenant of works, by which he bound him and all his posterity to personal, entire, exact, and perpetual obedience; promised life upon the fulfilling, and threatened death upon the breach of it; and endued him with power and ability to keep it.¹

II. This law, after his fall, continued to be a perfect rule of righteousness; and as such, was delivered by God upon Mount Sinai, in ten commandments and written in two tables;¹ the first four commandments containing our duty towards God, and the other six our duty to man.²

III. Beside this law, commonly called moral, God was pleased to give to the people of Israel, as a church under age, ceremonial laws, containing several typical ordinances, partly of worship, prefiguring Christ, his graces, actions, sufferings and benefits;¹ and partly holding forth divers instructions of moral duties.² All which ceremonial laws are now abrogated under the New Testament.³

¹ Heb. x, 1. ² 1 Cor. v, 7. ³ Gal. ii, 11, 16, 17.

IV. To them also, as a body politic, he gave sundry judicial laws, which expired together with the state of that people, not obliging any other, now, further than the general equity thereof may require.¹

¹ See Ex. xxi chap. and xxii chap., 1st to the 23th verse. Gen. xlix, 10.

V. The moral law doth forever bind all, as well justified persons as others, to the obedience thereof;¹ and that not only in regard of the matter contained in it, but also in respect of the authority of God the Creator who gave it.² Neither doth Christ in the gospel any way dissolve, but much strengthen, this obligation.³

¹ Rom. xiii, 8, 9. (See Note 1, Section II.) ² 1 John ii, 8, 1, 7. ³ Jam. ii, 10, 11. (See Note 1, Section II.) ⁴ Matt. v, 18, 19.

VI. Although true believers be not under the law as a covenant of works, to be thereby justified or condemned;¹ yet is it of great use to them, as well as to others; in that, as a rule of life, informing them of the will of God and their duty, it directs and binds them to walk accordingly;² discovering also the sinful pollutions of their nature, hearts and lives;³ so as, examining themselves thereby, they may come to further conviction of, humiliation for, and hatred against sin;⁴ together with a clearer sight of the need they have of Christ and the perfection of his obedience.⁵ It is likewise of use to the regenerate, to restrain their corruptions, in that it forbids sin;⁶ and the threatenings of it serve to show what even their sins deserve, and what afflictions in this life they may expect for them, although freed from the curse thereof threatened in the law.⁷ The promises of it, in like manner, show them God's approbation of obedience, and what blessings they may expect upon the performance thereof;⁸ although not as due to them by the law as a covenant of works;⁹ so as a man's doing good, and refraining from evil, because the law encourageth to the one and deterreth from the other, is no evidence of his being under the law, and not under grace.¹⁰

VII. Neither are the forementioned uses of the law contrary to the grace of the gospel, but do sweetly comply with it;¹ the Spirit of Christ subduing and enabling the will of man to do that freely and cheerfully, which the will of God, revealed in the law, requireth to be done.²

CHAPTER XX.

OF CHRISTIAN LIBERTY AND LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE.

The liberty which Christ hath purchased for believers under the gospel consists in their freedom from the guilt of sin, the condemning wrath of God, the curse of the moral law;¹ and in their being delivered from this present evil world, bondage to Satan, and dominion of sin;² from the evil of afflictions, the sting of death, the victory of the grave, and everlasting damnation; as also in their free access to God,⁴ and their yielding obedience unto him, not out of slavish fear, but a child-like love, and a willing mind.⁵ All which were common also to believers under the law;⁶ but under the New Testament, the liberty of Christians is further enlarged in their freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law, to which the Jewish church was subjected;⁷ and in greater boldness of access to the throne of grace,⁸ and in fuller communications of the free Spirit of God, than believers under the law did ordinarily partake of.⁹

II. God alone is Lord of the conscience,¹ and hath left it free from the doctrines and commandments of men which are in anything contrary to his word, or beside it in matters of faith or worship.² So that to believe such doctrines, or to obey such commandments out of conscience, is to betray true liberty of conscience;³ and the requiring an implicit faith, and an absolute and blind obedience, is to destroy liberty of conscience, and reason also.⁴

III. They who, upon pretence of Christian liberty, do practice any sin, or cherish any lust, do thereby destroy the end of Christian liberty; which is, that, being delivered out of the hands of our enemies, we might serve the Lord without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life.¹

IV. And because the powers which God hath ordained, and the liberty which Christ hath purchased, are not intended by God to destroy, but mutually to uphold and preserve one another; they who, upon pretence of Christian liberty, shall oppose any lawful power, or the lawful exercise of it, whether it be civil or ecclesiastical, resist the ordinance of God.¹ And for their publishing of such opinions, or maintaining of such practices, as are contrary to the light of nature, or to the known principles of Christianity, whether concerning faith, worship or conversation; or to the power of godliness; or such erroneous opinions or practices as, either in their own nature, or in the manner of publishing or maintaining them, are destructive to the external peace and order which Christ hath established in the church;² they may lawfully be called to account and proceeded against by the censures of the church.³

¹ 1 Pet. ii, 13, 14, 16. ² Rom. i, 32. ³ 2 Thess. iii, 14.

CHAPTER XXI.

OF RELIGIOUS WORSHIP AND THE SABBATH-DAY.

The light of nature sheweth that there is a God, who hath lordship and sovereignty over all; is good, and doeth good unto all; and is therefore to be feared, loved, praised, called upon, trusted in, and served with all the heart, and with all the soul, and with all the might.¹ But the acceptable way of worshiping the true God is instituted by himself, and so limited by his own revealed will, that he may not be worshiped according to the imaginations and devices of men, or the suggestions of Satan, under any visible representation or any other way not prescribed in the Holy Scripture.²

¹ Rom. i, 20. ² Deut. xii, 32.

II. Religious worship is to be given to God, the Father, Son and Holy Ghost; and to him alone;¹ not to angels, saints, or any other creature;² and since the fall, not without a Mediator; nor in the mediation of any other but of Christ alone.³

III. Prayer with thanksgiving, being one special part of religious worship,¹ is by God required of all men;² and that it may be accepted, it is to be made in the name of the Son,³ by the help of his Spirit,⁴ according to his will,⁵ with understanding, reverence, humility, fervency, faith, love, and perseverance;⁶ and, if vocal, in a known tongue.⁷

IV. Prayer is to be made for things lawful,¹ and for all sorts of men living, or that shall live hereafter;² but not for the dead,³ nor for those of whom it may be known that they have sinned the sin unto death.⁴

¹ 1 John v, 14. ² 1 Tim. ii, 1, 2. ³ 2 Sam. xii, 21, 22, 23. ⁴ 1 John v, 16.

V. The reading of the Scriptures with godly fear;¹ the sound preaching,² and conscionable hearing of the word, in obedience unto God, with understanding, faith, and reverence;³ singing of Psalms with grace in the heart;⁴ as, also, the due administration and worthy receiving of the sacraments instituted by Christ; are all parts of the ordinary religious worship of God;⁵ besides religious oaths,⁶ and vows,⁷ solemn fastings,⁸ and thanksgivings upon special occasions;⁹ which are, in their several times and seasons, to be used in an holy and religious manner.¹⁰

VI. Neither prayer, nor any other part of religious worship, is now, under the gospel, either tied into, or made more acceptable by any place in which it is performed, or towards which it is directed;¹ but God is to be worshiped everywhere,² in spirit and in truth;³ as in private families⁴ daily,⁵ and in secret each one by himself,⁶ so more solemnly in the public assemblies, which are not carelessly or willfully to be neglected or forsaken, when God, by his word or providence, calleth thereunto.⁷

VII. As it is of the law of nature, that, in general, a due proportion of time be set apart for the worship of God; so, in his word, by a positive, moral, and perpetual commandment, binding all men in all ages, he hath particularly appointed one day in seven for a Sabbath, to be kept holy unto him,¹ which, from the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, was the last day of the week; and, from the resurrection of Christ, was changed into the first day of the week,² which in Scripture is called the Lord's day,³ and is to be continued to the end of the world, as the Christian Sabbath.⁴

¹ See the 4th commandment in Ex. xx, 8, 9, 10, 11; Isa. lvi, 2, 4. ² Gen. ii, 3. ³ Rev. i, 10. ⁴ Ex. xx, 8, 10. (See note 1, above.)

VIII. This Sabbath is then kept holy unto the Lord, when men, after a due preparing of their hearts, and ordering of their common affairs beforehand, do not only observe an holy rest all the day from their own works, words and thoughts, about their worldly employments and recreations;¹ but also are taken up the whole time in the public and private exercises of his worship, and in the duties of necessity and mercy.²

CHAPTER XXII.

OF LAWFUL OATHS AND VOWS.

A lawful oath is a part of religious worship,¹ wherein, upon just occasion, the person swearing solemnly calleth God to witness what he asserteth or promiseth; and to judge him according to the truth or falsehood of what he sweareth.²

II. The name of God only is that by which men ought to swear, and therein it is to be used with all holy fear and reverence;¹ therefore to swear vainly or rashly by that glorious and dreadful name, or to swear at all by any other thing, is sinful, and to be abhorred.² Yet as, in matters of weight and moment, an oath is warranted by the word of God, under the New Testament, as well as under the Old,³ so a lawful oath, being imposed by lawful authority, in such matters ought to be taken.⁴

¹ Deut. vi, 13. ² Jer. v, 7. ³ Heb. vi, 16. ⁴ 1 Kings viii, 31.

III. Whosoever taketh an oath ought duly to consider the weightiness of so solemn an act, and therein to avouch nothing but what he is fully persuaded is the truth.¹ Neither may any man bind himself by oath to anything but what is good and just, and what he believeth so to be, and what he is able and resolved to perform.² Yet it is a sin to refuse an oath touching anything that is good and just, being imposed by lawful authority.³

¹ Jer. iv, 2. ² Gen. xxv, 2, 3, 9. ³ Num. v, 19, 21.

IV. An oath is to be taken in the plain and common sense of the words, without equivocation or mental reservation.¹ It cannot oblige to sin; but in anything not sinful, being taken, it binds to performance, although to a man's own hurt;² nor is it to be violated, although made to heretics or infidels.³

V. A vow is of the like nature with a promissory oath, and ought to be made with the like religious care, and to be performed with the like faithfulness.¹

VI. It is not to be made to any creature, but to God alone;¹ and that it may be accepted, it is to be made voluntarily, out of faith and conscience of duty, in way of thankfulness for mercy received, or for obtaining of what we want; whereby we more strictly bind ourselves to necessary duties, or to other things, so far and so long as they may fitly conduce thereunto.²

VII. No man may vow to do any thing forbidden in the word of God, or what would hinder any duty therein commanded, or which is not in his own power, and for the performance whereof he hath no promise or ability from God.¹ In which respects, popish monastical vows of perpetual single life, professed poverty, and regular obedience, are so far from being degrees of higher perfection, that they are superstitious and sinful snares, in which no Christian may entangle himself.²

OF THE CIVIL MAGISTRATE.

God, the Supreme Lord and King of all the world, hath ordained civil magistrates to be under him over the people, for his own glory and the public good, and to this end hath armed them with the power of the sword, for the defence and encouragement of them that are good, and for the punishment of evil doers.¹

II. It is lawful for Christians to accept and execute the office of a magistrate, when called thereunto;¹ in the managing whereof, as they ought especially to maintain piety, justice and peace, according to the wholesome laws of each commonwealth;² so, for that end, they may lawfully, now under the New Testament, wage war upon just and necessary occasions.³

¹ Prov. xvi, 15, 16. ² Psa. lxxxvii, 3, 4. ³ Luke iii, 14.

III. Civil magistrates may not assume to themselves the administration of the word and sacraments;¹ or the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven;² or, in the least, interfere in matters of faith.³ Yet as nursing fathers, it is the duty of civil magistrates to protect the church of our common Lord, without giving the preference to any denomination of Christians above the rest, in such a manner, that all ecclesiastical persons whatever shall enjoy the full, free, and unquestioned liberty of discharging every part of their sacred functions, without violence or danger.⁴ And, as Jesus Christ hath appointed a regular government and discipline in his church, no law of any commonwealth should interfere with, let, or hinder, the due exercise thereof, among the voluntary members of any denomination of Christians, according to their own profession and belief.⁵ It is the duty of civil magistrates to protect the person and good name of all their people, in such an effectual manner as that no person be suffered, either upon pretence of religion or infidelity, to offer any indignity, violence, abuse, or injury to any other person whatsoever; and to take order, that all religious and ecclesiastical assemblies be held without molestation or disturbance.⁶

IV. It is the duty of the people to pray for magistrates,¹ to honor their persons,² to pay them tribute and other dues,³ to obey their lawful commands, and to be subject to their authority, for conscience' sake.⁴ Infidelity or difference in religion, doth not make void the magistrate's just and legal authority, nor free the people from their due obedience to him;⁵ from which ecclesiastical persons are not exempted;⁶ much less hath the Pope any power or jurisdiction over them in their dominions, or over any of their people; and least of all to deprive them of their dominions or lives, if he shall judge them to be heretics, or upon any other pretence whatsoever.⁷

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Marriage is to be between one man and one woman; neither is it lawful for any man to have more than one wife, nor for any woman to have more than one husband at the same time.¹

¹ 1 Cor. vii, 2; Mark ii, 6, 7, 8, 9.

II. Marriage was ordained for the mutual help of husband and wife;¹ for the increase of mankind with a legitimate issue, and of the church with an holy seed;² and for preventing of uncleanness.³

¹ Gen. ii, 18. ² Mat. ii, 15. ³ 1 Cor. vii, 2, 9.

III. It is lawful for all sorts of people to marry who are able with judgment to give their consent;¹ yet it is the duty of Christians to marry only in the Lord.² And, therefore, such as profess the true reformed religion should not marry with infidels, Papists, or other idolaters; neither should such as are godly be unequally yoked by marrying with such as are notoriously wicked in their life, or maintain damnable heresies.³

¹ 1 Tim. iv, 3. ² 1 Cor. vii, 39. ³ 2 Cor. vi, 14.

IV. Marriage ought not to be within the degrees of consanguinity or affinity forbidden in the word;¹ nor can such incestuous marriages ever be made lawful by any law of man, or consent of parties, so as those persons may live together, as man and wife.² The man may not marry any of his wife's kindred nearer in blood than he may of his own, nor the woman of her husband's kindred nearer in blood than of her own.³

V. Adultery or fornication, committed after a contract, being detected before marriage, giveth just occasion to the innocent party to dissolve that contract.¹ In the case of adultery after marriage, it is lawful for the innocent party to sue out a divorce,² and after the divorce to marry another, as if the offending party were dead.³

VI. Although the corruption of man be such as is apt to study arguments, vainly to put asunder those whom God hath joined together in marriage; yet nothing but adultery, or such wilful desertion as can no way be remedied by the church or civil magistrate, is cause sufficient of dissolving the bond of marriage;¹ wherein a public and orderly course of proceeding is to be observed; and the persons concerned in it, not left to their own wills and discretion in their own case.²

OF THE CHURCH.

The catholic or universal church, which is invisible, consists of the whole number of the elect, that have been, are, or shall be gathered into one, under Christ the head thereof; and is the spouse, the body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all.¹

¹ Eph. i, 10, 22, 23.

II. The visible church, which is also catholic or universal under the gospel (not confined to one nation as before under the law) consists of all those throughout the world that profess the true religion,¹ together with their children;² and is the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ,³ the house and family of God,⁴ out of which there is no ordinary possibility of salvation.⁵

¹ 1 Cor. i, 2. ² 1 Cor. vii, 14. ³ Matt. xiii, 47. ⁴ Eph. ii, 19. ⁵ Acts ii, 47.

III. Unto this catholic visible church, Christ hath given the ministry, oracles, and ordinances of God, for the gathering and perfecting of the saints, in this life, to the end of the world; and doth by his own presence and Spirit, according to his promise, make them effectual thereunto.¹

¹ Eph. iv, 11, 12, 13.

IV. This catholic church hath been sometimes more, sometimes less, visible.¹ And particular churches, which are members thereof, are more or less pure, according as the doctrine of the gospel is taught and embraced, ordinances administered, and public worship performed more or less purely in them.²

¹ Rom. xi, 3, 4. ² 1 Cor. v, 6, 7.

V. The purest churches under heaven are subject both to mixture and error;¹ and some are so degenerated, as to become no churches of Christ, but synagogues of Satan.² Nevertheless, there shall be always a church on earth, to worship God according to his will.³

VI. There is no other head of the church but the Lord Jesus Christ.¹ Nor can the Pope of Rome in any sense be head thereof; but is that antichrist, that man of sin, and son of perdition, that exalteth himself in the church, against Christ and all that is called God.²

¹ Col. i, 18. ² Matt. xxiii, 8, 9, 10.

OF THE COMMUNION OF SAINTS.

All saints that are united to Jesus Christ their head, by his Spirit and by faith, have fellowship with him in his graces, sufferings, death, resurrection and glory;¹ and, being united to one another in love, they have communion in each other's gifts and graces,² and are obliged to the performance of such duties, public and private, as do conduce to their mutual good, both in the inward and outward man.³

¹ 1 John i, 3. ² Eph. iv, 15, 16. ³ 1 Thess. v, 11, 14.

II. Saints, by profession, are bound to maintain a holy fellowship and communion in the worship of God, and in performing such other spiritual services as tend to their mutual edification;¹ as also in relieving each other in outward things, according to their several abilities and necessities. Which communion, as God offereth opportunity, is to be extended unto all those who, in every place, call upon the name of the Lord Jesus.²

III. This communion which the saints have with Christ, doth not make them in any wise partakers of the substance of his Godhead, or to be equal with Christ in any respect; either of which to affirm is impious and blasphemous.¹ Nor doth their communion one with another, as saints, take away or infringe the title or property which each man hath, in his goods and possessions.²

OF THE SACRAMENTS.

Sacraments are holy signs and seals of the covenant of grace,¹ immediately instituted by God,² to represent Christ and his benefits, and to confirm our interest in him,³ as also to put a visible difference between those that belong unto the church, and the rest of the world,⁴ and solemnly to engage them to the service of God in Christ, according to his word.⁵

II. There is in every sacrament a spiritual relation or sacramental union, between the sign and the thing signified; whence it comes to pass, that the names and effects of the one are attributed to the other.¹

III. The grace which is exhibited in or by the sacraments, rightly used, is not conferred by any power in them; neither doth the efficacy of a sacrament depend upon the piety or intention of him that doth administer it,¹ but upon the work of the Spirit,² and the word of institution, which contains, together with a precept authorizing the use thereof, a promise of benefit to worthy receivers.³

¹ Rom. ii, 28, 29. ² Matt. iii, 11. ³ Matt. xxvi, 27, 28. (See note I, section II; Matt. xxviii, 19.)

IV. There be only two sacraments ordained by Christ our Lord in the Gospel, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord; neither of which may be dispensed by any but by a minister of the word, lawfully ordained.¹

V. The sacraments of the Old Testament, in regard of the spiritual things thereby signified and exhibited, were, for substance, the same with those of the New.¹

¹ 1 Cor. x, 1, 2, 3, 4.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

OF BAPTISM.

Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ,¹ not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible church,² but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace,³ of his ingrafting into Christ,⁴ of regeneration,⁵ of remission of sins,⁶ and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life;⁷ which sacrament is, by Christ's own appointment, to be continued in his church until the end of the world.⁸

II. The outward element to be used in this sacrament is water, wherewith the party is to be baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, by a minister of the gospel, lawfully called thereunto.¹

III. Dipping of the person into the water is not necessary; but baptism is rightly administered by pouring, or sprinkling water upon the person.¹

IV. Not only those that do actually profess faith in, and obedience unto Christ,¹ but also the infants of one or both believing parents are to be baptized.²

¹ Mark xvi, 15, 16. ² Gen. xvii, 7, 9, with Gal. iii, 9, 14.

V. Although it be a great sin to contemn or neglect this ordinance,¹ yet grace and salvation are not so inseparably annexed unto it, as that no person can be regenerated or saved without it,² or that all that are baptized are undoubtedly regenerated.³

VI. The efficacy of baptism is not tied to that moment of time wherein it is administered;¹ yet, notwithstanding, by the right use of this ordinance the grace promised is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time.²

¹ John iii, 5, 8. ² Gal. iii, 27.

VII. The sacrament of baptism is but once to be administered to any person.¹

OF THE LORD'S SUPPER.

Our Lord Jesus, in the night wherein he was betrayed, instituted the sacrament of his body and blood, called the Lord's Supper, to be observed in his church, unto the end of the world; for the perpetual remembrance of the sacrifice of himself in his death, the sealing all benefits thereof unto true believers, their spiritual nourishment and growth in him, their further engagement in and to all duties which they owe unto him; and to be a bond and pledge of their communion with him, and with each other, as members of his mystical body.¹

II. In this sacrament Christ is not offered up to his Father, nor any real sacrifice made at all for remission of sins of the quick or dead,¹ but only a commemoration of that one offering up of himself, by himself, upon the cross, once for all, and a spiritual oblation of all possible praise unto God for the same;² so that the Popish sacrifice of the mass, as they call it, is most abominably injurious to Christ's one only sacrifice, the alone propitiation for all the sins of the elect.³

III. The Lord Jesus hath, in this ordinance, appointed his ministers to declare his word of institution to the people, to pray, and bless the elements of bread and wine, and thereby to set them apart from a common to a holy use; and to take and break the bread, to take the cup and (they communicating also themselves) to give both to the communicants;¹ but to none who are not then present in the congregation.²

¹ See the institution, Matt. xxvi, 26, 27, 28; Mark xiv, 22, 23, 24; Luke xxii, 19, 20, and 1 Cor. xi, 23 to 27. ² Acts xv, 7.

IV. Private masses, or receiving this sacrament by a priest, or any other, alone;¹ as likewise the denial of the cup to the people;² worshipping the elements, the lifting them up, or carrying them about for adoration, and the receiving them for any pretended religious use, are all contrary to the nature of this sacrament, and to the institution of Christ.³

of these things, either in precept or example, in any part of the word of God. See all the places in which the ordinance is mentioned; the most important of which are cited above. ¹ Matt. xv, 9.

V. The outward elements in this sacrament, duly set apart to the uses ordained by Christ, have such relation to him crucified, as that truly, yet sacramentally only, they are sometimes called by the name of the things they represent, to wit, the body and blood of Christ; albeit, in substance and nature, they still remain, truly and only, bread and wine, as they were before.²

VI. That doctrine which maintains a change of the substance of bread and wine into the substance of Christ's body and blood (commonly called transubstantiation) by consecration of a priest, or by any other way, is repugnant, not to Scripture alone, but even to common sense and reason; overthroweth the nature of the sacrament; and hath been and is the cause of manifold superstitions, yea, of gross idolatries.¹

VII. Worthy receivers, outwardly partaking of the visible elements in this sacrament,¹ do then also inwardly by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally and corporally, but spiritually, receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all benefits of his death: the body and blood of Christ being then not corporally or carnally in, with, or under the bread and wine; yet as really, but spiritually, present to the faith of believers in that ordinance, as the elements themselves are, to their outward senses.²

VIII. Although ignorant and wicked men receive the outward elements in this sacrament, yet they receive not the thing signified thereby; but by their unworthy coming thereunto are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, to their own damnation. Wherefore all ignorant and ungodly persons, as they are unfit to enjoy communion with him, so are they unworthy of the Lord's table, and cannot, without great sin against Christ, while they remain such, partake of these holy mysteries;¹ or be admitted thereunto.²

CHAPTER XXX.

OF CHURCH CENSURES.

The Lord Jesus, as king and head of his church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate.¹

I. To these officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed, by virtue whereof they have power respectively to retain and remit sins, to shut that kingdom against the impenitent, both by the word and censures; and to open it unto penitent sinners, by the ministry of the gospel, and by absolution from censures, as occasion shall require.¹

II. Church censures are necessary for the reclaiming and gaining of offending brethren; for deterring of others from like offences; for purging out of that heaven which might infect the whole lump; for vindicating the honor of Christ, and the holy profession of the gospel; and for preventing the wrath of God, which might justly fall upon the church, if they should suffer his covenant, and the seals thereof, to be profaned by notorious and obstinate offenders.¹

IV. For the better attaining of these ends, the officers of the church are to proceed by admonition, suspension from the sacrament of the Lord's supper for a season, and by excommunication from the church, according to the nature of the crime, and demerit of the person.¹

CHAPTER XXXI.

OF SYNODS AND COUNCILS.

For the better government and further edification of the church, there ought to be such assemblies as are commonly called synods or councils,¹ and it belongeth to the overseers and other rulers of the particular churches, by virtue of their office, and the power which Christ hath given them for edification, and not for destruction, to appoint such assemblies;² and to convene together in them, as often as they shall judge it expedient for the good of the church.³

II. It belongeth to synods and councils, ministerially, to determine controversies of faith, and cases of conscience; to set down rules and directions for the better ordering of the public worship of God, and government of his church; to receive complaints in cases of mal-administration, and authoritatively to determine the same; which decrees and determinations, if consonant to the word of God, are to be received with reverence and submission, not only for their agreement with the word, but also for the power whereby they are made, as being an ordinance of God, appointed thereunto in his word.¹

III. All synods or councils since the apostles' times, whether general or particular, may err, and many have erred; therefore they are not to be made the rule of faith or practice, but to be used as a help in both.¹

IV. Synods and councils are to handle or conclude nothing but that which is ecclesiastical; and are not to intermeddle with civil affairs which concern the commonwealth, unless by way of humble petition in cases extraordinary; or by way of advice for satisfaction of conscience, if they be thereunto required by the civil magistrate.¹

CHAPTER XXXII.

OF THE STATE OF MAN AFTER DEATH, AND OF THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

The bodies of men, after death, return to dust, and see corruption;¹ but their souls (which neither die nor sleep, having an immortal subsistence, immediately return to God who gave them.² The souls of the righteous, being then made perfect in holiness, are received into the highest heavens, where they behold the face of God in light and glory, waiting for the full redemption of their bodies;³ and the souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torments and utter darkness, reserved to the judgment of the great day.⁴ Besides these two places for souls separated from their bodies, the Scripture acknowledgeth none.

II. At the last day, such as are found alive shall not die, but be changed;¹ and all the dead shall be raised up with the self-same bodies, and none other, although with different qualities, which shall be united again to their souls forever.²

III. The bodies of the unjust shall, by the power of Christ, be raised to dishonor; the bodies of the just, by his Spirit, unto honor, and be made conformable to his own glorious body.¹

CHAPTER XXXIII.

OF THE LAST JUDGMENT.

God hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness by Jesus Christ,¹ to whom all power and judgment is given of the Father.² In which day, not only the apostate angels shall be judged;³ but likewise all persons that have lived upon earth shall appear before the tribunal of Christ, to give an account of their thoughts, words and deeds; and to receive according to what they have done in the body, whether good or evil.⁴

¹ Acts xvii, 31. ² John v, 22, 27. ³ 1 Cor. vi, 3. ⁴ 2 Cor. v, 10.

II. The end of God's appointing this day, is for the manifestation of the glory of his mercy in the eternal salvation of the elect;¹ and of his justice in the damnation of the reprobate, who are wicked and disobedient.² For then shall the righteous go into everlasting life, and receive that fullness of joy and refreshing which shall come from the presence of the Lord;³ but the wicked, who know not God, and obey not the gospel of Jesus Christ, shall be cast into eternal torments, and be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.⁴

¹ Rom. ix, 23. ² Rom. ii, 5, 6. ³ Matt. xxv, 31, 32, 33, 34. ⁴ Matt. xxv, 41, 46.

III. As Christ would have us to be certainly persuaded that there shall be a day of judgment, both to deter all men from sin, and for the greater consolation of the godly in their adversity; so will he have that day unknown to men, that they may shake off all carnal security, and be always watchful, because they know not at what hour the Lord will come; and may be ever prepared to say, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Amen.

The First Bible Printed in New Jersey.

As early as the beginning of the last century laws existed in some of the colonies requiring every family to be furnished with a Bible. This supply continued to be kept up by individual exertion until the meeting of the first Congress, in 1777. To that body a memorial was presented on the Bible destitution throughout the country. This memorial was answered by the appointment of a committee, to advise as to the printing an edition of thirty thousand Bibles. The population of the colonies then was about three millions, and all the Bibles in the entire world at that time did not exceed four millions. This committee reported that the necessary materials, such as paper and types, were so difficult to obtain, that to print and bind thirty thousand copies would cost £10,272, 10s., and in their judgment was impracticable. But they recommended the following:

"The use of the Bible being so universal, and its importance so great, to direct the Committee on Commerce to import, at the expense of Congress, twenty thousand English Bibles from Holland, Scotland, or elsewhere, into the different ports of the States of the Union." The report was adopted and the importation was ordered.

In 1784, when the continuance of the war prevented further importation, and there was no telling how long this obstruction might be protracted, the subject of printing the Bible was again urged on Congress, and the matter was referred to a committee of three. On their recommendation the following action was taken:—

"Resolved, That the United States, in Congress assembled, highly approve the laudable and pious undertaking of Mr. Robert Aitken, of Philadelphia, as subservient of the interests of religion, and being satisfied of the care and accuracy of the execution of the work, recommend this edition of the Bible to the inhabitants of the United States."

This was on September 12th, 1782. In 1788 Isaac Collins, a member of the Society of Friends, and an enterprising printer of Trenton, N. J., and who established the first newspaper in that State, issued proposals to print a quarto edition of the Bible in 984 pages, at the price of four Spanish dollars. The Synod of New York and New Jersey, the same year, recommended the undertaking. Dr. Witherspoon, of Princeton, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, President of Nassau Hall, and Rev. Mr. Armstrong, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Trenton, were appointed a committee to concur with committees of any other Denominations, or of our own Synods, to revise the sheets, and, if necessary, to assist in selecting a standard edition. This committee was also authorized to agree with Mr. Collins to append Ostervald's Notes, if not inconsistent with the wishes of other than Calvinistic subscribers.

In the Spring of 1789 the General Assembly, at its meeting, appointed a committee of sixteen (on which was Mr. Armstrong) to lay Mr. Collins' proposal before their respective Presbyteries, and to recommend that subscriptions be solicited in each congregation. This recommendation was repeated in 1790 and in 1791. Mr. Collins, in 1788, issued an octavo New Testament. The quarto edition of the Bible, thus sustained, was issued in 1791. There were five thousand copies. Ostervald's "Practical Observations," of 170 pages, were furnished to special subscribers, and were bound between the Old and New Testaments. This Bible was so carefully revised that it is still a standard. He and his children read all the proofs. In a subsequent edition, 1793-4, he states in the preface, after mentioning several clergymen who assisted the publisher in 1791: "Some of these persons, James F. Armstrong in particular, being near the press, assisted also in reading and correcting the proof-sheets." The above interesting facts on this Collins Bible are found in "The History of the Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J.," by Dr. John Hall, the pastor. The care that was taken by Mr. Collins is evident from the closing paragraph of the preface:—

"The publisher has only further to add that he has made the following impression from the Oxford edition of 1784, by Jackson and Hamilton, and has been particularly attentive in the revision and correction of the proof-sheets with the Cambridge edition of 1688, by John Field; with the Edinburgh edition of 1775, by Kincaid, and, in all variations, with the London edition of 1772, by Eyre and Strahan; that where there was any difference in words, or in the omission or addition of words, among these he followed that which appeared to be most agreeable to the Hebrew of Arius Montanus, and to the Greek of Arius Montanus and Leufden, without permitting himself to depart from some one of the above mentioned English copies, unless in the mode of spelling, in which he has generally followed Johnson."

At the end of the New Testament is arranged an Index, or more accurately, an Epitome of the Old and New Testaments, with a Chronological Table in parallel columns. Following these are tables of Scripture weights, measures and coins; of officers and conditions of men; and the old table of kindred and affinity. The volume closes with a Concordance, "carefully perused and enlarged by John Douname, B. A." This Concordance is not so full as Cruden's, but is very serviceable. The "Practical Observations," by Ostervald, take up each chapter separately, giving first a brief explanation and then observations, much after the manner of Doddridge.

The remarks, even in the Epistle to the Romans, are evangelical rather than Calvinistic, and contain little that would be objected to by an Arminian. This Ostervald was a "Professor of Divinity, and one of the ministers of the Church in Neufchatel, Switzerland."

The copy before me was presented to the Presbyterian Church in Flemington, N. J., which was organized in 1791. It was used as the pulpit Bible for sixty-six years. It was the gift of Jasper Smith, one of the ruling elders and President of the Board of Trustees. He was an ardent patriot of the Revolution, a devoted Christian, and a strong Presbyterian. At the time he was one of the leading lawyers of the county. To his exertions and his generous contributions was mainly due the organization of the church, which is now approaching the close of its first century. About the beginning of this century Mr. Smith removed to Lawrenceville, N. J., where he died. In his will he bequeathed to the Presbyterian church there the large farm of over two hundred acres, which is now the manse farm. This Bible of Collins is not only the first, but so far as I know, the only edition of the Holy Scriptures printed in New Jersey.—George S. Mott, D. D.

The First Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y. In May, 1760, the Presbyterians of Albany sent a very pressing supplication to the Synod of Philadelphia for ministerial supplies, and Hector Alison, of Drawyers, Kettletas, of Elizabethtown, and Tennent, of Freehold, were sent to minister to them in holy things. The congregation was almost wholly of Scottish descent, some probably being from Freehold, some from other parts of New Jersey, and a few from old England. The church was organized at the close of the French war, in 1763. A building was soon commenced, and their first pastor was the Rev. William Hannah, a graduate of King's College, in New York city, and a licentiate of Litchfield Association. When and by whom ordained is not known, but he was "received into Dutchess County Presbytery," on October 18th, 1763, when he was pastor of the Church at Albany. Mr. Hannah remained pastor about two years, and it may be added that he was afterwards suspended from the ministry, in 1767, for having abandoned its work and accepted a commission from the Governor to practice as an attorney.

The Rev. Andrew Bay was the second pastor. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New Castle, in 1718, and belonged to that part of it which adhered to the Synod of New York. He became pastor of the Albany Church about 1769, and remained there till 1771, when he settled at Newton, L. I. He subsequently experienced some difficulty with his congregation, and retired from the jurisdiction of the Synod in 1776. In 1775 the Church at Albany had permission from the Synod to place itself under the care of the Presbytery of New York, but it had to struggle with many trials incident to the times, and remained without a pastor until after the close of the Revolution. In 1785 the congregation was incorporated, and on the 8th of November, of that year, the Rev. John McDonald was ordained and installed pastor of the church by the Presbytery of New York. He continued in that office till the year 1795. Subsequently to his removal, the pulpit was supplied for two years by the Rev. David S. Bogart, a licentiate of the Dutch Reformed Church. In the year 1798, the Rev. Elihu Nott, D. D., became pastor of the church, and remained till 1801. His successors were the Rev. John B. Romcyn, called in 1804, and remaining till the close of 1808. The Rev. William Neill, D. D., called in 1809, and remaining till the middle of 1816. The Rev. Arthur J. Stansbury, called in 1817, and remaining till the Spring of 1821. The Rev. Henry R. Weed, D. D., called in 1822, and remaining till the Autumn of 1829. The Rev. John N. Campbell, D. D., called in 1830, and remaining thirty-four years.

There are no dates accessible to the writer from which can be ascertained what seasons of revival may have occurred previously to the ministry of Dr. Campbell. From the number received on examination, into the church, in two years, 1826 and 1827, under the ministry of Dr. Weed, viz.: seventy-two, it is evident, however, that there must have been a season of unusual interest at that time. During Dr. Campbell's ministry of twenty years there were added to the church five hundred and eighty-two persons: on examination, three hundred and fifty-four, on certificate, two hundred and twenty-eight. Two revivals occurred during that period, the former in 1831. In that and the following year one hundred and six persons united with the church on examination. The latter occurred in 1840, during which year eighty-three persons were received on examination. There was also a season of more than usual interest in 1843.

The original trustees, in 1763, were John Macomb, David Edgar, Samuel Holliday, Robert Henry, Abraham Lyle and John Monro. The elders were Robert Henry, David Edgar and Matthew Watson.

The first house of worship was on a high hill, facing Hudson street, on a lot bounded on the east by William street, on the north by Beaver street, on the south by Hudson street and on the west by Grand street. It was a building of convenient size, fronting to the east, with a tall steeple, and cost £2813, York currency. The second house of worship was erected in 1798, and was a fine, large building; it was remodeled and fitted up with great taste, in 1831. The location, however, had become a noisy one, and the great prosperity of the church under Dr. Campbell, seemed to demand the erection of a more convenient, spacious and suitable edifice, and such an one was erected. It was a noble specimen of Gothic architecture; was commenced in the Autumn of 1847, and was opened and dedicated to the worship of Almighty God on Sabbath, March 10th, 1850. The lot on which this edifice was built was on Hudson street, 150 feet in length, and on Philip street, on which it fronted, about 148 feet in breadth, enclosed by an iron fence of Gothic pattern.

Rev. James M. Ludlow succeeded Dr. Campbell, and was ordained and installed in November, 1864. Though but recently graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary, Mr. Ludlow brought mental culture, genius and fine intellectual and spiritual discernment to this, his first pastorate; and there was a healthful growth of the church during his ministry, which was continued till November, 1868, when he accepted a call from the Collegiate-Reformed Church, New York city. Dr. Ludlow is now pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. He was followed by Rev. John M. C. Blayney, who was installed October 24th, 1869, and filled the ministerial office with great fidelity till February 1st, 1880, when, principally on account of a change of climate being necessary to preserve the failing health of his family, he tendered his resignation.

During his ministry here the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon Mr. Blayney by Union College. While he was pastor valuable improvements in the church structure were perfected, involving, with the purchase of a new organ, an outlay of some fifteen thousand dollars.

There were periods of special spiritual awakening during his pastorate, and his solid qualities of mind and heart endeared Dr. Blayney to his congregation, and gained for him the respect and confidence of the entire community.

Rev. Walter D. Nicholas succeeded Dr. Blayney, and was installed in September, 1880, having previously filled the pastoral office in Temple Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia.

Like his last two predecessors, Mr. Nicholas is a young man, and endowed with an acute intellect, superior discrimination and versatility of mind; his pulpit efforts are characterized by fervor and earnestness, and there is no doubt that, under the divine blessing, with increasing years, increasing usefulness awaits him.

The beautiful edifice referred to above, having been occupied for only a generation, was disposed of during the past Summer (1883), to the Hudson Avenue Methodist Church, for the reason that the pastor, officers and members of the congregation, in view of the westward tide of the city's population, had felt impelled to place themselves in the van of this movement, and had determined to locate and build another house of worship nearly a mile away, on the corner of State and Willett streets, facing the beautiful Washington Park.

Mr. Nicholas, the present pastor, has entered upon this undertaking with indomitable energy, and has the hearty and active concurrence of his people.

The expenditure for the site, building and furnishing of the new edifice will approximate $110,000, about $45,000 of which has already been subscribed, and $25,000 realized from sale of the former edifice.

The new church, though of a diverse style of architecture from the former elegant one, is after the design of the distinguished architect, J. C. Cady, of New York, and is a beautiful ecclesiastical structure.

The congregation are now worshipping in the Law School building, on State street, and anticipate the completion and occupancy of the new church by March 1st, 1884.

The German Theological School of Newark, N. J. This Institution had its origin in a successful mission work among the German people of Newark and vicinity.

THE FIRST MISSIONARY period extended from 1848 to 1869. The beginning was in the pious zeal of an humble layman, now for many years pastor of the Second German Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, O., the Rev. G. William Winnes. He was then recently from the Barmer Mission House, in Germany, and was inspired by the missionary spirit of that Institution. Impressed with the religious condition of his countrymen in Newark, he was so stirred in soul that he began immediately to preach (as a layman). At his first service were seven hearers, consisting of his "brother and a few saloon keepers." A promising congregation soon grew into an organized church, before he was ordained. He had meanwhile come into contact with Presbyterian pastors, and his church, as well as himself, sought the care of the Presbytery. Within a few years the little church became the German mother church of the Presbytery and of the Synod. Church after church was organized, in Newark, Paterson, Bloomfield and Orange, one of the two in Paterson by the Old School branch, all the others by the New School branch, and a widening success was opened. The cheering characteristic was that the Germans led the way in religious labors for their countrymen.

The one difficulty in responding to the demand for the development of their new opportunities was in the procurement of sufficient suitable German pastors. The successive trial of adventurers, and even of good men from the father-land, resulted in repeated failures. The two principal pastors, whose churches were growing in importance, urged the Presbytery of Newark to undertake the education of a special German ministry. After much delay and much reluctance, the Presbytery began the definite consideration of enlarged missionary plans.

A MISSIONARY THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL.

In 1864 the Presbytery appointed a Commission to consider the establishment of a theological class. The German pastors had assured their American brethren that proper candidates could be obtained, and four students were presented from the First German Presbyterian Church of Newark. A provisional Faculty was appointed, consisting of the Rev. Johann U. Guenther, pastor of the First German Church, and of the Rev. George C. Seibert, PH. D., pastor of the Third German Church, of Newark, as Instructors in German, and of Rev. Joseph Few Smith, D. D., of Newark, and Rev. Charles A. Smith, D. D., of East Orange, as Instructors in English. The four students were boarded in the house of the Rev. M. Guenther, and the lectures and recitations were held in the Lecture-room of his church. The instruction began on September 20th, 1869, and included at the first, in the German language, the subjects of Hebrew, Biblical History, Pastoral Work and German Grammar, and in the English language, once or twice a week, United States History, Natural Philosophy, English Grammar and Composition. The number of students increased during the year to nine. The second year the number became eleven, and the little building used as a dormitory was removed to a neighboring lot, and enlarged so that it could accommodate fourteen. The third year the students numbered sixteen, and a permanent location became necessary. The "Bloomfield Academy," in the town adjoining Newark, was therefore purchased, in 1872, and in the Autumn of the same year the Institution was moved thither.

The removal to the new location was followed, the next Autumn, by the formal election of a Faculty. The Rev. Charles E. Knox, then Secretary of the Board of Directors, was elected President and Professor of Homiletics, Church Government and Pastoral Theology, and the Rev. George C. Seibert, PH. D., was elected Professor of Biblical Exegesis and Theology, both of whom were installed at an inaugural service on the day of prayer for colleges, in January, 1874, in the First Church of Newark, N. J. The Institution was divided into a Theological and an Academic Department, the course being three years in each department.

Harry E. Richards, M. D., was elected, in 1878, Professor of Mathematics and of Natural Science in the Academic Department, and has since served without compensation. In 1882 the Academic Department was made to conform, in part, to the character of a German Gymnasium, and its course extended to four years. The Theological Professors devote one hour a day to this department, and assistant Instructors take the additional subjects required. The Preparatory Department is now open for the admission of other students than those studying theology. The purpose is, with the same force of instruction, to educate lay helpers to the ministry, at the same time with the education of pastors.

The first theological class of eight members was graduated in 1871. The number of students has usually been from twenty to twenty-five.

DIRECTORS AND CHARTER.

The Board of Directors is elected by the Presbytery of Newark, but is composed in part of members outside the Presbytery. The first Board was elected in 1869. The Charter was procured on February 2d, 1871. The corporate title remains, "The German Theological School of Newark, N. J.," the removal of the Institution locating it but a mile and a half outside the city. The number of Directors was originally nine, five clergymen and five laymen. A supplement to the Charter permits the number to be enlarged to twenty-five. The election of directors and of professors is subject to the approval of the General Assembly, under whose care the Institution was taken, at the re-union in 1870.

By the provisions of the Charter, "whenever, from a cessation of German immigration, or from any other cause, it may be deemed inexpedient longer to maintain said Institution as a distinctive German Theological School, it shall be lawful for the directors, with the approval of the Presbytery of Newark, and of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, to use the property and funds for any other branch of theological education, or to transfer its property and funds to any other Theological Seminary."

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES.

The following are the special principles on which the Institution is based:—

In order to reach any powerful body of foreign people, in a large way, there must be a native ministry, springing from among the people themselves.

In view of the great power of the German people in this land, it is wise to concede the German language during the period of transition.

Success in German churches among adult Germans, by ministers preaching exclusively in the English tongue, is exceptional, depends on special individual genius, and cannot be depended upon for a general system of evangelization.

In order to bring the German mind—educated through a long history so entirely different from our own—into sympathy with our doctrine and practice, a rightly-devised, wisely-conducted indoctrination of the German mind is necessary.

This indoctrination of the German people must be systematic, patient and continued, and must distinctly recognize in the German the historic and mental conditions on which it is to act.

There must be an Institution which shall indoctrinate those who are to indoctrinate the masses, in which Institution the Professors shall make this problem a special study, and where the instruction shall have constant and special reference to this object.

The instruction should be in both the languages—English and German.

The seminary should bring the student at graduation to a position in medio, viz., on the one hand, in full sympathy with the American Christian mind, in the doctrine, polity and practice of the Scriptures; and on the other hand, in full sympathy with the German mind, in language and in domestic and social life. The graduate, as an individual, should gravitate toward the German flock; the pastor and flock, as a mass, should gravitate together towards the American life.

To incorporate our German Theological School with any one of our English seminaries would be to put in peril the object for which the Institution is founded, and would probably defeat its end. The practical effect of the education of German ministers by our established American theological seminaries has been to educate away the student from the German people, thus gaining the individual pastor, but losing the flock.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT.

The financial maintenance of the Institution has been almost entirely by benevolent contributions from churches and individuals. An endowment fund of about $30,000 had been collected from 1870 to 1873. It advanced to $36,000 from 1873 to 1878, but during the general financial depression of 1874 to 1878, $10,771 of this fund was borrowed for current expenses. The amount has now been repaid, except about $600, and this balance is secured by subscriptions.

The present endowment is a little over $40,000, which includes the following separate funds:—

Theological Seminary, Danville, Ky. The General Assembly, in 1853, resolved "to establish an additional Theological Seminary, of the first class, in the West," and after an extended discussion, it was resolved to locate it at Danville, Ky., that place having received, on the first ballot, a majority of the two hundred and thirty-three ballots cast. Accordingly, the new Seminary was called the Danville Theological Seminary. The plan of the Princeton Seminary was provisionally adopted, and a committee appointed to revise it and report to the next General Assembly, in detail, a complete plan for the new Seminary. A full Faculty was elected, composed as follows: Rev. R. J. Breckenridge, D. D., LL. D., Professor of Exegetic, Didactic and Polemic Theology; the Rev. E. P. Humphrey, D. D., Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History; the Rev. B. M. Palmer, D. D., Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature, and the Rev. Phineas B. Gurley, D. D., Professor of Pastoral Theology, Church Government and the Composition and Delivery of Sermons; and it was ordered that the first session be opened on the 13th day of October, 1853, by the Professors elect, or as many of them as might accept the chairs tendered to them.

The overture presented to the Assembly by the twelve commissioners from the Kentucky Presbyteries undoubtedly had a potent influence in determining the location of the new seminary. In it the Synod and people of Kentucky were pledged to contribute $20,000 towards the endowment of one of the chairs, let the Institution be located where it might, upon condition that three other chairs should be endowed with a like sum; and $60,000 and ten acres of land for a site, should it be located at or near Danville. The hand of Dr. R. J. Breckenridge can be clearly seen in this paper, and his was the hand, too, that initiated and guided the noble effort that made it possible to make such a proposition to the Assembly. He was a commissioner from West Lexington Presbytery, and was made Chairman of the Standing Committee on Theological Seminaries; and, as Chairman of said committee, it belonged to him to draw the principal papers relating to the establishment of the Danville Seminary. He also drew the plan, which was approved by the Assembly of the following year. In all these writings his marked individuality appears. His great powers were now at full maturity; his mind, ever alert and of rare activity, was enriched with large and varied stores of knowledge; his influence in the Church was greater than that of any living man, and perhaps greater than any one man had ever exerted; his discrimination of truth was nice, his grasp of it uncommonly vigorous, his ability to state it in precise, lucid and forcible terms most remarkable. He was wonderfully fascinating at times in his intercourse with young men, impressed them with his broad generalizations, and stimulated their faculties to unwonted activity. Though sometimes impatient of the drudgery of teaching, he possessed the highest qualities of a great teacher, and entered on his work as a Professor of Theology with a genuine zeal to serve the Church and its adorable Head therein. All the interests of the Institution received his vigilant, unwearied care; and to Robert J. Breckenridge, rather than to any other man, may be applied the title of Founder of the Danville Theological Seminary.

Drs. Palmer and Gurley had declined the chairs to which they had been elected; nevertheless, Drs. Breckenridge and Humphrey, with the assistance of the Rev. J. G. Reaser (now Dr. Reaser of St. Louis), as teacher of Oriental and Biblical Literature, opened the new Seminary at the time appointed by the Assembly. In the meantime, the Cincinnati school had ceased to exist; the one at New Albany was continued till after the organization of the Seminary of the Northwest by the Assembly of 1859, into which it was then merged. Though Dr. Humphrey had been less prominent in the councils of the Church than Dr. Breckenridge, he was by no means an unknown man. He had been Moderator of the General Assembly of 1851, and had been elected to a chair in Princeton by the following Assembly. His opening sermon in 1852 had attracted an unusual degree of attention. His reputation for scholarship and culture was high; and he was widely known as a faithful pastor, an able and eloquent preacher, a judicious counsellor and an accomplished gentleman. He was also considered a model for the rising ministry of the Church. Around these eminent men and the Institution they were inaugurating, gathered the affections, the hopes and the prayers, of a large body of Presbyterian people in the West and Southwest, but especially in Kentucky. The Presbyterians of Kentucky regarded the Institution as, in some sense, their own. They rallied around it with a most affectionate interest; and, above all, the blessing of God seemed to rest upon it. The first session twenty-three students were in attendance; the second, thirty-seven; the third, forty-five; the fourth, thirty-six; the fifth, forty; the sixth, forty-seven; the seventh, fifty-two; and the eighth, forty-two. The eighth session ended after the outbreak of the Great Rebellion. In the meantime, the Faculty had been filled up by the election, in 1856, of the Rev. Dr. Stuart Robinson, to the chair of Church Government and Pastoral Theology, and, in 1857, of the Rev. Stephen Yerkes, to the chair of Biblical and Oriental Literature. In 1858, after a service of only two sessions, Dr. Robinson removed to Louisville. He was a man of genial disposition, of restless activity of mind, of remarkable capacity for labor and delight in it, a learned, devoted and successful instructor, and a strong, brilliant preacher. All classes of people heard him gladly. The removal of such a man was a serious loss. But no man or men, however great or good, could sustain the Institution, at the crisis reached in 1861. It was wrecked, but not utterly, amid the storms of civil war. Its doors remained open during those four dreadful years of internecine strife, with the exception of two months, while the larger part of Kentucky was under the heel of a Southern army; but, of course, the number of students was greatly reduced.

In December, 1861, the Southern General Assembly was constituted. This division of the Church cut off at one blow the major part of the special field of the Danville Seminary, and its difficulties were further aggravated by the division of the Synod of Kentucky, in October, 1866. Moreover, by the reunion of the Old and New School, in 1869, Lane Seminary was brought into direct competition with it in all that remained of its original field. It is to be remembered, too, that its endowment never was completed, as had been expected, and that, from this cause, it always suffered serious disadvantages. But, notwithstanding all these drawbacks, the Institution struggled on from year to year, maintaining a full course of instruction, by a full Faculty, nearly all the while, its exercises being intermitted only twice, and then but for a year each time. Since its organization, about two hundred and fifty young men have been matriculated, of whom somewhat less than a half completed their course of study within its walls.

In April, 1883, four very worthy men, all of whom had taken the entire three years' course at Danville, and "sustained a most admirable examination before the Board of Directors," were granted the usual certificate. Upon their departure, however, only three students remained in the Seminary. At the same time it was found that three professorial chairs were vacant, by reason of recent resignations which had been accepted, and that the resignation of the fourth and only remaining Professor was in the hands of the President of the Board. In these circumstances, and after long and earnest deliberation, the Board determined that it was not expedient to fill the vacant chairs at that time, but referred that subject to the next annual meeting. It was also resolved, "that the course of study in the Seminary be continued for the next Seminary year under the instruction of one Professor;" and the only remaining Professor "was requested to withdraw his resignation and continue his services for the year to come, teaching such students in the various branches of theology as may be matriculated under the rules." This request was complied with. But since the last meeting of the Board the two Committees of Conference appointed by the two Assemblies (Northern and Southern), in May, 1883, have met and agreed to recommend to their respective Assemblies "An equal joint use and occupancy of the Seminary, on condition that this occupancy be in perpetuity, and that the Seminary be removed to Louisville, Ky." And here the history of this School of the Prophets rests for the present.

Theory of Revivals. "The following things," says the Rev. Albert Barnes, "will express what is meant by a revival of religion; or the following truths are essential elements in the theory of such a revival:—

"1. There may be a radical and permanent change in a man's mind on the subject of religion. This change it is customary to express by the word regeneration, or the new birth. It supposes that, before this, man is entirely alienated from God, and that he first begins to love Him when he experiences this change. The previous state is one of sin; the subsequent is a state of holiness; the former is death, the latter is life. The former is the agitation of a troubled sea, which cannot rest; the latter calmness, peace, joy. This change is the most thorough through which the human mind ever passes. It effects a complete revolution in the man, and his opposite states are characterized by words that express no other states in the human mind. This change is instantaneous. The exact amount may not be known; and the previous seriousness and anxiety may be of longer or shorter continuance; but there is a moment when the heart is changed, and when the man that was characteristically a sinner becomes characteristically a Christian. This change is always attended with feeling. The man is awakened to a sense of his danger; feels, with more or less intensity, that he is a sinner; resolves to abandon his sins and seek for pardon; is agitated with conflicts of greater or less intensity on giving up his sins; finds greater or feebler obstacles in his way; and at last resolves to cast himself on the mercy of God in the Redeemer, and to become a Christian. The result is, in all cases, permanent peace and joy. It is the peace of the soul when pardon is pronounced on the guilty, and when the hope of immortal glory first dawns on a benighted mind. It may be beautifully illustrated by the loveliness of the landscape when the sun at evening breaks out after a tempest; or by the calmness of the ocean as it subsides after the storm. In the fact that such a change may occur, all Christians agree; in such a change is laid the whole theory of a revival of religion. Let many sinners simultaneously turn to God. Let conversions to Christ, instead of being few and far between, become numerous, rapidly occurring, and decided in their character, and you have all that is usually meant when we speak of revivals, so far as conversions are concerned. Still these are all individual conversions, accomplished in each case by the Holy Spirit, and in exact accordance with the design of the gospel, and evincing its glory. Each one is converted in the same way, by the same truth, by the same great agent, the Holy Spirit, as though he were alone, and not another mind had been awakened or converted. It is the conversion of a number of individuals from sin to holiness, and from Satan unto God. Look on the heavens in a clear night, and you will have an illustration of what we mean. The stars that are set in that broad zone of light which stretches over the firmament—the milky way—are single stars, each subject to its own laws, moving in its own sphere, glorious, probably, in its own array of satellites; but their rays meet and mingle—not less beautifully because the light of millions is blended together. Alone, they all show God's power and wisdom; blended, they evince the same power and wisdom when he groups beauties and wonders into one. So in conversion from sin to God. Take the case of a single true conversion to God, and extend it to a community—to many individuals passing through that change, and you have all the theory of a revival of religion. It is bringing together many conversions; arresting simultaneously many minds; perhaps condensing into a single place, and into a few weeks, the ordinary work of many distant places and many years. The essential fact is, that a sinner may be converted by the agency of the Spirit of God from his sins. The same power which changes him may change others also. Let substantially the same views and feelings and changes which exist in the case of the individual exist in the case of others; let a deep seriousness pervade a community, and a spirit of prayer be diffused there; let the ordinary haunts of pleasure and vice be forsaken for the places of devotion, and you have the theory, so far as I know, of a revival of religion.

"2. The second fact is, that there may be times in the life of a Christian of unusual peace and joy. To whatever it may be owing, it will be assumed as a fact—for the truth of which I now depend on an appeal to the Christian's own feelings—that there are times in his life of far more than usual elevation in piety; times, when his 'peace is like a river,' and his love to God and man 'like the waves of the sea.' There are times when he feels an irresistible longing for communion with God; when the breath of praise is sweet; when everything seems to be full of God; when all his feelings prompt him to devotion; and when he becomes so impressed with the great truths of Christianity, and filled with the hope of heaven, that he desires to live only for God and for the skies. Earthly objects lose their lustre in his view; their brightest, gayest colors fade away; and an insatiable panting of soul leads him away from these to hold communion with the Redeemer. A light, pure, tranquil, constant, is shed on all the truths of religion, and the desire for the salvation of children, partners, parents, friends, of the Church and of the world, enchains all the affections. Then to pray is easy, and to converse with Christians and with sinners is easy, and the prospect of boundless wealth and of the brightest honors would be gladly exchanged for the privilege of converting and saving a single soul.

"When this occurs in a church, and these feelings pervade any considerable portion of the people of God, there is a revival of religion so far as the church is concerned. Let Christians, as a body, live manifestly under the influence of their religion; let a feeling of devotion pervade a whole church, such as you have felt in the favored times of your piety, and there would be a revival of religion—a work of grace that would soon extend to other minds, and catch, like spreading fires, on the altars of other hearts. Let a Christian community feel, on the great subjects of religion, what individual Christians sometimes feel, and should always feel, and, so far as the church is concerned, there would be all the phenomena that exists in a revival of religion. A revival in the church is a revival in individual hearts, and nothing more. It is when each individual Christian becomes more sensible of his obligations, more prayerful, more holy, and more anxious for the salvation of men. Let every professing Christian awake to what he should be, and come under the full influence of his religion, and in such a church there would be a revival. Such a sense of obligation, and such joy and peace and love and zeal in the individual members of a church, would be a revival. But in the most earnest desires for your own salvation, there is no violation of any of the proper laws of Christian action. In great, strenuous and combined efforts for the salvation of others, in unceasing prayer for the redemption of all the world, there is no departure from the precepts of Christ, nor from the spirit which he manifested on earth.

“3. The third feature that occurs in a revival of religion, to which it is proper to direct our attention, is, that an extensive influence goes over a community, and affects with seriousness many who are not ultimately converted to God. Many individuals are usually made serious; many gay and worldly amusements are suspended; many persons not accustomed to go to a place of prayer are led to the sanctuary; many formerly indifferent to religion, or opposed to it, are now willing to converse on it; many, perhaps, are led to prayer in secret and to read the Bible, who before had wholly neglected the means of grace. Many who never enter into the kingdom of God seem to be just on its borders, and hesitate long, whether they shall give up the world and become Christians, or whether they shall give up their serious impressions and return to their former indifference and sins. The subsiding of a revival, or the dying zeal of Christians, or some powerful temptation, or a strong returning tide of worldliness and vanity, leave many such persons still with the world, and their serious impressions vanish—perhaps to return no more.

“4. It remains only to be added as an essential feature in a revival, that it is produced by the power of the Holy Ghost. It is not the work of man, however human agency may be employed. Imperfections there may be, and things to regret there may be, as in all that man touches there are; but the phenomenon itself we regard as the work of the Holy Ghost, alike beyond human power to produce it, and to control it. ‘The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, and canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth;’ and such is the work of the Spirit, alike in an individual conversion, or in a revival of religion. The wind, sometimes gentle, sometimes terrific, sometimes sufficient only to bend the heads of the field of wheat, or to shake the leaf of the aspen, sometimes sweeping in the fury of the storm over hills and vales, illustrates the way in which God’s Spirit influences human hearts. You have seen the pliant osier bend gently before the zephyr, and the flowers and the fields of grain gently wave in a summer’s eve. So gently does the Spirit of God breathe upon a Church and people. So calm, so lovely, so pure are those influences which incline the mind to prayer, to thought, to Christ, to heaven. You have seen the clouds grow dark in the Western sky. They roll upward and onward, unfolding themselves, and throwing their ample volumes over the heavens. The lightnings play and the thunder rolls, and the tornado sweeps over hills and vales, and the proud oak crashes on the mountains. ‘The wind blows where it pleases;’ and thus, too, the Spirit of God passes with more than human power over a community, and many a stout-hearted sinner, like the quivering elm or oak, trembles under the influences of truth. They see a dark cloud gathering in the sky; they hear the thunder of justice; they see the heavens flash along their guilty path; and they are prostrated before God, like the forest before the mighty tempest. The storm passes by and the sun rides serene again in the heavens, and the universal nature smiles—beautiful emblem of the effect of a revival of religion.”

Thom, Rev. John Culbertson, the son of John and Mary (Culbertson) Thom, was born in Clarion county, Pa., April 19th, 1830. After graduating at Jefferson College with honor, in 1853, he was a teacher in Eldersridge Academy, Pa., for two years. In 1855 he was chosen to take charge of the Senior Male Department of the Natchez Institute, Miss., and filled this position for two years, highly esteemed by all who knew him. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, was licensed to preach by Saltsburg Presbytery, in January, 1859. On May 19th, of the same year, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Waynesburg, Chester county, Pa., where he was greatly beloved, and labored with much success. In July, 1865, he received a unanimous call to the Pine Street Church, St. Louis, Mo., and entered upon his labors in October. The ministry thus commenced was full of promise, but destined to a speedy termination. He died, November 28th, 1865. Mr. Thom’s gentle manners, temperate spirit, intellectual vigor, and manifest piety and devotion to his work, won him popularity and gave him success as a preacher. As a presbyter, he was marked by faithfulness, diligence and promptness. It was a rule with him, when traveling, never to let an opportunity of speaking to a fellow-traveler about his soul go by unimproved. His end was peace. With the word "heaven" on his lips, he sank into unconsciousness, and calmly breathed his life away.

Thomas, Thomas Ebenezer, D. D., was born in Chelmsford, England, December 23d, 1812. He graduated at Miami University, O., in 1834, after which he engaged in teaching at Rising Sun, Ind., and Franklin, O. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Oxford, in October, 1836, and ordained by the Presbytery of Cincinnati, in July, 1837. He was pastor at Harrison, O., 1837-8; pastor at Hamilton, O., 1838-49; President of Hanover College, 1849-51; Professor of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, in the Theological Seminary, New Albany, Ind., 1851-7; stated supply of the First Presbyterian Church, New Albany, Ind., 1856-58; pastor of the First Church, Dayton, O., 1858-71, and Professor of New Testament Greek and Exegesis, in Lane Theological Seminary, O., 1871-5. He died February 3d, 1875.

THOMAS EBENEZER THOMAS, D.D.

Dr. Thomas was an earnest man, and exhibited great energy and decision of character. He was a scholar of high order, and a preacher of peculiar eloquence. He followed his convictions of duty at all hazards. He was frank and fearless in the avowal of his opinions, and there was no difficulty in determining on which side of a question he stood. He excelled as a debater, and always appeared to advantage in the discussions of the judicatories of the Church. By those who knew him, he was regarded as an able, conscientious and faithful man in all the positions he occupied.

Thompson, George Washington, D. D., was born in New Providence, N. J., October 10th, 1819; graduated at Rutgers College, N. J.; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick. After spending a short time as assistant minister in the Church at Danville, Pa., he was installed pastor of the churches of Millinburg and New Berlin, in 1841 or 1842. During the time of this pastorate he preached also at Hartleton, where a church was soon formed. In 1847 he became pastor of the church of Lower Tuscarora, which he served until his death, January 28th, 1864. Dr. Thompson was a man of pleasing person and winning address. He had a most genial spirit, which helped to endear him to his friends. He had an acute, ready, practical mind. His preaching was characterized by plainness, pointedness, persuasiveness, and especially by adaptedness. He was peculiarly qualified to labor in revivals of religion. He was a man of faith and prayer and child-like dependence on Christ. He was a prompt and useful friend of the Boards of our Church. His labors as a pastor were successful, and in various ways he exerted a large influence for good.

Thompson, Rev. John, came from Ireland as a probationer, in 1715, and was ordained and installed in April, 1717, pastor of the congregation in Lewes, Del., where he remained until September, 1729. He accepted a call from Middle Octorara, but being harassed by dissensions among his people, he removed, in 1732, to Chestnut Level. In 1738, he visited the Valley of Virginia, and being released from his charge July 31st, 1744, made his home in the Valley. In 1744, he visited North Carolina, and again in 1751. He published at Williamsburg, in 1749, an "Explanation of the Shorter Catechism." He was then laboring in Amelia. He died in 1753, in Centre, N. C.

Thompson, Hon. John, an elder in the First Presbyterian Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was born at Rhinebeck, N. Y., July 4th, 1809. Here he received his academical education. He was admitted to the New York Bar in 1830. In his profession he has commanding talent and influence. He was Representative in the Thirty-fifth Congress, from Dutchess and Columbia counties, N. Y. He has rare forensic and rhetorical gifts, which give grace to his pen and strength to his utterance. He is a diligent student, with decided literary and theological tendencies, and has found time among his many labors to write and give to the world several well-written essays, one on "Inspiration," another on the "Atonement," and another on the "Inner Kingdom." He has also published two articles, one on the "Holy Spirit," the other a vindication of the "Miracles of the New Testament." Mr. Thompson's lectures have been many, and, whenever announced, to crowded houses. At college anniversaries he has been a frequent speaker. Both Yale and Union Colleges have given him the honorary degree of A. M. He united with the Presbyterian Church, in Poughkeepsie, February 14th, 1830, on profession of faith, and for fifty-three years has been a steady and strong adherent to its fortunes, a worker in the prayer-meeting and Sabbath school.

Thompson, Miss J. C. This is not a familiar name to the world of fashion or of science, nor to many outside of one division of the Christian host. But to thousands of Presbyterian women and children at home and abroad it is known, as associated, from their beginning, with the two magazines, Woman's Work for Woman and Children's Work for Children. As editor of these periodicals, Miss Thompson was peculiarly identified with the work of the women of the Presbyterian Church for Foreign Missions during the twelve years preceding her death.

It was the desire of her heart, in early life, to be a foreign missionary, but her health would not permit it. A close association with the life for which she had longed was, however, given her, through her sister, who went to India unmarried, and afterwards became Mrs. C. B. Newton. We may not doubt that the will to do the more active service was accepted by the Lord, nor that Miss Thompson did as real and effective work for foreign missions in her quiet place at home as if the wish of her heart had been fulfilled. And, indeed, it was not a small or light labor which she performed in this connection. Beginning, in 1870, with a list of 500 subscriptions, she saw Woman's Work, in a few years, sent yearly to over 10,000 subscribers, and Children's Work, started in 1876, to a still larger number.

As her work grew upon her hands, complications and difficulties growing sometimes also out of it, she went on quietly and patiently, under the shadow often of weakness and pain, but single-hearted and faithful, until she received the summons to "depart and be with Christ." So timid and retiring was Miss Thompson that she would shrink from the thought of having much said about her in print, yet it is due to her memory, and to the cause she so much loved, to make a record of her earnest, faithful, patient labors, in season and out of season, and her consistent walk and conversation, which left no room for doubt that she lived habitually very near to God.

Thompson, Rev. Lewis O., graduated in 1863, at Beloit College, Wis., and was awarded the Salutatory of his class. He studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, and was licensed to preach by the Fourth Presbytery of New York. In 1866 he delivered the Master's Oration at the commencement of his alma mater, and received the degree of A.M. In the August following he was elected a Professor at the Northwestern University, Watertown, Wis., and ordained to the Christian ministry by the Presbytery of Minnesota, January 28th, 1869. He was called back to Watertown, as President of the Northwestern University, in the Spring of 1869, and in 1876 accepted the unanimous call of the Second Presbyterian Church at Peoria, Ill., which position he filled most acceptably, till failing health compelled him to tender his resignation, in July, 1882. Mr. Thompson's intellectual attainments and marked ability have secured the respect, and his genial Christian character the affection, of a wide and growing circle of friends. He is the author of several popular books, among which are, "The Presidents and their Administrations," "Nothing Lost," "The Prayer Meeting and its Improvement," "How to Conduct Prayer Meetings," and "Nineteen Christian Centuries in Outline."

Thompson, Pinckney, M. D., fifth son of William and Jane Thompson, was born in Livingston county, Ky., in 1828. He graduated in the Medical Department of the University of Louisville, in 1853. He was ordained a ruling elder in the church of Henderson, Ky., in 1865. For fifteen years he was Superintendent of the Presbyterian Mission Sabbath school, of which he still has charge. Dr. Thompson is President of the Kentucky State Board of Health, also of the Board of Trustees of the Henderson Colored School.

Thompson, Rev. Samuel, was received by the Presbytery of Donegal, November 16th, 1737, and ordained and installed pastor of the two churches of Upper and Lower Pennsborough, Pa., November 14th, 1739. This pastorate continued for nearly ten years. In 1745, he was released from his charge of Lower Pennsborough (now Silvers Spring), "on account of bodily weakness." Under his labors the congregation of Upper Pennsborough became very numerous and influential. His pastoral relation to it ceased November 14th, 1749. He then went to reside at Great Conewago, in Adams county, near Gettysburg, where he was installed pastor, and his labors were accompanied with the Divine blessing. On several occasions he was sent to supply destitute settlements in Virginia. In 1779 he requested leave to resign his charge, "on account of his infirmities of old age," and his people granted him "a gratuity for his support." Although this request was complied with, he continued in this partial connection with the congregation until April 29th, 1787, when his death took place, after a ministry in this region of forty-six years.

Thomson, Hon. Alexander, was an active member and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church of Falling Spring, Chambersburg, Pa., near to which place he was born, January 12th, 1788. When a young man, he was invited to the home of the Rev. Mr. Grier, at Northumberland, to pursue his own studies, and instruct the sons of his friend in Greek and Latin. After three years spent in this occupation, he went to Bedford, took charge of the Academy there, and studied law with Judge Riddle. After being admitted to the Bar, he soon attained the confidence of the public, both as a man and as a lawyer. He was elected to the House of Representatives in the State Legislature, and afterwards represented the district in Congress, from 1821 to 1826. To the discharge of his public duties he brought the same untiring industry and scrupulous fidelity that were his characteristics through life. About the end of his Congressional career he filled a Judgeship for a very short time, in the city of Lancaster, and then became President Judge of the Judicial District composed of the counties of Somerset, Bedford and Franklin, holding that position until his term expired, under the limited tenure of the amended Constitution of 1838, when he at once entered upon a laborious and successful practice in the district.

In addition to his professional labors in the courts, Judge Thomson filled the Professorship in the Law School connected with Marshall College, from which Institution he received the degree of LL.D. Throughout life he maintained an unsullied character. As a Judge, he was laborious, able, conscientious and dignified. As a lawyer he was esteemed, not only for his industry and courtesy, but for his legal and literary attainments. He commanded the confidence of the profession and the community by his moral and religious worth.

Thomson, Rev. Eberle W., was born in Decatur county, Indiana, January 25th, 1839. In 1863 he graduated at Hanover College, and in 1866 completed his theological course at Princeton Seminary. In 1865 he was licensed by White Water Presbytery, and ordained by the Presbytery of Iowa, September, 1867. He preached at Sharon, Iowa, for two years, and supplied the Church at Ottumwa, Iowa, for six months.

In 1869 he took charge of the Presbyterian Church of Rushville, Indiana, and during a very prosperous pastorate of five years continued his labors there. This church was signally blessed with spiritual growth and activity during his pastorate. In May, 1874, he took charge of the Church at Kirkwood, Ill., where he continues his labors as one of the most efficient and successful pastors in the West.

As a preacher, Mr. Thomson is plain, practical and evangelical, his sermons never failing to open up some of the most important doctrines of the gospel, and make a good impression on the attentive hearers. As a pastor, he is entirely at home among his people, knowing them all, both young and old, and assuring every one of his watchful care and interest in his welfare. As a citizen, a man among men, few ministers of the gospel stand higher than Mr. Thomson. He is favorably known, and cordially welcomed by all who know him, whatever be their religious views.

Thomson, Samuel Harrison, Ph. D., LL. D., son of James and Sarah (Henry) Thomson, was born in Nicholas county, Ky., August 26th, 1813. His father was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and was a descendant of a long line of Presbyterians, tracing back from Donegal, Ireland, into Scotland. His father's brother, Rev. John Thomson, D. D., was eminent in his day, and the father of William M.

Thomson, D. D., author of "The Land and Book," written while missionary in Syria. His mother, Sarah Henry, was of a family numbering among its members many ministers, some of whom were eminent.

Mr. Thomson graduated at Hanover College, ind., in 1837, and in 1844 was elected Professor of Mathematics in the same College. Although he was ordained to the ministry in 1837, yet he was never a settled pastor, his life-work being in the college, where he labored patiently and skillfully to develop the intellects of his students, and direct their hearts in the way of godliness. His influence on character was somewhat remarkable. Whilst severe in the denunciation of evil, he was merciful to the evil-doer. His life was inspired by righteousness. Numbers, since his death, which occurred at Pasadena, Cal., September 2d, 1882, have testified that through his example and influence they were led to consecrate their lives to high and holy purposes.

Dr. Thomson was a man of broad and deep learning. In 1852 he published "The Mosaic Account of Creation," also "Geology an Interpreter of Scripture." In 1874 he issued a pamphlet on "Human Depravity," and in 1876 one entitled "Our Fall in Adam." In his last years he was engaged in preparing a work for the press, which he hoped would render more intelligible to the ordinary reader the blessed truths of the Bible, so hidden by figurative language, but before it was completed, he was called to enter within the veil, and see and enjoy the glories of the redeemed.

Thorn, Rev. David, was ordained by Donegal Presbytery, between May, 1746, and May, 1747, and was settled at Chestnut Level. He died in 1750. His son, William, was the first minister at Alexandria, Va., and died in early life.

Thornton, Hon. James D., son of William M. and Elizabeth (Anderson) Thornton, was born in Cumberland county, State of Virginia, on the 18th of

HON. JAMES D. THORNTON.

January, 1823; was educated at the University of Virginia; graduating at five of the schools of the Academic Department in that Institution, he finished his course of study there in July, 1841. Mr. Thornton was admitted to the Bar in the State of Alabama about December, 1848, and came to California in June, 1851. He was present in the first prayer-meeting ever held in the Calvary Presbyterian Church, in San Francisco, and was elected elder in said Church about May, 1857. He is now an elder in St. John's Presbyterian Church of the same city. He was appointed Judge of the District Court of the Twenty-third Judicial District of California, in April, 1878, which position he held about two years, when he was elected to his present position as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of California for the long term of eleven years. Judge Thornton is a learned and upright judge, and a good type of the courteous, dignified Christian gentleman.

Thornton, John R., an elder in the Presbyterian Church, of Paris, Ky., thirty-five years; was born in Cardine county, Va., November 4th, 1786; died December 4th, 1873, aged eighty-seven years. He moved, with his father, Col. Anthony Thornton, to Kentucky, in 1808, and studied law with Judges Nicholas and Benjamin Mills. He was ordained an elder in Paris Presbyterian Church, 1838, and retained the office till his death. He was the oldest member of the Bar in the county at the time of his death. He represented his county in the Legislature for one year, and in the Senate for eight years. He was a personal friend of Henry Clay and the leader of the Whig party in his county for many years. He was a gentleman of the old school, very courteous and genial with his friends, and affable towards all with whom he had intercourse. He often represented his Presbytery in the General Assembly of the Church, and his counsel was always wise, yet conservative.

Thornwell, James H., D.D., was born in Marlborough District, S. C., December 9th, 1812. He entered the Junior class in South Carolina College, January 4th, 1830, and graduated the following year, with the highest honors. He was licensed by Bethel Presbytery, and in 1834 was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Lancaster Court House, and soon after the churches of Waxhaws and Six Mile were added to his charge, preaching to them as stated supply. This relation existed until 1837, when he was elected to the Professorship of Logic, Belle-Lettres and Criticism, to which Metaphysics was soon added.

After performing the duties of Professor two years, he was called to the Presbyterian Church at Columbia, S. C., as pastor, which he accepted and was installed January 1st, 1840, by Charleston Presbytery. At the end of this year he was again elected to a Professorship in South Carolina College, that of Sacred Literature and Evidences of Christianity. During the year 1841, owing to failure of health, he visited Europe, and on his return, entered with vigor upon his duties. He remained in this Professorship ten years, when he accepted a call as pastor of Glebe Street Church, Charleston, S. C. This relation existed but a few months, when he accepted the Presidency of South Carolina College, and returned to Columbia, S. C. He entered upon his duties January, 1852, and remained in this position until the Autumn of 1854, when he was elected Professor of Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. Soon after entering upon his duties as Professor in the Seminary, he became pastor of the Church in Columbia, and thus he continued to labor until his death.

Dr. Thornwell was a man of marked ability and great influence. Samuel Henry Dickson, M. D., Professor in the Jefferson Medical College, and a life-long friend, says of him: "Take him for all in all, we shall seldom see his equal. As a pastor, kind, affectionate and worthy of all reliance; as a pulpit orator, a model of glowing zeal and fervid eloquence; as a teacher, gifted with peculiar ability in the communication of knowledge, unexcelled in disciplinary prudence, exemplary in personal conduct and demeanor, humble and indefatigable in his search after truth, and utterly fearless in announcing and maintaining it. Such was the character of Dr. Thornwell, and such his life, useful and happy in a degree almost unexampled. His early death was indeed a severe infliction, a public calamity darkly overshadowing a large circle of loving friends and a community whose profound sorrow under the bereavement is mingled with grateful and reverential remembrance."

Timber Ridge Church, Virginia. Rockbridge county, Va., received her first white inhabitants in 1737. In the Fall of that year Ephraim McDowell and his wife, both advanced in years, with their sons James and John and daughter Mary, and her husband, James Greenlee, on their way from Pennsylvania, the landing-place of emigrants from the British Dominions, to Beverly's Manor, encamped on Linvel's Creek for the night. An enterprising man named Benjamin Burden, from New Jersey, but then a resident of Frederick county, Va., presented himself at their encampment, and asking permission to pass the night in their company, was cheerfully made partaker of their food and fire. During the evening he informed the family that the Governor had promised him a grant of 100,000 acres, on the head waters of the James river, as soon as he would locate a hundred settlers. In the course of the conversation, he learned that John McDowell had surveying instruments with him, and could use them, and he proposed that Mr. McDowell should go with him and assist in laying off his tract, offering him, for his services, a thousand acres, at his choice, for himself, and two hundred acres each, for his father and brother and brother-in-law, for which he would make them a title as soon as the Governor gave him his patent, which would be when a hundred cabins were erected. The next day Burden and McDowell went to the house of Col. John Lewis, on Lewis Creek, near where Staunton now stands, and there the bargain was properly ratified. From Mr. Lewis' they went up the valley till they came to North river, a tributary of the James, which they mistook for the main river, and at the forks commenced running a line to lay off the proposed tract. McDowell chose for his residence the place now called the Red House; the members of the family were located around, and cabins were built. The neighborhood was called Timber Ridge, from a circumstance which guided the location. This part of the valley, like that near the Potomac, was mostly destitute of trees, and covered with tall grass and pea-vines. The forest trees on this ridge guided these pioneers in their choice and in the name. Burden succeeded in procuring the erection of ninety-two cabins in two years, and received his patent from the Governor, bearing date November 8th, 1739.

The first church building on Timber Ridge was of wood, and stood about three miles north of the present stone building, and less than a mile south of the Red House, on the west side of the road, near an old burying-ground in the woods, where there are now seen many graves and a few monuments. In the division which took place in the Presbyterian Church, in the years 1741-5, this congregation sympathized with the New Side, and were supplied with missionaries from the Presbyteries of New Castle, New Brunswick and New York. In 1748 they, in conjunction with the people of Forks of James, made out a call for the ministerial services of William Dean, of New Castle Presbytery. The race of this warm and ardent preacher was soon brought to a close. His death occurred soon after this call. In 1753 this congregation united with New Providence in presenting a call to Mr. John Brown, a graduate of Nassau Hall, Princeton, in 1749, and a licentiate of New Castle Presbytery. He had visited the frontiers and was willing to cast his lot among them. The paper containing his call has been preserved by his descendants in Kentucky. The amount of salary promised by the commissioners who presented the call to Presbytery is not known. Mr. Brown's residence was about a quarter of a mile from the north end of the village of Fairfield, in the direction of New Providence, a very convenient position for his extensive charge. The elders in Timber Ridge in his time were William McChung, Archibald Alexander, Daniel Lyle, John Lyle, John McKay, Alexander McClellan, and John Davidson. In New Providence, John Houston, Samuel Houston, James Wilson, Andrew Steel and John Robinson.

Before the time of Mr. Brown, there was a classical school at New Providence, and Mr. Robert Alexander taught in the bounds of Timber Ridge the first classical school in the Valley. Mr. Brown kept up a flourishing "grammar school" near his residence. In 1774 the Presbytery of Hanover adopted the school, and appointed William Graham teacher, under the care of Mr. Brown. In 1777 the school was removed to Timber Ridge. From thence it was removed to the neighborhood of Lexington. For a series of years its history is inwoven with the life of William Graham. It is now Washington College. In October, 1767, Mr. Brown resigned the ministerial charge of Timber Ridge congregation and confined his labors to New Providence the latter years of his residence in Virginia.

After the Academy became established at Lexington, and that village grew in importance and was supplied with regular preaching, Timber Ridge was greatly curtailed on that side, and by a similar increase of Fairfield it was lessened on the other side. But there has ever been, under the variety of pastors and supplies since the time of Mr. Graham, a congregation of great worth assembling in the stone church now giving evident signs of age. The associations with the house, and the very rocks around, remain vividly in the hearts of those accustomed in youth to assemble here on the Lord's Day. Governor McDowell, of Virginia, passed this meeting-house always with reverence, often with tears, and when he came in sight of the great rock, the landing place of his father and mother and himself when a child, on the Sabbath day, he was often known to have raised his hat, with a burst of emotion.

In 1796, Mr. Brown, weighed down with the intimacies of age, resigned his charge of New Providence, welcomed Mr. Samuel Brown as successor in influence and usefulness, and removed to Kentucky. The inscription over his grave in Frankfort is—

"The tomb of the Rev. John Brown, who, after graduating at Nassau Hall, devoted himself to the ministry, and settled at New Providence, Rockbridge county, Virginia. At that place he was stated pastor forty-four years. In the decline of life he removed to this country, to spend the feeble remainder of his days with his children. He died in the seventy-fifth year of his age, A. D. 1803."

Tinkling Spring Church, Augusta County, Virginia. About six miles from Waynesborough, and six from the "City of Asylums" (Staunton), upon a hillside, half concealed by forest trees, and a short distance from the road from the Gap to Staunton, is the house of worship of the Tinkling Spring congregation. To this hill and sweetly flowing spring come in crowds, on the Sabbath, the young men and maidens with the old men and matrons—the place where their great-grandfathers, emigrating from the Presbyterian country in the North of Ireland, with their families, their politics and their religion, came regularly for the services of the sanctuary. There, in a log building finished off by the widow of John

Preston, "the shipmaster of Dublin," John Craig, the first settled Presbyterian minister in Virginia after the days of Makemie, preached the gospel for twenty-four years. The southern part of the congregation of the "Triple Forks of the Shenandoah," which formerly stretched across the valley from Rockfish Gap to the Ridge, in the western horizon, had some difficulty in deciding on the place for their church building, and for a short time worshipped in different parts, at stands or tents. At length the larger portion of this southern section chose this hill, on account of its central position, and the refreshing spring that gushed forth with a peculiar sound—and took the name of Tinkling Spring. (See Opequon Church, Stone Church.)

In the various Indian wars and in the Revolution, this congregation showed its patriotism, and sent forth fathers and sons to meet the enemy in battle. Some of the leading military men in the expedition against the Indians were from this congregation. When a call was made for militia to aid General Greene against Cornwallis, Tinkling Spring sent her sons. Mr. Waddell, their minister, addressed to the soldiers at Midway, in the southern part of the congregation, the parting sermon. In the battle at Guilford Court House, these men were found in the hottest of the fight. Some were among the slain. Some brought away deep wounds from sabre cuts, and bore the scars through a long life, protracted in some cases to more than fourscore years.

The graveyard of Tinkling Spring congregation is to the west of the church, surrounded by a stone wall, in shape of a section of a horse-shoe, divided at the toe. Here is a white marble slab to the memory of the third minister, the Rev. John McCue. Mr. Craig, the first pastor, lies in the graveyard of Augusta Church. Mr. Waddell, in Louisa, under an apple tree, in a place chosen by himself, near where the counties of Orange, Albemarle and Louisa meet. Mr. McCue was suddenly removed, September 20th, 1818, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. His congregation assembled for worship on Sabbath morning. His family preceded him a little on their way to the house of God. After a time a messenger informed the gathered people that his lifeless corpse had been found near his own gate. Whether he had fallen from paralysis, or the restiveness of his horse, can never be known. His ministry extended over twenty-seven years. Another marble slab covers the fourth minister, the Rev. James C. Willson, who, having served this church twenty-one years, was suddenly called away on the 10th of January, 1840. He had devoted that day to praying for and writing to an absent son, whom he had hoped to see engaged in the ministry of the gospel. Stepping into the post-office in apparently usual health, he sat down and gasped, and never moved again. Neither Mr. McCue nor Mr. Willson sustained the pastoral relation.

* The descendants of "John Preston, the shipmaster of Dublin," consisting of large numbers of his own name, and of the McDowells, Breckinridges, Cabells and others, scattered over the valley of Virginia, South Carolina, Kentucky and Missouri, about thirty years since, under the efforts of Governor James McDowell, combined in erecting to his memory a beautiful shaft, in a central part of the old burying ground of Tinkling Spring.

The southwestern end of the graveyard, which is full of mounds, but without a single inscription, is the resting-place of the ashes of the ancestors of many of the families in Virginia and Kentucky, men whose names are woven by their descendants in the web of political and religious courts, in colors too vivid to be unnoticed or mistaken. These are the sepulchres of men that turned the wilderness into habitations, and after assembling on that hillside to worship the God of their fathers, are gathered there to wait the coming of the Son of God, when the graves shall give up their dead.

Some dissatisfaction having arisen in the congregation, on account of the efforts of Mr. Craig's delegates to obtain by law arrears of salary due him as pastor, the people persistently declined forming any pastoral relation with any succeeding minister till 1810. After the death of Mr. Willson, the church called Rev. B. M. Smith, then pastor of the church in Danville, Va., who accepted the call, and was installed in the early part of the following Winter. He continued in this service till November, 1845, when he was called to Staunton. Heretofore Waynesboro, a village in the eastern part of the congregation, which constituted part of the charge known as "Tinkling Spring and Waynesboro," with about one-third of the whole charge, became the centre of the Waynesboro Church, as a separate charge. Over this church the Rev. William T. Richardson was called and settled as pastor, in 1846. He was succeeded by Rev. S. J. Baird, D. D., after a pastorate of nearly twenty years. Dr. Baird's successor is Rev. Frank McCutchan, by whose judicious effort was built one of the most tasteful churches in the Valley. He is still the pastor. Of the "Tinkling Spring" part, Rev. R. L. Dabney became pastor in 1847, and on his translation, in 1853, to a professorship in Union Theological Seminary, was succeeded by Rev. C. S. M. Lee, after a few years of vacancy and supplies. Mr. Lee resigned and went West some five or six years since, and was succeeded by Rev. Dr. G. B. Strickler, who has recently accepted a call to Atlanta, Ga., and the Church is vacant.

Todd, Rev. John, is said to have been a weaver before he entered Princeton College, where he graduated in 1749. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, November 13th, 1750, immediately after his licensure he went to Virginia, and became an assistant to the Rev. Samuel Davies, in Providence Church. After the removal of Mr. Davies to Princeton, Mr. Todd became the leading Presbyterian preacher in that region. During the Revolution he was a staunch Whig. While pastor in Virginia he taught a classical school, and the Rev. James Waddel, who was at time reading divinity with Mr. Davies, assisted him in teaching. He died July 27th, 1793.

Tokens, Tesseræ or Tickets. were written testimonials to character, much in use in the Primitive Church. By means of letters, and of brethren who traveled about, even the most remote churches of the Roman Empire were connected together. When a Christian arrived in a strange town, he first inquired for the church, and he was there received as a brother, and provided with everything needful for his spiritual or corporeal sustenance. But since deceivers, spies with evil intentions, and false teachers, abuse the confidence and the kindness of Christians, some measure of precaution became necessary, in order to avert the many injuries which might result from this conduct. An arrangement was therefore introduced, that only such traveling Christians should be received as brethren into churches where they were strangers, as could produce a testimonial from the minister of the church from which they came.

Tongues, Confusion of. The different nations of the world are at the present day yet more separated by the diversity of their speech than they are by geographical distance and position. There is a natural tendency in tongues to diverge. The habits, the wants, the productions of one people vary from those of another, and therefore words and phrases are needed and will be formed by the one which, as unnecessary, are never even conceived by the other. Thus we see continually new words establishing themselves in our own language, keeping pace with the progress of invention; photograph, telegram, are familiar examples. Again, if there is a commingling of different tribes, there will be in course of time a tongue compounded of the dialects they severally spoke. Thus of modern English, the Roman, Saxon and Norman ingredients may yet be distinguished.

Seeing that there is such a variety of languages in the world, it is a question whether they have been produced in the ways just indicated, or whether at any period there was a more sudden development of change. Those best qualified to form a judgment agree in reducing the almost innumerable existing dialects to a very small number of families. Scholars have abundantly demonstrated that, excluding certain American and African languages, the rest might be arranged in three families, called, as Max Müller and many other philologists denominate them, the Semitic, the Arian and the Turanian families. Dr. Bunsen is very nearly of the same mind, and deduces tongues from the Semitic, the Iranian and the Turanian stocks. Moreover, he thinks that there are mutual material affinities perceptible, which seem to imply a common descent. And there are indications, too, that American and African tongues, not formally ranked under the three great families, exhibit types not altogether dissimilar, which point to one or other of them as a source. The examination, therefore, of the existing phenomena of language undoubtedly corroborate the Scripture assertion that for some time after the deluge "the whole earth was of one language and of one speech" (Gen. xi, 1).

Many philologists, however, maintain that for the developments and diversities now existing a vast succession of ages—far more than the Scripture chronology allows—must have elapsed. To meet this acknowledged difficulty the Scripture alleges the supernatural interference of God (Gen. xi, 3-9). Those who object to miraculous intervention at all, of course, cavil at the statement. They must be replied to on the broad ground of principle (see Miracul.). But such as see nothing incongruous in God's moral government of the world He has formed, and who deem the Scripture credible when it relates supernatural equally with ordinary events, will acknowledge the harmony of the inspired record with the results of investigation—one original tongue, an impulse of change by the divine touch, the natural ramifications of that change in the vast variety of existing tongues. And that there was time for these so far to diverge as they have done from the stock to which they belong is proved by the fact that in modern times, in our own days, a new dialect is known to establish itself in the course of a few years, or sometimes even months.

The matter is well discussed by Duns, in his "Bibl. Nat. Science," vol. 1, pp. 280-291; and his conclusions are: "1st, that human language was originally the direct gift of God to man; 2d, that at Babel He showed His sovereignty over His own gift in interfering with it, that it might subserve His purposes after the flood as it had done before; 3d, that language was originally one; and 4th, as a sound and legitimate deduction from this, that the human race was from the beginning one." Kalisch agrees so far as to say that "the linguistic researches of modern times have more and more confirmed the theory of one primitive Asiatic language, gradually developed into the various modifications by external agencies and influences."

It was God's purpose, when the families of Noah's descendants multiplied, that they should overspread the earth; and, according to an old tradition, Noah was to command their migration and to divide, as it were, the world among them. But they did not choose to so separate. In the plain of Shinar, multitudes of them resolved to settle, and to establish there a proud sovereignty. Nothing was better fitted to disappoint their plans than to confound their speech; they were compelled to leave unfinished the vast tower they had commenced, around which Babylon afterwards clustered, and to go forth apart, dwelling, according to their generations, in the various regions of the globe. The ruin now called Birs Nimrud has been supposed to be the remnant of the mighty tower commenced in the plain of Shinar. It may occupy the same site; but the existing fragments are of a less ancient building, one, it would seem, erected or completed by Nebuchadnezzar. It may be added that a cuneiform inscription by this king at Borsippa, where the tower stood, has been interpreted by Dr. Oppert. It comprises a notice of the confusion of tongues: "Since a remote time people had abandoned it, without order expressing their words."

It is well to observe that we must not class the three families of languages according to the three sons of Noah; those of Hamitic descent are sometimes found using what are called Semitic tongues. But to discuss this part of the subject is impossible in the present work. It must suffice to say that the confusion at Babel did not regard tribes as such; for it cannot be satisfactorily shown that the Semitic families received one form of speech, the Japhetic another, the Hamitic a third.

Torrence, Joseph William, D. D., the ninth child of Joseph and Mary (McCreary) Torrence, was born July 21st, 1831. His grandfather, Samuel Torrence, was an elder in the Dunlap's Creek Church, Presbytery of Redstone, between the years 1780 and 1800. His parents were both brought up under the pastorate of Dr. Jacob Jennings, in that church. Having graduated at Ohio Central College, at Iberia, Ohio, June, 1858, and having completed the study of theology at the same place, under the instruction of Rev. George Gordon, its president, he was licensed to preach the same year, by the Presbytery of Central Ohio, of the Free Presbyterian Church. He was pastor of the Free Presbyterian churches of Mercer and Harrisville, Pa., from 1858 to 1864, and at Clarksville, Mercer county, Pa., from 1864 to 1868. In 1867 he and his church were received by the Presbytery of Beaver (O. S.). He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Frankfort, Ind., from 1868 to 1872; supply of the Church at Covington, Ind., in 1872-3; pastor of the churches of Waveland and Bethany, Ind., from 1873 to 1879; and of the Third Presbyterian Church of Toledo, from 1879 to the present time.

Dr. Torrence is an earnest, straightforward preacher. He makes free use of the Scriptures in his sermons. Having a ready command of language, while making careful preparation, he usually preaches without a manuscript. He is a faithful pastor and a successful worker in the Master's Vineyard.

Torrey, David, D. D., was born at Bethany, Pa., November 13th, 1818. He graduated in Amherst College in 1843, the valedictorian of his class. He studied theology at Andover Seminary and Union Seminary (N. Y.), graduating at the latter in 1846. He then was Tutor at Amherst College for a year, and directly after this opened and conducted for two years a private grammar school. He accepted, in December, 1849, a call to the Presbyterian Church in Delhi, N. Y., where he was the greatly beloved and honored pastor for ten and a half years. After a successful pastorate of five years in the First Presbyterian Church, Ithaca, N. Y., he accepted a call to the Church of Ann Arbor, which he served for a short time. After an absence abroad for more than a year, for health's sake, he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church of Cazenovia, N. Y., where he remained until ill health again compelled his resignation, in 1881.

In personal bearing Dr. Torrey is at once genial and dignified, loving the things which make for peace, and yet always fearless in maintaining principle. In intercourse with his parishioners he knew how to be affable without any trace of obsequiousness, and was revered by them as a wise counsellor and a true and sympathizing friend. He has always manifested a peculiar interest in young men, and obtained a great hold upon them in each of his parishes. His preaching is thoughtful without being abstruse, able without being ambitious, and scholarly without being pedantic. Each of his parishes has parted with him with great reluctance, and he maintains the warmest place in the affections of them all.

Torrey, Stephen, ruling elder and licensed preacher, was born at Bethany, Pa., in November, 1808, when the surrounding region, known as the "Beech Woods," was mostly a heavily-timbered wilderness. When he was only eight years old he was accustomed to find his way for miles through the woods, alone, on horseback, to carry messages and bags of bread and pork to parties of workmen or surveyors that were under the care of his father.

He became a Sunday-school teacher almost as soon as there were any Sunday schools, about 1820, and from that time his religious activity was constant, as was also his business diligence.

During about forty years of his active life, Mr. Torrey constantly had a "Parish" a few miles out from his home, to which he went on Sundays, after the morning service, and held a Sunday school in the afternoon and a neighborhood meeting in the evening, and where he visited families as often as practicable during the week. Within the range of two or three of these parishes permanent Presbyterian churches have been established, and from the harvests which he has reaped from these obscure fields, the "good seed," which consists of "the children of the kingdom," has been scattered all over the land. Thus he illustrated the aggressive power of the elder's office, and also its educating power, by becoming so capable a teacher and lay preacher, that when he was more than sixty years old his Presbytery (Lackawanna) took him away from his business and made him Presbyterian missionary for a large territory, covering the Eastern coal region of Pennsylvania, in which work he is still (1884) fruitfully engaged, at the age of seventy-five years.

Tracy, Rev. Charles Chapin, was born in East Smithfield, Pa., October 31st, 1838; graduated at Williams College in 1861, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1867, and was ordained July 7th, 1867. On August 24th of that year he set sail as a missionary for Turkey, in Asia. He labored at Marsovan, in seminary and station work, between two and three years. His wife's health becoming impaired, he took her to the capital for treatment, where he was located after her recovery for three years. Soon after his settlement there he was instrumental in establishing the first illustrated children's paper ever published in the Empire. This little pictorial he had the charge of near three years, printing it in Armenian, Armeno-Turkish and Græco-Turkish. During the same time he was writing, for two years, "Letters to Oriental Families," published in the Evangelical Weekly, and afterwards in book form.

When the needs of the Theological Seminary required it, Mr. Tracy returned to Marsovan, in 1872. There, during the following three years, in which he taught in the Seminary, he also preached, wrote a Commentary on Hebrews, also on Daniel, and translated Butler's Analogy for his class. In 1875 he made a visit to his native country, for rest, after which he returned to his work, reaching Marsovan on the eleventh anniversary of his first arrival there. His devotion to the missionary work is now much deeper than ever. His heart is much in the establishment of "The College of Anatolia," all the more because the Jesuits are on hand, struggling too successfully to supplant the Protestant missionaries in education. In reporting himself to his theological class record, he says, "I'm writing for one weekly paper a series of articles entitled 'Be a Man,' and addressed to the young men of the East, attempting to be a mental and moral tonic to the limp spirit of Turkdom."

Tracy, William, D. D., was born in Norwich, Conn., June 2d, 1807. He was a student in Williams College nearly three years, and a member of the class which graduated in 1833, but as he left before it graduated, his name does not appear among the graduates of the college. After leaving college, he taught about one year at Lexington, Ky., and then spent about a year at Andover Seminary, and between one and two years at Princeton Seminary. He was licensed to preach by the (Assembly's) Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 8th, 1835, and was ordained by the same body, April 12th, 1836, as an evangelist.

Having devoted himself to the Foreign Missionary work, he sailed for India November 23d, 1836, and after spending some months in Madras, reached the Madura district, which was to be his field of labor, October 9th, 1837. He soon after took up his residence at Tirumangalam, where he commenced his labors. Here he established a boarding school, which afterwards grew into the high grade Seminary of Pasmalal, having fifty pupils. Here he spent the next twenty-two years of his life, except a period between 1850 and 1851, when he was absent on a visit to the United States. More than two hundred and fifty young men passed through the course of study in this school while it was under his administration, nearly all of whom became professed Christians, and afterwards held positions of usefulness and honor. He prepared many text-books in theology and Bible study, and gave important aid in revising the Tamil Bible. After a second visit to America, in 1870, he lived and labored at Tirupuvanam. On November 8th, 1877, he and Mrs. Tracy welcomed their youngest son, the Rev. James Tracy, and his wife, from the United States, as missionaries to share their labors and their home. But now the aged missionary's work was done. He died November 28th, 1877, in the seventy-first year of his age and the forty-first of his missionary service. He was conscious to the end, and his mind was at peace.

Dr. Tracy was a man of active mind, keen wit and cheerful disposition. He was gifted with great penetration, prudence, practical good sense and kindly manners, and he was greatly beloved by both the old and the young.

Traditions. The traditions of men cannot be allowed to supplement Scripture as a rule of faith, because the Scriptures, while undertaking to lead men to a saving knowledge of God, never once ascribe authority to any such a supplementary rule. Traditions have been a fertile source of corruption in religion, both among Jews and Christians. The Jews pretended that besides what Moses committed to writing, he received from God a variety of revelations, which he communicated verbally to Aaron, and which were orally transmitted from generation to generation. These traditions multiplied exceedingly, especially after the spirit of prophecy was withdrawn from the Church; and when Christ appeared on earth He found the Jews so far degenerated, that their religion consisted almost entirely in the observance of such traditions. Hence we find Him declaring, "Ye have made the commandment of God of none effect by your tradition." "In vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men" (Matt. xv, 6, 9). In the same way have a multitude of the corruptions in the doctrine and worship of the Romish Church sprung up. They, after the example of the Jews, pretend that Christ and His apostles delivered many things which are not found in the Scriptures, and which have come down to us by tradition. But how can it be shown that those articles of religion or institutions of worship, which they say have come down by tradition, were really received from the mouth of Christ or from the teaching of His apostles? Or, supposing that they were derived from this source, how can it be ascertained that they have been conveyed down to us without alteration or corruption? The fact is, many of these traditions which are called apostolic can be traced to their commencement at a period much later than that of the apostles. To admit unwritten traditions would open a door for all the innovations and corruptions which the fancies of men may devise, and would make void the Law of God. But as our Lord strongly condemned the Jewish traditions, so we justly reject the mass of tradition received by the Romish Church.

Transfiguration of Christ. This very remarkable occurrence in our Lord's life is recorded by three of the Evangelists (Matt. xvii, Mark ix, Luke ix). The substance of what we learn from their accounts is, that upon a certain occasion Jesus took Peter, James and John into a high mountain, apart from all other society, and that He was there transfigured before them, His face shining as the sun, and His raiment white as the light; that moreover there appeared unto them Moses and Elias conversing with Him; and that while they spake together on the subject of His death, which was soon afterward to take place at Jerusalem, a bright cloud overshadowed them, and a voice out of the cloud proclaimed, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." The Apostle Peter, adverting to this memorable occurrence, says, "We have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount" (2 Peter, i, 16-18). This event is to be considered: 1. As a solemn confirmation of the prophetic office of Christ. 2. As designed to support the faith of the disciples, which was to be deeply tried by His approaching humiliation; and to afford consolation to the human nature of our Lord Himself, by giving Him a foretaste of "the joy set before him." 3. As an emblem of humanity glorified at the resurrection. 4. As declaring Christ to be superior to Moses and Elias, the giver and the restorer of the law. 5. As an evidence to the disciples of the existence of a separate state, in which good men consciously enjoy the felicity of heaven. 6. As a proof that the bodies of good men shall be so refined and changed, as, like Elias, to live in a state of immortality, and in the presence of God. 7. As exhibiting the sympathy which exists between the Church in heaven and the Church on earth, and the instruction which the former receives from the events which take place in the latter: Moses and Elias conversed with our Lord on His approaching death, doubtless to receive, not to convey information. 8. As maintaining the grand distinction, the infinite difference, between Christ and all other prophets; He is "THE SON." "This is my beloved Son, hear him." It has been observed, with much truth, that the condition in which Jesus Christ appeared among men, humble, weak, poor and despised, was a true and continual transfiguration; whereas the transfiguration itself, in which He showed Himself in the real splendor of His glory, was His true and natural condition.

Travelli, Rev. Joseph S., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 21st, 1809. After spending some time at the Abingdon Academy, under the care of the Rev. Robert Steel, he took charge of Blackberry Academy, Harford county, Md. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1833, and studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary. He was married to Miss Susan Irwin, of Allegheny, Pa., March 31st, 1836. In July of that year he sailed from Boston, with his wife, as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., to Singapore, in the East Indies, as a missionary to the Malays. He was placed in special charge of the Missionary Boarding School, which was started about the latter part of the year 1836, with some thirteen or fourteen pupils. In three years the number increased to nearly sixty. In 1840 Mrs. Travelli's impaired health required her return to the United States. Mr. Travelli was obliged, in about eight months, and for the same reason, to return also. Both subsequently desired to resume their mission work, but under the advice of many friends they finally decided not to risk a climate which had proved so disastrous.

In 1842 Mr. Travelli reorganized the Sewickley Academy, near Pittsburg, and continued it in successful operation for nearly twenty-five years. In 1865 or 1866, he became the General Agent of the Freedmen's Aid Commission of Western Pennsylvania, E. Ohio, and W. Virginia, and rendered it valuable service. He was for some ten years teacher in the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, closing his useful work there in July, 1883. Mr. Travelli still resides at Sewickley. He is a gentleman of good attainments, winning address, obliging and benevolent spirit, and rejoices in every opportunity for doing good. He is faithful to duty, and highly esteemed by his brethren in the ministry, and by the community in which he lives.

Travis, Rev. Mordecai Moore, was born October 23d, 1827, in Columbiana county, Ohio. He graduated at Jefferson College, and at the Western Theological Seminary, in 1859. His first field of labor was a missionary one, consisting of a group of churches in Athens and Hocking counties, O. Here he remained about three years, during the last of which he was Superintendent of the Public Schools of Athens. In 1862, he removed into the boundaries of the Presbytery of Zanesville, and remained till 1868, engaged in teaching and superintending the schools in Newark and preaching to the Church at Brownsville, Muskingum county. In 1869 he became pastor of the Church at Chenoa, Ill., where he has been for about fourteen years. Mr. Travis, throughout his life, has been faithful in the discharge of his ministerial duties. He shuns not to declare the whole counsel of God. He enjoys the confidence and affection of the people among whom he now labors.

Treat, Rev. Joseph, graduated at Princeton College in 1757, and acted as Tutor for two years after his graduation. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, in 1760. In October, 1762, he was installed as colleague of Rev. Dr. Postwick, in the First Presbyterian Church, New York city. When the Revolutionary War began, the congregation was scattered, and all the ministers left the city. Mr. Treat never returned, but supplied the churches of Lower Bethlehem and Greenwich, in Sussex county, N. J., until his death, in 1797.

Treat, Rev. Richard, born at Milford, Conn., September 25th, 1708; graduated at Yale in 1725, and was installed, by Philadelphia Presbytery, pastor of the church at Abingdon, Pa., December 30th, 1731. In 1739, while hearing Whitefield preach, he was convinced of his formal state, and became deeply exercised in regard to his personal salvation. In consequence of a division in the congregation at Abingdon he resigned the charge, about 1742. The Presbyterians at Milford, Conn., made out a call for him, August 10th, 1743, but the Presbytery advised him not to accept it. He published his sermon, preached in 1747, at the ordination of Lawrence, in the Forks of Delaware, and on the death of President Finley. He labored to the close of his days, having preached on "the West Branch of the Forks" (Allen township) shortly before his decease. He died, November 20th, 1778, being revered as a peacemaker and a man full of good works.

Trinity. This word does not occur in Scripture; it has been devised by theologians to express that which the Scripture plainly teaches, that in the unity of the Godhead there are three persons; that in the mode of His subsistence the Divine being is, in some way incomprehensible to us, three and yet one.

There are many passages in the Old Testament which prove a plurality of persons in the Godhead; such as those passages in which one divine person is introduced as speaking of or to another. To these we can only refer. Gen. i, 26; iii, 22; xi, 7; Ps. xlv, 6, 7; ex, 1; Isa. vi, 8. All these texts plainly point out a plurality of persons in the Godhead. But it is evident from Scripture, not only that there is a plurality, but also that there is a Trinity, or only three persons, in the Godhead. This is plain from Isa. lxi, 1, where our Divine Redeemer thus speaks: "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me," etc. Here one divine person is the speaker; he speaks of another divine person, whom he styles the Spirit; and of a third divine person, whom he calls the Lord God. The work of creation is ascribed to the agency of three distinct persons (Is. xxxiii, 6): "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." Here three are distinctly pointed out, the Father, the Word, or the Son of God, and the Breath of his mouth, which can be no other than the Holy Spirit. But in the New Testament this doctrine is still more explicitly revealed. In the history of our Lord's baptism we have a plain intimation of the mystery of the Trinity (Matt. iii, 16, 17). The Father, by an audible voice from heaven, bears testimony to the incarnate Redeemer; the Son, in human nature, is baptized by John; and the Holy Spirit descends upon Him in a visible manner. Hence the primitive Christians used to say to any who doubted the truth of this doctrine, "Go to Jordan, and there you will see the Trinity." Plainer still is this truth from the form of words appointed to be used in Christian baptism: "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. xxviii, 19). To baptize in the name of one, is to baptize by His authority and dedicate to His service. This is competent only to a divine person. Now, if the Father, in whose name we are baptized, be a person, so must the Son and the Holy Ghost, for we are baptized in their name, as well as in the name of the Father. The apostolical benediction furnishes another proof of a Trinity; "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all" (2 Cor. xiii, 14). "This is evidently a prayer, which it would be impiety and idolatry to address to any other but God. Yet three persons are distinctly addressed, and consequently are recognized as possessed of divine perfections; as knowing our wants, and hearing our requests, and able to do what we ask; as the fountain of all the blessedness implied in the terms, grace, love and communion." We have a most explicit testimony to this doctrine (1 John v. 7). "There are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." The genuineness of this text has been much disputed, but the truth of the doctrine does not rest on a single text, as has been already shown.

In a book compiled by ordinary men, some attempt would probably have been made to explain the mystery of the Trinity, at all events to define the terms of the doctrine. Scripture makes none. For human language is inadequate to such a task, or even if language were not inadequate, the human understanding could not have grasped the full knowledge of a theme so high. But it by no means follows that we are to reject a thing as fact because it is above our comprehension. Continually, in ordinary life, we admit that to be true which we cannot explain. It is to the fact, then, as Scripture teaches, that we must look. And as a fact, the Scripture reveals the doctrine of the Trinity in two ways, first in passages (some of which have been noticed) in which the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are mentioned together as God, and secondly, in passages, too numerous for mention here, which speak of each as divine.

The doctrine of the Trinity is not a matter of mere speculative interest. It essentially affects our views of God as the object of our worship, whether we regard Him as one in essence, and one in person, or admit that in the unity of this Godhead there are three equally Divine persons. These are two very different conceptions. Both cannot be true. The God of those who deny the Trinity is not the God of those who worship the Trinity in Unity, nor on the contrary; so that one or the other worships what is "nothing in the world," and, for any reality in the object of worship, might as well worship a pagan idol, which also, says St. Paul, "is nothing in the world." If God be Father, Son and Holy Ghost, the duties owing to God will be duties owing to that triune distinction, which must be paid accordingly; and whoever leaves any of them out of his idea of God, comes so far short of honoring God perfectly, and of serving Him in proportion to the manifestations He has made of Himself.

As the object of our worship is affected by our respective views on this great subject, so also is its character. We are between the extremes of pure and acceptable devotion and of gross and offensive idolatry, and must run to one or the other. If the doctrine of the Trinity be true, then those who deny it do not worship the God of the Scriptures, but a fiction of their own framing; if it be false, the Trinitarian, by paying divine honors to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, is equally guilty of idolatry, though in another mode.

Trouillard, Laurent Philip, a French Reformed or Huguenot minister, associated with Prioleau as pastor of the French Protestant Church of Charleston, S. C. He was the son of Pierre Trouillard, pastor at Sedan, and afterward at La Ferté-on-Vidame, where the son was born. He left Charleston in 1699, and became pastor of the French refugees settled on the western branch of Cooper river, where he died in 1711.

Trunkey, Hon. John, LL.D., is a Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church of Franklin, Pa. In these offices he does honor alike to Church and State. Judge Trunkey was born October 26th, 1828, and spent his early life on the farm that was cleared up by his father. His education was commenced in the common school of the county, and carried forward through private schools and the academy until he was prepared to commence the active preparation for the profession he had chosen for his life-work. Having studied law in the office of the Hon. Samuel Griffith, he was admitted to the Bar of Mercer county in 1851, and commenced practice as the partner of his legal preceptor. He worked on diligently, and with great carefulness, mastering the details of his profession, and laying a broad foundation for the work of coming days. In the Autumn of 1866 he was elected Judge of the Twenty-eighth Judicial District of Pennsylvania, composed of the counties of Mercer and Venango, and after a service of ten years he was re-elected, in 1876. In 1877 he was elected Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, which position he holds at the present time. During his public life his residence was Mercer, until 1872, when he transferred his home to Franklin, Pa.

Judge Trunkey was elected a ruling elder in the Church of Franklin, in 1876, and served for three years most efficiently and acceptably as Superintendent of its Sabbath school. In attendance upon the courts of the Church, he has uniformly shown his interest by taking part in their discussions and in giving the advantage of his judgment and counsel in all their affairs. He has been a successful man in the various walks of life. One great reason for this has been his unvarying determination to do well everything he undertook. For everything there has been forethought and diligent preparation.

DR. JOHN TRUNKEY.

His Christian character, from the beginning, has been exemplary and earnest. In his practice as a lawyer, his course has always been consistent, dignified and faithful alike to the interests of justice and the cause of his clients. As a judge, he was impartial, patient and forbearing. Whilst never in haste in the trial of causes, he yet endeavored so to master the issue before him that business was despatched with promptness and accuracy. As a Justice of the Supreme Court, his opinions have great weight with his associates, and give general satisfaction to the country, securing him the reputation of an industrious, careful and thorough jurist.

Truth, Knowledge of, Essential to Salvation. "That in the case of sane adult persons," says Dr. A. A. Hodge, "a knowledge of Christ and a voluntary acceptance of Him is essential in order to a personal interest in His salvation is proved; 1. Paul argues this point explicitly: If men call upon the Lord they shall be saved; but in order to call upon Him they must believe, and in order to believe they must hear; and that they should hear, the gospel must be preached unto them. Thus the established order is: Salvation cometh by faith, faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the Word of God (Rom. x, 14-17; Matt. xi, 27; John xiv, 6; xvii, 3; Acts iv, 12).

"2. God has certainly revealed no purpose to save any except those who, hearing the gospel, obey, and he requires that his people, as custodians of the gospel, should be diligent in disseminating it as the appointed means of saving souls. Whatever lies beyond this circle of sanctified means is unrevealed, unpromised, uncovenanted.

"3. The heathen in mass, with no single definite and unquestionable exception on record, are evidently strangers to God, and going down to death in an unsaved condition. The presumed possibility of being saved without a knowledge of Christ remains, after eighteen hundred years, a possibility illustrated by no example."

Tully, Rev. Andrew, was born at Potoscose, Roxburghshire, Scotland, May 30th, 1812. He graduated at Lafayette College, in 1837, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1840. He was licensed by Newton Presbytery, April 29th, 1840, and ordained and installed, November 24th, 1840, pastor of Upper and Lower Mount Bethel churches, having labored in them to some extent as a supply the previous summer. Lower Mount Bethel desiring his entire services, he was released from the Upper Church, April 26th, 1842. He was released from Lower Mount Bethel Church, October 4th, 1853, after thirteen years of faithful and successful pastoral labor, and November 9th, 1853, was installed pastor of Harmony Church, in the same Presbytery. Here he remained until April 16th, 1861, when the pastoral relation was dissolved. He then supplied the Church at Morrisville, Pa., 1861-66, when he accepted a call to the Second Church of Wantage, at Beemerville, Sussex county, N. J., where he was installed September 4th, 1867, and from which he was released April 16th, 1873. His next and last charge was the Church of Upper Mount Bethel, in which he had over thirty years before begun his pastoral work, where he was installed November 2d, 1873, and labored until his Master bade him come up higher. He died April 5th, 1880, full of the peace and hope of the gospel. His last words were: "Nearer, my God, to Thee." Mr. Tully was universally respected and loved. He was a man of warm heart, of frank and genial manners, and of generous impulses. As a preacher, he was able and scriptural, exhibiting an unction which carried the truth powerfully to the hearts of his hearers. As a pastor, he was watchful, industrious, attentive, kind, sympathizing and judicious. Large gatherings in gracious revivals marked some of his pastorates.

Tully, Rev. William Kelly, eldest son of Rev. David Tully, D.D., was born in Princeton, N. Y., November 9th, 1851. He was a student at Lafayette College, 1868-9; graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1875, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Newton, N. J., June 9th, 1874. He accepted a call to the Church of Medina, N. Y., June 7th, 1875, and was installed its pastor, October 15th, 1875. Here his labors were largely blessed. Considerations of health led to the resignation of this charge, July 1st, 1877. On January 1st, 1878, he was called to the pastorate of the Ocean Street Presbyterian Church, Jacksonville, Florida, where he has since ministered. Mr. Tully is an eloquent speaker, both in the pulpit and on the platform. He is very faithful as a pastor. He has done and is doing much for the cause of Presbyterianism and Missions in the South. He is the author of a number of the "Business Men's Tracts."

Turner, Rev. Douglas Kellogg, was the fourth child of Bela and Mary (Nash) Turner, and was born in Stockbridge, Mass., December 17th, 1823. Having graduated at Yale College, in 1843, he pursued the study of theology at Andover and Yale Theological Seminaries; was licensed to preach by the Hampden East Association of Massachusetts, in 1846; taught an academy at Hartsville, Bucks county, Pa., one year and a half, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Neshaminy Presbyterian Church, of Warwick, at Hartsville, April 18th, 1848, by the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia. After a pastorate of twenty-five years he resigned his charge April 20th, 1873. He is the author of an octavo volume, "The History of Neshaminy Church," from 1726 to 1876, containing sketches of Rev. William Tennent, Sr., and his sons, "Log College," etc. In 1883 he became Corresponding Secretary and Librarian of the Presbyterian Historical Society in Philadelphia. Mr. Turner is an excellent preacher, an able writer, and held in high esteem by his brethren.

Turner, Rev. James, the son of Richard and Nancy (Johns) Turner, was born in Bedford county, Va., May 7th, 1759. His hopeful conversion took place in 1789. Soon after he began a course of public exhortation. In this way, it became known that he had a remarkable talent for public speaking, as well as uncommon zeal for the promotion of Christ's kingdom, and the Presbytery of Hanover, within whose bounds he was exercising his gifts, soon encouraged him to give himself formally to the work of the ministry. Accordingly, on October 29th, 1791, at the age of thirty-two, he was licensed by that Presbytery to preach the gospel, the full literary course required by the Presbyterian Book of Discipline not being exacted in his case, as it was judged to be one of those extraordinary cases which would justify departure from the rule. On the 28th of July, 1792, he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and installed as colleague pastor with the Rev. Mr.

Mitchel, in what was then called the Peaks congregation, but which was really three congregations with one session. He also took charge of the New London congregation. Here he spent the whole of his ministerial life. He died January 8th, 1828. In his power over men, as a preacher, Mr. Turner was acknowledged to be without a rival among the clergy of Virginia. Dr. W. S. Plumer says—"I never saw but one James Turner in the pulpit, and I do not expect ever to see another. I have never seen any man sway an audience as he did. Old and young, learned and unlearned, saint and sinner, the white man and the black man, felt and owned his power."

Tuttle, Joseph Farrand, D. D., was born at Bloomfield, N. J., March 12th, 1818. He graduated at Mar. College in 1841; studied theology at Lane Seminary, 1841-3, and was ordained in April, 1846, by Marion Presbytery. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Delaware, Ohio, 1846-7; colleague pastor, Rockaway, N. J., 1847-62; President of Wabash College, 1862-81. Dr. Tuttle is a fine scholar, an able preacher, and throughout his life has been earnest and successful in the service of the Master.

Tuttle, Rev. Moses, was born in New Haven June 25th, 1715. In 1747 he was ordained the first minister in Granville, Mass., and was dismissed in 1753. Here his short ministry was blessed with prosperity and peace. In 1756 he was a member of the New Side Presbytery of New Castle, and was then employed in Kent county, Del. On the union he was joined to the Lewes Presbytery. In 1761 he belonged to the New York Presbytery, and withdrew in 1769. He died at Southold, L. I., it is said, in April, 1771. After his release from Granville, he preached in various places, and died in peace.

Tyler, George Palmer, D. D., son of Royall and Mary (Palmer) Tyler, was born in Brattleboro, Vt., December 10th, 1809; graduated at Yale College in 1836; studied theology at Union Seminary; was licensed to preach by the Third Presbytery in 1839; ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Lowville, Lewis county, N. Y., in 1840; in 1853 accepted a call to his native village, Brattleboro, Vt., where he remained pastor for thirteen years, when he resigned and immediately took temporary charge of a church at Buckport, Me. The climate proving too severe he returned to New York, and in 1869 became pastor of the Olivet Presbyterian Church, in the village of Lansingburg, N. Y., until given up at the union of the Old and New School branches, when he took charge of the Memorial Presbyterian Church of Troy, for two years. After that the old Olivet Church was revived in a new locality, and Mr. Tyler resumed his place as pastor. Middlebury College conferred the degree of D. D., in 1865. The various churches to which he ministered lived in peace and grew in numbers. Dr. Tyler has been faithful and successful in his ministry.

U

Uhl, Rev. Erskine, was born at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., April 12th, 1811. He graduated at the University of New York, in 1830, and studied theology at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city. He was teacher at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 1863-71; Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 1872-5, and Assistant Secretary of the International Executive Committee, of the Young Men's Christian Association, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 1875-.

Umsted, Rev. Justus Thomas, was born in Chester county, Pa., January 23d, 1820. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary. His fields of labor have been: stated supply at South Bend, Ind., 1848-9; pastor at Muscatine, Iowa, 1850-53; pastor at Keokuk, 1855-8; pastor at Fagg's Manor, Pa., 1860-72; pastor at St. George's, Del., 1872-6, and pastor at Smyrna, 1877-. Mr. Umsted is a forcible and faithful preacher, and as a presbyter, diligent in the discharge of duty. The divine blessing has accompanied his ministry.

Unbelief, the refusing of assent to testimony. It is often taken for distrust of God's faithfulness, but more particularly for the discrediting of the testimony of God's Word concerning his Son (John iii, 18, 19; xvi, 9). "It includes disaffection to God, disregard to His Word, prejudices against the Redeemer, readiness to give credit to any other than Him, inordinate love to the world, and preferring of the applause of men to the approbation of God." "Unbelief," says an old and able writer, "is the greatest sin, as it is the foundation of all sin; it was Adam's first sin; it is a sin against the gospel. It strikes peculiarly at God, is the greatest reproach of Him, robs Him of His glory, is a contradiction to His will, and a contempt of His authority." The causes of unbelief are Satan, ignorance, pride and sensuality. The danger of it is great; it hardens the heart, fills with presumption, creates impatience, deceives with error, and finally exposes to condemnation (John iii, 11).

Underhill, Judge Henry B., son of Abraham and Mary (Raymond) Underhill, was born September 11th, 1821, in the city of Troy, N. Y., where his father was for many years a prominent merchant. At the age of sixteen he was received into the Presbyterian Church of that city, then under the pastoral charge of N. S. Bennan, D. D., of which church his parents were members. He was graduated at Amherst College, in 1845, and spent eight years thereafter in teaching, two years in Massachusetts and six years in Mississippi. In the Spring of 1854 he removed to California, and spent the next six years in mercantile pursuits in the city of Stockton. He then applied himself to the study of law, to which he had previously devoted his leisure time, and was admitted to the Bar in December, 1860. In 1868 he was elected County Judge of San Joaquin, Cal. At the close of his term of office, in 1868, he was employed by the Central Pacific Railroad Company as attorney, to secure the right of way for the railroads being built by said company, and by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and to attend to other real estate matters, and holds that position at the present time. He was a member of the Session of the First Presbyterian Church of Stockton for eighteen years, and for three years thereafter was an elder in Calvary Presbyterian Church of San Francisco. For a number of years past he had been eminently successful as teacher of the adult Bible class in the Sabbath school of the First Presbyterian Church of Oakland, and having removed to San Francisco, holds the same position in the Sabbath school of Calvary Presbyterian Church. Judge Underhill is one of the examples among laymen which prove that there is no conflict between culture and Christianity; that men of the most varied attainments, eminent in professional life, second to none in intellectual force, still find their highest enjoyment in the work of the Church, and even in the teaching of its time-honored doctrines in the Sabbath school. In all the enterprises of the Presbyterian Church on the Pacific Coast the counsel of Judge Underhill is sought among the first. He was one of the committee appointed to inaugurate the new college movement, and is at present a member of its Board of Trustees. A fine personal presence, rare tact and courtesy, marked ability and transparent sincerity, are the elements of Judge Underhill's great influence and popularity.

Underwood, Rev. Henry Beman, was born in Irvington, N. J., December 25th, 1839. He graduated at Williams College, in 1862, and studied theology at Union and Andover Theological Seminaries. He was ordained, January 19th, 1866, and sustained the relation of stated supply to the following churches: Ringwood, Ill., 1865-7; East Long Meadow, Mass., 1867-8; Marlborough, N. H., 1869; Baxter Springs, Kansas, 1869-70; Hillsboro' Bridge, N. H., 1871-3; Algona, Iowa, 1873-5. After a life of diligence and usefulness in the Master's service, Mr. Underwood died, September 2d, 1875.

Union, Hypostatical, is the union of the human nature of Christ with the Divine, constituting two natures in one person. Not consubstantially, as the three persons in the Godhead, nor physically, as soul and body united in one person, nor mystically, as is between Christ and believers, but so as that the manhood subsists in the second person, yet without making confusion, both making but one person. It was miraculous (Luke i, 34, 35), complete and real: Christ took a real human body and soul, and not in appearance; inseparable (Heb. vii, 25).

Union of Believers to Christ. The union of Christ's people to Him is represented as the foundation of an interest in His benefits, in passages such as the following: "Of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus." "That I may be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."

This union is also represented by the strongest expressions language can supply. It is compared to the union of a vine and its branches (John xv, 4, 5). To the union of our food with our bodies (John vi, 56, 57). To the union of the body with the head (Eph. iv, 15, 16). To the conjugal union (Eph. v, 23, 30). To the union of a king and his subjects (Matt. xxv, 31, 40). To a building and its foundation (1 Peter, ii, 2, 1, 5; Eph. ii, 21, 22).

The bonds of this union are the Spirit and Faith. The Spirit being in Him and in them makes them truly one. The distance between Christ, who is in heaven, and believers, who are upon earth, is no obstacle, because the Spirit is omnipresent. Through His intervention, not merely a figurative, but a real union is effected; there is one living principle in the Head and the members (1 Cor. vi, 17, 12, 13; 1 John iii, 24; iv, 13). The principal bond of the union between Christ and His people is the Spirit. But, as the union is mutual, something is necessary on their part to complete it, and this is faith. Hence Christ is said to dwell in our hearts by faith. This faith is not merely a natural act of the mind, assenting to the truth of the gospel, as it assents to any other truth, upon credible testimony, but it is a supernatural act, an effect produced by the power of the Spirit of grace, and is such a persuasion of the truth concerning the Saviour as calls forth exercises suitable to the nature of its object. It is a cordial approbation of the Saviour, a hearty consent to His offers, an acceptance of Him in His entire character as "made of God unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption" (1 Cor. i, 30).

It is, we repeat, in truth, and not merely by a figure of speech, that Jesus Christ and His disciples are said to be one. They are one, not only in sentiment and affection, by consent of mind and heart, but by a real conjunction, their persons being united to His person. The Spirit of Christ actually dwells in the souls of believers. Hence, He is said to live in them, and they are said to abide in Him. Some regard the idea of such an union as a dream of enthusiasm; but the humble Christian is content to believe the testimony of Scripture, and cannot withhold his assent to a fact of which, although he is unable to explain it, the evidence which he finds in himself is conclusive. He who is led by the Spirit, enlightened, assisted and comforted by Him, cannot doubt that Christ dwells in him. This union is: 1. Spiritual. It is on this account that it is difficult to conceive it. The same spirit lives in our exalted Redeemer, and in His people upon earth, and hence, although separated from Him and from one another, they are but one. 2. Without Confusion. It is a union of persons, which imports that the parties concerned in it continue as much distinct individuals as before. As our Saviour cannot participate in the infirmities of His people, except by sympathy, so they cannot participate in His divine excellences, which are incommunicable. Christ and they are truly united, but there does not result a unity of essence, or of person, for it is not effected immediately, but through the intervention of the Spirit, and, consequently, there is no confusion of nature or persons; so that Christ is incarnate in believers, or they are deified in Him. 3. Indissoluble. There is no reason to apprehend that Christ will dissolve the union, because He is not fickle in His attachments, apt to be disgusted and easily irritated, but having a gracious design to accomplish, will persevere till it be completed. Those whom He loves He loves to the end. It will not be dissolved by any act of His people. They, indeed, have inconstant hearts, and, from their own changeableness, or from the influence of external temptations, they might renounce their connection with Him, but, as He prays that their faith may not fail, so the Spirit, dwelling in their hearts, preserves it amidst the dangers to which it is exposed. (See Rom. viii, 35, 37; John x, 23.)

Being united to Christ, believers have fellowship with Him in His sufferings and death, and are therefore said to be "crucified and dead with Christ" (Rom. vi, 6, 8). They have also fellowship with Christ in His resurrection; for they are "raised up together with Him," and have communion with Him in His life (Eph. ii, 6; Gal. ii, 20). They have fellowship with Him in His victories. He spoiled principalities and powers, overcame the world, destroyed death, and vanquished the grave for them; and they shall be made more than conquerors over all these enemies, through Him (Rom. viii, 37). They have communion with Him in all the benefits which He purchased; hence they are said to be "made partakers of Christ," and to be "complete in Him who is the head of all principality and power" (Heb. iii, 14; Col. ii, 10); they have an interest in His righteousness, by which He fulfilled the law in their room, and are thus entitled to the blessing of justification; they are adopted into the family of heaven, and made heirs of God, and joint heirs with His Son Jesus Christ; they are sanctified in soul, body and spirit, being enabled by His grace to die more and more unto sin, and live unto righteousness; they now sit in heavenly places with Christ as their representing head, and in due time they shall be glorified in their own persons together with Him (Eph. ii, 6; Col. ii, 4). In short, all things are theirs, as the apostle Paul asserts; and he founds their title to all things upon their union to Christ: "All things are yours: whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's" (1 Cor. iii, 22, 23).

Union Presbyterian Church, West Virginia. The Presbyterian church now called Union was originally known by the name of "Good Hope," and afterwards "Concord," bearing one or the other of these names as long as the congregation worshiped in the first building erected for their religious services. That house, which, it has been pretty satisfactorily ascertained, was built about the year 1794, stood about one and one-half miles south of the village of Union, in the midst of towering oaks, overlooking the deep vale through which Indian Creek makes its way. It was built of unhewn logs, on a stone foundation, and was twenty-five feet square.

When the county of Monroe was set off from the counties of Greenbrier and Botetourt, by Acts of the General Assembly of Virginia (1799 and 1802), and a village laid out for the county seat, with a courthouse erected thereon, then the log church on Indian Creek was abandoned, and the more spacious and comfortable court-house was allowed the congregation for their worship. The name of Union being given to the county seat, caused the congregation thereafter to bear the name of Union, and the organized church to be introduced into the Presbytery of "Old Hanover" as the "Church of Union." When the weather was pleasant, and large numbers came together, particularly on Communion occasions, the congregation assembled for worship in a shady sugar-tree grove adjacent to the village.

The majority of the early settlers in that region emigrated from the "Valley of Virginia," and were generally of "Scotch-Irish" descent, with a goodly number of English, Irish and German, the posterity of whom form a respectable and influential portion of the community at the present time. The first settlers around Union, and in convenient reach of the first Presbyterian Church, were the Alexanders, Dunlaps, Byrnsides, Erskines, Hutchinsons, Capertons, Estills, Grays, Hanlys, Vawters, Woodwards, Haynes, Chambers, Dunbars, Bensons, Beirns, Boyds, Leacees, Nickells, Youngs, Glenss, Keenans, Kelleys, Aldersons, Pattons, Clarks, Campbells, Ewings, Wileys, Parkers, Shanklins, Francis, Neels, etc.

The first permanent settlement of the whites, within the limits of what are at present the counties of Greenbrier and Monroe, was about the year 1769. Not long after the permanent settlement of the country, missionaries labored among the people both in Greenbrier and what is now Monroe counties. According to tradition, a Mr. Crawford, who came from the South branch of the Potomac, was the first missionary who came; the names of Frazier Read and some others were mentioned, but nothing definite is known as to the periods of their labors, the length of time any of them preached, or by whom they were commissioned. Their preaching, nevertheless, seems not to have been without gratifying results; since, within comparatively few years, before the year 1858, persons were living within this region who professed religion under the ministry of these missionaries, and were, some of them, burning and shining lights in the Church.

The Rev. John McCue organized the Church now bearing the name of Union. As Mr. McCue was the first minister of the Presbyterian Church who settled in any part of this region, and was the organizer of the Union Church, then called "Good Hope," and having, moreover, been a self-denying, faithful minister of the gospel, who prepared the way for the easier and more successful labors of those who came after him, it is met that he should be held in grateful and affectionate remembrance. To this end we present the following sketch of his life, prepared by his grandson, J. Marshall McCue, Esq., with the aid of some others:—

"The Rev. John McCue was the eldest son of John

McCue, and Eleanor Matthews, natives of Ireland, but at the time of their marriage residents of Pennsylvania. He was born about the year 1752. About the year 1765 his parents moved to the county of Nelson, Va., and settled about two miles south of the place now known as 'Axton Station.' They obtained a grant from George III, for seventy-one acres of land, bearing date in 1771, still in the possession of their descendants.

"When young McCue decided to obtain an education, he could receive but little aid from his father, who had a large family and limited means. The most he could do was to allow his son to retain whatever wages he might earn from manual labor. In pursuance of his object, it is remembered, that he would cross the Blue Ridge Mountain, at Rockfish Gap, toil as a day laborer in the fields of South river, and return to his home at night. The books and tuition paid for in this manner were duly appreciated. His name appears in the catalogue of Washington College, previous to the charter of 1782, with the degree of A. B. He was, therefore, doubtless, among the early pupils of the famous 'Liberty Hall Academy,' to which the Washington and Lee University, Va., is indebted for its origin.

"He was licensed to preach the gospel at Timberridge Church, May 22d, 1782, and at the same time appointed to labor a portion of his time, under the direction of the Presbytery ('Old Hanover'), in Greenbrier county, Va., Monroe not being set off from it. In one year after his licensure he preached his sermon for ordination at 'Old Mounmouth Church,' Va. (May 20th, 1783), and the ordination services were ordered to take place on the first Wednesday of August following, among the people of this Western region, where he had spent a year as an evangelist; at this time it appears the churches of Union and Lewisburg were organized and he installed as their Pastor, the churches being then denominated 'Camp Union' and 'Good Hope.' The former was afterwards denominated the 'Church of Lewisburg.'

"September 20th, 1791, Mr. McCue was released from his charge of the churches in Greenbrier and Monroe, and accepted a call from Tinkling Spring Church, with which church the people of Staunton were to have a portion of his pastoral services.

"It appears from the Records of 'Old Hanover Presbytery,' that while his main charge was in Greenbrier (then embracing Monroe), he was active and vigilant in attending to the spiritual interests of many localities, particularly in the southwest and western portions of Virginia. It is probable that he was the very first to preach the gospel in 'the Sinks,' 'the Levels of Pocahontas,' the 'Head of Greenbrier,' 'Tygarts Valley,' and numerous other places.

"His labors in Greenbrier and Monroe continued through a period of nine years and four months. He was the pastor of Tinkling Spring twenty-seven years. He reared a large and highly respected family of five sons and as many daughters. Some of his sons, sons-in-law, and their children occupied positions of honor and trust, as those remember who are familiar with the legal and political history of Augusta county, Va." (See Tinkling Spring Church.)

Mr. McCue was succeeded by the Rev. Benjamin Grigsby, as the minister of the gospel in the wide field occupied by the congregation known as the "Church of Union," embracing the whole of what is now the county of Monroe and part of Greenbrier. About the year 1805-6, Mr. Grigsby received a call to the Presbyterian Church of Norfolk, Va., where his labors were terminated in 1810, by Him who "holds the stars in His right hand," being yet in the vigor of life and in the midst of much usefulness as a minister of Christ. Tradition, among those who were the descendants of Mr. Grigsby's parishioners in Monroe and Greenbrier, represents him as having been much beloved as a man, and distinguished for his ability and fidelity as a pastor, that his sermons were generally impressive, and that at all times he was heard by every class with marked attention.

The Rev. Dr. John McElhenny came to this country in the year 1808, and was installed as the pastor of the United churches of Lewisburg and Union. When he was settled here, and for many years afterwards, there was no Presbyterian minister on the east nearer than Lexington, none on the west this side of the Ohio river, and none north or south for at least one hundred miles. It may be said, therefore, as his labors could not be confined to the two congregations over which he was set as pastor, in consequence of the frequent and urgent solicitations to preach in adjacent counties, that his real field of labor was some two hundred miles square. (See his sketch.)

The first elders who served the Church of Union, so far as can be learned, were James Chambers, who served with Rev. B. Grigsby; William Shanklin, ordained in 1805; Owen Neel and William Haynes, probably ordained about the same time; Robert Shanklin, in 1810.

The first church built by the Presbyterians in Union was erected on the southeastern corner of the village, a frame building. It had a good session house, or apartment, attached to it, which was also used for some time as a school-room. How long this building stood we have not learned. It was succeeded by a large and more costly brick edifice, which was still occupied by the congregation when the present pastor entered upon his duties here, in the year 1842. It was built on the site of the first; not being properly constructed it became unsafe, and many were afraid to enter it when a crowd was expected; hence it became necessary to erect another, and a new site was obtained, being donated by the liberality of the late Hon. A. T. Caperton, just outside of the corporate limits of the village, on the north. It was dedicated in the year 1855, and bids fair, at this time, (1883), to be for a long time a goodly temple for the worship of the living God.

Dr. McElhenny preached to the Church of Union from October 2d, 1808, till 1831, a period of twenty-six years. On the 19th of March, 1835, the Rev. David R. Preston was chosen pastor of the church. He accepted the call and all the preliminary arrangements were made for his installation as pastor, but he declined; but as their stated supply, preached to them regularly till the last of August, 1841, when he resigned. Mr. Preston's preaching was always instructive, perhaps too commonly didactic rather than practical, to be immediately and extensively effective.

The Church at Union was without a minister from August 29th, 1841 (when Rev. D. R. Preston gave up the charge), till October 25th, 1842, when Rev. Samuel R. Houston, D. D., was elected their stated supply, and as such served them till January 4th, 1845, when he was installed over them as pastor. Mr. Houston had been a missionary in Greece and Turkey, laboring under the direction of the "American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions," and having been providentially prevented from returning to the East (although every necessary arrangement had been made for his doing so), the way was open for his acceptance of a call to labor in this country; and he has now (1883) been ministering to the people of Monroe for nearly forty-one years. While the Church of Union was undivided and embraced the different out-stations served by Dr. Houston, there were received into the communion of the church, under his ministry, two hundred and eighty-eight members. When the church was divided, and the congregation connected with the village organized (1854) into a distinct church, the number of members was only sixty-eight. Since that time one hundred and fourteen have been added. At an out-station on the knobs, west of Virginia, a small building was erected in the year 1858, for the accommodation of the members residing there, where the pastor administers the Sacrament of the Supper regularly once a year. The elders of the church at this time (1883) are: Benjamin Grigsby Dunlap, Walter Douglass, Andrew H. Johnson, F. D. Wheelwright, ordained October 10th, 1880; Samuel Adger Houston, ordained October 10th, 1880.

Union Theological Seminary, New York city. The movement that issued in the founding of this Institution first took shape in the Autumn of the year 1835. A friend (Rev. Absalom Peters, D. D.) called one day on the Rev. William Patton, D. D., one of the active originators of the enterprise, to advise with him as to the disposal of some funds which a bookseller (Mr. Oliver Halsted) of New York desired to appropriate to some good object. "Let him give the sum towards the founding of a theological seminary in New York," was the reply. His friend remonstrated, raised objections to the project, and said, "It is no place for a seminary." The matter was then argued at considerable length.

This conference resulted in a consultation, first with the bookseller (whose funds, however, were never obtained), and then with a few prominent merchants, whose generous benefactions had already given them prominence in the walks of benevolence. The project was received with favor. A meeting of a few ministers and laymen of kindred sympathies was informally called. It was held at the house of Mr. William M. Halsted, No. 60 Walker street. The more the matter was talked of and thought of, the more it seemed to be of God's ordering. At length, a formal meeting was held, Saturday, October 10th, at the house of Mr. Knowles Taylor, No. 8 Bond street. In addition to Mr. Taylor, eight other persons were present; Messrs. William M. Halsted, Richard T. Haines, Abijah Fisher, and Marcus Wilbur, Rev. Absalom Peters, D. D., Rev. Henry White, Rev. William Patton, and Rev. Esckiae Mason. After a full interchange of views, it was then and there voted unanimously "That it is expedient, depending on the blessing of God, to attempt to establish a theological seminary in this city."

Other meetings followed weekly, at the same place, with a continual enlargement of the circle. Prominent among the additional attendants were the Rev. Drs. Thomas McAuley and Thomas H. Skinner; the Rev. Messrs. John C. Brigham, Ichabod S. Spencer, William Adams, Asa D. Smith, Elijah P. Barrows, Henry A. Rowland, Charles Hall and Henry G. Ludlow; and Messrs. Fisher Howe, John Nitchie, Lowell Holbrook, James C. Bliss, M. D., Cornelius Baker, Anson G. Phelps, Rufus L. Nevins, Charles Butler, Charles Starr, John L. Mason, Norman White, Oliver Wilcox and Alexis Baker. It was thought that the establishment of the seminary would involve an expense of sixty-five thousand dollars. At their meeting of November 9th a subscription was called for, payable in five annual installments; the first, on the first day of June, 1836, provided that not less than sixty thousand dollars had been subscribed. The sum of thirty-one thousand dollars was then assumed by those present, an additional subscription of ten thousand dollars was reported at the next meeting, and every encouragement was given that the whole sum would shortly be secured.

Measures were taken at once to procure a location, and to erect a suitable edifice for the seminary. A plot of ground, two hundred feet square, between Sixth and Eighth streets, extending from Greene to Wooster streets, four full lots on each street, was selected. It formed a part of the property of "The Sailors' Snug Harbor," which shortly before had been located in the old Randall mansion, on Broadway, above Ninth street. It was subject to an annual ground-rent of eight hundred dollars. The lease was purchased for eight thousand dollars. The locality was well up-town—quite on the outskirts of the city,

The location was deemed quite eligible, near enough to the business portion of the city, and sufficiently remote for a quiet literary retreat.

A permanent corps of instructors was now to be secured. The first choice of the Directors for the Chair of Theology was the Rev. Justin Edwards, D. D., of Andover, Mass., and for the Chair of Biblical Literature, Prof. Joseph Addison Alexander, of Princeton, N. J. Both appointments were declined. Professors Extraordinary (Rev. Drs. Thomas McAuley and Thomas H. Skinner, and Rev. Messrs. Ichabod A. Spencer, Erskine Mason and Henry White) were appointed from among the ministerial members of the Board. On the last day of September the Rev. Henry White, the pastor of the Allen Street Presbyterian Church of New York, was appointed to, and soon after accepted, the Chair of Theology. The Rev. Thomas McAuley, D. D., the pastor of the Murray Street Presbyterian Church, and the first President of the Board, was chosen Professor of Pastoral Theology and Church Government, with the position of President of the Institution. The Rev. Prof. George Howe, of Columbia, S. C., was also chosen to the Chair of Biblical Literature. Dr. McAuley accepted, but Prof. Howe declined. The services of two regular Professors, and of several Professors Extraordinary, having thus been secured, the Recorder was authorized, November 24th, 1836, to announce, in the public prints, that the Seminary would be opened on the first Monday of December following. Promptly, therefore, on the 5th day of December, thirteen young men presented themselves at the house of the President, No. 112 Leonard street, and were duly enrolled as theological students. A fortnight later, Prof. Edward Robinson, D. D., late of Andover, Mass., was chosen to the Chair of Biblical Literature. At the end of a month he accepted, and entered upon his work. Ten additional students were enrolled during the first year.

The new seminary had thus far acquired no "local habitation." The necessities of the case made the institution somewhat "peripatetic." The plans for the building having at length been completed and approved, contracts were made for the erection of a seminary building on University Place, and of four professors' houses in the rear on Greene street. Early in March, 1837, the work was fairly begun, but with utterly inadequate resources, owing mainly to the facts, that the great fire in the city had crippled quite a number of the patrons of the seminary and that financial embarrassment prevailed throughout the country. From two of the warm friends of the Institution, however, at the close of the year, loans amounting to twenty-seven thousand dollars, secured by mortgage on the grounds and prospective buildings, were obtained, and the work of construction, which had been suspended, was resumed. The second year of instruction had commenced, and thirty new students had been enrolled.

The next desideratum for the seminary was a theological library, and for the attainment of this a kind Providence opened the way. An immense collection of rare and valuable books was in the possession of Leander Van Ess, who, when Roman Catholic Professor of Divinity in the ancient University of Marburg, gave himself with intense interest to the study of the original Scriptures, and was thereby led, through divine grace, into the liberty of the children of God. Grown old and infirm, he had retired from the University to the quiet little town of Alzey, in Hesse-Darmstadt, west of the Rhine, about equal distance from Mayence and Worms, and offered his great library for sale. It had cost Dr. Van Ess fifty thousand florins, but in April, 1838, was purchased for the seminary, for ten thousand florins, its whole cost to the Institution, when it arrived in October, all charges paid, being five thousand and seventy dollars and eight cents. It was received just in time to find its way into the alcoves of the library room of the new building, and it has served as an invaluable nucleus around which to cluster the needful volumes of the modern press.

The second year of instruction had closed with an enrollment of fifty-six students. The third year had opened with a large accession. The new seminary building was dedicated December 12th, 1838. Three years had now elapsed since the incipient movement. A "local habitation" had been secured, a large and rare library had been provided, a full and able Faculty inducted, and a position attained among the first three seminaries of the land. An Act of Incorporation was obtained March 27th, 1839, from the Legislature of the State, the name "Union" having been given it at Albany, to distinguish it probably, from the Episcopal Seminary on Twentieth street, a name not desired, much less chosen, by the board, but prophetic of the position that the Institution has ever since maintained.

After severe financial struggles, for some years, a gracious Providence interposed, and the necessary support for the seminary was received. Large amounts were contributed by the friends of the Institution, which were crowned by the princely gift, by Mr. James Brown, of New York city, of three hundred thousand dollars. To furnish proper accommodations for the overflow of students, two of the four houses originally owned by the seminary, and sold, were repurchased, together with a third house on the corner of Clinton place. The latter building was connected with the former by an additional edifice, in 1855. The seminary building, at the same time, was rendered much more commodious and attractive by a large addition on its northern side, and by a refurnishing of the chapel and students' rooms, providing thus much larger space also for the library, which had then grown to more than thirty-three thousand volumes.

Thus has Union Seminary grown and prospered.

Through much and severe tribulation it has attained to a position of influence, equalled by none other in the land. Its students are found in every section, in nearly every State, of the Union. They are occupying influential pulpits in our largest towns and cities. In all the newer States, and in the outlying hamlets of the older States, they are laboring, with apostolical zeal, to "build the old waste places" and "raise up the foundations of many generations." They are found in our academies, colleges and seminaries, forming the minds and cultivating the hearts of the rising generation. On every continent and ocean-group of islands they are toiling to raise the heathen from their degradation and corruption, and train them for God and glory. Union Seminary is a mighty power in the world—a grand instrumentality for building up the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ among men.

The Faculty of Union Seminary consists, at present, of Rev. Roswell D. Hitchcock, D. D., LL. D., President and Washington Professor of Church History; Rev. William G. T. Shedd, D. D., LL. D., Roosevelt Professor of Systematic Theology; Rev. Philip Schafl, D. D., LL. D., Baldwin Professor of Sacred Literature; Rev. George L. Prentiss, D. D., Skinner and McAlpin Professor of Pastoral Theology, Church Polity and Mission Work; Rev. Charles A. Briggs, D. D., Davenport Professor of Hebrew and the Cognate Languages; Secretary and Librarian, Rev. Thomas S. Hastings, D. D., Brown Professor of Sacred Rhetoric, and Rev. Francis Brown, A. M., Associate Professor in the Department of Biblical Philology.

Union Theological Seminary, in Virginia, has its location within a few hundred yards of Hampden-Sidney College. The seminary grew out of the theological school or department connected with the college. (See the notice of that Institution.) As early as the close of the last century the necessity for measures to provide for the professional training of candidates had engaged the serious attention of the Synod of Virginia and its Presbyteries, Hanover and Lexington especially. In 1796 a theological class was organized by the Rev. William Graham, rector of Liberty Hall Academy. In 1805-6 Drs. Alexander and J. H. Rice had collected funds for a library for a theological school. When the Assembly sent down to the Presbyteries an overture asking a vote on the establishment of one seminary or several synodical schools, the majority preferred one, and thus in 1812 Princeton Seminary was founded. While acquiescing in the preference of the majority, and its churches aiding in carrying out the plan of the Assembly, the Synod thought it wise to have its own schools, and appointed Dr. Hoge its Professor of Theology. He performed the duties of this office till his death, in 1820.

After an intellectual effort to secure a successor, the Synod renounced the scheme of a School of Theology to the Presbytery of Hanover, which had initiated the enterprise when first set on foot. The Presbytery, in 1822-4, established a seminary entirely distinct from the college, and elected Dr. J. H. Rice a Professor. The Presbytery, by Trustees of the Seminary, proceeded to prepare buildings, and the Institution was opened, formally, January 1st, 1824, when Dr. Rice made his inaugural discourse. Three students had commenced the regular course in 1823; within less than eight years the number increased to fifty. The Presbytery delivered the Institution, in 1826-7, to the control of the Synods of Virginia and North Carolina, which appointed, each twelve Directors, the first meeting of the Board being held in November, 1827. The funds then amounted to $40,000, of which $15,000 had been invested in buildings and a library, and there were also $20,000 in unpaid subscriptions. By great labor, Dr. Rice collected from various sources in Virginia and North Carolina, and especially in New York and Boston, considerable additions to the funds, and at his death, in September, 1831, more buildings, adequate to accommodate nearly ninety students and three Professors, were in progress to completion. His death very much retarded the growth of the seminary. But by persevering efforts, on the opening of the war, provision had been made for four Professors, and the number of students had reached about forty. The disasters of the war occasioned the loss of a large part of the funds, and rendered what was left unproductive for a year. Friends in Baltimore and New York supplied adequate means to sustain it for a year; and with help from those cities, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis and Louisville, its permanent funds were largely increased, and by 1870, reached a sufficient amount for sustaining four Professors; and now other additions provide a total of about $70,000 of funds, the interest of which is applied, in the form of scholarships, to aid indigent candidates. The number of students has for several years ranged from fifty to seventy. The present Professors are Rev. B. M. Smith, D. D., LL. D., of Oriental Literature; Rev. Thomas E. Peck, D. D., LL. D., of Theology; Rev. H. C. Alexander, D. D., of New Testament Literature; Rev. G. B. Strickler, D. D., of Church History and Polity; and Rev. W. W. Moore, Assistant in Oriental and Biblical Literature.

Unity, oneness, whether of sentiment, affection, or behavior (Ps. cxxxiii, 1). The unity of the faith is an equal belief of the same great truths of God, and the possession of the grace of faith in a similar form and degree (Eph. iv, 13). The unity of the Spirit is that union between Christ and His saints by which the same Divine Spirit dwells in both, and they have the same dispositions and aims, and that unity of the saints among themselves by which, being joined to the same Head, and having the same Spirit dwelling in them, they have the same graces of faith, love, hope, etc., and are rooted and grounded in the same doctrine of Christ, and have a mutual affection to and care for one another (Eph. iv, 3).

Unity of the Bible. The Bible holds a position at once independent and unique in the history and the literature of the world. It cannot be classed with books of science, though its descriptions of nature excited the admiration of Humboldt, by their fidelity and comprehensiveness, and its schedule or ground plan of the creation is verified more and more by modern astronomy and geology.

It cannot be classed with historical works, though Bunsen, after all his toil upon the monuments and traditions of Egypt, with a view to determine her "place in Universal History," has aptly said that "History was born in that night when Moses, with the Law of God, moral and spiritual, in his heart, led the people of Israel out of Egypt;" and Ewald says of the "Book of Origins," which he regards as in part the foundation of the Pentateuch, that "this is the first work known to us that seeks to arrange infinitesimal details of origin in one comprehensive genealogy;" and he speaks also of the stress which the Hebrew Scriptures "laid upon the Divine element in history, without in the least marring its human truthfulness"—of their "grandeur of material, and their simple force of representation," as a peculiarity by which "Hebrew historiography stands so alone in antiquity, and serves for us too as a perpetual model."

The Bible does not properly belong to the department of Mental Philosophy, though, as Lord Bacon has said, "God makes use of our reason in His illuminations, inoculating, as it were, His revelations into the notions and comprehensions of our Reason;" and therefore, we ought in every way to exercise reason in matters of religion, "provided the mind be enlarged, according to its capacity, to the greatness of the mysteries, and not the mysteries contracted to the narrowness of the mind."

And yet again, the Bible is not strictly a treatise upon Ethics or Theology. Though it assumes a knowledge of moral distinctions, and of the being, the attributes and the government of God, derivable from the light of nature; and though it adds to this in the Ten Commandments of the Old Testament and the Sermon on the Mount in the New, the highest conceptions of moral truth and duty; and though in the Psalms and Prophecies of the Old Testament, and in the discourses of Christ and the writings of the Apostles in the New, it presents views of God, of the soul, of moral character and of the future life, which no other book contains, and which in their spirituality and sublimity must forever mark this as a book apart from and above all works of speculation or imagination upon such themes—yet the Bible does not present these, its peculiar and distinguishing topics, in the form of articles of faith or of theses in Ethics or Theology. We would not think of classing it with Butler's Analogy, or with the writings of Augustine, Leighton, Calvin. There is no one alcove of a classified library in which this Book would find its special and appropriate place.

Historical; containing perhaps the earliest authentic records of the human race, the history of the Jewish nation for fifteen hundred years, the biography of Jesus of Nazareth, and the narrative of the planting and spread of Christianity—yet the Bible is not a history.

Poetical; with a sublimity and beauty of objective description, and a depth and pathos of subjective feeling, in the Psalms, the Book of Job, the prophecies of Isaiah and John, unsurpassed in any poetry of ancient or modern times; and with an adaptation to universal human nature that neither Homer, Dante, Shakspeare nor Goethe can approach, yet the Bible is not itself a poem.

Legislative; as embodying the best code of antiquity in the statutes of a particular nation, and a moral Law that rules the wide empire of earth and time, yet the Bible is not a book of jurisprudence.

Philosophical; as addressing to reason the profoundest problems in the nature of being and the government of the moral universe, tasking the highest intellects with the argument of Paul and the inner sense of John, yet the Bible is not a book of logic or of philosophy.

Nor can we even class it with other sacred books, the Vedas of the Hindus, the Zendavesta of the Persians, the Koran of the Moslem; for we cannot regard the Bible simply as the sacred book of the Hebrews, or the text-book of Christian doctrine and worship, or the manual of personal faith and devotion. It has its place in history and in humanity; it is not merely of the past, but for the present and future also; not for a race, but for the world, not for an age, but for all time. It is a book of universal truths for universal man. And by reason of its doctrines concerning God and man, and its union of the divine with the human for the perfecting of mankind, it stands forever apart as THE BOOK.

This Book, which cannot be classified with any other, but which, viewed merely as a literary production, exhibits so many forms of composition, has yet a unity of its own, which marks an inherent spiritual life. The BIBLE which we are accustomed to see and handle as one book, bound together within the same covers, or at most divided into two parts, the Old Testament and the New, in reality consists of sixty-six distinct productions, the works of about forty different authors. The composition of these many books extended through a period of one thousand six hundred years, from the time of Moses, more than one thousand five hundred years before Christ, to the death of the apostle John, near the close of the first century of our era. More strictly speaking, there was an interval of about four hundred years between the close of the Old Testament writings and the beginning of the New; so that the composition of the thirty-nine books of the Old Testament stretches over a period of one thousand one hundred years from Moses to Malachi. Sometimes in this period there were long intervals between one prophet and another. Thus, after the five books of Moses and the book of Job, the oldest books of the Canon, though the historical records of the Jewish nation, and especially their religious annals, were carried regularly forward, there were no new books of piety and devotion until the time of David, an interval of more than four hundred years. At a later period, after two or three centuries, several of the prophets were nearly contemporary.

The twenty-seven books of the New Testament were all composed in the course of sixty years after the crucifixion, and all the eight writers of those books, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, Peter, James, Jude, were contemporaries, and had personal knowledge one of another. Yet they did not compose by concert, with a view to making one joint production as the standard Christian book; but each wrote his Gospel or his Epistles in his own time and way, and for an object directly before him. Hence the books of the New Testament are not arranged in the form of a series of essays or treatises designed to supplement each other, but each fulfills some specific purpose of the writer, while they all contribute to the same general end. This fact points to the conviction of some common superintendence over the writers.

The thirty-nine distinct books, by perhaps thirty different authors, that make up the Old Testament, were not prepared as an encyclopedia is prepared, by allotting to each writer particular subjects and then classifying the several productions in one work; nor were they written consecutively, each writer in turn taking up the work where his predecessors had left it; nor were these books the production of a certain school whose disciples from time to time expounded or defended its opinions; but these books, bound together as one, were the independent compositions of men living many years, and in some cases, many centuries apart. Judge, then, of the probability that forty distinct authors, in sixty-six separate works, written at intervals during 1600 years, would agree in their conception and statement of some of the highest themes of thought that can be suggested to the human mind. Can the history of science or of philosophy furnish a parallel? We shall come back to this point presently; I now wish simply to fix the fact that the Bible is made up of many books, by many men, who wrote apart from one another, and often at wide intervals of time.

Again, the books that make up the Bible were written in different countries, under various forms and conditions of national life and of civilization, and in different languages. The books of the Pentateuch were written probably in the Desert of Sinai, though under the manifest influence of Egyptian culture; the book of Job has the air of the archaic life of the Eastern desert; the historical books of the Old Testament, the Psalms and Proverbs, and several of the Prophecies were written in Palestine; the Prophecies of Ezekiel and Daniel, and the story of Esther, the Jewish queen, were written in the land of the Chaldeans, during the captivity; the Gospels and some of the Epistles were written in Palestine; but most of the Epistles were written away from Judea and its associations, in Asia Minor, in Greece and in Italy. Hence, though the writers concerned in the production of the Bible were of one race, it is difficult to conceive of circumstances and associations more diversified, and even opposite, than those in which they severally wrote; now, under the shadow of the monuments of Egypt, and trained in the learning and art of her early civilization; now in the wild freedom and grandeur of the desert, and amid the simple manners of wandering tribes; now at the capital of the Babylonian empire in the height of its luxury and splendor; now in the comparative seclusion of Judea, among an agricultural people of plain habits and tastes and of no literary ambition; or at the religious capital, in presence of the glory of the temple and its ritual; or again in time of war, when Judea was invaded and the temple laid waste, or the stranger and Gentile ruled in the land; and yet again, from such seats of pagan wealth, commerce, art, luxury, idolatry and dominion, as Corinth, Ephesus and Rome. Thus amid the widest contrasts of place, society, government and religion, and in contact with all the leading forms of civilization and of empire for sixteen centuries, these forty writers, themselves of one, narrow and often despised race, produced the books that compose our Bible. What were the chances that they would agree in their own views of truth, and especially in setting forth the highest spiritual truth, untinged by the social, literary and religious influences around them?

They wrote in different tongues; the old Testament writers in Hebrew, except that Daniel and Ezra, and to some extent Zechariah, show the influence of the Chaldee upon their style; the New Testament writers in Greek, except that the gospel of Matthew may have been first written in Aramean, the Chaldee dialect which the Jews brought back from the captivity, then the common language of Palestine, and probably the vernacular of our Lord Himself. And these books collectively make up the main body of the literature of the Hebrews, who were not a literary people. In other nations of antiquity we trace the rise, the progress, and the decay of a national literature, from rude beginnings up to a higher culture, then back into a fragmentary decline. But here Moses is as sublime as John, Isaiah is as weighty as Paul, and all the books are marked by the same moral characteristics, which distinguish them from other writings of antiquity. How shall we account for this, if there was not a divine superintendence over them all?

In estimating these books of the Bible from the point of unity, we must take into account also the great variety of social position and of intellectual culture among their writers. Moses and Paul were, in the proper sense, men of education. Moses, from his position at court, as the adopted son of Pharaoh's daughter, had access to the schools of learning which then placed the Egyptian priesthood at the head of the science of the world. The tradition is sanctioned by Stephen, that he "was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii, 22). Paul was trained in the chief school of Judea, under the famous Gamaliel, and his native Tarsus was a seat of Grecian culture (Acts xxii, 3), with which his letters and speeches prove him to have been familiar. Luke also was an educated physician (Col. iv, 4), and his style gives evidence of his training. Daniel and Nehemiah (Dan. v, 29; Neh. i, 11) held official posts at the pagan court of Babylon, then the leading empire of the world; and Solomon was himself a king, whose wealth and power excited the wonder of surrounding nations.

On the other hand, David was a shepherd boy (1 Sam. xvi, 11), and afterward a warrior, with no leisure for literary culture, though he created a Psalter for all ages and people. Amos was a herdsman, and was keeping his flocks in Tekoa when called to become a prophet (Amos i, 1, and vii, 14, 15). Most of the writers of the Old Testament are unknown to us, except by name; and the writers of the New Testament, with the exception of Paul and Luke, were men of no education, men taken directly from the humbler walks of life and made the apostles of a new religion for mankind.

What, then, are the probabilities that forty writers, differing thus widely in their antecedents and their surroundings—men taken from the court and from the sheepfold, from the school and from the fishing smack—would agree in their presentation of moral and spiritual truths which had tasked the most philosophical and the best disciplined minds? that without concert these would form a school of thought more comprehensive, more harmonious, and more permanent than any school of Greece?

And, to complete the survey, we must keep in view the diversity of style and plan in the composition of the sixty-six books that make up our Bible. We have books of history; the history of mankind at large from the creation until the dispersion into different nations after the flood; a history brief and fragmentary, and chiefly religious, but perhaps the oldest document in the world. After this comes the history of the Jewish people, with references to surrounding nations with whom they were brought in contact by the fortunes of war. These histories are interspersed with brief biographical sketches of patriarchs, prophets and kings.

We have also lyrical poems of the highest order, and didactic compositions, such as the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes; there are idyls too, such as the book of Ruth and the Song of Solomon; and the book of Job has a dramatic cast. The Prophecies are partly poetic visions, partly historical pictures, and partly moral discourses. The New Testament is made up of the four Gospels, which give us in fragments the life of Christ, of the history of the planting of Christianity, with a biography of Paul, of numerous letters discussing points of Christian doctrine and practice, and of the grand prophetic poem, the Revelation, by John. Now, what is the probability, by any ordinary rules of literary composition, that such a variety of books, poetical, historical, ethical, philosophical, narrative, epistolary; written by so many authors, of such diversified position and attainments; written in so many different places and at intervals so distant—is there any probability whatever, that these works would be found to agree in their presentation of certain truths, the most sublime and the most momentous that can be entertained by the mind of man?

Now let us look at certain characteristic features of these several books which stamp them with a unity of origin and of plan, beyond the possibility of chance or the probability of human contrivance.

1. They agree throughout in their representation of the nature and the character of God, and this, the highest conception of the Supreme Being that the human mind has ever formed. Everywhere in the Bible God appears as a Spirit, having life in Himself, and the Author of life to all creatures. His power, His wisdom, His presence, His knowledge, in a word all the attributes of His being, are infinite and eternal. The account of the Creation and the Ten Commandments in the books of Moses present God as an Infinite and Almighty Spirit as distinctly as does Paul in his speech at Athens. Isaiah's vision of the divine majesty and glory is as spiritual and sublime as the visions of John eight hundred years later. When Jesus said "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth," this was the same view of the divine nature that David a thousand years before, had uttered in the 139th Psalm: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit, or whither shall I flee from thy presence? Thou understandest my thoughts afar off."

The Oneness of God in His being is taught, or rather is assumed and recognized, equally by all the writers of the Bible, in all their books. Under whatever aspect God is presented, whether His unity is insisted upon in opposition to the many gods of the heathen, or He Himself is revealed by the three names of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit, He is always one and the same—the only living and true God. Moses worships Him, saying, "Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God (Ps. xc, 2); and John, in the Revelation, adores the Lord God Almighty, "which was, and is, and is to come" (Rev. i, 4; iv, 8).

The Holiness of God is uniformly presented by the writers of the Bible as His crowning excellence, the sum of His moral attributes, the very essence and glory of His character. He is "the Holy One of Israel;" "the Holy One who inhabiteth eternity;" He is worshiped in heaven by angels, by cherubim and seraphim, as "Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty." His house must be holy, His ministers must be holy, His people must be holy, all that would pertain to Him or receive His favor, must be or become holy, for He is holy.

Now this view of the Divine character, which is uniform in the Scriptures, is also peculiar to the Bible. It is not borrowed from other books or from other religions.

Some philosophers of Greece and Rome—notably Socrates, Plato, Cicero and Epictetus—approached the conception of one spiritual God, infinite in His nature and perfect in His attributes. Yet their best thoughts concerning God were crude and vague, and they themselves were in doubt of their own speculations. For the most part, even the religious treatises of antiquity contain very mixed and imperfect notions of the divine Being and His attributes, while beyond the pale of the Hebrew nation Polytheism was universal in practice. In all the literature of antiquity the books that compose the Bible are the only writings that sharply and unequivocally teach that there is but ONE God, a pure Spirit, whose nature is infinite, whose attributes are perfect. And when we examine into the character of the gods of the Old World, even among the most cultivated nations, Egypt, Babylon, Greece, Rome, we find monstrosities of the imagination, one-sided virtues marred by imperfections, deformities, frailties, passions, and even by positive and other outrageous vices. If the gods should appear on Chestnut street, in the garb and with the manners of Olympus, you would send them to Moyamensing, unless the "Black Crook" has accustomed you to their style. Nowhere did the ancient mythology approach to the idea of a God of perfect holiness, or to absolute holiness of character as essential to a right conception of the Supreme Being. Its gods were either distorted images of human qualities, or photographs of human characters, with virtues and defects intensely and even coarsely magnified.

With such imperfect and unworthy views of God continually before them in the literature and the religions of all mankind, how came it to pass that these forty men of an obscure race, shepherds, husbandmen, fishermen, or if scholars, then acquainted with the theology of Egypt, of Greece and of Rome; men, some of whom were captives under idolatrous nations, and others officials in courts where idol worship was conducted with state magnificence; how came it to pass, that these men, writing at such "divers times," centuries apart, and in such "divers manners," have given to the world a conception of God in His spirituality, His unity, His infinity, and, above all, in His holiness, which no other minds had ever attained to, and which is confessedly the highest possible conception of the Supreme Being?

We can account for this intellectual and moral phenomenon—without a parallel in literature—if we believe that God spake through these writers; that He was revealed unto them so that they discerned His character, realized His presence, were moved by His Spirit. But can we account for their doctrine of God in any other way?

I am far from claiming that Monotheism was an original discovery of the Hebrew mind. Indeed, the study of comparative Mythology points to Monotheism, under some crude conception, as the primitive Religion—with, perhaps, the Sun as its earliest symbol, from which radiated at length the manifold forms of a symbol-worship that degenerated into the grossness of idolatry. But the peculiarity of the Monotheism of the Bible is the singleness and pureness of its conception of God as a Spirit, with the powers and attributes of Spirit in their infinity—the Jehovah, the I AM; the Eternal, the Unchanging, the Almighty; the Creator of all things, the universal Lord—the tenacity with which it adheres to Personality, while other systems beginning in Monotheism run to Pantheism, or to the personification of Nature; the personal relations into which the Bible brings the Divine Spirit with the human spirit, through His moral government, His holy laws, His paternal love; and, above all, the peculiarity of the Biblical presentation of God, is expressed in the one word Holiness, which, as applied to Jehovah, has no synonym.

The impression of this Biblical idea of God is strengthened, if we keep in mind that the sacred writers do not enter into argument concerning the being and character of God; do not write on behalf of a system of theology, with its theses and definitions to be maintained by proof; do not reason like metaphysicians upon the nature of the Divine Being; but give forth their sublime conception of God as an intuition of their souls, as if they saw and felt that which they speak. They assert or declare the spirituality and the holiness of God as first truths, with which they are already familiar. And the impression is still further heightened by the fact that this Biblical idea of God takes hold upon the universal mind of man with a reality and a power that no other theology can gain. What Socrates, Plato, Cicero thought concerning God, what the sacred books of the Egyptians, the Chinese and the Hindoos teach on this subject, is a matter of curiosity, and is of use in the comparison of opinions; yet none of these views seize upon the minds and hearts of mankind at large with the conviction that this belief is a necessity to their own spiritual life. But the Bible takes hold upon the human mind in all ages, among all nations, in all conditions, with the same conviction that its God is a reality, and that this one, infinite, almighty, eternal, holy Spirit is the God with whom we have to do. This peculiarity of the Biblical presentation of God is admirably stated by Isaac Taylor, in his analysis of the 139th Psalm. "The element of the Infinite finds a coalescent surface, a point of adhesion, in the individual consciousness; a consciousness towards God which removes all other beings from our view, and which leaves us, each for himself, alone with his Creator and Judge. God is everywhere present, in the vastness of the upper heavens, in the remotest recesses of Sheol, everywhere, to the utmost borders of the material universe; but these affirmations of a universal truth are advanced in apposition to a truth which is more affecting, or which is of more intimate concernment to the devout spirit; this spirit, its faults, its terrors, its aspirations; and this animal frame, of which it is the tenant, is in the hand of God, and is dependent upon His bounty, and is cared for in whatever relates to its precarious welfare; and thus is so great a theme, the Divine Omniscience, brought home to its due culmination in an outburst of religious feeling: 'How precious also are thy thoughts unto me; O God! how great is the sum of them! If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand; when I awake, I am still with thee.' Whence came an idea of God so living, so real, so universal in its applications, so commanding in its power? Is it not the book that contains it—a book into whose whole texture is woven this supernatural idea of God—is not this book a revelation of God to the soul of man?"

Equally marked and characteristic is the teaching of this book with respect to the government of God. In other ancient books of philosophy and religion we find vague and uncertain speculations touching a Providence and the care of the gods for men. Some leave the world to fate; some represent a favoritism among the deities toward persons or classes; some govern the world by fixed laws; some make it the arena of conflicts between rival divinities; some see nothing but chance and human will. But in the Bible we find the grand conception of the personal government of God co-extensive with the creation; all things are upheld by the word of His power; all creatures are fed by His bounty; His tender mercies are over all His works.

Here, too, we find, far more pronounced than in any other religious system of antiquity, the doctrine of a moral government of God over individuals, over nations, over the entire race; a government by moral law, with sanctions of good and evil in this life, and with rewards and punishments in the hereafter; a government in which God is personally active, and to whose ends the whole course of Providence is subservient. Whence came this unique and sublime idea of the Moral Ruler and Judge of the world, a representation that illustrates the whole history of the past, that takes hold upon each individual conscience, that gives ground for penal sanctions under human laws, and hope of the final triumph of justice and righteousness in the world? How came this idea of the Government of God to be found in this book alone, unless God Himself revealed it?

The Bible, which is so striking and peculiar in its views of God, is none the less so in its view of Man. Though it describes man as degraded morally and socially by sin, it does not degrade him as to his origin, does not develop him from the ape. On the one hand it represents man as the offspring and the image of God, and thus links his origin with the divinity; on the other hand it represents him as fallen and debased, through the sinful abuse of his noble and immortal powers; but, at the same time, it shows him capable of restoration, and provides the means of his recovery. This view of man, which is the key to his whole history, and which is responded to by every conscience, is a peculiarity of the Scripture, which points for its origin to Him who knows what is in man, who searcheth the reins and trieth the hearts.

And again, in the standard of character which it sets up before us, and in the rule of life which it lays upon us, the Bible exhibits a unity of purpose as well as a purity and sublimity of conception unparalleled in the ethics of the world. Man's whole nature, spiritual, ethical, social, and the whole range of his relations to God, to the family, to his neighbor, to society, are comprehended in the Ten Commandments; and every motive of action, in every sphere, is analyzed and defined in the Sermon on the Mount. This searching analysis, this rigid test, this severe requirement, this lofty ideal, may well inspire awe in a mind conscious of its own imperfections; but at the same time it awakens hope, because the character which the Bible requires of men commends itself to their moral approbation, and brings the highest incentives to its own attainment. While a socialistic philosophy seeks to entertain us with the promise of "the Coming Man"—alas, ever a vague and distant vision—the Bible sets before us the New Man in Christ, "which, after God, is created in righteousness and true holiness" (Eph. iv, 24).

I have reserved until now the most convincing, as well as the most inspiring unity of the Bible, in the hope it ever holds up to humanity through the redemption of the race. The treatment of this theme, especially by Paul and John, blends the deepest philosophy of religion with the loftiest poetry of devotion; it exhibits the unity of thought in the Bible; the unity of plan in the religion which the Bible reveals; the unity of purpose in divine Providence, unfolding and fulfilling this plan; the unity of development in history as this great purpose of redemption moves onward through the ages; and the unity of end in the final accord of the physical and moral universe through the triumph of Good over Evil, of Salvation over Sin. The recovery of man was announced on the day of his apostacy; though, by the very terms of that announcement, this recovery would involve a long conflict between the seed of the woman and the serpent. But the method of that recovery was a mystery, obscurely hinted at by prophets who knew not what the Spirit that was in them did testify; more and more pronounced through symbols and the later prophecies; at length unveiled in the incarnation of Christ; but still a mystery of the divine love, for the ever unfolding glories of Eternity. In all this the spiritual is in close analogy with the natural, as unfolding and interpreting the mind of God.

Progressive development, unveiling more and more some hidden unity of plan, carrying out rudimental ideas through various changes of structure and condition toward a completed system, is the latest doctrine of science concerning physical nature, organized being and human society. Though in some quarters this doctrine is carried to an extreme not warranted by fact, and the unscientific attempt has been made to reduce the phenomena of consciousness, the spontaneous and the reflective movements of the intellect, and the executive and moral acts of the will, to the control of physical causes; yet Progress through changes, and Unity through variety, and System through details, is written upon the whole face of nature and the whole course of history.

Prof. Agassiz, versed in so many branches of natural history, gives it as the sum of all his studies in Nature, that in classifying creation under the order and arrangement of modern sciences, we have not invented a system of thought for Nature, but have simply translated into human language the thoughts of the Creator, which were expressed in the primitive relations of animal life, and there embodied for our study; that we are not introducing order into chaos by the mode in which we classify and arrange our knowledge; but in our attempts to expound Nature we are only the unconscious interpreters of Divine thoughts; that the science is not in ourselves, but in Nature, or rather in "the plan whose foundations were laid in the dawn of creation, and the development of which we are laboriously studying, the great divisions under which we arrange the animal kingdom being but headings to the chapters of the great book which we are reading." And having reduced his principles of classification to thirty distinct specifications of thought exhibited in Nature, he adds: "The combination in time and space of all these thoughtful conceptions exhibits not only thought; it shows also premeditation, power, wisdom, greatness, prescience, omniscience, providence. In one word, all these facts, in their natural connection, proclaim aloud the One God, whom man may know, adore and love; and Natural History must, in good time, become the analysis of the thoughts of the Creator of the Universe, as manifested in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, as well as in the inorganic world."

Now, just as the discovery of this original plan in the creation, to which science leads us back through long and gradual steps of its unfolding, points to a higher unity of thought and will—the conception and action of a supreme Intelligence, and shows the mind of God in the book of Nature, so does that prophetic plan of the new creation, which we trace as the primitive and formative conception of the Scriptures through every period of their development, show the mind of God in this Book revealing His purpose of redemption as men were able to receive it, until the whole sublime mystery was unveiled by the incarnation of Christ; ever the same purpose, the same promise, the same plan; the lines of prophecy, of ritual, and of history converging more and more, until "in the dispensation of the fullness of times" (Eph. i, 10)—the plenary dispensation, the dispensation characterized by fullness—all things were summed up together in Christ, as all parts and functions of the body are gathered up in and under the head.

Here the analogy of the animal kingdom holds both in the normal and in the exceptional methods of development. The Vertebrate type, "which began during the Paleozoic era in the prone or horizontal fish," passed into "the locomotive series" through the reptile, the bird, the ennobled mammal, and received its crown in "the cephalic development" in man—the fore-limbs being made to subserve the purpose of the head. In this long process eras are sometimes marked by the extinction of living species, and the appearing of new species under the comprehensive type. This answers to the miracle, which comes in at distant intervals to mark some higher phase in the grand prophetic type, until the whole is cephalized (the very word of Paul)—summed up under Christ as the Head.

If we run back a little along these lines, we shall see how this unity of plan in the sphere of spiritual life, like the unity in the sphere of animal life, reflects the mind of God, and stamps the Scriptures as the utterance of His thought and will concerning man. The evidence of the plan itself, the grandeur of its conception, the brightening glory of its unveiling, and the comprehensive blessings of its consummation—these all witness that we have here no "cunningly devised fable," but "holy men of God spake as moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i, 16, 21).

First we find in the Bible a unity of promise concerning the redemption of man. It was a striking and almost an exceptional feature in Christ as a teacher, that He did not profess to introduce a new and original system of truth, as is so much the manner of great teachers in science and philosophy, and of the founders of religious beliefs, but came to complete a foregoing revelation and to finish an appointed work. "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill" (Matt. v, 17)—or rather to fill out—to expand in their true spirit, and carry on to completion. He confirmed His own doctrine by appealing to Moses and the prophets: "Search the scriptures, for they are they which testify of me; Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me. If ye believe not his writing, how shall ye believe my words" (John v, 39, 40). Again, in giving his own summary of the law of love, he said: "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets" (John i, 45). His disciples recognized this connection between Jesus and the ancient Scriptures; as when Philip said to Nathanael, "We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write" (John iv, 25); and the woman of Samaria said to Jesus, "I know that Messiah cometh, which is called Christ" (Matt. xxii, 40); and the constant argument of the apostles in their early preaching was that Jesus of Nazareth fulfilled, in His person, all the conditions of ancient prophecy and promise.

Going back now upon this line of promise to the later prophets of the Hebrew Scriptures, we find in Malachi and Zechariah the announcement of the coming Purifier, the Deliverer, the Shepherd, the King, the Redeemer, with various marks of identity, all which were verified in Christ.

Going back a century earlier, to Daniel, then afar off at the court of Babylon, we find predictions of the Messiah as a Redeemer, with specifications touching His character and work which were marvelously filled out in Christ.

Yet again two centuries further back, in the prophet Isaiah, we find the most detailed delineation of the Messiah to come as the Child of Hope, as the Comforter of His people, as the suffering Redeemer, as the Prince of Peace.

Once more; in the height of the kingdom of Israel, when David had brought the tribes to be united at home and respected abroad, we find in his prophetic Psalms the announcement of a Son before whom he bowed as his Lord, of whom he predicted an everlasting kingdom and victory over death.

Then following back the course of ages to Moses, to Jacob, to Abraham, and across the flood up to the very gate of Eden, we find fewer and dimmer, but still legible and unmistakable—like ancient inscriptions on the rocks of Sinai, like footprints to be traced in the beds of sandstone—the promises of the great Prophet and Lawgiver, like unto Moses, of the Shiloh, the Prince of Peace, who shall gather the peoples to Himself, of the Seed of Abraham, in whom all nations shall be blessed, of the Seed of the woman, which shall bruise the serpent's head.

When we consider the vast intervals of time by which these prophecies are separated one from another, as by the stepping-stones of centuries, the great variety of circumstances, places and conditions in which they were uttered; in the infancy of the race, and at the moment when sin and death seemed to have destroyed all hope for mankind; in the homeless wanderings of solitary men like Abraham and Jacob, who had nothing to build upon but faith; in the wild encampment of a horde of fugitives just escaped from serfdom into the desert; from the throne of a consolidated Kingdom, renowned in arms, favored in foreign alliance, and glorious with the tokens of Jehovah's presence; amid the dismembered fragments of that same kingdom, and in the exile of the people of God, who, sitting by the rivers of Babylon, for very grief could not sing the songs of Zion to their mocking captors; under a foreign rule, and in times of religious decline and social corruption that seemed to render hopeless the idea of reviving and deliverance; when we thus follow through so many and so distant steps, so many and so contrary conditions, these fragmentary prophecies, and find them ever adhering to one type and following one line of development, and pointing to one perfect and glorious consummation, there is nothing in all that science has discovered of the permanence of types, and the unity of plan, and the development of system in the natural world, that can exceed in impression this proof, from the unity of the promise of redemption, of the finger of God inditing and unfolding the whole.

This impression is deepened when we follow back the line of ritual and symbol. How fully did Christ instruct His disciples, and how continually did the apostles insist, that His sufferings and death were a fulfillment of the sacrificial and ritualistic system of the Old Testament. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up (John iii, 14). "Thus it behooved Christ to suffer, and all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me" (Luke xxiv, 26, 46). At His first public appearance, Jesus was pointed out as "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world" (John i, 29), and he among the apostles who was best versed in the laws and customs of the Hebrews argued, that since "Christ our pass-over was sacrificed for us," and as High Priest had passed into the heavens, there was no more need of oblation or priesthood.

Now, through the whole Bible history of the Jews, we find from the date of their organization as a nation a system of sacrifices, framed first as a compensation or atonement for certain civil and ceremonial offences, and next as expressing the need of a propitiation in approaching to God. The system was cumbersome and meaningless, except in this latter view. But going back of the Levitical ritual instituted in the wilderness, to Noah as the priest of a new world, and back again beyond the flood, to Abel, we find a custom of sacrifice for which no mere natural instinct or reason can fully account. In the system of Moses we know this was expressly enjoined by God; and the prophets, while they denounced any neglect or abuse of sacrifice as a crime, also insisted that the sacrifice was worthless unless its spiritual significance was kept in view by the offerer. Here, then, we have the same principle of unity and of development in the language of symbol and ritual as in the verbal promise: the primitive rudimental conception of sacrifice by way of atonement for sin; this conception unfolded in a great number and variety of sacrifices, in which, however, the central figure was ever the Lamb slain, and the central thought the redemption of sin; and all these emblems and types meeting in Christ by His own interpretation of His death and the exposition of it by the apostles as the consummation of this system, which then vanished away as but the prophetic shadow, the outline sketch of the true, when the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world was offered once for all, to take away sin. And so the death of Christ verifies, interprets and transfigures that mysterious system which had else remained without a key. The unity that runs through the religion of the Bible in its treatment of sin and reconciliation, a treatment foreign to all rationalistic conceptions of man's approach to God, argues the divine impress upon the original conception, the law of its unfolding, the dread mystery and glory of its consummation through the cross.

There remains yet another line in this unfolding of redemption, which weaves this argument into a three-fold cord which cannot be broken; the Biblical history, whose unity is the development of the kingdom of God in the world. The public appearing of Christ was heralded by John the Baptist as the ushering in of "the kingdom of God;" Jesus began His ministry by preaching "the Gospel of the kingdom of God;" He announced to His hearers the glad tidings that the kingdom of God was nigh to them, was among them, and might be within them. Disdaining all the kingdoms of the world as the bribe of Satan, refusing the popular cry that would have proclaimed Him king of the Jews, checking the enthusiasm of His disciples when they would have fought or died for a royal Messiah, He nevertheless declared Himself a king, the anointed Son of God, challenged the allegiance of men to Himself as Lord, and asserted the sure and perpetual triumph of His kingdom.

Running back through the Old Testament Scriptures, we find this conception of a righteous and glorious kingdom to be set up in the latter days held forth continually, both as the hope of Israel, and as the consummation of God's purposes of grace for mankind.

We go back to that primitive scene of the patriarch of the twelve tribes, dying in a strange land, his sons gathered around him, as he braces himself upon the edge of his couch, and leans upon the top of his staff and worships the God before whom his fathers, "Abraham and Isaac, did walk," and as his dimmed eyes brighten with the vision of the future, we hear him say, with the confidence of a seer to whom that vision is reality, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh—the Peace—shall come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xlix, 10). Hardly is David seated upon his throne in Judah, and the ark that had rested in Shiloh brought up to Zion, when, as if to disclaim the fulfillment of Jacob's prediction in himself, the Psalmist prophesied anew the coming of the Lord's anointed, who should have "the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession" (Ps. ii).

But though Judah in the time of her prosperity must still wait for the consummation of her kingdom, yet in her times of depression and fear the promise is renewed to revive her hope. Isaiah then lifts up his voice like a trumpet, rallying the discomfited and despairing people: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth, even forever" (Isa. ix, 6,7). And Zechariah, making the hills of Palestine vocal with the welcome to Messiah, sings, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem; behold thy king cometh unto thee" (Zech. ix, 9); and Micah reaches forth the prophetic benediction to Bethlehem, "Though least among the thousands of Judah, yet out of her shall he come forth that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting" (Micah v, 2).

And all the history of the ages is brought to crystallize about this single thread of the promised kingdom of the Messiah. It is wonderful with what tenacity of assertion the Bible holds to this conception of the kingdom of God; it is amazing with what majesty of purpose, what stateliness of march, the Providence of God moves ever toward the consummation of that kingdom in the coming of Christ. Men, kings, peoples, dynasties, empires, as brought within the contemplation of this Book, are nothing, save as they touch upon this kingdom, and are the agents or opponents of its progress. Egypt, Arabia and Tyre, Assyria, Babylon and Persia, the later Macedonian and Roman empires, all are of no account save as they help or hinder the unfolding of the kingdom of God. The covenant with Abraham posited that kingdom in the oath of Jehovah as the guarantee of its universality and its perpetuity; the constitution of Israel under a Theocracy erected before the world a symbol of this divine kingdom, and provided within itself the means of its spiritual development; and when the fullness of time had arrived for the spiritual to burst its shell and stand forth in the beauty of Righteousness, the majesty of Truth, the power of Love, then the polity, like the ritual, fell away, and symbol, prophecy and history met and were fulfilled in Christ.

From a wider range of view I might describe the preparation in human society, in governments, religions, philosophies, laws, for the entering in of Christianity as a fresh infusion of life and power from above into a dissolving civilization—a decaying, despairing world; and following down the course of human affairs, might also show to what extent Christianity has moulded modern society, and been the central force in the history of human progress—Christ the unity of humanity past and to come. But the subject limits me to the internal evidences of such unity found within the Bible itself. And when we consider the sublimity of redemption as a scheme of thought, the mysterious pathos and power of the symbols by which it was shadowed forth, the vastness of the kingdom in which it was embodied as its consummation, we have in these ideas picked up along the track of ages in the line of this book, and found nowhere else, a unity of promise, of ritual and of history, unfolding a unity of plan, that no growth of a national literature, no process of national development, no philosophy of history can account for. Such mighty conceptions could have originated only in the mind that encircles all worlds, foresees all ages, directs all events; and the progressive unity of redemption through all the lines of Prophecy, Ritual and History in the Bible, is the unveiling there of the mind of God. The phenomenon of this book has no parallel except in the book of creation written by the same hand; and how does the moral transcend the material?

Oh for the tongue of Dante, to sing, as from the highest circle of Paradise he beheld the magnificent vision of all the events of Time consummated in the Redemption, and sang

"Behold the hosts
Of Christ's triumphal march, and all the fruit
Harvested by the rolling of these spheres.
There are the wisdom and the Omnipotence
That oped the thoroughfares 'twixt heaven and earth
For which there erst had been so long a yearning."

Oh, for the vision of Kepler, to discern in the movements of the planets the timing of Christ's advent, and see all the heavenly bodies marshaled to do homage at His throne!

Oh, for the fire of Handel, to kindle prophecy and story, and even suffering, into song; and set all things in earth and heaven aglow with the music of Messiah's triumph, from the symphony of shepherds to the chorus of the redeemed!

But neither Dante, nor Kepler, nor Handel, nor all that poetry, science and music might render to such a theme, could once approach this magnificent epic of Paul, which represents all things celestial and terrestrial, physical and moral, visible and invisible, from the first inception of the creation to its final consummation, as ordered for and centred in Christ.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ; according as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, . . . in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace; having made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself; that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him; according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fullness of him that filleth all in all" (Eph. i).

Viewing now the Bible as a whole, we find it marked by a tone or style above the common range of human thought and feeling. When we compare the style and thought of particular books with the known intellectual advantages of their authors, when we remember that David was a shepherd, and John a fisherman, we feel that something more than native genius or poetic inspiration was needed to produce such compositions from such minds. And through the whole book there is a tone of spiritual elevation, a style of thought, feeling and expression, concerning God, the soul, the invisible world, the future state, that is always sustained by these writers and is not equalled or approached by any others.

We find all the books that compose the Bible permeated by one spirit and object, clearly divine; it is, that by precept, by example, by a reconciliation provided and a guidance promised, they may restore man to the likeness of God, and make him a partaker of the divine blessedness by making him a partaker of the divine holiness. Men of great genius sometimes write so obscurely that both the moral and the meaning of their works are hidden from the majority of readers. Not to speak of Jean Paul Richter, who is an enigma to German scholars, who will decide what Tennyson meant to accomplish by his poem of "Maud," or Robert Browning by his "Sordello;" or whether Kant believed in a personal God or in a pantheistic soul; or whether Swedenborg believed that anything was real, or actual, or literal, outside or inside of his own brain. How often do we lay aside the writings of a man of reputed genius with the despairing question, "What is he driving at?" But one can never have a doubt of what the Bible is aiming at. There is no book so real as this, a book of realities, grand, glorious, palpable, terrible. Its God is a real, living God. Its law is a reality. Its spiritual world is a reality. Its threatenings against evil-doers are realities; its promises and hopes are realities; its salvation is a reality; its life and death, its resurrection and judgment, its heaven and hell are realities. And these realities have an object; they are not like the drapery of Milton's "Paradise Lost," or of Dante's "Inferno." The Bible aims throughout to make men better. Perfection of character is its aim; and the revelation of God in His holiness and His mercy, in His law and His redemption is its means.

As when you see wheels, shafts, pins, bands lying apart, each finished in itself, yet each adapted to others, you know that some machine is contemplated by the founder, though you may not see how to put it together; but when you see the machine put together and in action, you perceive new fitness in every part and the grand combination of all for one end; so in the several books of the Bible, you discover an adaptation to the same end, but in the completed volume you behold the grand harmony of all the books in one object—the restoration of a sinful race to its Paradise in God! The mind that conceived such a plan, and slowly unfolding it, part by part, through the ages, brought it together finished in this book, must be divine. The Bible is a sublime symphony framed about the theme of man's reconciliation with God. The theme runs through different keys and various movements, but the listening ear catches it again and again; it emerges from the chaos of the Fall in the song of Moses, the servant of God; the harps of David and Isaiah give it a distincter and sublimer utterance; the angels breaking the silence of the midnight air chant it over Bethlehem; it rises more clear and waxes more loud in the doxologies of Paul and the choruses of John, until it rolls through the arches of heaven in one magnificent choral of earth and sky, the song of Moses and the Lamb.—J. P. Thompson, D. D., LL. D.

Unpardonable Sin, The. "The unpardonable sin," says the Rev. Dr. Richard Watson, "is, according to some, the ascribing to the devil the miracles which Christ wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost. This sin, or blasphemy, as it should rather be called, many Scribes and Pharisees were guilty of, who, beholding our Lord do His miracles, affirmed that He wrought them by Beelzebub, the prince of devils, which was, in effect, calling the Holy Ghost Satan, a most horrible blasphemy; and as on this ground they rejected Christ, and salvation by Him, their sin could certainly have no forgiveness (Mark iii, 22-30). No one, therefore, could be guilty of this blasphemy, except those who were spectators of Christ's miracles. There is, however, another view of this unpardonable offence, which deserves consideration: The sin or blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, says Bishop Tomline, is mentioned in the first three gospels. It appears that all the three evangelists agree in representing the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost as the crime which would not be forgiven; but no one of them affirms that those who had ascribed Christ's power of casting out devils to Beelzebub had been guilty of that sin; and in St. Luke it is not mentioned that any such charge had been made. Our Saviour, according to the account in St. Matthew and St. Mark, endeavored to convince the Jews of their error; but so far from accusing them of having committed an unpardonable sin in what they had said concerning him, he declares that 'whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him;' that is, whatever reproaches men may utter against the Son of Man during His ministry, however they may calumniate the authority upon which He acts, it is still possible that hereafter they may repent and believe, and all their sins may be forgiven them; but the reviling of the Holy Ghost is described as an offence of a far more heinous nature: 'The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men.' 'He that shall blaspheme against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness.' 'Unto him that blasphemeth against the Holy Ghost it shall not be forgiven.' It is plain that this sin against the Holy Ghost could not be committed while our Saviour was upon earth, since He always speaks of the Holy Ghost as not being to come till after His ascension into Heaven. A few days after that great event, the descent of the Holy Ghost enabled the Apostles to work miracles, and communicated to them a variety of other supernatural gifts. If men should ascribe these powers to Beelzebub, or in any respect reject their authority, they would blaspheme the Holy Ghost, from whom they were derived; and that sin would be unpardonable, because this was the completion of the evidence of the divine authority of Christ and His religion; and they who rejected these last means of conviction could have no other opportunity of being brought to faith in Christ, the only appointed condition of pardon and forgiveness. The greater heinousness of the sin of these men would consist in their rejecting a greater body of testimony; for they are supposed to be acquainted with the resurrection of our Saviour from the dead, with His ascension into heaven, with the miraculous descent of the Holy Ghost, and with the supernatural powers which it communicated; circumstances, all of which were enforced by the Apostles when they preached the gospel, but none of which could be known to those who refused to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah during His actual ministry. Though this was a great sin, it was not an unpardonable one; it might be remedied by subsequent belief, by yielding to subsequent testimony. But, on the other hand, they who finally rejected the accumulated and complete evidence of Jesus being the Messiah, as exhibited by the inspired Apostles, precluded themselves from the possibility of conviction, because no further testimony would be afforded them, and consequently, there being no means of repentance, they would be incapable of forgiveness and redemption. Hence it appears that the sin against the Holy Ghost consisted in finally rejecting the gospel as preached by the Apostles, who confirmed the truth of the doctrine which they taught 'by signs and wonders, and divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost' (Heb. ii, 4). It was unpardonable, because this was the consummation of the proofs afforded to the men of that generation of the divine mission of Christ. This sin was manifestly distinct from all other sins, it indicated an invincible obstinacy of mind, an impious and unalterable determination to refuse the offered mercy of God. It would appear from this, that those only committed or could commit this irremissible offence, who were witnesses of the mighty works wrought by the Holy Spirit in the Apostles after Christ's ascension and the day of Pentecost. Our Lord's declaration appears chiefly to respect the Jews. This view will serve to explain those passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews in which the hopeless case of Jewish apostates is described."

"The cases which in our times," says Dr. Andrew Fuller, "appear to approach the nearest to this sin are those of persons who apostatize from the truth after having enjoyed great religious advantages, obtained much light, felt strong convictions, and made considerable progress in reforming their conduct. The apostacy of such characters, as of some among the Hebrews, is sometimes sentimental. Having long felt the gospel way of salvation to grate upon their feelings, they fall in with some flesh-pleasing scheme, either that of open infidelity, or some one of those which approach the nearest to it, and now, their conduct becoming equally loose with their principles, when reproved by their friends they keep themselves in countenance by professing to have changed their sentiments in religious matters. In them is fulfilled what was predicted of some by the Apostle Paul: 'They received not the love of truth, that they might be saved. And for this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lie, and be damned.'

"The apostacy of others, like those described in the Second Epistle of Peter, is of a more practical nature. Having long felt the yoke of religion galling to their inclinations, they burst the bonds and let loose the reins of lust, and to ward off reproof and keep themselves in countenance, they affect to treat all religion with contempt, raking together the faults of professing Christians as an excuse for their own iniquities. Such characters are commonly the worst of all and the most dangerous to society; nor do I recollect any instance of their having been 'renewed again unto repentance;' 'twice dead,' they seem doomed to be 'plucked up by the roots.' In them is verified what our Lord speaks of a man out of whom should be cast an unclean spirit, which goeth forth in search of a new habitation, seeking rest but finding none, and at length resolves on a return to his old abode.' 'And when he cometh, he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then he goeth and taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there, and the last state of that man is worse than the first.'

"With respect to dejected minds, let it be observed, that no person, let his crimes have been what they may, if he be grieved at heart for having committed them, and sincerely ask forgiveness in the name of Christ, needs to fear that he shall be rejected. Such grief is itself a proof that he has not committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, because it is a mark of that sin to be accompanied with a hard and impenitent heart. Such characters may feel the remorse of a Cain, a Saul, or a Judas, but a tear of godly sorrow never dropped from their eyes."

Upson, Anson Judd, D. D., LL. D., is the eldest son of Dana Judd, and Mary F. (Clarke) Upson. He was born in Philadelphia, Pa., November 7th, 1823. At the death of his father, he was removed, at an early age, to the home of his maternal grandfather, in Utica N. Y. Receiving his preparatory education at the Utica Academy, he entered the Sophomore class of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., and was graduated in 1843, with one of the highest honors of his class. Immediately after graduation he began the study of the law, in the office of Messrs. Spencer and Kernan, of Utica. But in 1845 he accepted a tutorship in Hamilton College, and in 1849 was appointed Adjunct Professor of Rhetoric and Moral Philosophy in the same Institution. In 1853 he was made Professor of Logic, Rhetoric and Elocution in the same college, and held this chair until 1870.

He united with the Presbyterian Church in Clinton, N. Y., November 4th, 1856, and having studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. W. S. Curtis, of Hamilton College, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Utica, June 29th, 1859, and ordained by the same Presbytery, at Rome, N. Y., January 29th, 1868; October 23d, 1870, he was installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y., as the successor of the Rev. Dr. W. B. Sprague; September 14th, 1880, he was inaugurated Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology in the Auburn Theological Seminary; February 11th, 1874, Dr. Upson was elected, by the Legislature of New York, a member of the Board of Regents of the University, a Board which has the supervision of all the colleges and academies of the State. He has been a member of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church twice, in 1871 and again in 1877. In 1870 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Hamilton College, and in 1872 was elected a trustee of the same college. In 1880 he received the degree of Doctor of Laws from Union College. From 1845 to 1870, while connected with Hamilton College, Dr. Upson delivered many literary and historical lectures in the State of New York and in the Western States. He has written various articles for magazines and reviews, and has published many occasional sermons and addresses.

The students under Dr. Upson, both while he was Professor of Elocution at Hamilton College, and while Professor of Rhetoric at Auburn Seminary, regarded him as singularly fitted for the great work of instructing and training young men for public speaking. He combines the rare faculties of acquisition and communication, and is able to impart knowledge and inspire enthusiasm. The high rank of Hamilton College, in the matter of preparation for the rostrum and pulpit, the use of the pen and the use of the tongue, is mainly attributable to the genius and talent of one who could condescend, from the Professor's chair, to give a stammering, awkward student such painstaking drill as that to which Demosthenes owed his oratorical efficiency.

Dr. Upson, whether as a Tutor or Professor, preacher or pastor, husband, son or friend, stands high with those who best know him.

Ustick, Rev. Hugh Stewart, son of William A. Ustick and Mary Stewart, was born at Bloomingburg, Ohio, September 9th, 1832. He graduated at Miami University, in 1853, began his theological studies in New Albany Seminary, the ensuing Fall, and was licensed to preach by Chillicothe Presbytery, in 1855. He was installed as pastor of the Church in Hamilton, Ohio, in May, 1857. His labors there were much blessed. Instant in season and out of season, he brought everything to bear upon the great work of winning souls to Christ. The constant feeling of his heart was, "the time is short," and he toiled as one who should give an account of his stewardship. He died on the 31st of October, in the year of his installation. He was greatly beloved for his Christian excellence, and his death was deeply lamented.

Vallandigham, Rev. Clement, was born, March 7th, 1778, in what was then Virginia, now Allegheny county, Pa. His father was Col. George Vallandigham, a native of Virginia, but one of the pioneer settlers of Western Pennsylvania, and one who took an active part in defence of the settlements against the incursions of the Indians. Mr. Vallandigham graduated at Jefferson College in 1801, and studied theology with the Rev. Dr. John McMillan. He was licensed to preach, June 25th, 1806. In May, 1807, he removed to New Lisbon, Ohio, and on the 24th day of June following he was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place. There he spent the remainder of his life, during the whole of that time officiating as pastor of that church, and part of the time having also charge of the congregations of Long's Run and Salem. He died on the 21st day of October, 1839, greatly beloved and regretted by a people among whom his ministerial labors had been eminently successful.

Vallandigham, James L., D. D., is a native of New Lisbon, O., and a son of the Rev. Clement Vallandigham, who was for thirty-two years pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that place. He graduated at Jefferson College, maintaining a high standing in a class of thirty. After graduating, he taught for six years in several places. He was admitted to the Bar, and practiced law in his native town until 1833, when he commenced the study of theology under the direction of A. O. Patterson, D. D., who was then pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of that place. After being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Lisbon, he continued to teach for some time. In 1850 he was ordained and installed as pastor of the churches of Princess Anne and Rehoboth, in Somerset county, Md. On May 14th, 1854, he was installed pastor of the churches of White Clay Creek, Head of Christiana, and Newark, Del. In 1860 he resigned the charge of the Newark Church, continuing in charge of the other two churches until 1875. In that year he became pastor of the Head of Christiana alone, and has continued in that relation ever since.

Dr. Vallandigham's preaching has always been earnest, practical, instructive and, in a good degree, doctrinal. All the churches under his care have been blessed with extensive revivals and large additions. Each of the three churches under his pastoral care erected a new edifice during his connection with them, and each is now a separate pastoral charge. In 1881 the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him by Westminster College, Mo. He has published the life of his brother, the Hon. C. L. Vallandigham, two editions of an "Address on the Evils of Intemperance," was at one time an assistant editor of a Temperance paper, has frequently contributed to the press, and is the author of the "Historical Sketches of the Presbyterian Churches of the State of Delaware," published in the "Encyclopedia of Delaware." Dr. Vallandigham still resides in Newark, and enjoys the unabated affection and confidence of all the congregations of which he has been pastor, and the respect of the community at large.

Vanartsdalen, Rev. Jacob, a native of Somerset county, N. J., was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, June 19th, 1771, and in 1774 took charge of the Church of Springfield, N. J., where he continued in the orderly and faithful performance of the duties of his office, as far as his health permitted, for more than a quarter of a century. He was released from his charge May 6th, 1801, and died October 24th, 1803.

Vance, Rev. Hugh, received his license to preach from Donegal Presbytery, about 1771, and in 1772, was ordained and settled as pastor of Tinscarora and Back Creek churches, Va. He died, December 31st, 1791.

Vance, Rev. Joseph, was born in Washington county, Pa., October 8th, 1837. He graduated at Washington College in 1858, at the Western Theological Seminary in 1861, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Washington, April 19th, 1860. He was settled as pastor of the Church of Beaver Dam, Wisconsin. In September, 1865, he was called to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church, Vincennes, Ind., where he labored with great acceptance till July, 1874. During the Summer of 1875 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church, Reading, Pa. In December of that year he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa., of which he still has charge. Mr. Vance is characterized by great gentleness of manner. His knowledge of men is wide and accurate, whilst his judgment is always tempered by a Christ-like charity. Sympathetic in all his pastoral relations, his ministrations from house to house are peculiarly welcome and efficient. His preaching necessarily partakes of his qualities as a man. In manner he is simple, direct, conversational—a manner which is the natural outcome of a logical mind, chaste imagination and devout heart. He is of the Johannean rather than the Pauline type of ministers. He is popular in the community in which he lives, loved by his people, and his general work in the ministry has not been without seals of the Divine approval. The old historic church of which he has charge is strong in numbers, social influence and sterling religious life.

Van Cleve, Rev. Robert Stansbury, was born at Beaver Meadow, Pa., October 16th, 1842. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1863, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Erie, December 14th, 1866, was stated supply at Westfield, N. Y., 1866, pastor 1868-9, and since 1870 has been pastor of the Church at Leetsdale, Pa. He is an instructive and impressive preacher, blessed in his ministry and beloved by his people.

Van Doren, Rev. William, was born at Griggstown, N. J., March 14th, 1811. He graduated at New Jersey College, in 1835, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was Professor at Columbia College, Missouri in 1837; Professor in the Missouri State University, in 1843; Principal at Lexington, Mo., 1843-50; Professor in Westminster College, Mo., 1850-62; Teacher at Napa City, Stockton and Visalia, Cal., 1862-67; and Principal at Watsonville, 1867-75. He died at Watsonville, Cal., December 3d, 1877. He was a gentleman of strong and cultivated intellect, and excelled as an instructor.

Van Dyke, Henry Jackson, D.D., was born in Abingdon, Montgomery county, Pa., March 2d, 1822. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1843, also studied at Yale College, and completed his theological course at Princeton Seminary in 1845. He was ordained by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, in June, 1845. He was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Bridgeton, N. J., 1845-52, and pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa., 1852-3, in both which fields his labors were successful, when he was called to his present charge, the First Presbyterian Church of HENRY JACKSON VAN DYKE, D.D.

Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1872, after the faithful labors of nineteen years, he resigned the pastorate of the church in Brooklyn, to accept a call to a leading Presbyterian church in Nashville, Tenn. Before entering permanently upon his duties in Nashville, he went abroad, and on his return, when about to undertake them, the Brooklyn church gave him a call to resume his pastorate, which he finally accepted. Here he has since continued, the congregation having largely increased under his ministry, besides enjoying the most gratifying evidence of spiritual and temporal prosperity.

Dr. Van Dyke has an earnest and active temperament. He is very cordial with all, ardent in his friendship and sympathies, and has the courage for any effort or enterprise which he deems to be right. He is very firm in his convictions of truth and duty, and maintains them at all hazards. He is a very effective speaker. His voice is strong and harmonious, and he displays that style of vigorous reasoning which is at once proof of sincerity and ability. He preaches with striking powers of pathos and logic. Among his published sermons are "Moses, the Servant of the Lord," "How Old Art Thou?" "The Commandment, with Promise," "The Conversion of Saul," "Politics for Christmas," "Giving Thanks for All Things," "The Character and Blessedness of the Peacemaker." These sermons all show much originality of thought, clearness of expression and earnest eloquence. In 1870 Dr. Van Dyke was prominent in the movement for the reunion of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Church. He was one of a Committee of the General Assembly convened at Philadelphia, who were sent to the General Assembly in session at Louisville. In 1876 he was Moderator of the General Assembly at its meeting at Brooklyn. He has a high standing in the Church as an authority on doctrine and discipline.

ated from Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute in 1869; entered Princeton College with the class of 1873, and took the Junior Orator prize; was the successful writer of three prize essays, and received the Senior prize in English literature, graduating with the English Salutatory and habetur oration. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1874; delivered the Master's oration at college in 1876; was corresponding editor of the Philadelphia Presbyterian, editor of the "Princeton Book," and was licensed to preach in 1876. In 1877, he went to Germany, was matriculated in the University of Berlin, and studied, for two terms, New Testament criticism and Christology, under Professors Dörner and Weiss. He was called to the United Congregational Church, in Newport, in December, 1878, and during his ministry there the church was blessed with marked prosperity. In September, 1882, he was called to the pastorate of the Brick Church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-seventh street, New York. The call was accepted, and he was installed in January, 1883, immediately after which the debt of the church was paid, and twenty-two thousand dollars were contributed for repairing and decorating the building. Mr. Van Dyke is a contributor to Harper's Magazine, The Contemporary, Princeton Presbyterian Review, etc. He is a fine scholar, a writer of decided ability, and an able, attractive, impressive and successful preacher.

Van Dyke, Rev. John P., was born in Adams county, Pa., October 18th, 1803. He graduated at Miami University in 1826; studied theology with Rev. Dr. Bishop, of Miami University, and in 1828 was licensed by Miami Presbytery. In June, 1829, he was installed over West Union Church, Ohio, and during twenty-three years here labored with great earnestness and acceptableness. In 1852 he removed to Red Oak, Ohio, and served that church until 1854, when he was called to Frankfort Church, Indiana. Here he labored as stated supply, not accepting the call, owing to the illness of himself and family. He subsequently accepted a call to Pleasant Ridge Church, Ohio. He died August 13th, 1862. He was an able divine, remarkable for his thorough knowledge of the Scriptures, and for his skill in their interpretation. His preaching was eminently doctrinal, and yet it had such an experimental odor, and was so earnestly and practically applied, as to secure much good fruit. His daily walk was ever such as to exemplify his teachings.

Vannuys, Henry Logan, D.D., was born in Shelby county, Kentucky, on the 3d of November, 1829. His father, Tunis Vannuys, was an exemplary Christian and elder in the Presbyterian Church. His mother, Kate Demares, of Huguenot blood, was a woman of remarkable strength of character and most devoted piety. He was prepared for college under private tuition, and graduated at Hanover College, Ind., in 1848. Studied theology in the Seminary at Princeton, N. J., and graduated there in 1852. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, and began preaching in Goshen, Elkhart county, Ind., October, 1852. He organized the Presbyterian Church of Goshen, on the 12th of March, 1853, and on the 16th of the next June he was ordained and installed its pastor, by the Lake Presbytery, and ever since has been, and now is, the acceptable, faithful and much loved pastor of the church so organized by him.

He is a man of strong will, clear conceptions, generous impulses, and scrupulously tender of the rights of others. His life is singularly pure, and all his acts are strongly characteristic of good common sense. He has few or no enemies. His sermons are terse in style, pure in diction, logical in thought, evincing great research and studious preparation, and yet free from all ostentatious display. His morning sermons are especially interesting, and listened to with marked attention, being filled with Biblical citations, historic references, poetic gems and earnest religious pathos. He is a diligent student and ripe scholar, and in 1881 Wabash College conferred upon him the degree of D. D., an honor most worthily bestowed.

Van Rensselaer, Cortlandt, D.D., was one of the Church's most beloved and useful men. He was born in Albany, N. Y., May 26th, 1808; graduated at Yale College in 1827, and studied theology at Union Seminary, Va., and at Princeton. He was ordained as evangelist by the Presbytery of West Hanover, 1835; was missionary to the slaves in Virginia, 1833-5; pastor at Burlington, N. J., 1837-40; stated supply of the Second Church, Washington, D. C., 1841-2; agent of Princeton Seminary, 1841; Secretary of the Board of Education, 1846-60; and editor of the Home, School and Church and Presbyterian Magazine. He died in Burlington, July 25th, 1860.

Dr. Van Rensselaer had his birth and education amidst decidedly Christian influences, and yet amidst those temptations to a life of indolent ease which are always incident, especially in this country, to a condition of great opulence and worldly consideration. Happily, in his case, Christianity early assumed the dominion in his heart, so that he passed safely the ordeal to which Providence subjected him, and came out of the walks of the most elegant refinement, willing to work in any part of the Master's vineyard in which he could be useful. He was held in the highest esteem by his brethren in the ministry, and by all the communities in which he lived and labored. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1857, and a Director of the Princeton Theological Seminary, always devoted to its interests. "The office which he held during the greater part of his professional life, discharging its duties not only most faithfully, but gratuitously," says Dr. W. B. Sprague, "placed him at the head of one of the great fountains of influence by which the Seminary is sustained. Who that knew him will ever forget the fertility of his mind in projects of Christian usefulness, and the exuberance of his charity in carrying them into effect? Who can forget the kindness of his smile, the meekness and modesty of his spirit, the firmness with which he adhered to his own mature convictions, and the graceful facility and generous indulgence with which he met the adverse opinions of others, his practical obliviousness of worldly rank, his wit, sometimes taking the form of a delicate inuendo, and sometimes doing the work of a two-edged sword; his zeal and energy, shrinking from no sacrifices, halting at no obstacles, and revealing a heart deeply in communion with Him, 'who, though he was rich, for our sakes became poor?' His death was the signal for mourning much beyond the limits of his own communion. The marble that marks the place of his grave might well bear the inscription: 'An exalted specimen of sanctified humanity.'"

Van Tries, Samuel, was born in Shirleysburg, Pa. His early life was spent in Franklin county and Bedford county (now Fulton), where he engaged in the manufacture of iron. Subsequently he removed to one of his farms at the head of Penn's Creek, in Penn's Valley, Centre county, Pa. In 1851 he removed to Potter's Mills, Pa., where he resided for sixteen years. He then removed to Bellefonte, where he spent the evening of his days, and where he died, August 21st, 1883, in the eighty-first year of his age. Mr. Van Tries united with the Presbyterian Church of Sinking Creek, of which he was for years an active and consistent member. Subsequently he was chosen an elder, which office he filled with fidelity and great acceptance. As an elder, he was a model. The interests of Zion were ever near his heart. He subordinated all other interests to his religious interests. He had a tongue ever ready to speak intelligently and earnestly for Christ, and his consistent Christian life gave force to all his utterances. By his earnest prayers, his prudent counsel, his tender sympathy, and his unimpeachable sincerity, he was an efficient helper to his pastor. He was a diligent and intelligent student of the Bible, as his unobtrusive utterances in the Bible class, in the meeting for prayer and in Christian converse fully testified. With all his other excellencies, he was a modest man. Ready to defer to others rather than to thrust himself into the front; shrinking from rather than courting prominence; depreciative of rather than disposed to magnify himself. With such a life, as might be anticipated, his death was peaceful.

Van Vorst, Hooper C., LL. D., was born in the city of Schenectady, State of New York. He was graduated at Union College, New York, in 1839. He pursued the study of the Law at Schenectady until 1841, when he removed to Albany, where, having finished his studies and entered upon the practice of his profession, he was shortly afterwards appointed by the Municipal Board, Attorney and Counsel to the City, which office he held for several years. While in college he became a professor of religion, and united with the Presbyterian Church in Schenectady, then under the charge of the Rev. Dr. Backus, and in Albany he was a member of the church of which the Rev. Dr. John N. Campbell was pastor. In 1853 he removed to the city of New York, where he was quite extensively engaged in the practice of the Law, until 1868, when he was appointed, by the Governor of the State, a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In 1871 he was chosen by the people to be a Justice of the Superior Court of the City of New York for a term of fourteen years. Since the year 1873, however, he has, under the designation of the Governor of the State, been sitting in the Supreme Court, holding circuits and special terms, but rendering occasional service in the Superior Court. Upon coming to New York city, in 1853, he united with the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, now under the pastorate of Rev. Dr. John Hall, but then under the charge of Dr. James W. Alexander. For several years he was Superintendent of the Sunday school, and is now an elder of that church. Before his election to the Bench, he was a member of the Board of Education, having charge of Public Instruction in the city of New York; and he is now a member of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, and a Trustee of the "Children's Aid Society." He was a Commissioner from the Presbytery of New York to the General Assembly which met at Saratoga, in May, 1883.

His private and social life has been marked by sincerity, simplicity of manners, warm and constant friendships, and active sympathy with charitable and religious concerns. His manner on the Bench has never been wanting in courtesy, and that "patience and gravity of hearing" which has been said to be an essential part of justice. His natural temperament is averse to extremes, and in his administration of justice he seems to have borne in mind what Bacon says of Judicature: "Where the wine press is hard wrought, it yields a harsh wine that tastes of the grape stones." His judicial course has been characterized by learning, impartiality and inflexible adherence to the law and equity of the cases brought before him. His written opinions are, in style, clear, and in reasoning, cogent and comprehensive. Not unfrequently, where appeals have been taken from his decisions, the Appellate Court has adopted, in hæc verba, his opinions as its own. Since his assignment to the Supreme Court, a large part of its equity business in the city of New York, has come before him. To have filled all the offices with which he has been intrusted by the confidence of his fellow-citizens, without a shadow of distrust, and especially to have discharged in so clear a manner his high judicial functions, to the general satisfaction of the Bar and the public, in a great city, whose citizens, selecting their own magistrates, elected him to its highest court when the political party to which he belonged was in a large minority, must be taken as no light confirmation of his many titles to the honor and esteem with which his career has been attended.

Vedder, Charles Stuart, D. D., is the son of Albert A. and Susan (Fulton) Vedder, and was born in Schenectady, N. Y., October 7th, 1826. Having graduated at Union College in 1851, he remained there as Tutor for one year. He entered the Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C., October, 1860, and was licensed to preach by Charleston Presbytery, in April, 1861. He was called to the Presbyterian Church of Summerville, S. C., in the same year, and remained there until November, 1866, when he was called to the French Protestant (Huguenot) Church, of Charleston, S. C., of which he is still the pastor. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the New York University, and from Charleston College in 1876.

Dr. Vedder is a man of varied gifts, wide and accurate scholarship, and elegant culture. Cherishing a preference for historical and literary, rather than philosophical studies, he has kept abreast of the age in his chosen departments of learning; and his ample stores of knowledge are always at his command, either in the pulpit, on the platform, or in the social circle. His sermons are carefully prepared, original and fresh in matter, polished and often brilliant in style, impressive and eloquent in delivery. Dr. Vedder never uses a manuscript. Of a fine poetic sensibility, and marvelous facility in versification, he has produced many charming lyrics that have been favorably received. His warm, sympathetic nature, his genial humor, his broad charity, his rare conversational powers, and his passionate fondness for children, have made him the favorite of all classes in the community, as well as the admired and beloved pastor. His noble public spirit has ever generously responded to the frequent calls for his valuable services in the cause of education or temperance, and of philanthropy. The amiable and gentle virtues for which his character is most conspicuous are allied with great independence, dignity and manliness.

Venable, Charles Scott, LL. D., was born at Longwood, in Prince Edward county, Va., April 19th, 1827. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College in 1842, remained another year as a resident graduate, in the further prosecution of his studies, and in 1843 was appointed Tutor of Mathematics in the college, the duties of which office he performed for two years, at the same time pursuing the study of law. In 1846 he was elected to the chair of Mathematics and Astronomy at Hampden-Sidney, which position he held for more than ten years. The session of 1847-48 he spent at the University of Virginia, in the study of Mixed Mathematics and Engineering, and established for himself a reputation for Mathematical ability unsurpassed in the history of that Institution. In 1852 he went abroad to avail himself of the advantages of foreign Universities. From January, 1856, for one year, he occupied the chair of Physics and Chemistry in the University of Georgia. In January, 1858, he accepted the chair of Mathematics and Astronomy in South Carolina College, and discharged the duties of his department with marked ability and success. In 1865 he was elected to the chair of Mathematics in the University of Virginia, where he now is, every day adding to his reputation as a learned mathematician, an accomplished scholar, a teacher of extraordinary ability and tact, and the encourager of all that is good and honorable among men.

CHARLES SCOTT VENABLE, LL. D.

Professor Venable was one of the five commissioners, under Professor Stephen Alexander, of Princeton, appointed, in 1860, to visit Labrador and observe the solar eclipse of that year. In 1874 he was appointed visitor to the Miller Manual Labor School, in Albemarle county, Va., and still continues to serve that Institution of beneficence with the most interested zeal. He has published several mathematical works, which are recognized as of very great merit.

He has been an active and useful elder in the Presbyterian Church at Charlottesville, since 1878, and was a delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council which met in Philadelphia in 1880. Professor Venable's qualities of mind and heart fit him admirably for the position which he holds. He is a model college officer. His dignity of deportment, his love for young men and sympathy with them, are very marked, and render him very attractive to his pupils. In all things he is straightforward and honest. He is not simply a learned and accomplished mathematician, but a scholar of varied and extensive acquirements; a man of broad views, great public spirit, and active and enlightened sympathies.

Venable, Rev. Henry Isaac, was born in Shelby county, Kentucky, June 28th, 1811. He graduated at Centre College in 1830; at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, in 1834, and in the same year was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery. In 1831 he sailed as a missionary for Zulu Land, in South Africa, where he labored, with great earnestness and self-denial, until he was driven from his field by war, when he returned to the United States, in March, 1839. He supplied the Church at Paris, Illinois, from October 1st, 1839, until December 1st, 1841. At the latter date he founded the Edgar Female Academy, at Paris. He was stated supply at Charleston, Illinois, from 1853 to 1856; then of Oakland Church, from April 1st, 1856, to May 1st, 1860, at which date he was installed its pastor, and continued so until 1865. After this he supplied the Church at Newton, Illinois, then Carlisle and Claiborne churches, and York Church, all in Illinois. In 1870 he became Principal of Edgar Collegiate Institute, at Paris, and continued so until a short time before his death, May 22d, 1878. Mr. Venable was a truly godly man, an earnest and faithful minister of the gospel, a true and faithful friend, universally esteemed and loved by his brethren.

Vermilion Institute. A Presbyterian Academy at Hayesville, Ashland county, Ohio, founded in 1816; donated to the Presbytery of Richland in 1849. The Presbyteries of Wooster and Coshocton afterwards took part in its support and management. After the reunion, in 1870, it belonged to Wooster Presbytery alone, until, in 1875, when, on account of various difficulties, it was sold to the citizens of Hayesville.

The Rev. W. W. Colmery, D.D., the Rev. Sanders Dieffendorf, D.D., and Professor A. F. Ross, LL.D., were successively Principals of Vermilion. John Simpson, PH.D., was for many years a valued Instructor in Mathematics and the Natural Sciences, and the Rev. T. K. Davis was for several years Professor of Languages. The school will ever be associated most closely with the name of Dr. Dieffendorf, who presided over it nearly all the time it was a Presbyterian Academy. Before the opening of Wooster University, in 1870, Vermilion served as a college for many of the O. S. Presbyterians in Ohio. It had a large patronage, over two hundred students being in attendance for several years, and it was eminently useful. Students who went there avowed infidels or utterly careless about eternal things, because they came from irreligious families, were converted to the faith and entered the gospel ministry. Down to 1875, more than one hundred of the Hayesville students had become ministers of Christ. Some of them are occupying prominent positions in the Church, and several have been efficient missionaries in foreign lands. Both sexes were received on an equality from the beginning. And the number of Christian wives and mothers and lady teachers, at home and on mission fields, who received their inspiration and spiritual impulse at "Old Vermilion" is quite large.

W

Waddell, James, D. D., was born at Newry, in the North of Ireland, in July, 1739. His parents migrated to America in his infancy, and settled in the Southeastern part of Pennsylvania, on White Clay Creek. As a student in the school of Rev. Dr. Finley, at Nottingham, he enjoyed excellent advantages for both intellectual and moral culture. Such was his proficiency, especially in the classics, that Dr. Finley took him at an early age to be his assistant. Afterward he was, for a year or more, an assistant in the celebrated school of Rev. Robert Smith, D. D., at Pequea, Lancaster county, Pa. Traveling South, he made the acquaintance of the Rev. Samuel Davies, in Hanover county, Va., and, though having been studying medicine before this, was persuaded by Mr. Davies to abandon it and enter the ministry. He studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Mr. Todd, of Louisa county, and was licensed to preach the gospel, April 2d, 1761, by the (Old) Presbytery of Hanover.

On the 7th of October, 1762, Mr. Waddell accepted a call from the churches of Lancaster and Northumberland, Va., and on the 16th of June he was ordained at Prince Edward. The ill effect of the climate upon his health, in connection with the inroads of the Revolutionary War, led him, about the year 1776, to resign his charge and remove to the Valley of the Shenandoah. On May 1st, 1776, he received a call from Tinkling Spring Church, in Augusta. For some time his labors were confined to this Church, but afterward they were shared by the congregation at Staunton. In 1785 he removed to an estate which he had purchased at the Eastern base of the Blue Ridge. He preached in several churches in the neighborhood, and also became, for the fourth time, a classical teacher, and received pupils in his own house.

Some time after his removal to Louisa, Dr. Waddell was overtaken with the calamity of blindness, but he continued to preach, availing himself, in his preparations, of the assistance of different members of his family, in finding the text, consulting the commentaries, etc., and the effect of his preaching was not a little heightened by the fact that he was seen to be speaking in total darkness. His latter days were eminently serene and happy. Before his decease he gave orders that all his manuscripts should be committed to the flames, that his funeral should be conducted in the most simple manner, and that his body should be borne to the grave by his own servants. His death, which was a bright scene of Christian triumph, occurred on the 17th of September, 1805.

Most persons are familiar with the glowing description given of Dr. Waddell's preaching by William Wirt, in the British Spy. He was peculiarly eloquent and impressive, and greatly admired by the intelligent and refined. James Barbour, Governor of Virginia, told an eminent physician in Philadelphia, that Dr. Waddell, whose pupil he had been, had spoiled him in regard to hearing other preachers.

Waddell, John Newton, D.D., LL.D., youngest son of Rev. Dr. Moses Waddell, of South Carolina, was born April 2d, 1812, at Willington, S. C. He prepared for the University of Georgia, at Athens, Ga., and graduated in that Institution, August 5th, 1829. He joined the Presbyterian Church in 1839, in Green county, Ala.; was taken under care of the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, in the same year; was licensed by the Presbytery of Mississippi, September 15th, 1841; and was ordained by the Presbytery of Tombecbee, September 23d, 1843. He was first settled as preacher at Mount Hermon, Smith county, Miss.; then at Mount Moriah, Newton county, Miss., alternating with Montrose, Miss. This continued until 1848, when, removing to Oxford, Miss., he supplied the church there in conjunction with Hopewell Church, near Oxford. Here he continued until 1857. He then supplied LaGrange Church, where he was associated with Dr. J. H. Gray. After acting as agent of Synod of Alabama for establishing the Orphan Asylum at Tuskegee, Ala., he supplied Oxford Church again, from 1865 to 1872, partly with Hopewell Church. In 1874 he removed to Memphis, Tenn., and supplied, as his last charge, Lauderdale Street Church until 1879.

Dr. Waddell's work has been largely connected with literary institutions, in all of which he has won a high reputation. He taught the academy from 1830 to 1834, at Willington, S. C., and taught another academy from 1842 to 1848, at Montrose, Miss. He was then elected Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Mississippi, where he served until 1857. He was then called to La Grange Synodical College, as Professor of Ancient Languages, serving as such until 1860, when he was made President of the same college, which office he held until the college was closed by the war. In 1865, called to the University of Mississippi as Chancellor, he served in this capacity until 1874. Resigning to accept the Secretaryship of Education of the Southern Church, he served in this office until 1879, when he accepted a call to the Chancellorship of the Southwestern Presbyterian University. He is still occupying this position.

Dr. Waddell was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church in its meeting at Baltimore, in 1868. His whole ministry has been one of great activity and widely extended usefulness. Blessed with a vigorous constitution, and until within the last few years with fine health, he has done an unusual amount of service in all his different charges. As a preacher, he is always evangelical, instructive and attractive. He is eminently conservative in all his doctrinal views, and may be regarded as a representative man of the Southern Church. It is, however, as an educator that he has won his widest reputation. Much of his life has been spent in this department of work. In the instruction of youth and in the government of collegiate institutions he seems to have inherited the genius of his distinguished father. Eminently wise in counsel, judicious and practical in all his methods, he has never failed to secure the respect, confidence and affection of young men in all the institutions of education with which he has been connected. There is probably no man in all the Southern Church who could be placed before him in this respect. Nor are there many in all the country who to an equal degree possess those high qualities of thorough scholarship, practical wisdom, good sense, firmness and affability which make the popular and efficient college president.

Waddell, Moses, D. D., was of Irish parentage. He was born in Rowan (now Fredell) county, N. C., July 29th, 1770. He received his academic education at a school which was opened in the neighborhood under the name of Clio's Nursery. He was engaged in teaching from 1784 to 1788, at several places in North Carolina and Georgia. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College in 1791; and was licensed by the Hanover Presbytery, of Virginia, to preach, May 12th, 1792. In 1793 or 1794 he opened a school in Columbia county, Ga., and in 1801 a school in Vienna, Abbeville District, S. C. Here he remained until 1804, when he removed to Willington, a country-seat of his own establishment, about six miles south of Vienna. In 1818 he was elected President of the University of Georgia, and in May, 1819, entered upon the duties of this office. Under his administration the Institution attained a measure of prosperity altogether unequalled in its previous history. Here he remained until August, 1829, when he resigned his place, and in February following he returned to Willington. This was the close of a course of pre-ceptorial labors that had continued forty-five years. His labors in the ministry continued six or seven years longer. Dr. Waddle closed his pre-eminently useful life, July 21st, 1840. His character, as a Christian, was unexceptionable. His piety burned with a steady flame. He was active and constant in the discharge of his ministerial duties, and he shrunk from no labor which his ecclesiastical relations imposed upon him. "He discharged," says the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, "punctually and faithfully the various duties attached to all his private relations. He was sociable and amiable, but not without a due mixture of sternness and firmness. As a minister of the gospel, he was pious, zealous, and well versed in theology generally. His style of preaching was plain, simple, earnest. He addressed himself much more to the understanding than to the imagination or passions. As a teacher he stands almost unrivaled."

Waddle, Rev. John, was born July 4th, 1837, in Ohio county, West Virginia. After graduating at Franklin College (New Athens, Ohio), in 1858, and at the Allegheny (U. P.) Theological Seminary, in 1862, he was ordained and installed pastor of the United Presbyterian Church at Decatur, Ohio, in 1863. In 1869 he received and accepted a call to the United Presbyterian Church at Kirkwood, Illinois, where he labored, with great profit to the church, and holding a very high place in the esteem of the community, until August, 1876, when he resigned the charge of this church to accept a call to the Presbyterian Church of Knoxville, Illinois, in the Peoria Presbytery. This church Mr. Waddle continues to serve, with great acceptance and profit.

As a preacher, Mr. Waddle is clear, concise, forcible, direct, scriptural, orthodox and especially spiritual. Never resorting to the sensational to attract or interest, he always comes to the pulpit with something fresh and instructive, which attracts to hold. His delivery is always impressive, though varying greatly with the character of his theme. Sometimes unimpassioned and quiet, but more frequently with considerable action, unconsciously using the arts of the elocutionist, and sometimes, especially when he speaks without notes, he becomes somewhat dramatic, when he sways an audience with great power. He is considered one of the leading pulpit orators of Central Illinois. As a pastor, Mr. Waddle is best estimated by the uniform personal attachment of his people.

Wadsworth, Charles, D. D., son of Henry and Mary Ann (Bradley) Wadsworth, was born at Litchfield, Conn., May 8th, 1811; graduated from Union College, New York, 1837; after his graduation, taught one year in Canajoharie, N. Y.; spent two years, 1838-1840, in Princeton Seminary; was licensed by Troy Presbytery, October 23d, 1840; was ordained by the same Presbytery, February 17th, 1842, and on the same day installed pastor of the Second Church of Troy, N. Y., from which, after eight years of brilliant and most successful pulpit service, he was released, March 5th, 1850. From March 20th, 1850, to April 3d, 1862, he was, with great popularity and effectiveness, pastor of the Arch Street Church, Philadelphia. He was installed November 5th, 1862, over Calvary Church, San Francisco, Cal., and after it had been greatly enlarged and strengthened by his labors, he was released, November 13th, 1869. He was installed December 19th, 1869, pastor of the Third Reformed Dutch Church, Philadelphia. In 1873 this church united with the Western Presbyterian Church, under the new name of Immanuel Presbyterian Church. The court having decided that this church could not hold the church property of the Third Reformed Church, in February, 1878, Immanuel Church was united with the Clinton Street Church, under the name of the Clinton Street Immanuel Church, and Dr. Wadsworth was installed its pastor, March 25th, 1879, continuing to be so until his death, April 1st, 1882. Dr. Wadsworth was gifted with a brilliant and inexhaustible imagination, great pathos of tone and earnestness of manner, a power of presenting gospel truth in a wonderfully fresh and impressive manner. For a long course of years the large churches in which he preached were densely packed with eager hearers. In private life he was ordinarily shy, diffident and reserved, but among his special friends, was cordial, frank, and often full of humor.

Wagner, General Louis, a prominent and active elder of the Market Square Presbyterian Church, Germantown, Pa., and the efficient Superintendent of its Sabbath school, was born in the city of Giessen, Germany, August 4th, 1838. He accompanied his parents to this country in his boyhood, and learned the business of lithographic printing in Philadelphia, which he continued until 1861. At present he is engaged in the insurance business. General Wagner was a member of the City Councils, 1867-73, and was President of the Common Council, 1869-70. He was a member of the Board of Public Education, 1870-73. He has been a member of the Board of Managers of the Almshouse. He has always been deeply interested in movements looking to moral reform, and has been specially active and prominent in his advocacy of the Temperance cause. By his natural ability, indomitable perseverance and strict integrity, he has won, in a high degree, public confidence and esteem.

Waith, Rev. William, was born in Herefordshire, England, April 17th, 1796; became an attorney in London; emigrated to America in 1832, and spent a few years in secular business. On September 6th, 1837, he was ordained an evangelist by Buffalo Presbytery. He ministered successively to a Church in Burton, in Napoli, in Ellington, in Silver Creek, and in Ripley, in which last field he died in the midst of his labors, June 4th, 1860. He was a man of unfeeling warmth and generosity, approachable, kind and charitable to the lowliest sons of grief; frank and fearless, without a particle of harshness or rancor; a determined foe to oppression in all its forms; a fast friend, ever bright and cheerful, full of hope; a good preacher, Calvinistic and Presbyterian, without bigotry; a laborious and faithful pastor.

Wales, Rev. Eleazer, settled at Crosswicks, or Crossweeksung, soon after 1730, but obtained leave from Philadelphia Presbytery to resign the charge, September 19th, 1734, on account of inadequacy of support. He was called to Millstone, September 19th, 1735, and joined East Jersey Presbytery, within the bounds of which it lay. Mr. Wales was one of the first members of New Brunswick Presbytery. He is mentioned incidentally, once or twice, in Whitefield's Journal, as having come to Amwell and New Brunswick to meet him. His name is also seen in Brainerd's Diary, among the contributors to the support of his mission. He died in 1749.

Walker, Rev. Richard, son of Richard and Sarah (Henderson) Walker, was born in West Nantmeal Township, Chester county, Pa., May 1st, 1812. He learned the trade of a blacksmith, and practiced it until his thoughts were turned to the ministry. At the age of twenty years he was received, on profession of his faith, to the communion of the Presbyterian Church of Brandywine Manor, under the ministry of the Rev. J. N. C. Grier, D.D. He received his academical education at the Hopewell Academy, and then continued his studies under the direction of the Rev. John M. Dickey, D.D., at Oxford, Pa., for about one year. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1839, and spent two years in study there; was licensed by the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, April 8th, 1841; was ordained by the same Presbytery at Bridgeton, N. J., April 21st, 1842; was stated supply of the Womelsdorf Church, Pa., 1842; was installed pastor of the Allentown and Catasauqua churches, Pa., May 31st, 1844, and released, January 11th, 1859. He then went to Philadelphia, to take charge of a projected church on Tioga street, where he labored as stated supply for three years, during which the church was organized and a church edifice erected for its accommodation. He then returned to Allentown, where he taught a private school for several years. In 1867 he labored in the mountains, near Alburdis, Pa., where over thirty souls were converted. These became the nucleus around which the Lock Ridge Church was afterwards formed. He continued to preach in Alburdis most of the time, and occasionally in other churches, until 1870, when he was invited to devote all his time to Lock Ridge. Under his ministry the church at Lock Ridge was organized and a house of worship erected. For eight years he preached to that people every Sabbath, making, in all, ten years of service among them, with little pecuniary reward, but to the salvation of many souls. This was his last field of active labor. He was an earnest man, of thorough integrity and of fine Christian character. He died at his residence in Allentown, Pa., May 10th, 1882.

Wallace, Dr. Benjamin J., was born in Erie, Pa., June 10th, 1810. He made a profession of religion in his twelfth year. In 1827, after trying law and clerkship, he entered West Point as a military cadet, but believing himself called to a higher service, he left West Point and studied theology in Princeton Seminary. Here he felt himself at home. In 1834 he was settled in Russellville, Ky. In 1837 he was installed over the Church in York, Pa. In 1846 he was elected Professor of Languages in Newark College, Del. In 1852 he was selected as editor of the Presbyterian Quarterly Review. He died July 25th, 1862.

Dr. Wallace's style, both as a preacher and reviewer, was characterized by great vivacity and freshness. He was very active in ecclesiastical affairs. His last words were, "I move into the light."

Wallace, Charles Clark, D.D., was born in the city of New York, June 3d, 1832, and was the third child of William and Anna (Clark) Wallace. He graduated from the New York University in 1853, and from Union Theological Seminary in 1856; was licensed by the Third Presbytery of New York, April 9th, 1853, and was by the same ordained and installed pastor of the Union Presbyterian Church, Tremont, N. Y., June 4th, 1856, then a new enterprise in the outskirts of the city; October 11th, 1860, accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Perth Amboy, N. J., and was settled by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, February 1st, 1864; resigned to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Placerville, California. After a successful pastorate and the erection of a new house of worship, returned East, March 1st, 1868.

Dr. Wallace is the author of several printed sermons, which have had extensive circulation, among which is "Positiveness in Preaching," delivered as the retiring Moderator of the Synod of New York. He is also an occasional contributor to the religious press. As a preacher, he is always sound, sensible and earnest; as a pastor, faithful and affectionate; as a presiding officer, dignified, discriminating and decided, and in all relations a Christian gentleman.

Wallace, Rev. J. Albert, is the eighth of twelve children of Rev. Benjamin and Mary (Anderson) Wallace, and was born at Soddy, Hamilton county, Tenn., January 16th, 1816. Graduated at King College, Bristol, Tenn., 1871, and at Union Theological Seminary, Va., 1874. He was licensed to preach by Knoxville Presbytery at Athens, Tenn., 1873, and ordained by Holston Presbytery, Synod of Nashville, April, 1874. He was stated supply to Jonesboro' and Johnson City churches from June, 1874 to June, 1876. Served, in the same capacity, Mossy Creek Church, from June, 1876, to June, 1879. From that position he was called to the Professorship of Mental and Moral Philosophy, in King College, Bristol, Tenn., which he still occupies, supplying at the same time, as stated supply, Greenspring Church, Va., and Arcadia Church, Tenn., having supplied the Blountville Church the first two years of his Professorship, instead of Greenspring. He is a very attractive preacher. His preaching is highly evangelical and practical, his style lucid and yet ornate, and his delivery graceful and impassioned.

Wallace, Rev. John, the son of Charles and Ann (Truman) Wallace, was born near the Gap, Lancaster county, Pa., October 1st, 1791. He was self-educated, both in regard to his classical attainments and theology. He was licensed by New Castle Presbytery, and ordained by the same Presbytery in 1832, and installed as pastor of the Pequea Church in Lancaster county, Pa. This was his only charge. He labored faithfully among this people. He was highly esteemed by his ministerial brethren, and was known throughout the whole region of his labors as an eminently good and faithful man.

Wallace, Rev. Marcus Jediah, was born June 19th, 1819, in Cabarrus county, N. C. Graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1849, and at Princeton Seminary in 1852. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 25th, 1852. He began his ministry in Texas, where he preached two years, from January, 1853, to January, 1855, as supply to the churches of Jefferson and Hickory Hill, having been ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Eastern Texas, April 4th, 1853, at Church Hill, Rusk county, Texas. Next he supplied Hickory Hill and Smyrna churches, from January, 1855, to January, 1860, when he moved to his last and longest field of labor, and became supply of Marlbrook and Greenwood (now Hope) churches, in Ouachita Presbytery, Arkansas. Here he labored assiduously and faithfully for more than eighteen years, until his death, which occurred June 21st, 1878, in the sixtieth year of his age. He had no fear of death, but during his sickness often expressed a wish to live longer, so that he might do something more for the Master. But his work was done, and well done. He was an honest, earnest, faithful preacher of the gospel, a firm and devoted friend, true in all the relations of life.

Wallace, Rev. Matthew G., a graduate of Princeton College in 1795; studied theology with the Rev. Nathan Grier, of Brandywine Manor, Pa., and removed immediately to Ohio. Mr. Wallace was among the first Presbyterian ministers who settled in Ohio. About the year 1802 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, which had been founded in 1790, by Rev. David Rice. Afterwards he preached at Springfield, Hamilton, and other places in Ohio. He was in the ministry nearly sixty years, and in the latter part of his life resided in Terre Haute, Ind., without charge, where he died August 12th, 1854.

Wallace, Robert, Sr., was born in the North of Ireland, in 1733; came to America at eighteen years of age; settled and married in the State of Delaware; moved to Ohio in 1801, and died in 1828, in the ninety-sixth year of his age. He was elected to the eldership of the Second Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, July 10th, 1817, and held the office till his death. He was an exemplary Christian. A zealous patriot in the Revolution, he was sometimes under the immediate command of Washington, and received his approbation on the field of battle.

Wallace, Robert Howard, D. D., was born in Montgomery, N. Y., November 12th, 1796. His parents were members of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, with which he connected himself at the age of eighteen. In 1821 he removed his church relations to the Associate Reformed Church of Neeleytown, N. Y. His education, ordinary and classical, was very complete, under the supervision of Rev. Dr. McJimpsey of Montgomery Academy, with whom he also studied theology. He was licensed to preach by the Associate Reformed Presbytery of New York, September 15th, 1824. By solicitation of the Board of Domestic Missions of the Associate Reformed Church, he went on a horseback mission of exploration as far west, by way of Buffalo, as Detroit, the limit of civilization at that time in that direction. Returning to his native State, he was installed, October 6th, 1825, pastor of the churches of Little Britain and Caledonia, his only charge, where he was eminently successful, and where he remained until his death, February 9th, 1868. In 1836 his son, Rev. R. Howard Wallace, was associated with him in the pastorate, soon after which the church and pastors changed their relation to the Presbyterian Church. Dr. Wallace was a man of great influence in his Denomination. Poor health and constitutional modesty led him to shrink from publicity. He was eminently manly, courteous and affectionate. A clear, logical, vigorous sermonizer and thinker, he was always effective. His style was terse and chaste, a mingling of the doctrinal, practical and pathetic. His manner was very impressive. As a pastor, he was peculiarly judicious, faithful and sympathetic.

Wallace, Rev. Robert Howard, only son of the Rev. Robert H. Wallace, D. D., was born in Little Britain, Orange county, N. Y., December 20th, 1828. His father was the pastor, for forty-four years, of the Old Scotch Church in that place. He graduated from Union College, Schenectady, with the highest honors, in 1850, and studied theology partly with his father and partly in the Associate Reformed Theological Seminary at Newburgh, N. Y. After spending a year or two in agricultural pursuits, for recruiting his health, he was licensed to preach by the A. R. Presbytery of New York, in May, 1854, after which he spent an efficient pastorate of two years with the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church of Springfield, N. Y. In 1856 he was invited to act as colleague with his father, in consequence of the feeble health of the latter, and was subsequently installed. Some time previous to the death of his father, in 1868, both the pastors, with the church, transferred their relation to the Presbyterian Church. On the death of Dr. Wallace he remained in full charge of the church until January, 1883, a period of twenty-seven years, father and son spending more than seventy years of labor in the same pulpit. He resigned the charge on account of impaired health, from overwork.

Mr. Wallace is a man of more than ordinary mental vigor, well read in every department and a frequent contributor to current literature. He is clear and versatile as a thinker, a strong, logical sermonizer, with a shade of poetry in his composition, and a vein of the pathetic. His pulpit manner is graceful, earnest and impressive. He always preaches without manuscript. The true marrow of the gospel pervades his preaching, and God has blessed it. With integrity of character he possesses courtesy of manner and peculiar conversational ability.

Wallace, Rev. William, the son of John and Margaret (Anderson) Wallace, was born in Chester county, Pa., March 17th, 1787. He finished his education at Jefferson College; studied theology under the direction of James Hervey, D. D., and was licensed by Steubenville Presbytery in the Spring of 1821. As a domestic missionary he went through the new settlements of Eastern Ohio, hunting up families of the Presbyterian order, and when finding one or more such families in any destitute place, he would give out an appointment for preaching, and in this way was instrumental in gathering up and forming nuclei from which have arisen some of our more prominent congregations. He was chairman of the committee of Presbytery which organized several churches, and among them the churches of Nottingham and Freeport, Ohio, of which he became pastor in 1822, and continued so for eighteen years. He died December 18th, 1841. He was a man of ardent piety and practical worth. He was faithful and successful as a pastor. As a preacher, he was plain and textual, his sermons being rather expository than topical. He was diligent in his attendance upon the courts of the Church.

Wallace, Hon. William A., was born November 28th, 1827, in Huntingdon county, Pa., of Scotch-Irish parentage, Presbyterian on both sides; received an academic education, studied law, admitted to the Bar before he was twenty years of age. He soon became proficient in land law, ranked at the head of his profession, and has been successful as a lawyer and business man. Many of the reported decisions of the Supreme Court point out his ability and influence in settling principles affecting titles in Pennsylvania.

In 1862 he was elected to the State Senate, and was re-elected 1865, 1868, 1871 and 1874, serving continuously from January, 1863, to March, 1875. He was a conservative legislator. Many laws now upon the Statute Book came from his pen, especially in 1874, when the new Constitution required appropriate legislation. He was foremost in that necessary and important work. One-third of the statutes of that session were framed by him, including the corporation, city and partnership statutes. In 1875 he was elected to the United States Senate, serving a term of six years with ability and usefulness to his State. He was the political head of his party there. Against his will, he was returned to the State Senate in 1882, and the sessions of 1883 were marked by the work of his hand in the Arbitration Statute, and the amendments to our general railroad law, making it more liberal than it had ever been before. The prevention of strikes among laboring men and the invitation of foreign capital to the State to build railroads were the purposes of these two statutes.

After the 4th of March, 1881, he became interested in developing the mineral resources of Central Pennsylvania, and he is now the head of a large railroad enterprise, pushing its lines into Central Pennsylvania and securing competition and additional transportation for the soft coal and iron ores of his locality.

Mr. Wallace has shown himself a faithful public servant, an able constitutional lawyer, and a shrewd, energetic and successful business man. In private life, and in a large circle of friends, he is held in high esteem. He is a worshiper in the Presbyterian Church at Clearfield; has several times acted as one of its Trustees; was one of the Building Committee when the large new church edifice was erected, and contributed liberally for this purpose.

Waller, Rev. David Jewett, was born in Wilkesbarre, Pa., January 16th, 1815. After graduating at Williams College, in 1834, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, and took a regular course. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Northumberland, May 1st, 1839. He has been pastor at Bloomsburg, Pa., 1839-71; stated supply at Berwick and Brier Creek, 1838-42; and missionary, residing at Bloomsburg, 1871—. Mr. Waller is a gentleman of pleasing address, energy of character, and decided intellectual ability. As a preacher, he is clear, logical and instructive. He has been Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia. He is thoroughly conversant with the law of the Church, and in its judicatories is a ready, independent and forcible speaker.

Wallis, Rev. James, was born at Sugar Creek in 1762. He received his early education at Liberty Hall, in Charlotte, and took his collegiate course at Willsborough, S. C. He was ordained pastor of the church in New Providence in 1792, and remained in charge of the same congregation till his death, which occurred in the year 1819. Besides performing his duties as a minister, he was for several years at the head of a classical school. He was a trustee of the University of North Carolina from 1810 till his death.

Walsh, Rev. Henry, the son of William and Sarah Walsh, was born near Dublin, Ireland, August 5th, 1821. He was for a time a student at Oglethorpe University, Ga., went through the regular course at Princeton Theological Seminary, and was licensed by Raritan Presbytery in 1852. He was pastor of Carmel and Macedonia churches, N. C., and Edmiston Church, Miss., all of which he served faithfully and acceptably. His death occurred February 14th, 1861. Mr. Walsh was a man of noble and generous impulses, warm in his attachments, genial, and uniformly cheerful in disposition, would make any sacrifice to serve his friends, and took the deepest interest in all with whom he was connected. He was characterized by uncommon energy and perseverance, and was never happier than when promoting some benevolent object. Liberal himself, he sought on all occasions to make others so, upon gospel principles and from gospel motives.

Walton, Rev. William C., was born in Hanover county, Va., November 10th, 1793. In the Autumn of 1811 he repaired, under the direction of the Presbytery of Winchester, to Hampden-Sidney College. On the 22d of October, 1814, he was licensed to preach the gospel, though he was still a student at Hampden-Sidney, and remained there a considerable time afterwards. After preaching for some time to the congregations of Smithfield and Berryville, on the 25th of April, 1818, he was ordained by the Presbytery to the work of the gospel ministry, and on the 6th of May was installed pastor of the Church in Hopewell. Early in 1823 he accepted a call to the Third Presbyterian Church in Baltimore, where he remained about eighteen months and then returned to Virginia. After laboring in various places, and suffering almost constantly from bodily indisposition, he accepted a call, in the Spring of 1827, to the Second Presbyterian Church in Alexandria, and was installed as its pastor on the 3d of July following. In August, 1832, he became pastor of the Free Church in Hartford, Conn., in which relation he continued until his death, which, after a scene of Christian triumph such as is rarely witnessed, occurred February 18th, 1834. The most prominent characteristic of Mr. Walton's ministry seems to have been his unceasing direct efforts to promote revivals of religion. A very interesting memoir of his life was published in 1837, by the Rev. Joshua Danforth, D.D. He represents him as having been one of the most zealous and devoted of ministers. In a letter, he says of him, "He was gentle in temper, never denunciatory, remarkable for amenity of manners, opinions, life. He loved souls and the glory of God."

Wampler, Rev. John Matthias, was the third son of Leonard and Anna Mary (Martin) Wampler, and was born in Littlestown, Adams county, Pa., January 20th, 1811. His parents and ancestors for some generations back were of the German Reformed Church. He made a profession of religion at and was received into the First Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, Ohio, then under the pastorate of the late Rev. C. C. Beatty, D.D., LL.D., in August, 1831. He was the first of his kindred known to him to make this diversion from the Church connection of his ancestors, yet no truer Presbyterian of the Westminster line, doctrinally considered, lives to-day.

He followed the printing business, including his apprenticeship, some ten years. A part of this time he was associated with Rev. Drs. W. L. Breckinridge and Jos. G. Monfort in originating and publishing the Presbyterian Herald, at Louisville, Ky., during the progress of the O. S. and N. S. Presbyterian controversy. He commenced his literary studies in The Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, under the Presidency of Rev. Dr. R. H. Bishop, in January, 1839, and graduated there in 1843, under the Presidency of Rev. Dr. George Junkin. He studied theology under Rev. Dr. Joseph Claybaugh, in the Associate Reformed Theological Seminary, at Oxford, Ohio, and was licensed to preach the gospel, April, 1845, by the Presbytery of Oxford, and ordained to the work of the ministry by the Presbytery of Indianapolis, in August, 1848. After ten years pastoral work, two years at Shelbyville, and eight at Monticello, Ind., on invitation, he united with his former associate, Dr. J. G. Monfort, as joint proprietor and editor of the Presbyterian of the West, afterwards the Presbyter, from January, 1857, to November, 1870. In April, 1871, he removed from Cincinnati to Oxford for rest and the education of some of his children. Four years of his stay there he ministered to a neighboring church. In May, 1881, on invitation, he returned to Cincinnati, and became one of the editors of the Herald and Presbyter, a leading paper in the Presbyterian Church, which position he holds at this writing.

Time has dealt gently with Mr. Wampler. At seventy-two he is still compact, erect and vigorous, capable of enduring much, physically and mentally. Unobtrusive modesty, dignified manliness and great kindness of heart characterize his manner. His preaching is logical, clear and impressive, strong in Scriptural proofs, filled with the pith and marrow of the gospel. As an editor, he is prudent, practical, perspicuous, scholarly in exegesis, incisive and destructive in polemics, as is attested by his contest with Bishop Kingsley some twenty years ago, while Dr. Kingsley was editing the Western Christian Advocate, and chose to antagonize Calvinism.

Wanamaker, John, was born in Philadelphia, in 1838. With the ordinary advantages of school education, his early youth was spent in a clerkship in several mercantile establishments in the city. Subsequently engaging in business for himself, his career was a decided success. He made a profession of faith in the church of the late Rev. John Chambers, D. D., of whom he was a great favorite. Active as a Christian, he set himself, with much skill, energy and perseverance, to the work of doing good. He started, in the southwestern part of the city, a Sunday school, in a shoemaker's shop. This, at the time, was a section of Philadelphia greatly in need of spiritual culture, but under the religious appliances brought by him to bear upon it, it soon began to present an improved and promising aspect. One after another the saloons with which the region had abounded disappeared, pleasant homes were built in their places, and morality and Sabbath observance succeeded disorder and vice. As time advanced, a beautiful stone structure arose, with these words graven on its front: "A Little Child Shall Lead Them." On Sundays three thousand scholars gathered in the spacious assembly room. This room was of itself attractive, with its frescoes of blue and gold, and its cool silvery fountain in the centre. Presently, too, the adjoining church was built, for the twelve hundred members which had grown up from the Sabbath-school, Mr. Wanamaker giving $60,000 toward this enterprise, as a thank-offering for God's blessing on his work (see Bethany Presbyterian Church).

On his twenty-third birthday he decided to embark in the clothing business. Two of his mottoes were: "He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him," and "No man is ever lost on a straight road." Soon his wonderful business capacity began to show itself, and has continued to do so until the present time, at which he is the owner of three stores, covering nearly seven acres, one of them the largest retail dry goods store in America, with 3000 employees. When the Centennial Exposition was talked of, and Philadelphia looked about for men to aid in the vast enterprise, John Wanamaker was one of the first called to the National work. He was made chairman of the Bureau of Revenue, and, with the aid of the Board of Finance, he raised the first million dollars; he was chairman of the Press Committee that brought the subject before the whole country, and with much labor and judicious management, he stood by and helped carry the enterprise through to its success. From its very inception he has been a prominent member of the Young Men's Christian Association in the city, was its President for thirteen years, until his resignation in 1883, and has given it $100,000.

JOHN WANAMAKER.

Mr. Wanamaker has taken an active part in every good work in Philadelphia. He was one of the founders of the Christian Commission. The Moody meetings received from him an earnest support. He has built a church near his country home at Jenkintown; has aided hospitals and orphanages, and from year to year gives very largely in private charities. He is a gentleman of warm winsomeness of temperament that will keep him always young. As a speaker, he is forcible and impressive. He is characterized by unlagging industry and the strictest system. On his business desk are the words, framed, "Nulla dies sine linea—no day without a line." He has hosts of friends, and is evidently happy in using, for the grand purposes of religion and humanity, the signal prosperity and the large influence which, under Providence, he has acquired.

Ward, Ferdinand De Wilton, D. D., comes of a sturdy stock, morally, intellectually, physically. He was born at Bergen, Monroe county, N. Y., July 9th, 1812. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1831, and studied theology at Princeton, N. J. He was stated supply at Albion, N. Y., 1831; stated supply of the Tenth Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1835-6; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Rochester, August 31st, 1836, and, in that year, as a missionary of the A. B. C. F. M., sailed for India, and made the provinces of Madras and Madras the centres of ten years of faithful, and, under the blessing of God, fruitful missionary labor. Since his return to his native country, he has been stated supply of the First Church, Rochester, N. Y., 1849; pastor of the Second Church, Geneseo, 1849-58; pastor of the Central Church, Geneseo, 1858-61; stated supply at Phelps, Groveland and East Avon, N. Y.; pastor of the Central Church, Geneseo, 1866-71, and District Secretary of the American Bible Society, 1871-5. In all his varied spheres of labor he has been greatly blessed, and enjoyed a deserved popularity for his sterling character, of which benevolence is a leading ornament.

Dr. Ward published a volume in Tamil, at Madras. He is also the author of "India and Hindus," "Christian Life," "Summer Vacations Abroad," "History of Rochester," "Religious History of Livingston County, New York," besides numerous smaller publications, all of which indicate ripe scholarship, and have met with the most encouraging reception. Dr. Ward still maintains his cherished home at Geneseo, where, in a community that loves him much, he spends his time, impelled by a constant desire and effort to do all the good he can. His hand, heart, pen and voice are continually at work for the promotion of the grand causes of humanity and religion.

Wardlaw, Thomas Delacey, D. D., was born at Warrenpoint, County Down, Ireland, November 1st, 1826; graduated at Belfast College in 1844; came to the United States in June, 1846, and entered Princeton Seminary that year, where he graduated in 1849. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, February 7th, 1849.

He began to preach as stated supply at Port Carbon, Pa., May 1st, 1849; was ordained and installed as pastor, January 29th, 1850, and continued in this relation until October 5th, 1852, when he accepted a call to the Church at Paris, Ky. He was installed at the latter place April 6th, 1851, and released March 29th, 1858, when he accepted a call to the Church at Clarksville, Tenn., from which he was released November 23d, 1867. He then removed to Shelbyville, Tenn., where he continued to reside to the end of his life. At Shelbyville he became Principal of a Young Ladies' Seminary, which he conducted with singular ability and success, at the same time supplying the neighboring Church at Petersburg, from 1868 to 1871, and that of Bethsalem, from 1871 to 1877. He died, August 29th, 1879.

Dr. Wardlaw was a man of superior scholarship and extensive literary culture. He was a close student, prepared for the pulpit with great care, and his sermons were models of composition, full of well-digested thought, presented with freshness and earnestness. He was somewhat metaphysical, but always lucid and logical. As a pastor, he was greatly beloved and valued by the churches under his charge. He was a constant friend, a true man, a genial companion, simple and unostentatious in manner, strong in his convictions, firm as a rock, yet becomingly tolerant of the opinions of those who differed from him. As a teacher, he was eminently successful.

Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge, D. D., is the oldest son of his parents, William Warfield and Mary C. Breckinridge, oldest daughter of Dr. R. J. Breckinridge. He was born at Lexington Ky., November 5th, 1851, and graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1871, and at Princeton Seminary in 1873, after which he pursued his theological studies for a time at Leipsic, Germany. He was stated supply of Concord Church, Ky., 1875; of the First Church, Dayton, O., 1876; and of the First Church, Baltimore, Md., 1877. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Ebenezer, April 26th, 1879. In 1878 he was appointed Instructor in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., and in 1879 was elected Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis in the same Institution, which chair he still occupies, and with much ability and acceptableness. Dr. Warfield's scholarship, for one so young, is of a high order, and promises well for the future. He has contributed several valuable critical papers to the Presbyterian Review and the Southern Presbyterian Review, and is the author of an excellent tract entitled "The Divine Origin of the Bible," which has been published by the Presbyterian Board of Publication.

Warford, Rev. John, was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1776, and was ordained in 1777. In July, 1789, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Salem, N. Y., where he preached for fourteen years. His heart was enlisted in the cause of Christian philanthropy and missionary enterprise.

Washington College (now Washington and Lee University), is in Lexington, Va. In 1771 the Presbytery of Hanover took into consideration the great expediency of erecting a seminary of learning. The result of this consideration, delayed for several years, was finally reached in 1771. On the nucleus of a school taught by Rev. John Brown, pastor of New Providence Church, the Presbytery organized the Augusta Academy, retaining Mr. Brown in its general inspection, and employing Mr. William Graham, a recent graduate of Nassau Hall, as teacher. In 1776-7 the academy was removed to Timber Ridge, a Board of Trustees of twenty-four gentlemen, including Mr. Graham, then rector, was appointed, Presbytery reserving "forever the right of visitation." Buildings were erected on land given for the purpose, and funds secured to procure books and apparatus. The school was prosperous. But the troubles of war decreased the number and also the income of the teachers. Mr. Graham moved to a farm near Lexington, still retaining the superintendence of the school. This plan proved inexpedient, and an eligible site about three-fourths of a mile from Lexington being secured and buildings erected, the school, now called "Liberty Hall," in keeping with the spirit of the time, was removed to this new location. Mr. Graham continued rector till 1797. Meanwhile, in 1789, he had formed a "class for students of theology," the first ever formed in Virginia. General Washington having received from the Legislature of Virginia one hundred shares of the "James River Canal Company," he generously appropriated the donation to the Liberty Hall Academy, the name of which was changed to Washington Academy. The Trustees had been incorporated in 1783, and authorized to confer degrees.

From 1798 to 1799 Dr. Samuel L. Campbell was rector. He was succeeded by Rev. George A. Baxter, who, on the change of charter, by which the academy became a college, in 1813, became President in 1829; he was succeeded by Lewis Marshall, M.D., 1830, and he by Henry Veltake, LL.D., in 1834. Rev. Dr. Henry Ruffner presided over the Institution from 1836 to 1848. The college was made his sole legatee by Mr. John Robinson, and received about $40,000 net proceeds of his estate.

During Dr. Ruffner's presidency the college received a donation by the Cincinnati Society of $25,000. Deducting for erection of building and other expenses, there remained of these sums and $50,000, Washington's donation, about $100,000 of vested funds, when Rev. Dr. George Junkin succeeded Dr. Ruffner in 1848. He having resigned, about the opening of the war, the college remained, till its close, without a President. Four Professors and two Tutors had been associated with Dr. Junkin. In 1865 the Trustees called to the presidency Gen. Robert E. Lee, whose life of active and successful administration was cut short in 1870, and he was succeeded by his son, Gen. Geo. W. Custis Lee. The charter of the College was again changed, raising the Institution to the grade of a University. Large additions have been made to its fund during the period of 1866 to 1883. Now, there are, including the President, eight Professors and three assistant Instructors. The Institution, notwithstanding its separation from all formal relations to the Presbyterian Church, has still, in its Board of Trustees of fifteen members, fourteen by education Presbyterians, and of them, twelve are ministers, elders and members of the Church. Of the Faculty, a majority are officers and members of the same Church. The Institution is still a feeder of Union Seminary.

Washington and Jefferson College, Pa. The history of this Institution is essentially that of higher education in Western Pennsylvania. The first settlers of the region planted the school and the church while engaged in clearing away the forests and defending their houses against the Indians. The pioneer Presbyterian ministers favored the establishment of academies in which pious young men might be instructed in the rudiments of classical learning, with a view to their preparation for preaching the gospel. Such schools were conducted from as early as 1782, in Washington county, by Dr. John McMillan, at Chartiers, by Dr. Thaddeus Dod at Ten Mile, and by Dr. Joseph Smith at Buffalo, in connection with their ministerial work. As early as 1787 an academy, chartered by the State, was established at Washington, of which two years later, Dr. Dod was appointed the Principal. In 1791 a similar Institution was chartered and founded at Canonsburg, to which the pupils of Dr. McMillan's Latin School were soon transferred. It was the germ from which Jefferson College grew, and for which a charter was obtained in 1802. In like manner the Washington Academy developed into Washington College, which received its charter in 1806.

The first President of Jefferson College was Rev. John Watson, who had been a student of the Canonsburg Academy. He was elected August 29th, 1802, and died in November of the same year. The office was filled successively by Rev. James Dunlap, Rev. Andrew Wylie, D.D., Rev. William McMillan, A. M., Rev. Matthew Brown, D.D., LL.D., Rev. R. J. Breckinridge, D.D., LL.D., Rev. Alexander B. Brown, D.D., Rev. Joseph Alden, D.D., LL.D., and Rev. David H. Riddle, D.D., LL.D.

Rev. Matthew Brown became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Washington and Principal of the Academy in 1805. When the charter of Washington College was secured, the next year, he was elected to the Presidency, and retained the position for eleven years. His successors in office were Rev. Andrew Wylie, D.D., Rev. David Elliott, D.D., LL.D., Rev. David McConaughy, D.D., Rev. James Clark, D.D., Rev. James I. Brownson, D.D. (Pro. Tem.), and Rev. John W. Scott, D.D., LL.D. The distinguished educators who served the Colleges of Jefferson and Washington, as Presidents, were seconded in their labors by able and devoted men who filled the several chairs of instruction. They cannot even be named in this sketch, but their work, performed under many discouragements, lives in the grateful memories of hundreds who were helped by them in the paths of knowledge. These Institutions attracted students from all parts of the West and South, and Eastern Pennsylvania, and their alumni have always taken high rank, both in the Church and State. A healthy and dominant religious influence prevailed in them throughout their history. Revivals of religion of great power occurred at intervals, which resulted in the conversion of many of the students, and the consecration of not a few to the ministry of the gospel. A large majority of the Trustees and Professors have been connected with the Presbyterian Church, and from that Denomination their support was chiefly derived. From 1852 to 1865 Washington College was under the care of the Synod of Wheeling. An ample return for all expenditures made in their behalf was received in the number of ministers educated in their halls. Of three thousand graduates over fourteen hundred became preachers of the gospel.

But their contiguity and the fact that they appealed to the same constituency alike for patronage and pecuniary support, operated as a barrier to their sufficient endowment. Many enlightened friends of education withheld their help, under a conviction that no sufficient reason appeared for the co-existence of two colleges, having identical aims, and under circumstances calculated to excite rivalry and inspire efforts to build up one at the expense of the other. Efforts to bring about a union were often made, beginning as early as 1807, and repeated in 1815, 1817, 1843, 1847 and 1852; but all negotiations to this end were fruitless until Rev. Charles C. Beatty, D. D., LL. D., of Steubenville, Ohio, made an offer of fifty thousand dollars, conditioned upon a union. The time at which this generous proposal was made was propitious for securing its favorable consideration. The number of students had been reduced, owing to the large numbers of young men who had entered the military service of the country. The sale of cheap scholarships by both Institutions, gave them an insufficient endowment, and cut off all income that had formerly been derived from tuition fees. The advance in prices incident to war times increased their financial embarrassments, and rendered their continuance impossible without debt or increase of resources. These circumstances, in a measure, prepared the way for the acceptance of Dr. Beatty's proposition.

By an Act of the Legislature, passed March 4th, 1865, Washington and Jefferson College was established. It was provided that the Senior, Junior and Sophomore Classes should be instructed at Canonsburg, and the studies of the Freshman Class and the Scientific and Preparatory Departments should be conducted at Washington. Rev. Jonathan Edwards, D. D., was elected President, and Rev. James Black, D. D., Vice-President and Executive of the department at Washington. This dual arrangement continued four years, and furnished sufficient evidence that it was an impracticable mode of management. The Board, acting upon unmistakable indications of public sentiment, applied to the Legislature for an amendment to the Charter, which was passed February 26th, 1869, authorizing the consolidation of the departments and their location at a place to be determined by a majority of two-thirds of the Board. Under the provisions of this act the college was finally located at Washington. The decision being unsatisfactory to some who had favored the choice of Canonsburg, suit was entered to test the legality of the proceedings by which the result had been attained. The action of the Board was sustained by an unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and an appeal being taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, it was in like manner affirmed by that high tribunal.

In April, 1869, Dr. Edwards resigned the presidency to accept a call to the pastorate of the Second Presbyterian Church of Baltimore. The office was filled temporarily by Rev. Dr. Samuel J. Wilson, of the Western Theological Seminary, and Rev. Dr. James L. Brownson. Rev. George P. Hays, D. D., was elected President August 3d, 1870. During the legal troubles, an injunction forbidding the teaching of the upper classes at Washington caused the majority of the students to enter other colleges, and the patronage of the college was largely turned away; but under the administration of Dr. Hays, the number of students increased. Efforts were soon started which resulted in the erection of a large and elegant college building. The Chair of Agriculture and Correlative Branches was endowed by Dr. F. J. Lemoyne, of Washington, Pa., who subsequently endowed the Chair of Applied Mathematics. Dr. Charles C. Beatty further signified his interest and confidence by the endowment of the Steubenville Professorship of Greek. By these large gifts the future of the college seemed to be secured. Its former friends were encouraged and many new ones were gained. Dr. Hays resigned, June 20th, 1881, to engage in pastoral work in Denver, Colorado. He was succeeded by Rev. James D. Moffat, D. D., who was elected November 16th, 1881, and inaugurated June 20th, 1882. His administration began under favorable auspices.

The Faculty now consists of the President and nine Professors. The college possesses buildings and grounds worth more than one hundred thousand dollars, and a productive endowment of two hundred thousand dollars. This endowment will be increased in due time by the reception of about thirty thousand dollars bequeathed by the late Dr. Beatty.

The following classification of the Alumni of college, including the graduates of the colleges before and since their union, will be of interest, as indicating in some measure the character of work done: Of the whole number of graduates, 3196, about 80 per cent. entered the three professions of Law, Medicine and the Ministry, and a good proportion of the rest engaged in teaching. 1406, or 44½ per cent. of all graduates entered the ministry, a larger number and proportion, than any other college related to the Presbyterian Church can claim. Since the union in 1865, 169, or nearly 40 per cent. of graduates have entered the ministry. It may not be improper to add the numbers of those who may be said to have reached eminence in their professions, United States Senators, 6 or 8; members of Congress, over 50; Cabinet officers, 6; Judges of Courts, 60; Presidents of Colleges, 46; College Professors, 75; Professors in Theological Seminaries, 25; Principals of Female Colleges, 25.

Waterbury, Jared Bell, D. D., was born in the city of New York, August 11th, 1799; graduated, with high honors, at Yale College in 1822; was a student two years in Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach November 13th, 1825, by the Presbytery of New York. He was, for a time, an agent for the American Bible Society, and then became pastor of a church at Hatfield, Mass. Whilst residing there, he published a small volume entitled "Advice to a Young Christian, by a Village Pastor," which was widely read and very useful. In 1829 he was called to Portsmouth, N. H., and remained for two years in a happy and useful ministry, which he was compelled to resign on account of ill health. For nearly fourteen years from February 20th, 1833, he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Hudson, N. Y., and his earnest and fervent pulpit services, his genial and social manners, his glowing and untiring zeal, and his godly life, secured for him the unbounded affection and respect of the whole Christian community. He was pastor of the Bowdoin Street Church in Boston, Mass., from September 15th, 1846, until June, 1857. Subsequently he served as a city missionary in Brooklyn, with great earnestness, until stricken down with paralysis. His death occurred December 31st, 1876.

Dr. Waterbury was a man of warm piety, and always watchful for opportunities of winning souls to Christ. As a pastor, he was faithful, sympathetic and earnest. In his prime he was a preacher of unusual excellence and power. He wrote much for the religious newspapers, and published a considerable number of sermons and tracts, besides six or eight volumes. Among his last utterances was this: "Jesus is with me, Jesus is with me."

Watkins, Judge Francis Nathanael, is now nearly seventy years of age, but older in merit, as a citizen, an upright judge and faithful and beloved ruling elder. Of a pious ancestry, many eminent in both Church and State, he has not only followed the good examples set before him, but has added lustre to names well known and honored in the State to which he belongs. In the church Session of the Farmville Church, in Virginia, he has always been a ready and efficient aid, and indeed leader, in all that was proposed for the promotion of sound doctrine, pure church order and the piety of the charge, over which he has long held the part of an overser. Early introduced, under wise parental care, to the communion of the church, and at an early period of mature life into the office of ruling elder, he has faithfully sustained himself, by God's grace, in "works of faith and labors of love." He has ever been found on the side of truth and righteousness, in all the relations of society. While acting as a judge, few of his decisions were properly revoked by higher courts, and when a ruthless and disgraceful partisanship deprived him of the office he honored, the entire community, irrespective of party, still deeply mourned the event. As the financial officer of the Board of Trustees of Union Seminary, his services have been invaluable. He has so cared for the funds committed to his trust and management, for nearly forty years, that not only has not a cent been lost through any fault of his own, but thousands of dollars have been added to the investments, by his sound judgment and prompt efforts. Though his many and pressing public duties, have prevented his frequent appearance in the higher Church courts, yet when present, he has proved sound in judgment and zealous for the interests of Zion. Long may he yet live to adorn his station!

Watkins, Rev. John S., was born at Mayo, Halifax county, Va., January 4th, 1844. He was educated at Brooklyn Academy, Hampden-Sidney College and the University of Virginia, at the last of which Institutions he graduated in 1867. After teaching for two years, he studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, Va., and was noted while a student for fidelity and proficiency in his studies. In 1872 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and was installed the same year pastor of Roanoke Church, Roanoke Presbytery, in which relation he continued for six years. He took charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Raleigh, N. C., in September, 1878, of which he has the pastoral oversight at present. Mr. Watkins is a godly man, a diligent pastor and a profitable preacher. He is gentle in spirit and manner, but of unswerving principle; thoroughly in accord with the doctrinal standards of the Church of which he is an honored and able minister, and yet of marked independence of mind and character; gracious and pleasing in his intercourse with men, yet sincere and manly. He is earnest and successful in the great work to which his life is consecrated.

Watson, Rev. John, was born of poor but respectable parents, west of the mountains of Pennsylvania. When a boy, he lived with a gentleman keeping a tavern and retail store, who taught him writing and arithmetic, in order that he might be a useful assistant in his business. Every leisure moment was devoted by young Watson to the study of such books as he could command. Judge Addison, of the Court of Common Pleas in the Western District of Pennsylvania, lodged at the public house where the lad lived, and returning to his lodgings one night at a late hour, after the family had retired to rest, found the young barkeeper reading Horace by fire-light. The Judge promised to bring him suitable books at the next session of the Court. When that time arrived, Watson, anticipating the hostler, seized the bridle of Judge Addison's horse, and at the same time cast an impatient look at the portmanteau. "I have brought you the books, my lad," said the Judge. "Never," said Watson, when relating this incident, "did I experience a more joyful moment. My heart was so full I could not utter a word." A Latin Grammar, Æsop's Fables, Selectæ Veteri Testamento, and a good Latin Dictionary, formed the treasure.

Having diligently improved himself, as he had leisure in his business, in the ancient classics, and in various branches of literature and science, young Watson, through the influence of Rev. Dr. John McMillan, to whom his worth became known, was appointed as assistant teacher in the Academy of Canonsburg. After eighteen months Dr. McMillan procured him a place, on the Leslie Fund, in the College of New Jersey. Here he took charge of the grammar school, in order to sustain himself, in part, during his education, and at the same time recited in his class. During his college course he was distinguished for his excellent standing as a scholar, for his amiable disposition, conciliatory manners, unblemished morals, and unaffected piety. On returning to his native State, he was immediately chosen Principal of the Academy at Canonsburg, and soon after, by an able and powerful appeal to the Legislature, he obtained the charter of Jefferson College.

Mr. Watson was licensed to preach the gospel in 1798, one year or less after he left college. Soon after his licensure, he accepted a call to a small congregation about three miles from Canonsburg, and continued to preach regularly to this people on the Sabbath, and occasionally on week days, until a short time before his death, which occurred November 30th, 1802. Mr. Watson, in the pulpit, had at his command a ready flow of simple, chaste, and sometimes elegant language, which enabled him to express his thoughts without effort, in the most intelligible manner. He made no appeals to the passions, aiming solely to enlighten the understanding and touch the conscience. In these two points he was very successful; for his language was so simple and natural that it could be understood by a child, and his aim so honest and direct that it brought conviction to the heart.

Watson, Rev. Samuel Lytle, the son of David and Margaret (Adams) Watson, was born at Bethel, York county, S. C., February 5th, 1798. He graduated from South Carolina College in 1820; taught for two years, to procure the means of continuing his studies; entered Princeton Seminary in 1823, and was regularly graduated thence in 1826; was licensed by the Presbytery of South Carolina, November 17th, 1826; went immediately as a missionary to Alabama, then a new and thinly settled State, where he remained nearly a year, Montgomery being the chief place of his labor. He then returned and was ordered as an evangelist by the Presbytery of South Carolina, March 15th, 1828. In November of the same year he became stated supply of the Steele Creek Church, Mecklenburg county, N. C., and was installed as its pastor by the Concord Presbytery, May 23d, 1829. Here he labored, with great success, and to the satisfaction of the people, until March 13th, 1840, when the pastoral relation was dissolved on his acceptance of a call from the Bethel Church, S. C., over which he was installed, April 25th, 1840. In this church he labored as pastor for forty-two years, a fact that speaks volumes for the faithfulness and the devotion of the pastor, and for the sincerity of the people in their attachment to God's worship and the ambassador whom He sent to them. In September, 1882, he asked the Presbytery to dissolve the pastoral relation, on account of the infirmities of age, which rendered him unable to discharge its duties. But he still preached as opportunity occurred. His last sermon was on the third Sabbath before his death. He died, November 13th, 1882, in his eighty-fifth year. In his last hours he was calm and peaceful, fully sustained by the hopes of the gospel he had so long and faithfully preached. Mr. Watson was a man of fine personal appearance, cheerful in conversation, with a voice full of melody in age, as that of youth. Quiet and unostentatious in all that he did, scrupulously avoiding everything like display, he exerted a gentle yet persistent and unfaltering influence for good, which only the registers of eternity can exhibit.

Watson, James Clemson, D.D., was born in Donegal township, Lancaster county, Pa., January 27th, 1805; graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1827, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Philadelphia April 23d, 1830; was ordained by the Presbytery of Carlisle, October 14th, 1832, and on the same day was installed pastor of the United churches of Gettysburg and Great Conewago. Here he labored nearly seventeen years, until he was released, August 29th, 1849. His next charge was at Clinton, N. J., where he was installed, November 21st, 1849, and was released December 3d, 1850. His third charge was at Kingston, N. J., where he was installed February 19th, 1851, and was released October 17th, 1854. His fourth and last charge was at Milton, Pa., where he was installed December 11th, 1854, and continued until he was released by death.

In the beautiful region of the Susquehanna, where Dr. Watson spent the last quarter of a century of his life and ministry, he acquired a wide and great influence. His ministerial work in the church at Milton was a most faithful and successful one. The closing months of his life were darkened by the great misfortune which befell his town and congregation, through a sweeping conflagration, in which their pleasant house of worship was consumed. He was a man of positive convictions, and was quite ready to utter them. He stood in the old paths, taught the old theology, and strove to build up his church on solid Scriptural foundations. He died August 31st, 1880, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

Watt, Rev. James, a graduate of Princeton College in 1763, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Cape May, N. J., by the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1770. Mr. Watt died November 19th, 1789. His tombstone has the following inscription:

"If disinterested kindness, integrity, justice and truth deserve the tributary tear, here it is claimed."

Watt, Rev. James B., was born in Fairfield District, South Carolina, April 4th, 1820. After spending some time in Erskine College, he studied theology privately with James Boyce, D. D., of Due West, S. C., and was licensed by the First Presbytery of the Associate Reformed Synod of the South. When he had labored some years successfully in several congregations of the Associate Reformed Church, he changed his ecclesiastical connection, being received into Concord Presbytery in 1858, immediately after which he took charge of Big Steel Creek and Pleasant Hill churches, and was, in a short time, duly installed. Here, for nearly two years, he labored, in season and out of season, the Lord crowning his labors with success and giving him as much favor in his new sphere as in his old. He died, September 16th, 1860, in hope of a blissful immortality. Mr. Watt was popular as a man in the private walks of life. As a preacher, he was equally popular—always instructive and reaching the hearts of his hearers. As a pastor, he was laborious, preaching from house to house. He was the author of several meritorious versifications of choice Psalms, and, as correspondent of The Due West Telescope, he wrote freely for the press.

Waugh, Rev. Samuel, was a native of Pennsylvania. He was licensed by Donegal Presbytery in 1777, and was settled as the pastor of the united churches of Pennborough and Monaghan, Pa., in 1782, in which relation he continued till his death, in January, 1807. Mr. Waugh was a sound divine, a very acceptable preacher and highly esteemed by his people.

Waxler, William Hall, was born in Philadelphia, December 13th, 1837. He received his education mainly at Port Royal Seminary, a Mathematical and Classical Institute, near Frankford. He graduated from the Law Department of the University of Pennsylvania, July 3d, 1860; was admitted to the Bar, January 19th, 1861, and at once energetically engaged in practice. He is a prominent member of and ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church. He was one of the originators and Secretary of the Frankford and Philadelphia Passenger Railway Company, afterward merged into the Second and Third Streets road, and is an officer in various other local corporations, including the North Cedar Hill Cemetery Company, of which he is a Director and an originator. He has earnestly devoted himself to his profession, in which he has been very successful by his strong intellect and inherent energy.

Wayland, Abraham, M. D., was a native of Virginia, born in 1792. After pursuing the practice of medicine in that State until 1837, he went to Missouri, and settled in Clarke county. He was confident of his conversion in early childhood, but he did not publicly confess Christ until 1832. In the year 1816, the year in which the first Presbyterian organization was formed on Missouri soil, he organized what he believed to have been the first Sabbath school west of the Blue Ridge. Soon after his removal to Missouri, he and his brother began holding a prayer-meeting at St. Francisville, which culminated in a revival of great power, and which was conducted by them three weeks without the presence of a preacher. As the result of this meeting, a large number of persons were converted, and three churches were organized in the town, one of them a Presbyterian church, known as the DesMoines Church, of which Dr. Wayland became an elder. Those three churches were the first of any kind organized in Clarke county.

Dr. Wayland was "not slothful in business," and by means of a lucrative practice he was blessed with large fortune. To give of his means to the Lord was a joyful privilege and pleasant duty; and he was enabled to give during his life the sum of seventy thousand dollars, one-third of his entire estate. His piety was no less conspicuous by the fervency of spirit with which he served the Lord. He was a man of faith, prayer and earnest attachment to God's House. His presence and counsel in the courts of the Church will long be remembered by those who had the privilege of his fellowship there. Dr. Wayland, full of years and blessing, passed to his reward April 21st, 1875.

Wayne, Rev. Benjamin, was born June 4th, 1824, in New Orleans, La.; graduated at Oakland College, Miss., in 1845; at Princeton Seminary in 1848, and was licensed by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 6th, 1847. Mr. Wayne never was an installed pastor. He was called to become pastor of the Church at Plaquemine, Iberville Parish, La., in 1850. He declined the call, but served that Church as stated supply for six years, 1850 to 1856. In 1860 he began to preach in what was then known as Jefferson City, a suburb of New Orleans, now annexed to it, and called the Sixth District of the city. In 1861 a church was organized there, now known as the Napoleon Avenue Presbyterian Church, which Mr. Wayne continued to supply until his death. From 1856 to 1860, inclusive, he acted as Agent for the Trustees of the Synodical Board of Publication, first for the collection of funds in the Synod of Mississippi, and afterwards in the general management of its book-store in New Orleans. In addition to his duties as preacher and agent, in 1869, he accepted a position as principal in a public school in New Orleans, which he held until near the time of his death. This event occurred August 21st, 1879. Mr. Wayne was a useful citizen and an assiduous and earnest minister, laboring with untiring zeal where his lot had been cast, among all classes and conditions of people. He had won the esteem and regard of all who knew him.

Weaver, Philip, ruling elder. Mr. Weaver was born in Manchester county, Md., May 31st, 1806. Removed in early life to Selma, Ala., where he died, September 4th, 1875. He was installed as elder of the Presbyterian Church in Selma, Ala., in June, 1846. At that time Selma was a small village, and the church but recently organized. As a successful merchant, in a growing town, he wielded an immense influence for good. The old records show that he was regular in his attendance upon the meetings of Session, and faithful in taking heed to himself, to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost had made him an overseer. During successive pastorates he stood in his lot as a ruler; and to his liberal contributions, unobtrusive piety, untiring energy and fervent prayer, much of the growth of this church is to be attributed. Having served his generation well and faithfully, he "fell asleep," in a good old age, beloved by all.

Webb, Rev. Joseph, the son, probably, of the minister of Green's Farms, Conn., graduated at Yale in 1715, and became a member of Synod in 1720, being the pastor of Newark. He is said to have been dismissed from his pastoral charge in 1736; his name is mentioned as a member of Synod till 1740. He and his son, a student in Yale College, were drowned, October 21st, 1711, while crossing the ferry at Saybrook, Conn.

Webb, Rev. Robert A., second son of Robert C. and Elizabeth (Dooch) Webb, was born in Lafayette county, near Oxford, Miss., September 20th, 1856; entered Colleoka Institute, in Manry county, Tenn., in 1871, and after remaining there three years and a half, entered the Sophomore Class in Stewart College, now the Southwestern Presbyterian University, at Clarksville, Tenn., and graduated, with the honors of the class, in 1877. In September of the same year he entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and completed the course in May, 1880. He was licensed at McMinnville, Tenn., by the Presbytery of Nashville, April 19th, 1880, and ordained by the Presbytery of Bethel, S. C., April 1st, 1882. After this, Mr. Webb supplied Moore Memorial Church, Nashville, Tenn., the Presbyterian Church at Albany, Ga., and the Second Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C. He is now settled as pastor over Bethel Church, York county, S. C.

Webster, Rev. Richard, was born in Albany, N. Y., July 14th, 1811, and early became a subject of converting grace. He graduated at Union College in 1829, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1834. He was anxious to go on a foreign mission to India, but his deafness proved an insurmountable obstacle. He then determined to devote himself to missionary labors at home. He began his career at South Easton, but shortly after organized a church at Mauch Chunk, November 1st, 1835, over which he was settled as pastor. His labors were not confined to this spot, but extended over the coal region in the counties of Lehigh, Northampton, Columbia, etc. He aided in founding a dozen churches, and was the father of Luzerne Presbytery. He died June 19th, 1856, in the forty-fifth year of his age.

When it was announced to him that he was dying, he expressed his doubts, because he felt naturally, and in the full possession of all his faculties. "If it be death, it is such a death as I have never dreamed of. I never dreamed of such a heaven. It is most glorious, but, what is wonderful, it is not strange. It is only a brighter home." Such was the euthanasia of this excellent man, expiring in the prime of life.

Mr. Webster had a tenacious memory, a fondness for antiquarian lore and a familiarity with the details of church history that was astonishing. His deafness and near-sightedness drove him to solitary studies, particularly in the line of historical research. He had poetical gifts, but published nothing. He was genial and social, given to sportive and satirical sallies, full of anecdote and sparkling wit, yet, withal, a man of prayer, submitting with patience to his lot, and exemplary as a pastor, attentive and tender in affliction. He was a frequent correspondent for the religious periodicals, under the signature of K. H. He prepared a "Digest of the Acts of the General Assembly," and materials for a "History of the Presbyterian Church," published as a posthumous work by the Presbyterian Historical Society.

Webster, Rev. Samuel Eyres, was born in Chester county, Pa., July 26th, 1848; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Westminster, April 11th, 1871. He was pastor of Bellevue Church, Gap, Pa., 1871-5; of the First Church, Mansfield (Washington), N. J., 1875-80, to which churches more than 500 persons were added during his ministry, and since the latter year has had charge of the First Church, Williamsport, Pa., where his labors have been signally blessed. He is a thoroughly orthodox, strong and impressive preacher, and a most laborious pastor. He is loyal to the Standards and faithful in presenting the doctrines of the Church. He is a bold and courageous man of God, and denounces sin in its various forms with an uncompromising voice. He is one of the rising pastors of the Church, and stands in the front ranks of the young preachers of our day. (See First Presbyterian Church, Williamsport, Pa.)

Weed, Henry Rowland, D. D., was born at Ballston, N. Y., July 20th, 1789; graduated at Union College in 1812, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1815. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, January 4th, 1816; was pastor at Jamaica, L. L., N. Y., 1816-22; pastor of the First Church, Albany, N. Y., 1822-29; Agent of the Board of Education, 1830-32; stated supply of the First Church, Wheeling, Va., for some months, then pastor until 1870, though for a few years preceding his resignation, through the infirmities of age, the active duties of the pulpit and pastorate devolved upon his junior co-pastor, the Rev. D. W. Fisher. Dr. Weed was an able, earnest, faithful and successful preacher. He contributed occasionally anonymous articles to the religious periodicals of the Church, including the Biblical Repository, but avoided regular authorship. For the use of his own Bible class, he published a series of questions on the Confession of Faith, which was afterwards published by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He died at Philadelphia, December 11th, 1870.

Weir, James Wallace, was born at Harrisburg, Pa., August 9th, 1805. His great-grandfathers, Weir and Wallace, fought together in the siege of Derry; their grandchildren (Samuel Weir and Mary Wallace) met on the bank of the Susquehanna a hundred years after, and were united in marriage.

In 1824 Mr. Weir undertook to edit a small religious paper, and with this view learned type-setting. Whilst thus engaged, he received an appointment in a bank at Harrisburg, which he accepted. For five years he was clerk in the Branch Bank of Pennsylvania, located there; for eleven years he was Teller in the Harrisburg Bank, and for thirty-one years was Cashier of the same Institution, which is now known as the Harrisburg National Bank, and which, under his cashiership, greatly prospered.

Mr. Weir was a writer of force and varied ability, and the author of several poems of much merit. The principal productions of his pen are a "Treatise on Sabbath-school Instruction," "Duties of Laymen," and "Social Prayer," all of which were received with marked favor, and recommended by gentlemen of high literary standing.

Mr. Weir was an elder of the Presbyterian Church at Harrisburg, from 1831 until his death; was connected with the Sunday school about fifty years, and was Superintendent of the school of that Church for over forty years. He was one of the first, firmest and most influential friends of the anti-slavery and temperance causes. In 1859, he was elected a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and long continued to promote its interests in every way in his power.

Mr. Weir resided, with the exception of six months, in the city of his birth, and his steadfast residence only tended to increase his influence and to endear him more and more to his neighbors. On his seventieth birthday the personal friends of the distinguished financier united in an ovation of respect to him, such as is not often paid to men who had a purely private character. No man better deserved it than James Wallace Weir. No man in the State had a more unsullied reputation, and no man in any community, reaching the age of seventy, had a purer personal reputation. Uprightness, benevolence, energy, geniality, courage in duty, fidelity in earth's various relations, all sanctified and adorned by religion, eminently marked his symmetrical character.

Welch, Ransom Bethune, D.D., LL.D., is a native of Greenville, N. Y. He graduated from Union College in 1816, and studied theology at Andover and Auburn. Ordained and installed at Gilboa, N. Y., by the Classis of Schoharie, 1854; Gilboa, 1854-6; Catskill, 1856-69; Professor of Logic, Rhetoric and English Literature in Union College, 1860-76, and since 1876, has been Professor of Christian Theology in Auburn Seminary. He received the degree of D.D., from Rutgers College in 1868, also from the University of the City of New York, 1868, and the degree of LL.D., from Maryville College, 1872. Dr. Welch is an eminent scholar, a forcible writer and an instructor of marked ability. He has published "Notes on Theology," "Faith and Modern Doubt," also many articles, addresses, etc.

Welch, Thomas R., D. D., son of John Welch

and B. J. Rice, was born in Jessamine county, Ky., September 15th, 1825. Having pursued preparatory study at Bethel Academy, in Nicholasville, he entered Centre College, May, 1841, and was graduated, A. B., September, 1846. After a year spent in reading law and teaching school, he passed to the Theological Seminary at Princeton, in September, 1847, where he remained two sessions and was then licensed to preach by the Presbytery of West Lexington, September, 1849. During the next year he supplied the pulpit at Warsaw, Ky., after which he resumed his theological studies in the New Albany (Ind.) Seminary, from which he received the usual certificate, May, 1851. Proceeding at once to take charge of the Church at Helena, Ark., he remained there eight years, when he was called to the Church at Little Rock. His ordination took place at the hands of the Presbytery of Arkansas, in session at Batesville, April 11th, 1852.

He became pastor of the First Church at Little Rock, the capital of the State, in December, 1859. There he still abides, beloved of men and approved of God.

His alma mater conferred on him the degree of D. D., in 1870. In 1872 he was Moderator of the General Assembly at Richmond, Va. In 1877 he was a member of the First General Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh. In 1880 he represented the State of Arkansas at the Centenary Sunday-school Celebration in London. He is President of the Board of Trustees of Arkansas College, and a Director of the Southwestern Presbyterian University at Clarksville, Tenn., of which Institution he was, a year ago, elected a Professor and Vice-Chancellor; a position he declined, in obedience to the decision of his Presbytery that he should not leave his pastoral charge.

Dr. Welch has had a busy life, and made an enviable record. Of fine presence, genial manners, ready sympathy, he finds welcome everywhere. Especially are they attached to him who have experience of his wise and faithful pastoral ministry in seasons of perplexity, wandering, sickness or sorrow. A well-grounded theologian, a clear thinker, a lucid expositor, he is a model preacher of the gospel, rightly dividing the Word, shunning not to declare all the counsel of God, feeding the flock, and warning and entreating them who are without.

By long residence, abundant labors, eminent administrative ability, Dr. Welch is the Presbyterian Nestor of Arkansas, and no man in the State is held in higher esteem or wields a stronger influence.

Wellford, Hon. Beverly Randolph, third son of Dr. Beverly R. Wellford, President of National Medical Association, 1853, and Professor of Materia Medica, in the Medical College of Virginia, 1851-70; was born in Fredericksburg, Va., May 10th, 1828. Mr. Wellford graduated in the Centennial Class, 1847, of the College of New Jersey, and began the practice of law in Fredericksburg, Va., in September, 1849. In 1851 he removed to Richmond, Va., where he continued the practice of his profession, and was elected, by the General Assembly of Virginia, Judge of the Seventh Judicial Circuit, including the city of Richmond and county of Henrico, in March, 1870, and re-elected by the General Assembly, December, 1878, for an additional term of eight years. He was baptized in the Presbyterian Church, of Fredericksburg, Va., of which both his parents were members, under the ministry of Rev. Samuel R. Wilson, D. D., who died when a Professor in Union Theological Seminary. Judge Wellford was received as a communicant in the same church, on profession of faith, in 1853, and afterward removed to Richmond, where he was ordained as ruling elder, in the First Presbyterian Church, in 1857; was elected by the Southern

DR. BEVERLY RANDOLPH WELLFORD.

General Assembly, in 1866, a member of the "Committee of Publication," which position he still fills.

Wentworth, Stephen Girard, belonged to that large and well-known family which came to this country from England many years ago. He was born in Williamstown, Mass., October, 1811. Early in life, at the age of nineteen, and without means, he came to Monroe county (now, W. Va., where he remained for six years. In 1837 he moved to Brownsville, Saline county, Mo., where he resided for three years. He removed to Lafayette county, Mo., in 1840, where he has since lived, most of the time in Lexington.

Mr. Wentworth united with the (O. S.) Presbyterian Church of Lexington, Mo., in 1841, then under the ministry of Dr. J. L. Yantis. He was, in 1847, elected deacon, and served the Church faithfully as treasurer for many years. In 1872, having "obtained a good degree," he was chosen ruling elder, which office he held while he lived.

By industry, energy, frugality and wisdom, he soon began to acquire property, which he not only kept and increased, but used wisely and well. Besides sharing in every good word and work in his church and community, and conferring many private benefi-tions of which the public knew nothing, he gave largely to the cause of education. The "Elizabeth Aull Seminary," a school for young ladies belonging to his church, more than once received substantial tokens of his friendship, while the "Wentworth Male Academy," of Lexington, Mo., owes its existence to his liberality, and will doubtless long perpetuate his name and that of his son, in whose memory it was founded.

As a Christian, Mr. Wentworth was quiet and unassuming, but earnest and sincere; as an officer, he was "found faithful," always ready to do the duty laid on him; as a friend and neighbor, he was peaceable, generous and kind, and as a citizen, trustworthy and large-hearted. A good man and true, he loved God and served his generation by the will of God.

West, Nathanael, D. D., was born in the province of Ulster, Ireland, in the year 1794; pursued his theological studies in Edinburgh, and entered the ministry in 1820, in the Independent connection. He emigrated to this country in 1831, and was installed pastor of the Church of Meadville, Pa., May 11th, 1836. This relation continued until June 26th, 1838. He subsequently labored at Northeast, Pa.; Monroe, Mich.; Pittsburg, McKeesport, Belmont and Hestonville (united), Pa. He died September 2d, 1864.

Dr. West was endowed by nature with a stalwart frame, great powers of endurance, and an energy that was almost invincible under ordinary difficulties. In mind he was gifted above the ordinary range of men, although his mental characteristics were peculiar. His powers of analysis and his strength of memory were astonishing. His knowledge of the Scriptures was such, that he could not only quote at length verbatim, but give chapter and verse. In this respect he was almost literally a living concordance. As a preacher, he was original, fluent and eminently Scriptural and instructive. In the Old Testament Scriptures, in every tree and shrub, in every nail and stone of the temple, he saw something that pointed to the gospel and the work of Christ. From his treasure he brought forth things new and old.

Westcott, Lorenzo, was born July 21st, 1825, at Fairton, N. J. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, in 1852, and at the Theological Seminary there, in 1855. He was Tutor in Princeton College from January to June, 1856; was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, April 26th, 1854; from May to December, 1855, supplied the pulpit of the First Church of Wilmington, Del., in the absence of its pastor; was ordained by the Presbytery of Nassau, October 16th, 1856, in Brooklyn, N. Y., and on the same day installed as pastor of the Greene Avenue Church in that city, where he labored until that relation was dissolved, April 21st, 1858. He then became pastor of the Warrior Run Church, at McEvensville, Pa., over which he was installed by the Presbytery of Northumberland, June 15th, 1859. Here he labored faithfully and successfully, being greatly beloved, until he was released, May 2d, 1865.

On June 1st, 1865, Mr. Westcott became Professor in Lincoln University, Chester county, Pa., and continued to labor with great assiduity in that position until June 30th, 1872, when he entered upon a Professorship in Howard University, at Washington, D. C., continuing to fill it until his death, which occurred June 5th, 1879. He was a man of great purity of life, a courteous gentleman, a wise presbyter, a faithful minister of the gospel, an able Professor, a warm-hearted Christian. He was profoundly interested in the education and elevation of the colored race, and zealously consecrated thereto his strength and talents and skill. Great numbers of those whom he taught and helped deeply mourned his departure.

Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa. The founders of this Institution were among the most sagacious and penetrating men of their times. And yet the title by which they desired that it should be known, shows how limited were their conceptions of the developments which were to occur in the early future of our country. They called it the Western Theological Seminary, a designation which, though appropriate then, could only be thought of now for a theological Institution located on the Pacific coast.

A complete history of this seminary was prepared some years ago, by the Rev. James I. Brownson, D. D., and may be found in the "Centenary Memorial," a volume published at Pittsburg, in 1876. From this record, containing a graceful tribute to the character and usefulness of the Institution, much of the following has been condensed.

With a desire to provide for the great Valley of the Mississippi, the General Assembly of 1825 resolved that it was expedient to establish a theological seminary in the West. Five commissioners were appointed to examine sites and report to the Directors. These commissioners were: General Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee; Hon. Benjamin Mills, of Kentucky; Hon. John Thompson, of Ohio; Rev. Messrs. Obadiah Jennings and Andrew Wylie, of Pennsylvania.

The first meeting of the Board of Directors was held in Chillicothe, Ohio, July 15th, 1825, and in November of the same year they met in Washington, Pa. In April, 1826, they convened in Wheeling, Va., when, after considering offers, nine of which were from Ohio, one from Indiana, and two from Pennsylvania, a decision was made in favor of Allegheny, Pa. Sharp competition had been displayed in reaching this result, and when the report was made in the General Assembly, the contest was renewed. With the hope of securing harmony, the subject was referred to the Assembly of 1827, by which, in due time, the selection of Allegheny was confirmed.

The offer made by Allegheny was a donation of

WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, ALLEGHENY, PA

$20,000 in installments, together with the release of eighteen acres from the one hundred which had been set apart in the original location of the town for the purpose of a common pasture, these eighteen acres being worth in fee simple about $20,000. The acceptance of these acres became the occasion of protracted and vexatious litigation, which was only terminated December 2d, 1849, when all the ground, except about one acre, was deeded to the city of Allegheny, under the obligation of a perpetual lease; the city, on the other hand, binding itself for a perpetual loan of $35,000, with an interest of $2100, to be paid semi-annually.

The original location of the seminary building was on what is now known as Monument Hill, a very expensive excavation having been necessary to prepare for the substantial, capacious and imposing building, which in due time appeared. Though portions of the interior were in an unfinished condition for several years, it was, nevertheless, ready for occupation in the Spring of 1831. It contained a chapel, with a gallery, in which was the library, and about eighty dormitories for students. This building, with which many interesting and precious recollections are connected, was destroyed by fire in the Winter of 1851. The difficulty of securing an adequate supply of water for ordinary purposes had always been one of the penalties of the elevated location, and when the building was found to be on fire, its rapid destruction was regarded as inevitable, most of the inmates escaping with the loss of all they possessed.

As negotiations with the city had already resulted in an agreement to relinquish the location on Monument Hill, measures were at once adopted to rebuild the Institution on the reserved ground, where it now stands. In the meantime the exercises were conducted with but little interruption, in the rooms of the First Presbyterian Church, Allegheny.

The present structures of the seminary are eight in number. The main building, containing the chapel, class rooms and twenty dormitories, is healthfully and beautifully located, facing the West Park, where it can be seen by travelers entering the city on the Pittsburg and Cleveland, and the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railways. It was built in 1855, at a cost of a little over $22,000. On either side of this main building are two houses for the Professors. The two on the west side were built in 1854, and will be remembered by some, as having been occupied for several years by Drs. Elliott and Jacobus. Those on the east were built in 1856 and were occupied by Drs. Plumer and Wilson.

The remaining three structures are at a distance of one square west, on the opposite side of Ridge avenue. The central building is Memorial Hall, containing superior accommodations for fifty-nine students, each suit of rooms consisting of a parlor and a bed chamber. The original building, known as Beatty Hall, was reared in 1859, through the generosity of Mrs. Hetty E. Beatty, of Steubenville, O. Neither the name nor the arrangement of the building had ever fully met the approval of the honored patron of the Institution whose benevolence it was intended to commemorate. In 1876, therefore, Rev. Dr. C. C. Beatty proposed to rebuild and enlarge this structure, at a cost of $20,000, on condition it should be known as Memorial Hall. In November, 1877, this hall was formally dedicated.

On the west of Memorial Hall is the Library, a fire-proof building, erected in 1876, containing 22,657 volumes, and well adapted in all its appointments to the purposes for which it was reared. On the east of Memorial Hall is the latest accession to the property of the Institution, consisting of a large dwelling, which, according to the purpose of Dr. Beatty, will give place in a few years to two Professors' houses, for which the grounds are amply sufficient.

The Professors who have filled the chairs of this Institution have been recognized as among the most godly, learned and influential ministers of their times. As suggestive of pleasant and profitable reminiscences, their names, departments and periods of service, are here given. Jacob I. Janeway, D.D., Theology, 1828-29; Luther Halsey, D.D., Theology, 1829-36, and History and Church Government, 1836-37; John W. Nevin, D.D., Oriental and Biblical Literature, 1829-40; David Elliott, D.D., LL.D., Theology, 1836-51, and Polemic and Historical Theology and Church Government, 1854-74; Lewis W. Green, D.D., Oriental and Biblical Literature, 1840-47; Alexander T. McGill, D.D., History and Church Government, 1841-51; Melancthon W. Jacobus, D.D., LL.D., Oriental and Biblical Literature, 1851-76; William S. Plumer, D.D., Theology, 1851-62; Samuel J. Wilson, D.D., LL.D., Church History, 1857-83; William M. Paxton, D.D., Sacred Rhetoric, 1860-72; Archibald A. Hodge, D.D., Theology, 1864-77; William H. Hornblower, D.D., Sacred Rhetoric, 1871-83; Samuel T. Lowrie, D.D., New Testament Literature and Exegesis, 1874-77.

Four of these Professors have died during the period of official connection with the Institution. The Summer of 1883 will be remembered long and sadly for that dark and mysterious dispensation by which, within two months, Professors Wm. H. Hornblower and S. J. Wilson were removed by death.

The present Faculty is as follows: William H. Jeffers, D.D., LL.D., Old Testament Literature and Exegesis; elected in 1877. Samuel H. Kellogg, D.D., Didactic and Polemic Theology and Lecturer on comparative religions; elected in 1877. Benjamin B. Warfield, D.D., New Testament Literature and Exegesis; elected in 1878. Thomas H. Robinson, D.D., Sacred Rhetoric, Church Government and Pastoral Theology; elected in 1883. Robert Dick Wilson, A.M., Instructor in Biblical and Ecclesiastical History, and History of Doctrines; elected in 1883. An instructor in Elocution is also employed during each term.

This seminary had always been under the care of the General Assembly, by which its directors and professors were chosen, until 1870, when it accepted the powers offered by the action of the General Assembly (see minutes of Assembly for 1870, page 62), and its directors have since fulfilled their trust in accordance with this new plan, proposed at the time of the re-union. Its Board of Directors is composed of forty members, in four classes, and its Board of Trustees, having charge of its financial affairs, is composed of twenty-one members, in three classes.

Some years ago, the Elliott Lectureship was founded by the Alumni of the Seminary, providing for a course, each year, on some subject related to the evidences of the Christian religion. In October, 1879, Alexander F. Mitchell, D.D., of the University of St. Andrews, Scotland, delivered a course of lectures on the History of the Westminster Assembly.

In 1880 a course of study was established for those who might wish to enjoy the advantages of a fourth year. The number of those who avail themselves of it is increasing.

There are endowments for thirty-two scholarships and five professorships. The endowments amount to $400,000, and the real estate is worth $75,000.

There can be no more suitable conclusion to this brief history, than a tribute to the character and influence of that munificent benefactor of the Institution, Charles Clinton Beatty, D.D., LL. D. He was appointed one of its Directors in 1827, and at the time of his death he was the President of its Board of Directors. For more than fifty years he gave it his wise counsels and his earnest prayers. Seldom absent from the meeting of either Directors or Trustees, he was always thoroughly acquainted with its spiritual, sanitary and financial condition. He gave to its treasury, at various periods, more than $200,000, and the influences originating in these acts are telling to-day at the ends of the earth, and they will continue to operate while time shall last.

Westervelt, Rev. William E., is the seventh son and youngest child of Peter A. and Catharine Burdans Westervelt, and was born near the city of Paterson, N. J., January 17th, 1829. His classical course was pursued under private teachers, all Presbyterian clergymen, in Paterson and in Johnstown, N. Y. He entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton in September, 1851, and graduated in the Spring of 1857. In April of the same year he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Passaic, and for six months from the 1st of the ensuing June he supplied a mission station in Windham, Conn., under care of the Home Board. He was ordained and installed the first pastor of the Presbyterian Church, in Bloomsbury, N. J., in April, 1858; and from September, 1861, to April, 1864, he supplied the Presbyterian Church of Burlington, Iowa. In November, 1865, he was installed pastor over the Presbyterian Church in South Amboy, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, where he labored with success three years; then was called to the Presbyterian Church in New Hamburg, N. Y., which he served as pastor until November 1st, 1876. From January, 1877, to April, 1880, he supplied the Presbyterian Church in Milerton, N. Y. After a few months of rest, he supplied for nine months the Presbyterian Church in Chesapeake City, Md.; and on the 1st of November, 1881, he entered upon his labors in his present field, Roxborough, Philadelphia, and was installed on the 30th of the same month.

Westminster Confession of Faith. Most of the Confessions of the Reformed and Lutheran churches were composed by single authors, or by a small group of theologians to whom the task of drawing up a standard of doctrine had been committed. Thus, Luther and Melancthon were the principal authors of the Augsburg Confession, the common standard of faith and bond of union of the Lutheran churches. The Second Helvetic Confession was composed by Bullinger, to whom the work was entrusted by a number of Swiss theologians, and the celebrated Heidelberg Catechism was composed by Ursinus and Olevianus, who had been appointed thereto by Fredrick III, Crown Prince of the Palatinate. The old Scotch Confession, which was the standard of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland for nearly one hundred years before the adoption of the Westminster Confession, was composed by a committee of six theologians, at the head of whom was John Knox, appointed by the Scottish Parliament. The Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England and of the Episcopal Church of America were prepared by the bishops of that church in 1562, as the result of the revision of "The Forty-two Articles of Edward VI," which had been drawn up by Archbishop Crammer and Bishop Ridley, in 1551.

The "Canons of the Synod of Dort," of high authority among all the Reformed Churches, and the Standard of the Church of Holland, were, on the other hand, drawn up by a great international Synod convened in Dort by the States General of the Netherlands, and composed of representatives of all the Reformed churches except that of France. And the Confession of Faith and Catechisms of our Church were drawn up by a large and illustrious National Assembly of divines and civilians convened in Westminster, England, by the Long Parliament, from July 1st, 1643, to February 22d, 1648. (See CATECHISMS.)

"For a considerable time after the Assembly commenced its deliberations," says He theington, "the chief subjects which occupied its attention were the directories for public worship and ordination, and the form of Church government, including the power of Church censure. Till some satisfactory conclusions had been reached on these points the Assembly abstained from entering upon the less agitating but not less important work of framing a Confession of Faith. But having completed their task, so far as depended upon themselves, they appointed a committee to prepare and arrange the main propositions which were to be discussed and digested into a system by the Assembly. The members of this committee were Dr. Hoyle, Dr. Gouge, Messrs. Herle, Gataker, Fackney, Reynolds and Vines, with the Scottish commissioners. These learned and able divines began their labors by arranging, in the most systematic order, the various great and sacred truths which God has revealed to man, and reduced these to thirty-two distinct heads or chapters, each having a title expressive of its subject. These were again subdivided into sections, and the committee formed themselves into several sub-committees, each of whom took a specific topic, for the sake of exact and concentrated deliberation. When these sub-committees had completed their respective tasks, the whole was laid before the entire committee, and any alterations suggested and debated till all were of one mind. And when any title or chapter had been thus fully prepared by the committee, it was reported to the Assembly, and again subjected to the most minute and careful investigation, in every paragraph, sentence and word. It is exceedingly gratifying to be able to state, that throughout the deliberations of the Assembly, when composing the Confession of Faith, there prevailed almost an entire and perfect harmony. There appear, indeed, to have been only two subjects on which any difference of opinion existed among them. The one of these was the doctrine of election, concerning which, as Baillie says, they had long and tough debates. 'Yet,' he adds, 'thanks to God, all is gone right, according to our mind' (Baillie, vol. II, p. 325). The other was, that 'the Lord Jesus, as King and Head of His Church, has therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate,' which appears as the fundamental proposition of the chapter entitled, 'Of Church Censures.' This proposition the Assembly manifestly intended and understood to contain a principle directly and necessarily opposed to the very essence of Erastianism, and it was regarded in the same light by the Erastians themselves; consequently it became the subject of long and earnest discussion, and was strenuously opposed by Lightfoot and Coleman, especially the latter. But Coleman falling ill and dying, before the debate was concluded, it was carried, the sole dissentient voice being that of Lightfoot.

Some discussion took place on the thirty-first chapter in the Confession, respecting Synods and Councils; but that subject also was carried in the express language of the Assembly, and without any Erastian modification. The first half of the Confession was laid before the Parliament early in October, 1646, and on the 26th of November the remainder was produced to the Assembly in its completed form, when the Prolocutor returned thanks to the committees, in the name of the Assembly, for their great pains in perfecting the work committed to them. It was then carefully transcribed, and on the 3d of December, 1646, it was presented to Parliament, by the whole Assembly in a body, under the title of 'The humble advice of the Assembly of Divines and others, now by the authority of Parliament sitting at Westminster, concerning a Confession of Faith.' On the 5th, Parliament ordered 'five hundred copies of it to be printed for the members of both Houses, and that the Assembly so bring in their marginal notes, to prove every part of it by Scripture' (Whitlocke, p. 233). There is strong reason to believe that the House of Commons demanded the insertion of the Scripture text for the purpose of obtaining an additional period of delay, as indeed Baillie pretty plainly intimates.

The Assembly, accordingly, resumed their task, and after encountering a number of interposing obstacles, again produced the Confession of Faith, with full Scriptural proofs annexed to all its propositions, and laid it before the Parliament on the 29th day of April, 1647. The thanks of the House were given to the Assembly for their labors in this important matter, and 'six hundred copies were ordered to be printed for the use of the Houses and the Assembly, and no more, and that none presume to reprint the same till further orders' (Rushworth, vol. vi, p. 473).

The appointed number of copies having been printed, they were delivered to the members of both houses by Mr. Byfield, on the 19th of May, when it was resolved to consider the whole production, article by article, previous to its being published with the sanction of Parliament, as the Confession of Faith held by that church on which they meant to confer the benefits of a national establishment. But the deliberations of the Parliament were interrupted by the insurrection of the army, and the numerous protracted and unsatisfactory negotiations in which they were engaged with the King, so that they had not completed their examination of the Confession till March, 1648. On the 22d day of that month a conference was held between the two houses, to compare their opinions respecting the Confession of Faith, the result of which is thus stated by Rushworth: 'The Commons this day (March 22d), at a conference, presented the Lords with the Confession of Faith passed by them, with some alterations, viz.: That they do agree with their lordships, and so with the Assembly, in the doctrinal part, and desire may be made public, that this kingdom, and all the Retorned churches of Christendom, may see the Parliament of England differ not in doctrine. In some particulars there were some phrases altered; as in that of tribute being due to the magistrate, they put dues; the degree of marriage they refer to the law established; particulars in discipline are recommended, and for the title, they make it not 'A Confession of Faith,' because not so naming, 'I confess,' at the beginning of every section, but, 'Articles of Faith agreed upon by both houses of Parliament,' as most suitably to the former title of the Thirty-nine Articles' (Rushworth, vol. vii, p. 1035).

"Such was the last positive enactment made by the English Parliament respecting the Confession of Faith, for the subsequent mention made of it, and of other particulars in Presbyterian Church government, during the course of their negotiations with the king, were not enactments, but attempts at accommodation with His Majesty, with the view of endeavoring to secure a satisfactory basis for a permanent peace to Church and State. And it will be observed, that the only material defect mentioned in this reported conference between the Houses is, that 'particulars in discipline are recommitted.' These 'particulars' are said to have been the thirtieth chapter, 'Of Church Censures;' the thirty-first chapter, 'Of Synods and Councils;' and the fourth section of the twentieth chapter, 'Of Christian Liberty and Liberty of Conscience.' The enumeration of these particulars rests on the authority of Neal (vol. ii, p. 429), which is by no means unimpeachable, but it is in itself probable, being quite consistent with the views of the Erastians, whose chief hostility was directed against the power of Church discipline, of which the chapters specified contain an explicit statement according to the judgment of the Assembly. It is of some importance to remark, that these 'particulars in discipline' were not rejected by the English Parliament, as is generally asserted, but merely recommitted, or referred to a committee to be more maturely considered. But as the Parliament itself not long afterwards fell under the power of the army, and was at length forcibly dissolved by Cromwell, the committee never returned a report, and consequently these particulars were never either formally rejected or ratified by the Parliament of England."

"The Confession of Faith and Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly," says Dr. A. A. Hodge, "were adopted by the original Synod in North America, A. D. 1729, as the 'Confession of Faith of this Church,' and it has been received as the standard of faith by all the branches of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland, England, Ireland and America, and it is highly revered, and its Catechisms used as a means of public instruction, by all the Congregational bodies of Puritan stock in the world.

"Although the Westminster Assembly resolutely excluded from their Confession all that they recognized as savoring of Erastian error, yet their opinions as to church establishments led to views concerning the powers of civil magistrates concerning religious things (circa sacra), which have always been rejected in this country. Hence, in the original 'Adopting Act,' the Synod declared that it did not receive the passages relating to this point in the Confession, 'in any such sense as to suppose the civil magistrate hath a controlling power over Synods with respect to the exercise of their ministerial authority, or power to persecute any for their religion, or in any sense contrary to the Protestant succession to the throne of Great Britain.'

"And again, when the Synod revised and amended its Standards, in 1757, in preparation for the organization of the General Assembly, in 1789, it 'took into consideration the last paragraph of the twentieth chapter of the Westminster Confession of Faith, the third paragraph of the twenty-third chapter, and the first paragraph of the thirty-first chapter, and having made some alterations, agreed that the said paragraphs, as now altered, be printed for consideration.' As thus altered and amended, this Confession and these Catechisms were adopted as the doctrinal part of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church in America in 1788, and so stand to this day."

The original articles of the Westminster Confession as to the civil magistrate which are altered in our confession are as follows:—

Westm. Conf. chap. 20, § 4, of certain offenders it is said: "They may be proceeded against by the censures of the Church and by the power of the civil magistrate." Chap. 23, § 3: "The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the Word and sacraments, or the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, yet he hath authority, and it is his duty, to take order, that unity and peace be preserved in the Church, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire, that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed, all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all ordinances of God duly settled, administered and observed. For the better effecting whereof, he hath power to call synods, to be present at them, and to provide that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the mind of God." Chap. 31, § 2: "As magistrates may lawfully call a synod of ministers and other fit persons to consult and advise with about matters of religion, so, if magistrates be open enemies to the Church, the ministers of Christ themselves, by virtue of their office, or they with other fit persons, upon delegation from their churches, may meet together in such assemblies."

It is proper to add that, in the act preliminary to the Adopting Act, the General Synod of our Church, whilst in the act of enforcing the adoption of the Confession upon office-bearers, yet in regard to private members declares itself willing to "admit to fellowship in sacred ordinances all such as we have grounds to believe Christ will at last admit to the kingdom of heaven" (See Baird's Digest, Book I, § 7). In 1839, the General Assembly put forth a similar statement (See Book VII, § 2, b).

Westminster Presbyterian Church, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, was organized August 29, 1857, by a committee of the Presbytery of St. Paul, consisting of Rev. J. G. Riheldaffer and Rev. H. Matthy. Eight persons were enrolled as members, and Mr. A. W. Oliver, now deceased, was elected and installed ruling elder. The first church building was dedicated about three and a half years later, March 17th, 1861. Rev. J. G. Riheldaffer, D. D., preached the sermon. During the first ten years succeeding the organization the congregation was supplied by Rev. Benjamin Dorrance, Rev. Levi Hughes, Rev. James McKee, Rev. Robert Strong and Rev. Robert A. Condit, in the order named. Mr. Condit, now a Professor in Coe College, Iowa, was the first installed pastor, and served the church for three years. During his ministry the church edifice was enlarged, in order to meet the exigencies of the growing congregation. The Rev. Robert F. Sample entered upon the pastorate March 8th, 1868, in response to a call extended to him the previous January, whilst supplying the Andrew Church, in the eastern division of the city. The membership at this period was about 100, and the eldership consisted of Messrs. A. W. Oliver, J. C. Williams, L. H. Williams and C. E. Vanderburgh. In 1870 the church building was again much enlarged, but the extension soon proved inadequate. The corner-stone of the present edifice was laid July 13th, 1880. Rev. Daniel Stewart, D. D., pastor of the Park Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Rev. W. T. Beatty, D. D., of Pittsburg, Pa., and Rev. J. B. Donaldson, of Hastings, Minn., assisted the pastor, Dr. Sample, in the interesting exercises, which attracted an immense audience. The erection of the large structure was much delayed by the difficulty encountered in transporting the stone from the quarries of Lake Superior. The spacious Lecture-room was occupied for the first time August 10th, 1882. The main audience room was completed a few months later, and the church was dedicated, without debt, on the third Sabbath of its occupancy, March 11th, 1883. The sermon was preached by Rev. Herrick Johnson, D. D., then Moderator of the General Assembly. The dedicatory prayer was offered by the pastor. Drs. Edward D. Neill, J. G. Riheldaffer and others assisted in the services, which were attended by about two thousand persons. Although the capacity of the church was large, it was taxed to the utmost from the first, and the congregation, which has already sent out two colonies, and was maintaining three missions, inaugurated a new enterprise, under the auspices of the Presbyterian Alliance, in another part of the city, now known as the Bethlehem Church.

The Westminster Church edifice is built of brown stone, and with its great proportions, deep reveals, and massive towers, has a substantial appearance, which suggests that it has been built for all time. It is entered through three broad portals, and from the large halls pleasant stairways lead to the audience room and galleries above. The lecture room is on the first floor, and around it are located Sunday school and Bible-class rooms and parlors. The pastor's study occupies the second story of the large south tower, and communicates with the pulpit. The main audience room is sixty-eight by ninety feet, and fifty feet in height. The floor slopes on three sides from the outside walls to the centre of the fourth, where the pulpit is located, the radiating point for the seven aisles, dividing the circular sweep of pews into convenient lengths. The gallery is remarkably graceful in its outline, and the large organ occupying the space above the pulpit is incased in an elaborate frame which harmonizes with the rich walnut finish of the church. The frescoing, with its delicate shadings and chaste designs, is considered a marvel of beauty. This commodious church, with a frontage of one hundred and thirty-four feet, a depth of eighty-nine feet, the main spire one hundred and ninety feet in height, one of the best appointed, most beautiful, and acoustically most perfect church edifices in this country, was erected and furnished at a cost of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

But the glory of the house is the divine presence. The spiritual life and growth of the church is a subject of devout gratitude. Precious revivals have been enjoyed at different periods. The preaching of the gospel, the great facts of sin and salvation by the cross emphasized, and the office and work of the Holy Ghost made continually prominent, has gathered the largest congregation and membership in the Northwest. The present pastorate has extended, at the present date (1884), through sixteen years, and the influence of Westminster Church reaches to remote regions. It is represented in the foreign field by Rev. Graham C. Campbell, at Gaboon, Africa, and by Mrs. Robert M. Mateer, at Cheifor, China. Its Sabbath school is characterized by Scriptural intelligence, spirituality and benevolence, and the Ladies' Missionary societies by great devotion to the interests which led to their formation. The entire history of this church is a signal commentary on the words of Christ: "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." (See picture of church, p. 892.)

To this sketch of Westminster Church, we add notices of the other Presbyterian churches in Minneapolis.

ANDREW CHURCH.

The Westminster and Andrew Churches are twins, with respect to the date of permanent organization. Both were organized at the same time, and by the same committee of Presbytery. The Andrew was then known as the "First Presbyterian Church of St. Anthony." Its earliest beginning may be dated from 1849-50 when Rev. E. D. Neill preached on alternate Sundays at the Falls. In July, 1750, Rev. Wm. T. Wheeler, formerly a Congregational minister to Africa, commenced preaching, at the request of Mr. Neill; and the members being mostly Presbyterians, it was decided to call the church the "First Presbyterian Church of St. Anthony." Rev. Mr.

Wheeler was succeeded by Rev. Chas. Secombe, who persuaded the society to drop the Presbyterian name and be known as the "Congregational Society." When the Presbyterian element of the society finally organized as a church in 1857, the former name was resumed, but the Congregational portion may be considered as the original of the present Congregational Church Society of the East Division.

The first members of the "First Presbyterian Church of St. Anthony" were Richard Chute, Mrs. Mary E. Chute, Mrs. Margaret Edwards, S. H. Lea, Joseph Van Eman and Mrs. S. Van Eman. Richard Chute was elected ruling elder, and acted as clerk of the Sessions until July 10th, 1867, when he was succeeded by Gen. H. P. Van Cleave. In June, 1858, Rev. Levi Hughes, of Logansport, Ind., was engaged to preach both for this church and for the Westminster, at a salary of $1000 per year. The first prayer meeting was held in "Edwards' Hall," October 7th, 1858, and on the tenth of the same month a Sunday school was organized, with six teachers and twelve scholars. In January, 1860, Mrs. Catharine Andrews and daughter, of New York city, donated, through the "Church Extension Board," $1000, to aid in erecting a church building; and, by act of legislature, a year later, the name was changed to "Andrew Presbyterian Church," in honor of the donors.

A building was erected on Second street and about Fourth avenue, southeast, and was dedicated April 14th, 1862. In May, 1860, the Rev. Mr. Hughes removed from the city and was succeeded in September following by Rev. James McKee, who remained until 1865. From June 17th, 1866, to March 8th, 1868, Rev. R. F. Sample was pastor, and during this time thirty-four members were added to the society. From March 1st, 1869, to March 1st, 1870, Rev. David Pelton served, and was succeeded May 1st, 1870, by Rev. Isaac W. Montfort, who acted until July, 1872. In November, 1870, the building was removed to its present site on Fourth street, between Seventh and Eighth avenues, southeast. Rev. David Stewart was pastor from August 1st, 1872, to May, 1875, and Professor E. J. Thompson, of the University, supplied from May 16th, 1875, to May 26th, 1877. Rev. C. T. Chester was then engaged as pastor and served four years. After the Rev. Mr. Chester's pastorate, Rev. J. H. Edwards supplied for a time, but the society remained without a regular pastor until the recent engagement of Rev. Peter Stryker, D.D., of Saratoga Springs, under whose ministrations the church is now prospering finely, with a membership of over one hundred, and a Sunday school of over two hundred scholars.

PARK AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN

Church was organized May 22d, 1853, by Rev. G. H. Pond, the pioneer missionary, as the "First Presbyterian Church of Minneapolis." It prospered for a time, but the members finally became scattered and for five years services were suspended. August 19th, 1860, it was reorganized by Rev. A. C. Rutison, as a successor of the "First Presbyterian Church of Minnesota," and was in fact the continuation of the Presbyterian Church of St. Peter or Fort Snelling, the oldest church of any denomination in the State, the St. Peter Church having been organized at the Fort, June 14th, 1835, by Rev. Thomas S. Williamson.

The first building owned by the society was located on the corner of Eighth street and First avenue, south. The present building on Park avenue and Tenth street was completed about ten years ago. Rev. D. Stewart, D.D., was pastor from June, 1875, to 1881, since which time the present pastor Rev. S. M. Campbell, D.D., has served. This church maintains the Bloomington Avenue Mission, which is in charge of Rev. Mr. Bowers with J. A. Tyler as Sunday-school superintendent. The Mission will probably be organized this year as a separate church. Park Avenue Church has over three hundred communicants, and a Sunday school of four hundred members. Its contributions to various objects have been liberal.

THE FRANKLIN AVENUE PRESBYTERIAN

Church was formally organized December 21st, 1873, in a building previously occupied by the First Church, that had been moved to a lot donated by Rev. George W. Jackson. A Sunday school had been held in that locality, as a mission from Westminster Church, since January, 1873. The pulpit was supplied by Professor E. J. Thompson and Rev. E. D. Neill until July 1st, 1874, when Rev. A. A. Kiehle took charge, and remained until succeeded by Rev. I. Faries, in February, 1878. The present pastor is Rev. D. E. Wells.

The society has a membership of one hundred, with a Sunday school of over four hundred pupils, under the superintendency of Judge C. E. Vandenburg, who has done much for the church, although himself an elder in the Park Avenue Church.

THE FIFTH PRESBYTERIAN

Church, which occupied its cosy new building, in Oak Lake addition, on Sabbath, February 16th, 1884, for the first time, was started in 1873, as a mission from Westminster Church. It was organized as a church in 1879, with Rev. A. W. Benson as pastor, succeeded after five months by Rev. David Rice, D.D., who was followed by Rev. R. Macquesten, the present pastor.

The church has a membership of about sixty, and a Sunday school of over two hundred pupils. The new building has a pleasant location on Lyndale avenue in Oak Lane addition. The erection of the edifice was commenced in 1882, and is now nearly completed at a cost of $8000.

BETHLEHEM PRESBYTERIAN

Church is the youngest child, but promises well. It was formerly organized January 4th, 1884, at a meeting held in Avery's Hall, on Nicollet avenue and Twenty-sixth street. It had previously existed for about a year as a mission from Westminster Church.

Rev. Joseph Lanman is the pastor in charge of the society, which has now about forty members. R. L. Stillman has donated to the society the building formerly used by Westminster Church. The building will be repaired and moved to a lot on Blaisdell avenue, in a locality now being rapidly populated.

Whallon, Rev. Edward Payson, the son of Rev. Thomas and Harriet S. (Bickie) Whallon, was born in Putnamville, Ind., March 30th, 1819. He graduated at Hanover College in 1868; studied theology for two years at the Northwestern Theological Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Madison (O. S.), April 13th, 1870. He supplied, for about one year and a half, the Presbyterian Church of Kasson, Minn., where he was ordained by the Presbytery of Winona, April 25th, 1871. He subsequently spent one year in the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, where he graduated in 1872. He was pastor of the Church of Liberty, Ind., from May, 1873, until August, 1878. He was installed pastor of the Church of Vincennes, Ind., in 1878, and still holds this position, to the great acceptance of the congregation. He was elected a Trustee of Hanover College in 1879, and re-elected in 1883. In 1882, upon the consolidation of the Synods, he was elected Stated Clerk of the Synod of Indiana. A faithful preacher and pastor, a good organizer and a methodical worker, a large degree of success has crowned his labors.

Wharey, Rev. James, was born in Rutherford county, N. C., June 15th, 1789. He entered Hampden-Sidney College, and while he pursued his studies, he paid for his board by teaching several children in the family of the steward. It is supposed that he never graduated, but prosecuted both his literary and theological course simultaneously. Here he spent about five years, being employed, during part of the time, as Tutor in college. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Hanover, in 1818. He commenced his ministry in the counties of Amherst and Nelson, spending a portion of his time as Principal of an academy. He continued to labor in Amherst but a year and a half. In the following Spring he went on a missionary tour through the eastern portion of the State, having received a commission from the Young Men's Missionary Society of Richmond. Subsequently he consented to become chaplain of Hampden-Sidney College and pastor of the College Church for one year. Here his labors were greatly blessed. Near the close of the year 1822 he went to the village of Cartersville, and labored for a time, but was not long suffered to remain in this position. His able and useful ministry at the College was "known and read" of many. The churches of Bird and Providence, in Goochland county, gave him a unanimous call, which he accepted, and was installed their pastor in 1824. Here, after eighteen years of useful labor, he ended his days. He died April 29th, 1842. Mr. Wharey was a good scholar. His mind acted slowly, but safely and vigorously. His style of composition often rose to a high degree of beauty. He wrote for the religious periodicals of the day, on a variety of topics. A series of articles which he furnished for the Southwestern Religious Telegraph, on the subject of Baptism, and another series in the same paper, on Church History, were so popular that their publication in a more durable form was called for, and they were published in separate volumes. He was a good and useful man, loving to preach, to serve on committees, or to engage in any service, however humble, to which the voice of his brethren or the voice of Providence might seem to call him.

Wheeler, Francis Brown, D.D., is of ministerial descent, his father, grandfather and four uncles having been clergymen. He was born in North

FRANCIS BROWN WHEELER, D.D.

Adams, Mass.; graduated at the University of Vermont in 1812; studied theology at Andover Theological Seminary, and was pastor of the Congregational Church at Jericho Centre, Vt., from January 2d, 1815, until January 2d, 1850. During this pastorate he was for two years Superintendent of the common schools in Chittenden county, Vt. From May 29th, 1850, to September 7th, 1851, he was pastor of the Congregational Church in Brandon, Vt. On the 6th of December, 1854, he took charge of the First Congregational Church in Saco, Maine. His pastorate there was one of marked success and power, being blessed, in the Winter of 1857-8, with a wonderful display of Divine grace in the congregation, and resulting in large accessions to the Church. The health of his family required him to relinquish this field, and he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., over which he was installed May 12th, 1859. Here he has since labored very faithfully and acceptably. Frequent additions have been made to his congregation, and at two different times there have been special revival gatherings. His church has had a steady and solid growth.

Whilst Dr. Wheeler is Calvinistic in his theology, he is broadly and thoroughly identified with all true progress wherever found. In his preaching, he is simple, practical and emotional; free and unconstrained in manner, with rare gifts in extemporaneous utterance. As a pastor, he is eminently faithful to his flock. Dr. Wheeler has been a voluminous writer for the religious and secular press; has published several sermons; given especial addresses on many public occasions, and is the author of many hymns, some of which have found their way into books of praise.

Whelpley, Rev. Philip Melancthon, was born in Stockbridge, Mass., in December, 1791. Thoroughly educated by his father, who was one of the most accomplished teachers of his day, in 1812 he commenced the study of theology, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Richards, of Newark, N. J., and was licensed to preach early in October, 1814, by the Presbytery of Jersey. On April 25th, 1815, he was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian congregation in New York. Here he passed the whole of his brief ministerial life, his death occurring July 17th, 1824. His career, though short, was brilliant and useful. He was characterized by gracefulness of manner, elegance of diction, melody of voice and eloquence of thought. His preaching was progressively good, and spiritual and effective till the close of his ministry. He was valued by his co-presbyters. Among his last expressions he was heard to say, "The Lord Jesus is near. The will of the Lord be done."

Wherry, Rev. Elwood Morris, was born at South Bend, Pa., March 26th, 1843. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1862, and after his graduation was engaged, for a time, in teaching. He was ordained an Evangelist by the Presbytery of Donegal, May 8th, 1867. He was missionary in India, at Rawal Pindi, 1868-69, and at Lodiana, 1869. He returned to his native country several years ago, and spent a short time, during which he rendered good service in kindling missionary zeal in the churches, and then went back to Lodiana, where he now is earnestly serving the cause he so much loves.

Whilldin, Alexander, was born in Philadelphia, January 28th, 1808. His parents were both members of the Presbyterian Church. His father was a sea-captain, and a native of New Jersey. In 1812, leaving France on a return voyage to this country, he never reached our shores, no tidings of his fate ever coming to relieve the suspense of the bereaved family. This sad event left the subject of this sketch an orphan at the early age of four years. The widowed mother, with her son and two daughters, went to reside at the old homestead, in Cape May county, N. J. There, on the old farm near the courthouse, he lived for twelve years. In his sixteenth year he returned to Philadelphia, and entered a store, as a clerk.

In 1832 Mr. Whilldin started business for himself, and continued in mercantile life until 1881, when, on account of declining health, he withdrew from active pursuits. For twenty-one years he was connected with the Old Pine Street Presbyterian Church, and was, during that time, with the exception of the first year, a Ruling Elder, and zealously devoted to the duties of his office. For twenty-three years he has filled the same position, with the same spirit, in the Presbyterian Church, Broad and Green, of which the Rev. R. D. Harper, D. D., is now pastor.

During his long and useful life Mr. Whilldin has been called to many prominent positions of honor and responsibility, the duties of all of which he has discharged with fidelity—credit to himself and advantage to the institutions and associations he represented. He has been for sixteen years a Director of the American Sunday-school Union, for fifteen years President of the Philadelphia Sabbath Association, for twenty years President of the American Life Insurance Company, for twenty-three years a Director of the Children's Union Home, for forty-one years a Director of the Seamen's Friend Society, for thirty-five years a Manager of the Pennsylvania Colonization Society, for thirty years a Trustee of Lincoln University, for fifteen years a Trustee of the General Assembly, and a Director of the Presbyterian Hospital since its organization. Mr. Whilldin is a devoted friend of the cause of Temperance. He has always been very liberal in support of the interests of religion and humanity. His record is that of a model merchant, courteous gentleman, generous philanthropist and exemplary Christian.

Whitaker, Ephor, D. D., is a son of Reuel and Sarah (Westcott) Whitaker, and was born in Fairfield township, Cumberland county, N. J., March 27th, 1820. He graduated, with the highest honors of his class, in July, 1847, at Delaware College; at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1851; was licensed to preach by the Third Presbytery of New York, in April, 1851; and on September 10th, of the same year, was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church of Southold, Long Island, where he continues to discharge the duties of his office.

For forty-five years Dr. Whitaker has written freely for the press. He published, in 1865, a volume entitled "New Fruits from an Old Field;" in 1872, a small collection of his hymns; and in 1881, an elaborate "History of Southold, Its First Century, from 1610 to 1710," and the next year he sucvised the printing of the first volume of the "Southold Town Records, from 1651 to 1792." Many of his separate sermons and addresses—biographical, patriotic, educational, etc., have been printed. Six times he has represented the Presbytery of Long Island in the General Assembly. He was Moderator of the Synod of New York and New Jersey during the year 1869, and of the Synod of Long Island during the year 1872-3. He has served the Presbytery of Long Island as Stated Clerk for the last twenty-eight years, and continues this service. The congregation of Southold, under Dr. Whitaker's pastoral care, has greatly improved the church edifice, doubled the size and value of the parsonage, bought the site of the chapel and built the edifice, purchased the grounds and erected and established the Southold Academy, which belongs to the church, and enlarged the church cemetery. And though most of the young people of the congregation remove to the cities or to the West, yet the membership of the church has increased during his pastorate. He has preached as often as three times a week throughout his ministry.

Whitaker, Rev. Nathanael, was born on Long Island, February 29d, 1722, and graduated at Nassau Hall in 1752. He was installed pastor of the congregation in Chelsea, near Norwich, Conn., February 25th, 1761. He went to Great Britain with the Rev. Sanson Ocum, of the Mohegan tribe, to solicit funds for a mission school, among the Indians, and they had great success. On his return, he accepted a call to the Second Church in Salem, Mass., May 9th, 1769. In 1773, he, with fourteen friends, withdrew, formed a Presbyterian congregation, which was called the Third Church, and united with Boston Presbytery, November 27th, 1773. On the breaking out of the war, he espoused warmly the cause of independence. He removed to Maine and subsequently to Virginia, and died January 21st, 1795, at Woodbridge.

White, Charles, D. D., was born at Randolph, Mass., December 25th, 1795; graduated at Dartmouth College, with the first honors of his class, in 1821, and received his theological education at Andover, Mass. After preaching for a time at Theford, he was settled over the Presbyterian Church in Cazenovia, N. Y., and again at Owego, N. Y., from which charge he was dismissed, after his election to the Presidency of Wabash College. He entered upon the duties of his office in October, 1841, so that his presidency was of just twenty years' continuance. From the first he discharged its duties to the entire satisfaction of the trustees, the patrons, and the students under his care. By his intellectual strength, and his rich and varied learning, he commanded their respect, and by his great simplicity of character and goodness, he won their affections. He died October 29th, 1861. President White's pulpit productions were generally rich specimens of elaborate thought and polished diction. In theology, he was sound and conservative, preferring one clear "Thus saith the Lord," to a thousand brilliant and plausible speculations.

White, Emerson Elbridge, A. M., LL. D., son of Jonas White and Sarah (Gregory) White, was born in Mantua, Portage county, Ohio, January 10th, 1829. He was educated at Ewingsburg (Ohio) Academy and the Cleveland University. He taught in Ewingsburg Academy and Cleveland University (Instructor in Mathematics), and has since filled the positions of Principal of the Brownell Street School, Cleveland, 1851; the Cleveland Central High School, 1854; Superintendent of the Public Schools of Portsmouth, Ohio, 1856; State Commissioner of Common Schools of Ohio, 1863; and President of Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind., 1876-83. He was President of the Ohio Teachers' Association in 1863; of the National Superintendents' Association in 1866; of the National Educational Association in 1872, and is now President of the National Council of Education—the highest and most important educational organization in the country. He was editor and proprietor of the Ohio Educational Monthly from 1861 to 1875, and of the National Teacher from 1870 to 1875. He was the writer of the memorial to Congress on the National Bureau of Education, and author of the accompanying bill introduced into the House by General Garfield, of Ohio, and subsequently passed. He is also the author of several valuable school text books, and of a large number of papers and addresses on Education, which have been published from time to time and widely circulated.

Dr. White has been an elder in the Presbyterian Church since 1863, and was a delegate to the World's Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1877. He has won his way, through native ability and much of earnestness and devotion, to the front rank of American teachers. He has shown large capacity for organization and for effective administration, and has had a wide and successful experience in college work. As a speaker, he is both winning and forcible, especially in the discussion of educational topics. As an elder, he has always been highly useful, both in our particular church and in Presbytery and Synod, where his influence has been highly prized.

White, Erskine Norman, D. D. (son of Norman White and Mary A. Dodge), was born in New York, May 31st, 1833. He was graduated at Yale College in 1854, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1857. After studying a year or two abroad, he was ordained, June 7th, 1859, by the Reformed Dutch Classis of New York. He was pastor of the R. D. Church of Staten Island, from 1859 to 1862; of the Presbyterian Church, New Rochelle, N. Y., from 1862 to 1868; of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y., from 1868 to 1874, and of the West Twenty-third Street Church, New York city, since 1874. He received the degree of S. T. D. from the University of New York, 1874. He is one of the Directors of the Union Theological Seminary, and is upon the Building Committee for the new buildings. He has published a few occasional sermons; a history of the West Twenty-third Street Church, and several articles in the Reviews. Two translations in the American Theological Quarterly: "Infant Baptism," in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, 1873, and "The Reorganization of Synods," in The Presbyterian Review, 1881.

Dr. White was a member of the Assembly's Special Committee of Seven, which in 1880 reported the Overtures for the consolidation of the Synods and the enlargement of their powers, and which, by its judicious management, carried those Overtures through the Presbyteries. He was one of the working members of that committee. To him was specially assigned the consolidation feature of the movement; and to his wise leadership in connection with President Darling, the church is indebted especially for the adoption of the Consolidation Act by the Assembly of 1881. He has been engaged, without interruption, in pastoral work for nearly twenty-five years. No man stands higher in New York Presbytery. He is a genial friend, an instructive preacher, a faithful and successful pastor, a conscientious and prudent presbyter, devoted to our Church and to its Head and always at work for both.

White, Henry, D. D., was born at Durham, N. Y., June 19th, 1800. He was graduated at Union College, in 1821, with high honor, having especially distinguished himself in the departments of mathematics and philosophy. He then pursued his theological studies at Princeton. His only pastorate was in the Allen Street Church, New York, over which he was installed during the Winter of 1827-8, and where he remained until he was elected Professor of Theology in Union Seminary, at the time of its founding, 1836. This professorship he retained until the time of his death, which occurred August 25th, 1850.

Dr. White, as a Pharos, stood above the shoals of theological speculation. Whoever sailed by him avoided wreck. He was a steady warning to keep the open sea, or to anchor in the roadstead. He had little sympathy with that class of minds which love most the dangerous places of theological study. Not that he would leave such places unsounded, unsurveyed, but that he distrusted the fascinations which such places have for the venturesome and the curious. His system was pre-eminently clear and simple. His aim was to teach what he himself had learned from the Bible as a revelation. That which the Scriptures did not reveal he was not anxious to explain. He peculiarly disliked the mists of German philosophy, by which the students of his day were often befogged.

Dr. White's preaching was remarkable and strong. He at once alarmed and attracted his hearers. If Sinai thundered from his pulpit, the light of the Cross also beamed there, like that of the seven lamps which burned with steady radiance amid the flashes of the Apocalyptic vision of the throne. Circling about all the symbols of terror was the sign of mercy, the "rainbow, in sight like unto an emerald." He was still in the vigor of manhood when he died, but ready to be unclothed and clothed upon. During the last year of his earthly life, he supplied the pulpit of the Sixteenth Street Presbyterian Church, in New York, and there preached, not only with the power, but also with the success of his earlier days, using old weapons, repeating old victories.

White, Rev. James C., was born at Lancaster, Mass., October 12th, 1806, where his ancestors settled in 1617. At two years of age James went to live with his uncle, Dea. Samuel Farrar, of Lincoln, Mass. At fifteen he became a clerk in Boston, where he afterwards established "White's Bonnet and Dry Goods Store," over which his sign remained forty years. In 1825 he was converted and united with the church of which Dr. Lyman Beecher was pastor. He was one of the original members of Salem Street Church, and for many years one of its deacons. In 1840 he entered Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati; was appointed Chaplain in the Cincinnati Hospital and County Jail, and graduated in 1843.

In 1841 and 1842, Mr. White gathered and organized the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church in that city, and remained its pastor until 1850. On account of failing health, he then went abroad and spent a year. Upon his return he organized the Congregational Church in Springfield, Ohio, where he remained until 1851, when he was called to the Plymouth Congregational Church of Cleveland, and was its pastor for seven years. From 1861 to 1866 he was pastor of the "Free Congregational Church" at Providence. He then accepted a call to the First Orthodox Congregational Church, of Dayton, Ohio (which he had organized while a pastor at Springfield). He removed to Chicago in 1869, and was pastor of the Oakland Church for three years, when the disasters connected with the "great fire" led him to accept a call from the Popular Street Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, in the vicinity where he was licensed, ordained and installed thirty years before. With this church he still continues his labors. Mr. White is a practical preacher, of deep nervous intensity and persuasive appeal, drawing around him business men and young people with great social and affectionate power. He is now at the age of seventy-seven, but "his eye is not dimmed nor his natural force abated." In 1845, Mr. White published "Religion as it Should Be," which went through three editions. He has also recently written "Personal Reminiscences of Dr. Lyman Beecher." Many discourses and lectures have also been published.

Mr. White has the degree of A. M. from Wittenberg College. Although much engaged in organizing or reorganizing churches and building church edifices, a thousand persons have united with the churches under his care.

White, John, Sr. was the eldest child of Thomas and Jane Reynolds White, of Scotch-Irish descent, and was born near Emmittsburg, Frederick county, Maryland, in the year 1764. His education was received in the schools and academies of his native county. In early life he engaged in agricultural pursuits at "Harmony Grove," near Frederick city, Md., where he lived the remainder of his life. He united with the Presbyterian Church in Frederick city a short time after its organization, and was elected and ordained a ruling elder of the same church in 1820, during the pastorate of Rev. Patrick Davidson. He served the church in this office until his death, which occurred October 7th, 1833.

Mr. White was a man of sterling worth to the community in which he lived and to the church of which he was a model member, faithful elder, and liberal supporter. He was a Christian of devoted piety. His son, Mr. William White, has been a deacon for forty years in the same church in which he was an elder; and his daughter, Miss Sarah A. White, like her father, is its most generous contributor, and one of its most faithful and devoted members.

Rev. Joseph Smith, D. D., an eminent divine, who was Mr. White's pastor when he died, wrote concerning him: "Few have surpassed him for a life of industry, strict integrity, and generous kindness and hospitality of disposition. . . . The foundation on which he had placed his immortal hopes did not fail him in the hours of sickness and at the approach of death. The light of peace and Christian hope broke in upon his soul and shone steadily and calmly, as he entered the dark valley. . . . And thus, in the full exercise of his reason and under the sunshine of the Holy Ghost, he 'slept in Jesus.'"

White, Rev. Nathan Grier, was born at Fagg's Manor, Pa., April 11th, 1810. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1828. After leaving college he was engaged for a time in teaching. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Carlisle, June 11th, 1831, and installed pastor of the churches of McConnellsburg, Green Hill and Wells Valley, Pa. These churches he served faithfully and successfully for thirty years. In 1861 he took charge of the Church at Williamsburg, Pa., where his earnest labors were blessed. This pastorate he resigned in 1883. Mr. White is a man of modest, retiring disposition, but of decided ability. He has been very faithful during his ministry of fifty years, and is highly esteemed by his brethren.

White, Rev. Robert, was born in Montgomery county, Pa., about the year 1755. received his classical education at Norristown, under the direction of General Porter; studied theology under the Rev. Nathan Grier, of the Forks of Brandywine; became pastor of the Church at Fagg's Manor in 1810, and after a faithful and successful ministry there, of twenty-five years, died September 20th, 1835. He published a sermon designed to prove that Job was Melchisedec. His successor in the ministry, the Rev. Alfred Hamilton, said of him: "His people regarded him with great affection, and thought him, as he was in truth, a laborious, tender-hearted, prayerful pastor."

White, Rev. Sylvanus, was born in 1704; graduated at Harvard University in 1723, and was ordained by a Council, November 17th, 1727, pastor of the Church of Southampton, where, amid confusions and divisions growing out of the great revival, he seems to have dwelt in peace among a united people. After a ministry of fifty-five years, in which he was honored and revered, and happy in the affections of a large and warmly attached congregation, he died, October 22d, 1782.

White, Rev. William P., was born in Honeybrook, Pa., in 1810. He was brought into the church early in life. He partly prepared himself for Amherst College, where he graduated in 1867. He graduated at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1870, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal in 1869. He was called to be pastor of the Church at Plymouth, Pa., and ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Lackawanna in 1870. In this relation he continued thirteen years, with the divine blessing on his labors. He was stated clerk of the Presbytery. He has been a valuable correspondent of the Presbyterian, and a contributor for various papers. A number of sermons have been published by him. He was an earnest advocate of Temperance and co-laborer of Rev. Thomas P. Hunt in Wyoming Valley. In April, 1883, he was called to his present promising charge at Mt. Airy, Philadelphia. Mr. White is a vigorous writer, an able preacher, a good pastor, and a very useful member of the judicatories of the church.

White, William Spottswood, D. D., was born in the county of Hanover, Va., July 30th, 1800. His parents were connected with the congregation gathered in that part of the colony, by the Rev. Samuel Davies. His collegiate education was at Hampden-Sidney, and while a student of that Institution, the ministry of its venerable President, Dr. Moses Hoge, was blessed in awakening such conviction of sin as led to his conversion. His theological instruction was under the Rev. John H. Rice, D. D., and he was one of the first students under that eminent Professor of Theology in Union Seminary. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of East Hanover, in 1827. His first field of labor was in the counties of Nottoway, Amelia, Lunenburg and Dinwiddie, during which time his ordination took place. In 1832, he removed to Scottsville, and became pastor of the church in that place. Here his labors, as before, were greatly prospered. After two years he accepted an appointment as General Agent of the Virginia (a branch of the American Tract Society, with a special reference to the "Volume Enterprise." After two years of very arduous and successful labor, he was settled as pastor in Charlottesville. During his residence there he conducted a large and prosperous female school, and was twice elected Chaplain to the University of Virginia. In 1818 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Lexington, which was his home to the end of life.

If this outline were filled with the details which might be supplied, it would present before us the portrait of a beloved, devoted servant of Christ, worthy of the admiration of all, and to be held in everlasting remembrance. Dr. White was a man of no common endowments. With no relish for subtle speculations of any sort, he had a solid, vigorous understanding, a thoroughly good common sense, a wide knowledge of men and the springs of human action, together with a remarkable tact in finding access to them. He was an able, earnest and most successful preacher, with a rare gift for illustrating the subject in hand, both by similitudes and by incidents from general history, and by those which had come under his own observation. In every field in which he was called to labor his ministry had an ample seal of the Divine blessing. His fine social qualities, together with his tender sympathy, amiable, pacific disposition and fervent piety, endeared him to all as a friend and a pastor. He was an eminently wise, good and loving husband and father, and his household was a scene of domestic affection. On account of failing health his pastoral charge was resigned some time before his death, which took place November 29th, 1873. It was full of Christian peace. His memory is precious, and his name remains among the good and the great which so profusely adorn and enrich the history of the Synod of Virginia.

Whiting, Rev. Albert, was born in Milton, Saratoga county, N. Y., May 27th, 1847, and was a son of Jonathan and Hester Maria (Gilbert) Whiting. He was graduated at Union College in 1869, and in the same year entered Princeton Seminary, graduating in 1873. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, April 10th, 1872, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Perth, then in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, at Perth, Lanark county, Ontario, Canada, July 30th, 1872. Mr. Whiting never labored in an organized church either as pastor or stated supply. In May, 1870, soon after his licensure, he began to preach in remote settlements among the Canadian forests, and continued the same work during the Summers of 1871 and 1872, his field covering parts of Lanark, Fontenac and Renfrew counties, Ontario, where he preached in log school-houses, in shanties, and sometimes in the open woods. But his heart was in the work of Foreign Missions. Having been elected to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, he sailed for China in the Summer of 1874. After spending a few months at Suchow, after his arrival, he went with his wife and the Rev. Charles Loman, to establish a station at Nanking. The difficulties were many, but he overcame them all; made warm friends of those who opposed him; gained the respect of his Mandarin neighbors, and was accomplishing great good. Then came the terrible famine in Northern China. American Christians responded to the appeals for help, and the missionaries were called on to disburse the funds. In March, 1878, a call was made for volunteers to go into the province of Shensi and carry relief to the dying multitudes. Mr. Whiting at once offered his services, although fully appreciating the risks. His wife seconded his plans. Having reached Fai Yuen, he was attacked by typhus fever, under which he rapidly sank, and died April 25th, 1878, in the thirty-first year of his age, very peacefully and resignedly. He was a noble young man, of strong faith and earnest consecration to the Master's work.

Whiting, John, was born in Luray, Page county, Va., March 4th, 1811. In his early manhood he removed to Montgomery, Alabama, and was a distinguished ornament of the city and State. He was for twenty-five years an eminently useful member, and for twenty-three years a highly honored and beloved ruling elder, of the Presbyterian Church in Montgomery, Ala. When he was made the hopeful subject of renewing grace, he devoted himself with determined purpose to the service of his redeeming Lord, by a public profession of his faith, and from that period his life was one uniform exhibition of modest piety and beautifully consistent Christian deportment. When elected to the responsible office of a ruling elder, he gave himself up to the high duties which that important position involved, with a diligence, a steadiness and a perseverance which never faltered, ever interested in the peace, unity and purity of the Church, and ever ardent in his aspirations for the promotion of vital piety and the extension of the gospel. Though naturally modest, unobtrusive, and even diffident of himself, he was nevertheless a highly intelligent, a firm and unflinching advocate for everything that was true, just, honest, pure, lovely and of good report; and constantly set his face, like a flint, not only against all errors in doctrine, but against every form of immorality in life. Hence, in the church, the Sunday school, the social prayer meeting and in the community his influence was always felt, and was of the most salutary and beneficial character.

In compliance with the wishes of the public, Mr. Whiting accepted and undertook the management of the South and North Alabama Railroad, an enterprise which was regarded greatly important to the public welfare of the State of Alabama. To improve the financial condition of this Institution, with the activity and energy so characteristic of the man, he was induced to visit the North when in a state of feeble health, needing rest and quiet rather than exposure to a journey rendered dangerous by fatigue and accident. It was under these circumstances he gave up his life, in the city of New York, in the service of his country. After a very brief illness, in the meridian of his fame, in the vigor and maturity of his faculties, on the 5th of February, 1869, at the Astor House, in the city of New York, he breathed out his earthly life, within a month of closing his 57th year, and entered into rest.

His last words were memorable. They were spoken to his medical attendant and friend, and are thus touchingly given by him: "The day before he died there was a bright flash of his fleeting spirit that I can never forget. His eyes were closed, he was uttering incoherent words, and it seemed that reason had forever fled; when he opened his bright eyes, fixed them on mine, and said, in a slow, steady voice, "De, X —, there are lies that bind a man to his family, his friends and his country; but to one who feels that he has endeavored to do his duty to God and man, and whose trust is firmly fixed in Christ, death has no terrors."

His passage through the dark valley, though unchorded by the presence of his dearest kindred and most intimate Christian brethren, was made bright by the presence of his Redeemer.

Whittlesey, Rev. Eleazer, was probably a native of Bethlem, Conn. He graduated at Nassau

Hall in 1749, and was licensed by New Castle Presbytery in 1750. For a time he supplied vacancies. A log church was put up near Muddy Creek, in Peach Bottom Township, York county, Pa., and there Mr. Whittlesey preached, gathering the congregations of Slate Ridge and Chanceford. He also labored faithfully in Harford county, Md., and was the means of establishing a number of congregations. He was a man tenderly loved for his zeal and integrity. He died December 21st, 1751.

Wick, Rev. William, was born at Southampton, L. I., in 1768. He received his classical and scientific education at Canonsburg Academy, Pa., and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. John McMillan. He was licensed to preach August 28th, 1799, and was ordained and installed pastor of the two churches of Youngstown and Hopewell, September 3d, 1800. To these churches his labors were mainly devoted, though he spent considerable time as a missionary in the destitute settlements. His death took place March 29th, 1815. He had the reputation of being an excellent man and a faithful missionary.

Wiestling, B. J., M.D., a ruling elder in the Church in Middletown, Pa., was born September 16th, 1805, near Harrisburg, and was the son of Dr. Samuel C. Wiestling, a native of Lower Saxony, who came to this country about 1760. He belonged to a family distinguished for its physicians. Two of his older brothers were men of note in the profession, and two of his sons also are in the same calling. For five generations some members of the family have been in the profession. Dr. Wiestling read medicine with his two brothers, and then studied at the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1827. He located at Middletown, Pa., in March, 1832, and continued in practice there, highly successful and greatly beloved, until his death, which occurred July 30th, 1883.

Dr. Wiestling was no ordinary man. It may justly be said of him that in all the relations of life he was one of the best of men. Skilled and successful in his profession, and greatly beloved and trusted by his patients for his wise care and tender sympathy in their sufferings, it was as a husband and father and as a Christian that his character was most marked. He made his home a place of great attractiveness by the generous hospitality and piety that filled it. He confessed Christ when young, and became a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church in Middletown on October 29th, 1850, and continued in the office until his death. He was a most intelligent and devoted Christian. With a mind clear and vigorous, he had a heart so deeply interested in the doctrines of the gospel that he became a thorough and enthusiastic student of the Bible and spiritual things. His familiarity with the Scriptures, and his ability to quote them, were quite remarkable. He was quite superior as a theologian, especially searching the Word of God for the things that bore directly upon the highest experiences of the Christian life. His mind and heart were daily and largely occupied with religious themes. His devotion to Christ was unquestioned. He was a complete and undoubted believer in spiritual verities, and lived in habitual communion with them. He loved the truth, rejoiced in it, lived by it. Few men could be found who were so eager and inquisitive in studying and meditating upon the great themes of thought in the New Testament as was Dr. Wiestling. As a direct result of his earnest religious life, he was free from spiritual doubts and fears, and "made his calling and election sure." Charitable toward others; kind and generous in feeling; a faithful church officer; a tender husband and loving father; upright, prayerful and irreproachable in life; he has left a name and memory that will be gratefully recalled by all who learned to know him.

Wiley, Calvin Henderson, D. D., son of David L. and Anne Wiley, was born near Alamance Church, CALVIN HENDERSON WILEY, D. D.

Guilford county, N. C., February 3d, 1819. He entered the Junior Class in the University of North Carolina, taking at the same time the studies of the Sophomore Class, and winning the highest honors in both. He was graduated in the year 1840, and having studied law during the Senior course, was admitted to the Bar in the Winter of 1840-41. He served two years in the Legislature, in the House of Commons (1850-52), when he was actively engaged in devising and promoting measures of public value. In 1852 he was elected the first State Superintendent of Common Schools, and was re-elected to this office six times in succession. This position he occupied with much credit to himself and great advantage to the State. On retiring from it, he received, through the Legislature, the thanks of a grateful people, and history honors him as the "Father of Common Schools in North Carolina." He has held the position of Trustee of the State University for a number of years, and is officially connected with graded schools, as Chairman of the Board of Commissioners, in his town.

Dr. Wiley is the author of several publications of literary merit and public value, among which are "Alamance," "Roanoke," and a "History of the State," designed as a text book for common schools. He was also one of the founders of the North Carolina Presbyterian. Having previously studied theology, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Orange in 1855, and in 1866 he was ordained sine titulo by the same body, and although he has never been settled as pastor, he has been abundant in labors as a minister of Christ. As a preacher, he is strong, practical and eminently Scriptural, his discourses being always instructive, earnestly delivered, and often marked with passages full of feeling and power. In 1869 Dr. Wiley accepted an appointment as General Agent of the American Bible Society for Middle and East Tennessee. In 1874 he was transferred to North Carolina, and two years later South Carolina was included in his field. He is a man of strength and intense activity, courteous in bearing and affable in manner, and for intellectual worth, wide sympathies and sturdy devotion to the best interests of his native State, is second to none of his contemporaries.

Willard, Mrs. Carrie McCoy, daughter of Joseph White, M. D., was born at Newcastle, Pa., May 3d, 1853. She early manifested a strong missionary spirit, forming a society of little girls before she was eleven years old. In her eleventh year she had a protracted sickness, descending so low as to be apparently dead. From this she never fully recovered; so that her work has been performed in spite of much physical weakness. During this early sickness, while too weak to leave her room, she wrote notes to her playmates on the subject of religion. When sufficiently recovered to be carried into the church she made, in her twelfth year, a public profession of her faith in Christ. The state of her health prevented her from taking the usual course of studies pursued by girls.

Early manifesting a talent for drawing and painting, she commenced lessons with a teacher at home. Afterward her art studies were prosecuted at the Academy at Cincinnati and the National Academy at New York, finishing with portrait painting at Pittsburg, Pa. In September, 1874, she accepted the position of teacher of painting and drawing at the College, Monmouth, Ill., where she remained two years. On April 24th, 1879 she was married to Rev. Eugene S. Willard. In the Spring of 1871 they were commissioned as missionaries to the Chilcat tribe, at the head of Lynn channel, in southeastern Alaska. From her home among the glaciers Mrs. Willard commenced a series of mission letters that awakened great enthusiasm in the localities where they were received, and which afterward were gathered together and published in a volume for mission libraries.

Williams, Rev. Augustus W., was born in the city of Syracuse, N. Y., October 31st, 1814. His parents removed to Battle Creek, Michigan, in 1846, where he received his primary education. He graduated at Marietta College, Ohio, in 1869, delivering one of the philosophical orations and being elected a member of the Phi Beta Kappa Society. He studied theology at Lane Seminary, and under the tuition of his uncle, Rev. Lucius J. Root, at Upper Alton, Ill. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Lansing, April 10th, 1872. He became stated supply to the Presbyterian Church, Greencastle, Indiana, July 1st, 1872, and was so until July 1st, 1874. For three months he preached for the Church at Shelbyville, Ill. After an absence of several years abroad, he was installed pastor of the Wharton Street Church, Philadelphia, October 5th, 1875, and still continues in this relation. He is a faithful preacher and presbyter, and earnestly active in doing good.

Williams, Rev. Benjamin H., who was, from 1811 to 1851, pastor of the Church at Pine Ridge, Presbytery of Mississippi, was distinguished by his personal worth, his scholarly acquisitions and his fidelity as a minister. Mr. Williams was a native of New Jersey; was graduated at the Princeton Seminary, in 1842, and, until his settlement at Pine Ridge, labored as a domestic missionary in Louisiana. In 1854 he was called to the Church at Vicksburg, and commenced his pastorate with unusual promise of usefulness. It pleased God, however, early to remove him to a higher ministry. He fell a victim to the yellow fever, with which the city of his residence was scourged, during the Fall of 1855.

Williams, Jesse L., a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church of Fort Wayne, Ind., was born May 6th, 1807, in North Carolina, near Guilford Court House, the vicinity of one of the battle-fields of the Revolutionary War. His parents were members of the Society of Friends. When he was seven years old the family removed to the North, residing first in Cincinnati, and subsequently near Richmond, Ind. While yet a youth he joined an engineering corps, making the first examining survey, with the then bold view of connecting the Lakes and the Ohio river by a canal. He was thus engaged in the location and construction of the Miami Canal in the State of Ohio. The State of Indiana entering upon a similar enterprise, its Legislature invited Mr. Williams to undertake, as Chief Engineer, the building of its canal, known as the Wabash and Erie. This work he assumed when he was twenty-five years of age, and in that capacity was connected with it from its inception to its completion, and until its supersession by the later system of railroads. For the past twenty-five years he has been interested in railroads, projecting lines and furthering their construction.

Since 1832 Fort Wayne has been the place of Mr. Williams' residence. In 1830, while yet a young man, he became a Presbyterian. Arriving at the little town in the forests of Northern Indiana, he found a Presbyterian church, recently organized, under the care of the Rev. James Chute. The following year he was made a ruling elder, in which office he has ever since continuously served. From the very first days of pioneer hardship and struggle, he was not only closely identified with his local church, but maintained an active interest in the general cause of Presbyterianism throughout his section of country, showing hospitality to all exploring Home Missionaries, enjoying wide personal acquaintance with the ministry throughout the State, and encouraging and aiding many a young Timothy in the early "day of small things." He has been an efficient Director of the Theological Seminary of the Northwest from its organization to the present, and a frequent attendant as Commissioner at the meetings of Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly, in the business of which he has taken an active and influential part.

Williams, Joshua, D.D., was born in Chester county, Pa., August 8th, 1767, and was of Welsh extraction. He graduated at Dickinson College, in 1795, at the age of twenty-eight, and studied theology with Dr. Cooper, pastor of the Middle Spring Church, Presbytery of Carlisle. His first charge was Paxton and Derry, October 2d, 1799. He was installed over the Church of Big Spring (or Newville) Church, April 14th, 1802, where he labored for twenty-seven years, till 1829, when, in consequence of the infirmities of age, he resigned.

Dr. Williams, though quiet and unassuming in his general demeanor, was an acute reasoner, a profound metaphysician after the school of Edwards, a well-read theologian, a grave divine, an evangelical and didactic, but earnest preacher. He was much sought after as a theological instructor. Rev. David Elliott, D.D., one of his students, considered him as having an intellect of high order, and fitted to rank with the most gifted. Upon his tombstone, in the cemetery at Newville, is the following inscription, which was written by the Rev. J. W. Nevin, D.D. :—

"In memory of Joshua Williams, D.D., pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Big Spring, from A.D., 1801, to A.D., 1829; called home August 21st, A.D., 1838, in the seventy-first year of his age.

"A man of vigorous and comprehensive mind; in thought acute, original and profound; learned and able in his profession; firm, enlightened and independent in his views of truth; as a preacher, sound, evangelical and instructive, and in his general walk and character, a consistent Christian, whose life, systematically ordered by principle, rather than by impulse, adorned the gospel which he proclaimed to others. Though formed to take rank with the conspicuous of the age, he shrank from observation while living, and courted no fame beyond the sphere of his own pastoral charge. Here his memory is enshrined in many hearts, and his voice will long continue to be heard from the grave where he sleeps; may it find an echo in every spirit, and be as the 'still small voice' from heaven, that leads to righteousness and to God."

Williams, Meade, C., D. D., son of Jesse L. Williams and Susan (Creighton) Williams, was born in Indianapolis, Ind., December 18th, 1840. He was early dedicated to the Lord in the faith of the covenant. He was brought up in Fort Wayne, Ind. He graduated at Miami University, with one of the honors of the class, in 1861; at Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1864, and was licensed to preach, a few weeks after leaving the Seminary, by the Presbytery of Fort Wayne. He supplied for three months one of the Presbyterian churches in Circleville, Ohio. In October, 1865, he was settled at Sterling, Ill., and continued to be pastor there nearly eight years. He resigned a pastorate of four years in Sandusky, Ohio, on account of failing health. After a year's respite he began labor in the Church at Williamsport, Md. Since November, 1880, he has been pastor of the Church in Princeton, Ill. Dr. Williams is an instructive and successful preacher. He has contributed articles frequently to the different religious papers, many of which, displaying ability, have been on points of interest connected with the revision of the English New Testament.

Williams, Rev. Stephen, was born in Somersetshire, England. He emigrated to the United States when young, and having made a profession of religion, he was taken under the care of Baltimore Presbytery, in May, 1821, and licensed to preach the gospel, but was never ordained. He began his labors in the ministry among the sailors, having charge of the Seamen's Bethel in Baltimore. He subsequently became city missionary, preaching in the missionary institutions, and in the streets and lanes, and visiting the poor, sick, afflicted and dying. He probably attended as many funerals, assisted as many brethren, and supplied as many churches, as any minister that ever lived in Baltimore. He had the respect and confidence of almost every one who knew him. He died December 15th, 1866.

Williams, William W., D. D., was born in Vernon, Oneida county, N. Y., October 25th, 1821. For fifty years his father was an elder in the Presbyterian Church in Vernon, and the son was early taught the principles and practice of the religion of Christ. When seventeen years of age he experienced that great change, the new birth, and soon afterward joined the church. He prepared for college at Vernon Academy and Dr. David Nelson's Mission Institute, at Quincy, Ill. He took his college course at Amherst, and graduated from the Auburn Seminary in 1846, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Cayuga, and by the Onondaga Presbytery ordained, at Canillus, 1848, and at the same time and place installed pastor of the Presbyterian church in that village. In 1853 he was called to the First Church, in Toledo, Ohio, and installed pastor, where he has remained for more than thirty years. His ministry in Toledo has been one of eminent success.

When he entered on that field he found many and stubborn hindrances to the progress of the work he had taken in hand, but the Master has greatly blessed the marked wisdom and faithfulness of his plans and labors, so that 938 members have been received into the church, and the society has become strong and influential. It is by far the largest church in the Presbytery of Maunee, and it abounds in the work of the Lord in all appropriate directions. One church building has been enlarged and two others built for the parent society, and two fine chapels for mission churches.

Dr. Williams' manner, both in private and in public, is eminently gentle, persuasive and courteous, and so long as strength shall be given him for his work he will remain in Toledo, held in honor and love by all who know him. A large part of his success has resulted from his labors in his Sunday school. He has himself acted as its superintendent, and it would be difficult to find a school, large or small, which has had better management or yielded better results.

Williamson, Rev. Alexander, was born near Newville, Pa., September 17th, 1797; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1818; was missionary in Mississippi, 1823-5; was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Salem, April 8th, 1825; was stated supply at Corydon, Ind., 1825-35; at Lebanon, 1835-9; at Delphi, 1839-42, at Monticello and Indian Creek, 1842-6; and at Corydon, 1846-9. He died at Corydon, Ind., July 11th, 1849, leaving the record of an earnest, faithful and devoted minister of the gospel.

Williamson, Hugh, M.D., F.R.S., was born in West Nottingham township, Chester county, Pa., December 5th, 1735, and from his very earliest childhood gave strong indications of marked intellectuality. He graduated at the Philadelphia College, May 17th, 1757; studied theology for a time under the direction of Rev. Dr. Samuel Finley, and in 1759 went to Connecticut, where he still pursued his theological studies, and was licensed to preach the gospel. He preached but a short time—not exceeding two years—when he found that his health was not adequate to the duties of the office, and left the pulpit and entered upon the study of medicine. About 1760 he was appointed Professor of Mathematics in Philadelphia College, but continued his medical studies, which, after 1764, were completed at the University of Edinburgh, in London, and at Utrecht.

Dr. Williamson practiced medicine in Philadelphia for a few years. In 1768, he was chosen a member of the American Philosophical Society. In 1770 he published Observations on Climate in the "American Philosophical Transactions". In 1772 he visited the West Indies, to collect contributions in aid of the Academy at Newark, Del. In 1773 he went with Rev. John Ewing to Europe, to solicit further aid for this Institution. On his return to this country he settled at Edenton, N. C. At the close of the war he served as a representative of Edenton, in the House of Commons of North Carolina. He was next sent to Congress from "the old North State," where he continued for three years, as long a term as the law at that time allowed. He was a member on that memorable occasion, December 23d, 1783, when Washington, at Annapolis, tendered his commission and claimed the indulgence of retiring from the public service, and his fine commanding figure is prominent in the grand picture of this sublime scene, which was painted by Trumbull, and which now adorns the rotunda of the Capitol at Washington. In 1786 he was one of the few delegates sent to Annapolis to revise and amend the Articles of Confederation of the Union, and in 1787, he was a delegate from North Carolina to the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. He was a zealous advocate of the new Constitution, and was a member of the State Convention which adopted it. He served in the first and second Congress, and then declined a re-election.

In 1789, Dr. Williamson removed to the city of New York, where he continued industriously to write on various philosophical subjects; was an advocate of the great New York canal system, an active promoter of philanthropic, literary and scientific institutions, and in 1812, gave to the world his "History of North Carolina." He died May 23d, 1819. He was an ornament to his country, and one of the most eminent and useful men which it has yet produced. An interesting memoir of him was prepared and published by the distinguished Dr. Hosack, of New York, and has now a place in the Transactions of the New York Historical Society.

Williamson, Rev. James, was one of four brothers who entered the ministry in the Presbyterian Church. He was born near Newville, Pa., June 11th, 1795; graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1817; was ordained by the Presbytery of Luzerne, in June, 1821; was stated supply at Athens Pa; pastor of Silver's Spring Church, Pa., 1823-37; of the Church at Milton, 1838-45; of the churches of Hazleton and Millinburg, of the churches of New Windsor and Taneytown, Md., 1849-54; of the Church at Athens, Pa., 1854-58; of the Church of West Kishacoquillas, 1858, and stated supply of the Church of Little Valley. He died March 10th, 1865. Mr. Williamson was an earnest Christian, a good preacher and a faithful pastor. He was a gentleman of dignified bearing and very agreeable manners, highly esteemed by his brethren in the ministry and by the congregation of which he had charge.

Williamson, Rev. Moses, son of David and Tamar (McKnight) Williamson, was born near Newville, Pa., May 7th, 1802. He graduated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., in 1824; taught for a short time in the Academy at Bellefonte, Pa.; graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1828, afterwards spent six months at Andover Seminary, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, April 28th, 1828. From October, 1828, until September, 1829, he supplied the Church at Christiana, Del., at the same time preaching at Elkton, Md., where there was at that time no church organization. After supplying the Church at Cold Spring, Cape May county, N. J., for some time, he was installed as its pastor, July 6th, 1831. In this pastoral charge he continued to labor patiently and faithfully over forty-nine years, during which time there were added to his church not less than four hundred and ninety persons. He died October 30th, 1880, in the seventy-ninth year of his age. His end was peace. There was not a cloud in his spiritual sky. His last words concerning his future were, "Christ is all my desire." He was an eminently good man, and was beloved by all who knew him.

Williamson, Rev. Samuel McCulloch, was a native of North Carolina, and graduated at Yale College in 1823. He removed, in 1826, to Tennessee, with a view to enter upon the practice of the legal profession, but after some time was led to devote himself to the service of Christ; then, sacrificing his worldly interests, he placed himself under the tuition of Dr. Blackburn, and in 1829, was licensed to preach by Shiloh Presbytery. After travelling as a missionary in Western Tennessee, and laboring for a brief period among the Chickasaw and Choctaw Indians, he settled, in the Fall of 1830, at Memphis, where he soon succeeded in gathering a prosperous congregation, and by his constancy and firmness, in improving the moral tone of the community.

In connection with his charge at Memphis, which he retained for three years, he preached at two other stations, one ten and the other twenty-four miles distant. It was not uncommon for him to preach five times in a week, and in order to fulfill his appointments he was often obliged to make his horse swim the swollen streams which abounded in that region at certain seasons of the year. His labors as an Evangelist were particularly successful. On removing from Memphis he labored first with the Mountain and Covington congregations, and subsequently at Lagrange and Bethany, until his death, in 1846. Unsparing in his devotion to the great work of his life, Mr. Williamson accomplished much during his short ministry. For activity and energy of mind, clearness of thought, impressiveness and earnestness of manner, and fervid unaffected eloquence, he had not his superior, either in the pulpit or at the Bar, in the whole Western District.

Williamson, Samuel, D.D., son of Samuel and Ann (Starr) Williamson, was born in York District, S. C., June 12th, 1795, began his academical studies with Rev. James Wallis, and was graduated from South Carolina College in 1818, with high-class standing. He studied theology with Rev. James Adams, of South Carolina; was licensed by Concord Presbytery April 14th, 1822, and ordained by the same and installed pastor of Providence Church, May 24th, 1827. Having taught classical schools with success, both before and after his ordination, he was chosen Professor of Mathematics in Davidson College, in 1840, and in the following year promoted to the presidency, which post he occupied till his resignation, in 1854. During his presidency he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity. From 1857 till 1876 he served the churches of Washington and Columbus, in Arkansas, where he died, March 12th, 1882.

Dr. Williamson was a man of remarkable mental vigor, a fluent and impressive preacher, industrious, active and faithful. By his skill, prudence and patience he conducted the new College of Davidson through its most trying period of existence. He was at the same time President, Pastor and Professor of Rhetoric, Logic, Moral and Mental Philosophy, Mineralogy, Geology, Chemistry, Political Economy and International Law, and meanwhile, had to conduct a poorly endowed college, so as to satisfy its patrons, retain its students, keep up its finances and please a Board of forty-eight Trustees. Though immeasurably overworked, he kept the college alive in troublous times, almost till the arrival of a brighter era, when, with ample endowment, it was able to launch forth on a happier career. The Church in the Carolinas owes to Dr. Williamson a debt of gratitude for those years of toil and self-denial. His memory is still precious in the hearts of the long list of students who were trained for usefulness under his guiding counsels. His closing years were spent in the bosom of his family, and his remains rest in the cemetery of the Presbyterian Church in Washington, Arkansas.

Williamson, Rev. William, was educated in Scotland, his native country, and came to Virginia with a view to engage as a teacher. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Hanover, October 12th, 1792, and was ordained the next year. He resided for a time near Gordonsville, and preached in the adjacent congregations, but afterwards removed to the valley of the Shenandoah, and took his position in Warren county, near Front Royal. He subsequently removed to Loudon county, established a classical school near Middleburg, and preached in the counties of Loudon and Fauquier, as he could find opportunity. He continued his labors till he was about eighty years of age. He was a man of powerful intellect, and a bold and exciting preacher.

Willson, Rev. Robert Edmund, was born in America (now Northeast), N. Y., March 28th, 1807; graduated from Hamilton College in 1831, and studied theology at East Windsor and Auburn Seminaries. He was ordained and installed at Hammondsport, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Bath, December, 1838, where he remained fourteen years. He was at Corning four years, Clyde fourteen years, Havana five and a half years, an evangelist residing in Hudson, N. Y., 1875-8, and since then has lived in Philadelphia, Pa. His life has been one of fidelity to duty and usefulness in the Master's service. Mr. Willson has published "A Review of a Farewell Sermon by the Rev. Mr. Russ," and sermons, reviews and articles.

Wilmot, Rev. Walter, was born at Southampton, Long Island, in 1709; graduated at Yale in 1735, and was installed pastor at Jamaica, April 12th, 1738. In the great revival, Jamaica was highly favored. Mr. Wilmot died August 6th, 1744. He was greatly beloved by his people.

Wilson, Alexander G., D. D., was a student of Eldersridge Academy, Pa., the intellectual and religious birth-place of so many great and good men. After graduating at Jefferson College, in 1856, he became Associate Principal of Beaver Academy for one year. He then went to Natchez, Miss., and after teaching five months in a family, he became Principal of the High School Department, and then Superintendent of the Natchez Institute, the public school of the city. He studied theology in the Seminary of the Northwest, at Chicago, and was pastor of the Church at Onarga, Ill., from 1865 till 1870. He was then called to Beloit, Wis., and remained there for a year as pastor. His next pastoral charge was the Church at Streator, Ill., where he remained till 1875, when he removed to Iowa, and was Professor of Ancient Languages and head of the Faculty in Parsons College, from 1875 to 1878. He subsequently was Professor of Latin and Biblical Instruction, and Principal of Ferry Hall, in Lake Forest University, Ill.

He was Moderator of the Synod of Northern Illinois, in the famous Patton and Swing trial, and managed the deliberations of that body with great ability and fairness. Dr. Wilson is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, affable disposition, and beloved by those who know him. He now resides at Elgin, Ill., and is Principal of the Elgin Academy.

Wilson, Rev. A. W., was a native of South Carolina, and was blest in having had in early life excellent religious training. He graduated at Davidson College in 1873, and at the Theological Seminary of Columbia in 1876, and a year prior to that event he received license from Bethel Presbytery to preach the gospel of Christ. Mr. Wilson went to Mississippi in the Fall of the year 1876, and entered upon a field of labor, embracing the churches of Greenwood and Roebuck, in the Yazoo Valley. His introduction there awakened general interest, and gave new life to Presbyterianism in that comparatively destitute section. He raised the standard of the Cross before the eyes of those who seldom heard the voice of ministers of the Word. At a meeting of the Presbytery of Central Mississippi, held at the Roebuck Church, in October, 1876, he was received from Bethel Presbytery as a licentiate, and a call for one-half his time, from the church in which Presbytery met, was placed in his hands. He was accordingly ordained and installed pastor. On the 27th day of December of that year he was united in marriage with Miss Mary H. Carothers, daughter of Rev. W. W. Carothers, of Summerfield, Ala., and soon after settled in the town of Greenwood. To the two churches he continued to labor until the end of his life, giving also a part of his services in the last two years to Trece Church in Carroll county. The influence which he wielded became strong and extensive. The hearts of the people were won by the minister, and the work was prosecuted in earnest spirit. His strength was mainly in the pastoral work, which extended over a wide district. He was willing and adapted to this department of ministerial duty; hence he could not rest at ease when the impression existed in his mind that the sick could be comforted, the poor assisted, or sinners moved to seek Christ by his personal efforts.

Mr. Wilson was a man of truly missionary spirit, and paid frequent visits to vacant churches. Modest, social, unassuming and zealous, he gained the good will of the masses. As a preacher, he was earnest, faithful, and often very impressive in the pulpit. By untiring labors, amiable and unselfish spirit, and by personal sacrifices made for the cause of the Master, he acquired the name and character of a model Christian, and proved himself a faithful minister of Jesus Christ. He died April 1st, 1882.

Wilson, Rev. Daniel Love, the youngest son of James and Margaret Wilson, was born near Churchville, Augusta county, Va., February 16th, 1849. He was graduated, with high honors, at Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Va., in 1870. The same year he entered Union Theological Seminary, Va. In April, 1874, Lexington Presbytery licensed him to preach the gospel, and in September, ordained and installed him pastor of the Church at Broadway, Va. After a successful pastorate of five years, he became pastor of the Church in Pulaski, Tenn., where he now resides. Mr. Wilson is a young man of scholarly attainments and habits. As a minister, he has been eminently successful. During his ministry at Broadway, there was a large ingathering of souls. He is a man of pleasant address, and a preacher of more than ordinary ability.

Wilson, Rev. David Morrison, was born March 6th, 1819, in Charlestown, N. H. In 1828 the family removed to Ohio. He spent 1838-9 at Woodward High School, Cincinnati, and was a student, 1840-1, at Pleasant Hill Academy. He graduated at Lane Theological Seminary, June 9th, 1847. On October 16th, 1847, he was ordained at a meeting of Synod at College Hill, and the same day was married to Miss Emeline B. Tomlinson. December 29th, 1847, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson set sail for Boston, under appointment of the American Board, as missionaries to Syria, arriving at Beirut, March 8th, the following year.

Mr. Wilson was associated with Rev. Horace Foot, at Tripoli, Syria, from November, 1848 to November, 1854, when Mr. and Mrs. Foot left for the United States. In the Summer of 1854, however, Mr. Wilson superintended the Mission Female School, at Abeih, on Mount Lebanon. In the Spring of 1861, on account of the failure of Mrs. Wilson's health, they returned to the United States.

Soon after their arrival in this country, Mr. Wilson took charge of the Congregational Church at New London, Butler county, Ohio, where he engaged in the work of teaching and preaching until October 12th, 1864, when he removed to Radnor, Delaware county, Ohio, and was stated supply of the Congregational Church at that place until December, 1867, when he removed to Athens, Tenn., where he has since resided, having charge of a Presbyterial Church known as Mars Hill, and another a few miles distant, at Pleasant Forest.

Mr. Wilson is a man of extensive reading and varied information, and possessing a retentive and ready memory, no one can listen to his conversation without being surprised at his wide range of knowledge in history, theology, and in Biblical and general literature, and in his wise discrimination in the use of the facts at his command. Mr. Wilson is a man of clear judgment, strong convictions, indomitable and persevering in his efforts to promote the cause of truth and righteousness.

His missionary life, both at home and abroad, has been one of no little toil and self-sacrifice for the Master. Ever faithful and indefatigable in his work, he still felt grieved, in leaving the foreign field, that the results of his labors were not fuller and more apparent. But he planted better than he thought, for the seed he sowed in tears has since sprung up and yielded an abundant harvest.

Wilson, Henry Rowan, D. D., was born near Gettysburg, Pa., August 7th, 1780. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1798, and having prosecuted his theological studies under the direction of Dr. Nisbet, partly in connection with his college course and partly after he had completed it, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, in 1801. His first charge was a congregation in Bellefonte, in 1802, of which he was the founder. He was also Principal of the academy in the same place. In 1806 he was made Professor of Languages in Dickinson College, acting part of the time as assistant to Dr. Davidson, pastor of the church at Carlisle. In 1813 he was installed over Silver's Spring Church, and in 1823 over the Church of Shippensburg. In both charges he was diligent and successful. From 1838 till 1842 he was General Agent of the Board of Publication. In 1842 he was installed over Neshaminy Church, where he was greatly beloved; but his health giving way, he resigned in 1848. He died March 22d, 1848.

Dr. Wilson was an eminently faithful and successful preacher. He was Stated Clerk of the Synod of Philadelphia (Old School) for twenty-three years, up to the date of his decease, and the minutes were beautifully kept. He was tall and athletic, and of dignified presence. His life was an eventful one. More can be said of him than that he passed through scenes of some interest, grew old, and then died. He had that steadiness of purpose and energy of execution for which, from his earliest labors in the gospel, there was a demand. He was one of those ministers who, by their character, stamp an impression upon the times in which they live, give a fixedness to the order, the government, the instruction and standard of piety in the Church, by which they, being dead, yet speak. His ministerial labors were abundant. His preaching was marked by all that seriousness of manner and weight of instruction which are the fairest ornaments of the Christian pulpit. He was ruled by a sense of duty in his labors. Not the increase, but the work was his. Not the measure of his success, but the command of Christ and the assurance that God would bless and prosper His own truth—this was the rule and the measure of his toil. For months before resigning his last charge he was carried from his bed to the church and placed in a chair, in which posture he delivered his message, amidst much bodily weakness and suffering. He died with the language of praise upon his lips, most beloved by those who knew him best and lauded by all pious men of every name.

Wilson, Hugh Nesbitt, D. D., was born at Elizabeth, N. J., May 7th, 1813. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1830, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1831. During the years 1833-35, he was Tutor in the College, and proved himself a faithful, thorough and able instructor. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, April 23d, 1835, and ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, October 7th, in the same year. As pastor of the Church at Southampton, Long Island, for nearly sixteen years, his labors were largely blessed, and he enjoyed the unbounded love of an attached people. For reasons connected with his health, he resigned this charge April 13th, 1852. June 23d, in the same year, he was installed over the Church at Hackensacktown, N. J., where he labored six years, with great acceptance and success. In May, 1858, he became pastor of the Second Reformed Dutch Church, of New Brunswick, N. J., and labored there four years. In 1861 he was again installed as pastor of the Church at Southampton. But after three years, his health, which had for a long time been far from strong, hopelessly failed, and he resigned, May 1st, 1867. After this date, he resided in Germantown, Philadelphia, until his death, which occurred June 4th, 1878. Dr. Wilson was, in the truest sense of the term, a Christian gentleman. He was a fine classical scholar, and a man of extensive reading. As a preacher, he was earnest, affectionate, instructive and popular. The blessing of God attended his labors in every place where he was settled.

Wilson, James Duncan, D. D., was born at Spring Mills, Centre county, Pa., April 3d, 1836. He graduated at Amherst College in 1858, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1862. After teaching for a year in the academy at Lawiston, he was stated supply of the Spring Street Presbyterian Church, New York, until 1863, when he became its pastor, in which relation he continued until 1869. During his ministry here, the church was blessed with great prosperity. On retiring from this charge, he accepted a call to the Central Presbyterian Church in the same city, where he has since labored with diligence, acceptableness and success. Dr. Wilson is a gentleman of genial spirit and attractive manner. He is endowed with a strong intellectual capacity. He is in the fullest sense a worker. Activity of mind and body with him is his most happy condition. As a preacher, he is scholarly, faithful, and often very effective. As a pastor, he is earnestly devoted to the welfare of his congregation, and is by them held in affectionate regard, for his nobility.

Wilson, James P., D. D., was born in Lewes, Del. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1788. He acted, for some time, as Surveyor-General for the State of Delaware. He was admitted to practice at the Bar. The unexpected death of his wife, and the assassination of his brother before his eyes, made such an impression of the importance of eternal things that he quitted the law for the pulpit. He was ordained pastor of the Lewes Church, as successor of his father, in 1804. In 1806 he accepted a call from the First Church in Philadelphia. In May, 1828, he retired to his farm, a little south of the village of Hartsville, Bucks county, about twenty miles from the city, on account of the infirm state of his health, preaching, nevertheless, to his congregation as often as his health permitted. For some years before his death his infirmities compelled him to preach sitting on a high chair in the pulpit. His resignation of his pastoral charge was accepted in the Spring of 1830.

Dr. Wilson was characterized by a few eccentricities, but they were overlooked, or only excited a smile, in view of his sterling worth. As a preacher, he was perfectly deliberate and unimpassioned, handling the most abstruse subjects in a masterly manner, speaking for an hour without the least assistance from notes, yet drawing on the stores of a memory replete with recondite learning, especially of the Greek and Latin Fathers. He was regarded as one of the most learned divines of the day. He was of a tall and lank figure, and pallid, from a habit of blood-letting. His published works consisted of "Occasional Sermons," a "Hebrew Grammar without Points," "Lectures on the New Testament," an edition of Ridgeley's "Treatise on the Holy Trinity, with Notes," treatises on church government, on which subject he held some peculiar notions, etc.

Dr. Wilson's remains are buried in a spot selected by himself, in the graveyard of Neshaminy Church, near the tomb of the celebrated William Tennent, the founder of the "Log College."¹ On his monument is the following inscription:—

Born, February 23d, 1799.

Died, December 9th, 1830.

Placide hic pœquisit Jacobus P. Wilson, per annos bis septem composuisses, sermoes in dolo digna tractans. Quod sum et fui, jam non est, viat or. Quod, de supra, vi d. 94. Brevi quid ipse taturus, nunc postore versu. Natus, 1799. Obiit, 1830.

For the benefit of the reader who is not familiar with the Latin language, this may be translated thus:

Here I James P. Wilson, rest in calm peace. During fourteen years, I preached a law, then a forward treating of sacred themes. Now, traveler, you know what I am and have been. What I am about to do, on the last day you will see. Now dwell, in your mind, on what you yourself will be in a short time!

Wilson, Rev. John, as early as 1702, preached in the Court House at Newcastle, Del., but had no pastoral relation to the congregation there. In 1708 the Presbytery directed him to preach alternately, on the Sabbath, at Newcastle and White Clay, and monthly, on a week-day, and quarterly on a Sabbath, at Appoquinimy. In 1710 he was succeeded by Mr. Anderson, at Newcastle, and probably devoted all his time to White Clay till his death, in 1712. He conducted the Presbytery's correspondence with divided or uneasy congregations, with Scotland, and with Sir Edmond Harrison, in London.

Wilson, John Leighton, D. D., was born in Sumter county, S. C., March 25th, 1809. His parents were William and Jane James Wilson. He graduated at Union College, New York, in 1829. Taught school one year at Hadriß's Point, near Charleston, S. C. Graduated at the Theological Seminary, Columbia, S. C., in 1833, being a member of the first class of that Institution; ordained in the Spring of 1833, as a missionary to Africa, by Harmony Presbytery. Studied Arabic at Andover Seminary, Mass., during the Summer of 1833. In November, 1833, he sailed from Baltimore, Md., on a voyage of exploration to Western Africa, returning the following Spring. As the result of this exploration, he decided on Cape Palmas, Western Africa, as the most promising place to commence his missionary work. Extended accounts of this exploration were published in the Missionary Herald, of Boston, in the year 1834. In May, 1834, he was united in marriage to Miss Jane Elizabeth Bayard, of Savannah, Ga., daughter of Nicholas Bayard, M. D., and Miss McIntosh, the daughter of Gen. Lauchlin McIntosh, of Revolutionary note. In 1834 Mr. and Mrs. Wilson sailed for Cape Palmas, where they arrived at the close of the year. They remained at Cape Palmas seven years. During these years they accomplished the following work: a Church of forty members organized, more than a hundred native youth educated, the Grebo language reduced to writing, a grammar and dictionary of the language published, the gospels of Matthew and John translated, and, with six or eight other small volumes, published in the native language. In 1842 Mr. and Mrs. Wilson removed to the Gaboon river, 1200 miles southeast of Cape Palmas, and commenced a new mission amongst the Mpongwe people. Here, again, the language was reduced to writing for the first time. A grammar, a vocabulary, portions of the Bible, and a number of small volumes were published in the native language. In the Spring of 1853, owing to the failure of Mr. Wilson's health, he and his wife returned to America. In the Autumn of 1853 he entered the office of Foreign Missions in New York, and continued to discharge the duties of that office until the outbreak of the Civil War, when he returned to his home in the South. In 1854 he received the title of D. D. from Lafayette College, Easton, Pa. At the organization of the Southern Presbyterian Church, Dr. Wilson was appointed Secretary of Foreign Missions. This office he has continued to hold to the present date (1883), without interruption. During this period, for seven years, the Home Mission work was combined with that of Foreign Missions, Dr. Wilson having care of both.

In 1854 Dr. Wilson published a volume of five hundred pages on "Western Africa, Its History, Condition and Prospects." Dr. Livingstone pronounced this book the best volume on that part of Africa ever published. In 1852 a strong effort was made in the British Parliament to withdraw the British squadron from the coast of Africa, under the impression that the foreign slave trade could not be broken up. Dr. Wilson wrote a pamphlet, showing that the impression was erroneous, and indicating what was wanting to make the effort to suppress the slave trade successful. The pamphlet fell into the hands of Lord Palmerston, and was, by his order, published in the United Service Journal, afterwards in the "Blue Book" of Parliament. An edition of 10,000 copies was circulated throughout the kingdom. Lord Palmerston informed Dr. Wilson that this pamphlet put an end to all opposition to the continuance of the squadron, and in less than five years the trade itself was brought to an end.

During his residence in New York Dr. Wilson acted as editor of the Foreign Department of the Home and Foreign Record, and since that time has edited "The Missionary." He has published, in whole or part, thirty Annual Reports on Foreign Missions and seven on Home Missions. He has published thirty or more articles in the Southern Presbyterian Review, and in other literary and scientific Reviews. While in Africa, Dr. Wilson procured and sent to the Boston Society of Natural History the first specimen of the gorilla known in modern times.

Dr. Wilson has a commanding presence. His features are clearly marked and indicate physical and intellectual strength. His manly form is graced with quiet dignity. Affable and courteous in address, he exerts over those about him a great charm. His varied information makes him the attractive centre of the social circle. He is just in judgment, wise in counsel, practical in methods, and endowed in an eminent degree with executive ability. His life has been devoted to foreign missions, both in the active service in the field and in the direction and management of the work from the office at home. In this work he has achieved his greatest distinction, and for it will be longest remembered. Dr. Wilson's public life has now covered fifty years. These fifty years have recorded wonderful progress in the foreign mission work. They constitute a great missionary age in the history of the Church. It is only fair to remark that amongst the great workers in this branch of Christian service, Dr. Wilson stands with the first. He is still in the vigorous exercise of his powers, the able and efficient Secretary of Foreign Missions for the Southern Presbyterian Church.

Wilson, John Makemie, D. D., was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., within the bounds of the Sugar Creek Congregation, in 1769. In his boyhood he was the intimate friend and playmate of Andrew Jackson, and, young as they were, they are said to have shared largely in the patriotic spirit of the times. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, with the highest honor, in 1791, and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. James Hall. In 1793 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Orange, and immediately after he was sent, by the Commission of Synod, on a missionary tour through the counties of the lower part of North Carolina. He was ordained as pastor in Burke county, about 1795. His labors in Burke county were eminently successful, both in planting new churches and in ministering to the growth of those already in existence, and when he left the county he carried with him, in a high degree, the grateful respect and good-will of those who had enjoyed his ministrations. In 1801 he accepted a call from the congregations of Rocky River and Philadelphia, in which he labored for about eleven years. He commenced a school in 1812, which he continued for about twelve years, and twenty-five pupils of which became ministers of the gospel. As a teacher, he was at once eminently popular and successful. He died July 30th, 1831.

Dr. Wilson possessed a strong, penetrating and well cultivated mind. Soundness of judgment, energy of purpose, and great prudence, were striking features of his character. His piety was manifested, not by impulses, but by works of righteousness. He had a peculiar talent for ministering to the happiness of others. His manner of preaching was marked by a faithful and judicious exhibition of the truth. As a member of the judicatories of the Church, no man of his day was held in higher repute. In this department of ministerial duty it was universally conceded that he possessed almost unrivaled power.

Wilson, Joseph R., D. D., is the youngest son of the late Judge James Wilson, of Steubenville, O., and was born in that town February 28th, 1826. He graduated at Jefferson College, as valedictorian of his class, in 1845, and then commenced his studies in theology at Allegheny Seminary (Presbyterian), completing them at Princeton. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Steubenville, in 1848; was called, in 1849, to the Chartiers Church, in what was then known as the Presbytery of Ohio, by which body he was in that same year ordained and installed.

In 1851 Mr. Wilson accepted a Professorship of Natural Sciences at Hampden-Sidney College, Va., whence he was called to the Presbyterian Church at Staunton in 1851, and from there, in 1857, to the much larger Church at Augusta, Ga. Meanwhile, he received the title of Doctor of Divinity from Oglethorpe University, which was then in a flourishing condition, near Milledgeville, Ga. Dr. Wilson's pastorate in Augusta embraced thirteen years of happy and successful labor, which, in 1870, he reluctantly left, to obey the order of his General Assembly to enter upon the duties of the Professorship of Homiletics in the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C. This Institution failing pecuniarily and in other respects not necessary to particularize, he removed to the city where he now resides, as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Wilmington, N. C.

In 1861 Dr. Wilson was elected Permanent Clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (South); in 1865 was chosen its Stated Clerk, which office he still holds, and in 1879 was the Assembly's Moderator during its sessions at Louisville, Ky. He is a thorough scholar, an accomplished theologian, a powerful preacher and a devoted pastor.

Wilson, Joshua Lacy, D. D., was born in Bedford county, Va., September 23d, 1771. After his father's death, the family settled in Kentucky. When twenty-two years of age, he entered the Kentucky Academy, at Pisgah, where he remained about a year, then spent a year and a half at a private school, and subsequently taught a school himself in Frankfort, Ky. During his residence here he commenced the study of law. Having decided to enter the ministry, he went to live in the family of Rev. James Vance, who was then engaged in conducting a classical school near Louisville. He assisted in the school, at the same time pursuing his theological studies under the direction of Mr. Vance. He was licensed to preach in 1802, and was ordained in October, 1804, when he took charge of the churches of Bardstown and Big Spring. In 1805 he sat as a member of the Commission of Synod in the Cumberland difficulties. In 1808, he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, where he remained for thirty-eight years, part of the time teaching a classical school.

Though Dr. Wilson possessed originally a vigorous constitution, it was greatly impaired, while he was yet in early manhood, by a protracted illness occasioned by exposure in rescuing a lad from drowning. His ministry was exercised in the midst of much bodily suffering, and for a long period he was obliged to preach in a sitting posture, and sometimes with his eyes entirely closed, on account of an inflammation induced by studying before daylight, it being his custom for many years to rise at three o'clock in the morning. He died August 11th, 1846, after most intense suffering, but, in the midst of it all, evincing the most tranquil submission to his heavenly Father's will.

Dr. Wilson published quite a number of sermons. He was highly acceptable as a pastor. In social intercourse he was always friendly and agreeable. As a preacher, at the period of his greatest strength, he was decidedly among the ablest of the day. His sermons, though not read, were clear and logical in their structure. No matter whether he exhibited doctrine or enforced duty, he did it with an air of strength and boldness that showed his hearers that he deeply realized the importance of what he was saying and that he was bent upon making them feel it too. In an ecclesiastical judicatory he was perfectly at home, and was always felt to be a controlling spirit. He was perfectly familiar with the forms of ecclesiastical procedure, and in the most involved cases was never perplexed as to the cause which ought to be pursued. In or out of a deliberative body, he would have followed his convictions of duty, if they had required him to break every earthly tie or even led him to the martyr's stake.

Wilson, Rev. Lewis Feuilleteau, was born at St. Christopher's, one of the West India Islands, in June, 1753. He was sent to a grammar school in London, at which he continued until he completed his seventeenth year, at which time he accompanied an uncle, who migrated to America and settled in New Jersey. He was graduated, with honor, at Princeton College, in 1773. He commenced the study of divinity under the direction of Dr. Witherspoon, in 1774, and soon after this he was chosen Tutor in the college, and held the office about one year. Being interrupted in his theological studies by the breaking up of the college, he studied medicine, embarked in the cause of American independence, and entered, as a surgeon, the Continental army, which position he filled several years. Some time afterward he settled as practicing physician in Princeton, N. J. In 1786 he took up his residence in Fredell county, N. C., and in 1791 was licensed to preach by the Orange Presbytery. His efforts in the pulpit, from the first, were received with marked approbation, and in a short time several respectable congregations endeavored to secure him as their pastor. In June, 1793, he was installed pastor of the Fourth Creek and Concord churches, and continued in this relation about ten years, with uninterrupted harmony. He died, in perfect peace, December 11th, 1801. Mr. Wilson occupied a highly respectable rank as a preacher. "The language of his precepts and practice," says Dr. R. H. Morrison, "was one." By a life and conversation conformed to the gospel, he silently exhorted those to whom he ministered, as the great Apostle of the Gentiles did the churches—"My little children, be ye followers of me, even as I am a follower of Christ."

Wilson, Rev. Matthew, was born in New London, Chester county, Pa., January 15th, 1731; was licensed by New Castle Presbytery before May, 1754, and was employed to teach the languages in the Synod's School, at Newark. He was installed before May, 1755, pastor of Lewes and Cool Spring churches, Delaware, and he was sent, for three months, in the following Spring, to Virginia, where the congregation at Indian River, in 1768, became part of his charge. He was engaged as a teacher, a physician and a pastor, and was eminent in all these professions. He was skilled in jurisprudence, and highly esteemed for his counsel. He was zealous in the cause of American independence, and inscribed the word "Liberty" on his cocked hat, that no one might doubt his sentiments. He died March 30th, 1790.

Wilson, Rev. Miles C., was born in Kishacoquillas Valley, Millin county, Pa., July 12th, 1829, and had his preparatory education at Milnewood Academy. He was a fine scholar, and a good debater, a methodical thinker, and in every way a pleasant, genial man. After graduating at Jefferson College, in 1856, he entered Princeton Seminary, but his health failing somewhat, in the winter of 1857, he went South in the Spring, and engaged in teaching at LaFayette, Ala., and afterwards started a school of his own at Montgomery. In the Fall of 1859 he returned to Princeton Seminary, and graduated in the Spring of 1861. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Huntingdon, in 1860, and taught for several years in academics and select schools after leaving the seminary.

preaching occasionally, as time and opportunity afforded. In 1868 he went to Iowa, spending some time in Sioux City, preaching also in St. Joseph, Mo., and became stated supply of the church in Sidney, Iowa, and continued to preach there till the time of his death, June 15th, 1870. While serving this church, a new building was erected, to which he contributed nearly all his salary.

Wilson, Rev. Peter, was ordained by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, about 1785, and was settled as pastor at Hackettstown and Mansfield Presbyterian churches, N. J., where he remained until his death, July 24th, 1799.

Wilson, Robert G., D.D., the son of John and Mary (Wray) Wilson, was born in Lincoln county, N. C., December 30th, 1768. He graduated at Dickinson College, Pa., in 1790, and studied theology under the direction, partly of his pastor, the Rev. Mr. Cummins, and partly of the Rev. William C. Davis. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina, April 16th, 1793, and on May 23d, 1794, was ordained and installed pastor of Upper Long Cane Church, in Abbeville district. He had, at the same time, the charge of the Church at Greenville. During his connection with these churches his labors were signally blessed to their edification and enlargement.

He was offered a professorship in South Carolina College, and was also invited to become Principal of an academy, in Augusta, Ga., with very flattering pecuniary prospects in each case, but he declined these offers, and accepted a call to the pastorate of a small church, then lately organized in Chilli-cothe, O., with a salary of only four hundred dollars. Here he gave half his labors, for seven years, to Union Church, five miles from the town. He was honored with the degree of Doctor of Divinity, by the College of New Jersey, in 1818.

Dr. Wilson remained pastor of the church at Chilli-cothe nineteen years, greatly beloved by his people and fellow citizens, and signally blessed in his labors. In 1824 he resigned his charge, by advice of Presbytery, and accepted an invitation to the Presidency of the Ohio University, at Athens. Over this Institution he continued to preside, with great acceptableness and success, until 1839, when, on account of the increasing infirmities of age, he resigned the office and returned to Chilli-cothe. Not content to remain inactive, he here labored as a stated supply for Union Church for seven years. He died April 17th, 1851. Dr. Wilson, as a preacher, was solemn, instructive, impressive, and often affecting, in respect to both manner and matter. He excelled as a member of the judicatories of the Church. He was firmly and fully established in the faith and order of the Presbyterian Church, and was jealous of any efforts that seemed to him designed to modify either.

Wilson, Rev. Robert W., the son of Rev. Robert and Elizabeth (Harris) Wilson, was born in Washington, Mason county, Ky., July 12th, 1821. He was educated in Miami University, Ohio, and began his divinity studies in Lane Theological Seminary, finishing his course in the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Oxford, Ohio. He was licensed by Oxford Presbytery in 1842, and the following year was, by the same Presbytery, ordained and installed pastor of Bethel Church, Butler county, Ohio. Here he labored with zeal for five years, when he resigned to assist in the management of the Salem Academy, South Salem, Ohio. Whilst engaged in teaching, he preached for two years at Rocky Spring Church. He was then invited to the Church at Bloomingburg, Ohio, as co-pastor with the Rev. William Dickey, and entered upon his work in October, 1851. When Father Dickey was called to glory, Mr. Wilson became pastor of the congregation and served it with great fidelity. As a preacher, he blended the doctrines of grace with the practical duties of our holy religion. In his daily walk and conversation he exemplified the doctrines of the gospel and adorned his ministry. He was a man of unusual and retiring modesty, tender and affectionate sympathies, uniform and cheerful piety, affable and gentle manners, and of untiring and self-denying devotion to the office and work of a bishop. Ever ready to visit the sick and attend at the house of mourning, he gained the affection of all classes in the community and was known by old and young only to be loved.

Wilson, Rev. Samuel, graduated at Princeton College in 1782. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Newcastle, and was called to the pastorate of Big Spring (now Newville), Presbyterian Church, Pennsylvania, March 21st, 1786. In this charge he remained, laboring faithfully, acceptably and successfully, until called to his reward in 1799. There is yet in the hands of one of the descendants of Mr. Wilson, at Newville, the call which was given to him, signed by two hundred and four persons, in which the congregation binds itself "to pay, on his being ordained to be our minister, and for his discharge of his duties of said office, the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds, Pennsylvania currency, in specie, and allow him the use of the dwelling-house, barn, and all the clear land on the globe, possessed by our former minister, also plenty of timber for rails and firewood, likewise a sufficient security for the payment of the above-mentioned sums during his incumbency."

Wilson, Samuel B., D.D., Professor of Theology in Union Seminary, Va., was born in South Carolina, about the year 1782. He served his generation, by the will of God, in the ministry of the gospel, for a period of over sixty years. His entrance into the ministry was through the methods of study pursued by candidates before the existence of theological seminaries. With characteristic fidelity he had made his preparation, with the thoroughness which produced the abiding results of his labors in his pastoral life of thirty-seven years, and constituted the basis of his ability in the training of students coming under his instruction. In all his ministerial relations, as preacher, pastor, presbyter and professor, he was sound in doctrine, easy and graceful in speech, sensible and judicious in counsel among his people and in the church courts, and to all with whom he had to do, ever the pattern of a finished Christian gentleman. In his declining years, when deafness had almost destroyed his successful performance of his duties, every proposition made by him for resigning his position was promptly put aside by his colleagues and the authorities of the seminary; not only because his long and faithful services justified the Board to their constituents in retaining him in the status of an Emeritus Professor, but also because all who knew his relations and influence felt that the Institution was the better for the presence of such a man in its walls, even should he not enter a lecture-room. After a long and painful decline, through all of which he illustrated eminently the traits of meekness and patience and the sentiments of abiding faith and love to His Redeemer, he fell asleep in Jesus, in the month of August, 1869. Two of his sons and three of his grandsons entered the ministry, and one of his daughters married a minister. The blessing of Isaiah lix, 21, still follows his descendants.

Wilson, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D., was born near the town of Washington, Pennsylvania, in the year 1828. His father, Henry Wilson, died more than thirty years ago. His excellent mother, Mrs. Jane Dill Wilson, to whose Christian training and self-denying devotion to his interests he confessed himself a large debtor, was permitted to live until she realized her rich reward in the distinguished honor and success of her son. His elder brother, the Rev. Thomas Dill Wilson, another object of the same mother's devotion, died in 1858, when in full success as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Xenia, Ohio, leaving two sons, children of the covenant, both now acceptable ministers in the Church of their ancestry.

Dr. Wilson's youth was spent on the farm where he was born, with only the advantage of ordinary country schools, until his entrance as a student into Washington College. He was graduated from that Institution in 1852, receiving the first honor of his class. It was in 1849, during a powerful revival in the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, under the early ministry of the Rev. Dr. Brownson, that, along with many other students of the college, he was brought to accept Christ and confess him before men. From the college he at once passed into the Western Theological Seminary, at Allegheny, Pa., and, with similar standing, was graduated, in 1855. Receiving licensure from the Presbytery of Washington, he supplied the First Church of Steubenville, O., for a season, during the absence of its pastor, the Rev. H. G. Comingo, in Europe. Shortly afterwards he received a unanimous call to the pastorate of the Second Church of Wheeling, but, under urgency, declined it to accept the position of assistant instructor in the Seminary, out of which as a student he had just passed. For a Summer session of five months, during his theological course, he had admirably conducted the department of Ancient Languages in his Alma Mater, suddenly made vacant by the death of Prof. Nicholas Murray.

His marked success as instructor led to his unanimous election, by the General Assembly of 1857, as Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Homiletics in the seminary, into which chair he was formally installed April 27th, 1858. In accordance with their decided preference, and in the enjoyment of their full confidence, he thus took his place in the Faculty, along with those honored servants of God, Drs. David Elliott, Melancthon W. Jacobus and William S. Plumer. These venerable men have all since been called to their reward and "their works do follow them." The lapse of a quarter of a century, duly celebrated by the Alumni, April 18th, 1883, amidst the closing exercises of the session, found the Junior advanced to his seventh year as the Senior Professor of the beloved seminary he served so well. With some modification, his chair of instruction was that of "Sacred and Ecclesiastical History and the History of Doctrines." The death of Dr. Jacobus, in 1876, devolved upon him the executive headship of the Institution. And there he continued, in the highest honor and usefulness, having been permitted to impress himself upon the characters of four or five hundred ministers of the Presbyterian Church, a goodly proportion of whom sound the trumpet of the gospel in the lands of heathenism. To his ability, vigilance and steadfastness the continued prosperity of the seminary is largely due. In the fullness of his strength he was the accepted leader of an enterprise founded in the faith and devotion of the fathers of Presbyterianism in Western Pennsylvania, and if the past be a true prophecy of the future, the blessings yet to be expected from that most excellent school of the prophets are beyond human calculation. He died August 17th, 1883.

SAMUEL JENNINGS WILSON, D. D., LL. D.

Whilst Dr. Wilson's accurate and varied learning would have qualified him for any chair in the seminary, he was also one of the most eloquent and acceptable preachers of the Presbyterian Church. Along with his professorship he acted as pastor, for a number of years, of the Sixth Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, only ceasing on account of his increased responsibilities as senior Professor. Many, also, were the efforts made from time to time to win him to some of the most prominent pulpits in the land. But he was ever true to the manifest call of the Church and her Lord. Few, if any, of our prominent men have been so frequently called upon to deliver addresses on college commencement and other public occasions, or have acquitted themselves more satisfactorily. At the age of forty-six years he presided, with great success, over the General Assembly of the reunited Presbyterian Church, as its Moderator, in 1871, in the city of St. Louis, and his opening sermon the following year, at Cleveland, upon the world-wide work and promised glory of the Church, will long be remembered as one of the most able and effective discourses ever listened to by that venerable body. In like manner he was made the first Moderator of the consolidated Synod of Pennsylvania, which held its sessions in Harrisburg, in October, 1882. Upon the consolidation of the two colleges in Western Pennsylvania, in March, 1869, under the joint name of Washington and Jefferson College, he was induced to act as temporary President for the remainder of that year, and thus graduated the class of 1869. He was also an efficient Trustee of the united college from the first, and was at the time of his death Vice-President of the Board. In 1861, only three years after his inauguration at Allegheny, he received the honorary degree of D. D. from the authorities of Washington College, and some years later the title of LL. D. was conferred upon him by one of the colleges of Ohio.

This sketch may be fitly closed by reference to Dr. Wilson's representative service in connection with the Presbyterian Alliance. He was a member of the Joint Committee which assembled in London and adopted the constitution of that body. His very able paper on "The Distinctive Principles of Presbyterianism," read before the Second General Council of the Alliance, at Philadelphia, in 1880, attracted marked attention, and had been accounted one of the soundest and best contributions of that great body to the cause of Biblical truth. He had also been chosen by the last General Assembly as one of its representatives in the Third Council, which is to meet in 1884, at Belfast.

Wilson, Samuel Ramsay, D. D., was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, June 4th, 1818. He graduated at Hanover College, Ind., in 1836, and completed his professional studies at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, August 5th, 1840, and ordained by the Presbytery of Cincinnati, April 26th, 1842. He was associate pastor with his father in the First Church of Cincinnati from 1842 to 1846, and then pastor until 1861. In 1862 he took charge of the Grand Street Church, New York city, where he remained a year and a half. From 1864 to 1865 he was in charge of the Mulberry Church, Ky., and from 1865 to 1880 he was pastor of the First Church of Louisville, Ky. In 1880 he accepted the pastorate of the Second Church of Madison, Ind., where he remained two years and a half, when he removed to East Seranton, Pa.

Dr. Wilson is a strong and able theologian, and an earnest gospel preacher. Strongly conservative in his theology, thoroughly Presbyterian in his feelings, and having the courage of his convictions, he has frequently been engaged in controversy in regard to Church polity and doctrine. In his prime he was one of the ablest preachers in the Presbyterian Church.

Winchester, Rev. Samuel G., was born in Hartford county, Md., February 17th, 1805. At an early period he developed a talent for oratory. He gave himself to the study of the law, but becoming converted under the preaching of Dr. W. Nevins, he turned his back on the law and determined to become a preacher of the gospel. His father was so offended that he disinherited him. After pursuing the full course of study in the Seminary at Princeton, he was ordained pastor of the Sixth Church of Philadelphia, May 4th, 1830. After seven years there spent, his failing health induced him to accept a call to Natchez, Miss., where he remained four years. He died, of congestion of the brain, August 31st, 1841, at the early age of thirty-six.

Mr. Winchester was tall and slender, and had an open, prepossessing countenance and pleasant voice. He dispensed with notes, and knew how to blend the didactic and the hortatory. He was a practical debater, and forced his antagonists to respect his youth. His published writings were a few tractates of practical character.

Wines, Rev. Frederick Howard, was born at Philadelphia, Pa., April 9th, 1838. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1857, and for a time was Tutor in the Institution. He was stated supply of Calvary Church, Springfield, Mo., 1860-1; ordained by the Presbytery of Sangamon, October 29th, 1865; pastor of the First Church, Springfield, Ill., 1865-69, and Secretary of Board of Charities, Illinois, 1869. His residence is at Springfield.

Wing, Conway Phelps, D.D., was born on the Muskingum, twelve miles above Marietta, Ohio, February 12th, 1809; graduated at Hamilton College in 1828, at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1831, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Church at Lotus, Wayne county, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Seneca, September 27th, 1832, where he labored with success. In 1836 he accepted a call to a church in Ogden, N. Y., where he also labored four years, with large accessions to his church. From 1838 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Monroe, Mich. After spending six months in Tennessee, preaching to Presbyterian churches at Pulaski and Columbia, he accepted a call to a church in Huntsville, Ala. April 28th, 1848, he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa. This relation he sustained, with great fidelity to his duties and marked earnestness and ability as a preacher, respected and beloved by those who knew him, until October, 1875, when he resigned his charge.

Dr. Wing is an earnest Christian, a cultivated and genial gentleman, an accomplished scholar, a graceful writer and an able, instructive and impressive expounder of divine truth. Among his other publications are articles in the Presbyterian Quarterly Review, the chief of which were two on Abelard, two on the "Historical Development of the Doctrine of the Atonement," one on "The Permanent in Christianity," one on "Miracles and the Order of Nature," in the Methodist Quarterly. He was also the writer of two elaborate articles on "Federal Theology," and "Gnostics and Gnosticism," in McClintock's and Strong's Cyclopaedia, and in 1868 he translated, with large additions, Dr. C. F. Kling's Commentary on Second Corinthians, for Dr. Schaaf's American edition of Lange's Commentary.

Wishard, Rev. Samuel Ellis, was born December 18th, 1825, in Johnson county, Ind. He graduated from Wabash College in 1853, and completed his theological studies at Lane Seminary in 1856. He was licensed to preach April, 1855, and the same year was appointed a missionary to Turkey by the American Board. But in that desired work he was not permitted to enter. During a four years' pastorate at Rushville, Ill., from 1857, and a six years' pastorate at Tecumseh, Mich., his ministry was greatly blessed. Equally manifest tokens of divine favor were vouchsafed on his labors at Battle Creek, Mich., and at Franklin, Ind., and in a marked manner on his service for three years as an evangelist, aiding pastors in special revival work. In May, 1880, he accepted a call to the Fifth Church, Chicago. The three following years were years of spiritual blessing to that church. In August, 1883, he engaged as Synodical missionary for the State of Kentucky.

Mr. Wishard has given to the press a memorial volume of the Rev. F. R. Gallagher, a history of the Presbyterian Church of Franklin, Ind., several tracts and weekly articles in the Herald and Presbyterian newspaper. He has preached more than 3500 sermons, and held 4100 prayer and Bible meetings. His controlling purpose seems to be, not to please men, but to save them. He is a faithful, fearless, forcible preacher, presenting the claims of God with such clearness and honest earnestness, as to leave no excuse to the drowsy professor or hiding-place for the convicted sinner. There is withal a quaint humor sparkling out through his glowing utterances that enhances their power and attractiveness.

Wisner, William Carpenter, D. D., was born in Elmira, N. Y., December 7th, 1808. He graduated at Union College in 1830. He first studied law, then studied theology privately. He was ordained pastor of the Third Church, Rochester, N. Y., October 24th, 1832. His fields of labors were: Rochester, 1831-2; Athens, Pa., East Avon, N. Y., eighteen months; Second Church, St. Louis, Mo., 1836; Lower Church, Lockport, N. Y., 1837-42; First Church, Lockport, 1842-76. He died July 14th, 1880. Dr. Wisner was Moderator of the General Assembly in St. Louis, in 1855. He published "Pre-lacy and Parity," 1841, and many sermons and articles. He was a man of inexhaustible and irresistible humor and drollery, and of solid greatness of attainments and of character.

Dr. Wisner was for some thirteen years a member of the Board of Trustees of Auburn Theological Seminary. The Board of Commissioners, at the meeting in 1881, in the record which they made of their testimony to his high character and valuable services, said: "A man of high attainments and honorable distinction in the Presbyterian Church, he gave to the Board of which he was a member the benefit of timely counsels and great practical wisdom, and never ceased to manifest a deep and anxious interest in the welfare and usefulness of this beloved Seminary. And it should also be mentioned as a proof of this, and as a mark of his generosity, that one of his latest acts was that of presenting to the Seminary his carefully selected private library, to be added to the library of this Institution, and also a portrait of his father, the Rev. Dr. William Wisner, of Ithaca. And while we bow to God's will in depriving us of his assistance, we thankfully record our estimate of his high character, and his untiring devotion to the interests of theological learning."

Wiswell, George Franklin, D. D., was born at Whitehall, N. Y., in 1820. He was educated in Middlebury College; a student in the Union Theological Seminary, 1841-4; ordained June 18th, 1845. He was pastor at Southold (L. I.) N. Y., 1845-50; Financial Secretary of the Union Theological Seminary, 1850-3; pastor at Peekskill, N. Y., 1853-6; pastor at Wilmington, Del., 1856-67, and since 1867 has been in charge of the Green Hill Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa. Dr. Wiswell is an affable gentleman, a faithful pastor and an able and successful preacher. He was a member of the N. S. Reunion Committee, in place of Dr. Thomas Brainerd. He is an active and efficient member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He moves forward quietly in the discharge of his duties to his congregation, has their confidence and affection, and is favored with the divine blessing on his ministry.

Witherow, Rev. Benjamin Howard, was born at Fairfield, Pa., February 23d, 1840; graduated at Jefferson College in 1859; studied theology at Allegheny Seminary, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Burlington, August 30th, 1864. He was pastor at Cream Ridge, N. J., 1864-69, and at Columbia, Pa., 1869-73, in both which charges he labored faithfully and successfully, having the confidence and esteem of his people. He died in Shippenburg, Pa., February 7th, 1876.

Witherspoon, A. J., D. D., was born in Lancaster, S. C. He graduated at the South Carolina College. After studying theology privately, he was licensed by Bethel Presbytery, and devoted himself to the Foreign Mission field, but the state of his health prevented him carrying his solemn purpose into execution. He had pastoral charge of Montpelier, Geneva and Laurel churches, in Marengo county, Ala., where his labors were blessed. After relinquishing this position, he went to Mobile and took charge of Warren Chapel Mission, which was formed into a church in eighteen months. He organized five churches, as evangelist of South Alabama Presbytery. For some years he has had charge of the Bethel Chapel for Seamen, in New Orleans. Here he has accomplished much good by his faithful labors. This useful Institution, so worthy of public sympathy and support, was founded in 1877; begun upon a small scale, accommodating about 250 persons in the reading room and concert hall, and now it provides entertainment for 800.

Witherspoon, John, D. D., LL. D., was a branch of a very respectable family, which had long possessed considerable landed property in the East of Scotland. He was lineally descended from John Knox, well-known as a distinguished instrument of spreading the reformed religion in that part of the

JOHN WITHERSPOON, D. D., LL. D.

United Kingdom. He was born, February 5th, 1722, and his father was at that time minister of the parish of Yester, about eighteen miles from Edinburgh. His father was eminent, not only for piety, but for literature, and for a habit of extreme accuracy in all his writings and discourses. Young Witherspoon was very early sent to the public school at Haddington, where his father spared no expense in his education. He had been at that seminary but a little while when he attracted particular notice; he was distinguished for assiduity in his studies, for soundness of judgment, and for clearness and quickness of conception among his schoolfellows, many of whom afterward filled some of the highest stations in the literary and political world. At the age of fourteen he entered the University of Edinburgh, where he advanced with a great degree of credit in all the branches of learning, until the age of twenty-one, when he was licensed to preach the gospel. When a student at the Divinity Hall, his character stood remarkably high for his taste in sacred criticism, and for a precision in thinking and a perspicuity of expression rarely attained at so early a period.

From Beith, where he was first settled as pastor, he soon received a call to the large and flourishing town of Paisley, where he enjoyed great reputation, and labored with uncommon success. During his residence at Paisley, he was invited to Dublin, in Ireland, to take the charge of a large and respectable congregation. He was also invited to Rotterdam, in the United Provinces, and to the town of Dundee, in his own country, but he could not be induced to quit such a sphere of comfort and usefulness as Paisley offered him. He rejected also, in the first instance, the invitation of the trustees of the College of New Jersey, in America. But, urged by all the friends whose judgment he most respected, and whose friendship he most valued, hoping, too, that his sacrifice might be more than repaid by his being made peculiarly useful in promoting the cause of Christ and the interests of learning in the New World, and knowing that Jersey College had been consecrated from its foundation to those great objects to which he had devoted his life, he consented on a second application. And true it is, that after the election of Dr. Witherspoon to the presidency, learning received an extension that was not known before in the American Seminaries. He introduced into their philosophy all the most liberal and modern improvements of Europe; he made the philosophical course embrace the general principles of policy and public law; he incorporated with it sound and rational metaphysics, equally remote from the doctrines of fatality and contingency, from the barrenness of the schools, and from the excessive refinements of those contradictory but equally absurd and impious classes of skeptics, who either wholly deny the existence of matter, or maintain that nothing but matter exists in the universe. The number of men of distinguished talents in the different professions who received the elements of their education under Dr. Witherspoon demonstrates how eminent his services were to the College of New Jersey.

Dr. Witherspoon continued directing the Institution of which he was President, with increasing success, till the commencement of the American War, but that calamitous event suspended his functions and dispersed the college. He then entered upon a new scene, and appeared in a new character. Still, however, he shone with his usual lustre. Knowing his distinguished abilities, the citizens of New Jersey elected him a delegate to the convention which formed their republican constitution. In this convention he appeared, to the astonishment of all the members of the legal profession, as profound a civilian as he confessedly was a philosopher and divine.

From the Revolutionary committees and convention of the State, he was sent, early in the year 1776 a representative of the people of New Jersey, to Congress of United America. He was seven years member of that body, which, in the face of immense difficulties and dangers, secured to America the establishment of their independence. Dr. Witherspoon was always firm amidst the most gloomy, formidable aspects of affairs, and always displayed the greatest presence of mind in the most embarrassing situations. His name is affixed to the Declaration of Independence.

Towards the close of his life, however, Dr. Witherspoon felt and gratified an inclination to retire from the political scene, on which he had long acted with uncommon dignity and usefulness. He withdrew a great measure, from the exercise of all the public functions that were not immediately connected with the duties of his sacred office. For more than six years before his death he suffered the loss of his sight, which continued to hasten the progress of his disorders. These he bore with a patience and a cheerfulness rarely to be met with, even in those eminent for wisdom and piety. His activity of mind and anxiety to be useful would not permit him, even in this depressing situation, to desist from the exercise of his ministry and his duties in the college, which was frequently led into the pulpit, both at home and abroad, during his blindness, and he always acquitted himself, even then, in his usually accurate, impressive and excellent manner. He had the happiness of enjoying the full use of his mental powers to the very last. He died, November 15th, 1791, in the seventh year of his age. The College of New Jersey lost in him a most distinguished President, America one of her ablest statesmen, and the Church of Christ one of her most valuable ministers. His writings, which are well known, were collected into four volumes, octavo, and of which a uniform edition was published at Philadelphia, in 1803, and at Edinburgh in 1804, in nine volumes, 12mo.

Witherspoon, Statue of. As an expression of their admiration of Dr. John Witherspoon, and his eminent services to the church and the country, a majestic statue of him has been erected by his friends in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. The site is Lansdowne Drive, just east of Memorial Hall, the foundation of the pedestal having been completed Tuesday, November, 16th, 1875, in the presence of a considerable number of ministers, ruling elders and laymen, together with a deputation from the Andrew's Society of Philadelphia. After prayer by the Rev. W. W. Barr, D.D., of the United Presbyterian Church, the corner-stone of the monument was laid by the Rev. George W. Musgrave, D.D., LL.D. On account of the inclemency of the weather, the assembly proceeded to Machinery Hall, of the Centennial Buildings, where the Rev. William P. Breckinridge, D.D. (to whose commendable and indefatigaactivity the whole enterprise mainly owes its success), occupying the chair, an address was delivered by the Rev. William Adams, D.D., LL.D., of New York. At the conclusion of the oration a handsome Presbyterian flag was presented by the young ladies of West Spruce Street Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia to the Centennial Committee of the General Assembly. It was presented by George Junkin, Esq., and received by Col. J. Ross Snowden, chairman of the committee.

On Friday, October 20th, 1876, the colossal statue of the colossal Presbyterian statesman, patriot and divine was unveiled, in the presence of a large concourse of people, many of whom had come from a distance to witness the interesting occasion. The Rev. William P. Breed, D.D., Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia, assisted by the Rev. Thomas McCauley, Moderator of the Synod of New Jersey, took charge of and conducted the exercises. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. George W. Musgrave. Dr. W. O. Johnstone announced the one hundredth psalm. Scripture selections were read by the Rev. J. B. Dales, D.D. The Rev. Henry C. McCook, D.D., gave a history of the effort to erect the monument. The Rev. Stephen W. Dana, D.D., Secretary of the Centennial Committee, then announced the hymn:—

"Great God of nations, now to thee
Our hymn of gratitude we raise,
With humble heart and bending knee
We offer thee our song of praise."

The contents of the corner-stone were stated by the Rev. Samuel Irenæus Prime, D. D., one of the earliest and warmest friends of the enterprise. The recital of the inscriptions was then given as follows, by the Rev. Wm. M. Paxton, D. D., of New York:—

On the east side:—

"John Witherspoon, D. D., 11, 12, a lineal descendant of John Knox Born in Scotland, February 5th, 1722; ordained minister in the Presbyterian Church, 1743; President of the College of New Jersey, 1768-1791. The only clergyman in the Continental Congress. A signer of the Declaration of Independence. Died at Princeton, N. J., November 15th, 1794."

On the west side:—

"This statue is erected under the authority of a committee appointed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, July 14th, 1876."

On the south side:—

"Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof."—Lev. XX, 10

On the north side:—

"For my own part of property I have some; of reputation none; that reputation is staked, that property is pledged, on the issue of this contest. And although these gray hairs must soon descend into the sepulchre, I would infinitely rather that they should descend thither by the hand of the executioner than desert, at this crisis, the sacred cause of my country."—Dr. Witherspoon

Just as Dr. Paxton pronounced the word country, the Hon. D. W. Woods, of Lewistown, Pa., a grandson of Dr. Witherspoon, pulled a cord, and the flag which had enveloped the statue fell, suddenly exposing to view the colossal form of Witherspoon.

After the shouts of applause which this unveiling evoked, Dr. Paxton resumed his address. At its conclusion, the Rev. J. Addison Henry, D.D., of the sub-committee, then gave out the hymn:—

"God bless our native land"

This was followed by an oration by His Excellency, Joseph D. Belle, Governor of New Jersey, President of the Board of Trustees of Princeton College. The statue was presented to the Fairmount Park Commission, by the Hon. J. Ross Snowden, LL.D., Chairman of the General Assembly's Centennial Committee, and accepted by the Hon. John Welsh, President of the Fairmount Park Commission. Thanks to the Park Commission were extended, in behalf of the General Assembly's Centennial Committee, by the Rev. George Hale, D.D., Treasurer of the Committee. The doxology was announced, with some remarks, by the Rev. Alfred Nevin, D.D., LL.D. After the singing of the doxology, the benediction was pronounced by the Rev. James McCosh, D.D., LL.D., who, also, in response to loud calls from the crowd, made an address. Dr. McCosh was followed in a brief speech by Dr. Stuart Robinson, of Louisville, Ky., who was also called out by the crowd.

The whole enterprise received a most fitting climax in the services of Sabbath evening, the 22d of October, when, in the West Spruce Street Presbyterian Church, the Rev. W. S. Plumer, D. D., LL. D., of Columbia, S. C., delivered, by request of the Centennial Committee of the General Assembly, in the presence of a large and intelligent congregation, a discourse upon the life and writings of Dr. Witherspoon. Thus were concluded the exercises in connection with an event which acquires peculiar importance from the fact that this statue, so far as known to us, is the first statue of a Christian man, as such, yet erected in our Republic.

Witherspoon, Rev. Thomas S., was licensed by the Presbytery of South Alabama, October 23d, 1830, and ordained November 10th, 1832. His whole ministerial life, of fifteen years, was spent within the bounds of the Synod of Alabama. His talents were commanding, and apparently without an effort he made himself familiar with any subject, if not master of it. He was a sound Presbyterian, a ready debater and an able preacher. His influence was deservedly great. He was a lovely man and a faithful minister. At the time of his death (October 20th, 1845), he was engaged in raising funds, by appointment of Synod, for the endowment of the Alabama Professorship in Oglethorpe University. When the endowment was completed, after his decease, the Synod, in testimony of their high appreciation of his worth and services, substituted the name of Witherspoon for that of Alabama, thus making it the Witherspoon Professorship. The Presbytery of Alabama, in a minute adopted relative to the death of Mr. Witherspoon, April 3d, 1846, says: "He had labored long and faithfully and well. He fell at his post, on the field of labor, beloved of the churches, wept by his numerous spiritual children, lamented by his brethren of Presbytery, and honored of God. His was a bright star, that suddenly set in unclouded lustre."

Withrow, John Lindsay, D. D., was born at Coatesville, Pa., March 19th, 1837; graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1860; studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained by the second Presbytery of Philadelphia, May 23d, 1863. His first pastoral charge was the Church at Abington, Pa., 1863-8. He was pastor of the Arch Street Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1868-73; pastor of the Second Church, Indianapolis, Ind., 1873-6; and is at present pastor of the Park Street Congregational Church, Boston, Mass. Dr. Withrow is a gentleman of genial and benevolent spirit, and of much energy of character. In all his pastoral settlements he has attained a high popularity for his pulpit ability and achieved success. He is also a graceful writer, often contributing to religious journals.

Witness of the Spirit. There can be no question in regard to the reality of the witnessing of the Spirit, for it is expressly declared that, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God" (Rom. viii, 16). What is this witness? We believe it to be the testimony of the Spirit in the Word of His grace, in which he fully and plainly declares that all such, and only such, as are described in Scripture are the children of God. In such passages as these: John i, 2; 1 John iii, 24; 1 John iii, 10; Matt. v, 10; 1 John v, 4; 1 John ii, 5, the Spirit designates the graces and dispositions which prove our adoption. He enables those who possess them to perceive these evidences, to compare their characters with the Scriptural marks of trial, and hence to conclude and infer that they are the children of God.

This belief is confirmed by the following considerations:—

1. The whole train of the Apostle's reasoning in the chapter shows that the witness spoken of is a testimony founded on observing the graces of the Spirit. The words are connected with the two preceding verses: "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." "As many as resign themselves to the guidance of the Spirit's influences, show that they are brought into covenant relation with God. "And ye," who are real Christians, "have not the Spirit of bondage again to fear;" ye are not animated with a servile spirit, that merely trembles at the rod of a master; "but ye have received the Spirit of adoption"—the noble, ingenuous and affectionate disposition of children—"whereby we cry, Abba, Father"—whereby we are disposed to go to God, and act towards Him, as children to a parent. By thus leading us, and giving us the disposition of children, he proves that we bear a child-like relation to God. For (this is the exposition of Doddridge, who adds "for" to complete the sense, and show the causality), "the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."

2. The act of the Holy Spirit which, in the passage above quoted, is termed "witness," is elsewhere denominated a sealing and an earnest (2 Cor. i, 22; Eph. i, 13, 14). The apostle may have alluded to the custom, prevalent among all nations, of marking with a seal the goods bought, that the owner might know and claim them, or to the custom of setting a seal upon what was dedicated to God, or to be offered to him in sacrifice, or to its necessity in making instruments of writing valid, or to the seals of junices, which are wont to bear their image. In any of these senses, the expression applied to believers means, that when God by his Spirit seals his people as his own, he impresses on them his eternal purity and truth, which remains upon the heart, just like the impression which is left upon the wax by the seal. It is the evidence by which they are known as his; they have the image of their Father enstamped upon them by the Spirit of promise.

The phrase "earnest of the Spirit" presents the same view of the subject. An earnest is a pledge of something promised; a part of the price agreed for between a buyer and seller, by giving and receiving of which the bargain is ratified; a part of the promised inheritance granted now in token of the possession of the whole hereafter. This earnest, which is the same as the seal, and so similar to the witness of the Spirit, cannot be a noted declaration, or sudden suggestion; it is that grace which is "glory begun below," the vital, gracious, and sanctifying influences of the Holy Ghost.

3. The same truth is established by considering what is the uniform language of the Scriptural saints, when declaring their confidence in the pardon of their sins, and their title to heaven. They point to the graces which the Holy Spirit has wrought in their hearts, to the good works which he has enabled them to perform. "Hereby do we know that we know him, if we keep his commandments" (1 John ii, 3). Paul knew that a "crown of righteousness was laid up" for him, because he had "fought a good fight," and had "kept the faith." This is the constant language of the saints of Scripture, and it is unnecessary to quote the many texts that declare it; they uniformly derive their confidence from considering that they have that holiness and love to God, which are at once the marks and the fruits of union to Christ.

The view of the subject now presented is sustained by the opinions of some of the greatest divines and holiest men that have adorned the Church. Flavel, in his "Sacramental Meditations," says: "In sealing or witnessing to the believers, the Spirit doth not make use of an audible voice, nor of the ministry of angels, nor of immediate and extraordinary revelations; but He makes use of His own graces implanted in our hearts, and of his own promises written in the Scripture, and in this way He usually brings the doubtful, trembling heart of a believer to rest and comfort." President Edwards, in his "Treatise on the Affections," observes: "Many have been the mischiefs that have arisen from a false and delusive notion of the witness of the Spirit; that it is a kind of inward voice, suggestion, or declaration of God to man; that he is beloved of Him, pardoned, elected, or the like; sometimes with and sometimes without a text of Scripture; and many have been the false and vain, though very high, affections that have arisen from hence. And it is to be feared that many thousands of souls have been eternally undone by it." "The Spirit," remarks Baxter, "witnesses our sonship as a reasonable soul witnesseth that you are a man, and not a beast. You find by the acts of reason that you are a reasonable soul, and then you know that, having a reasonable soul, you are certainly a man; so you find by the works or fruits of the Spirit that you have the Spirit, and then finding that you have the Spirit, you may certainly know that you are the child of God. Take heed, therefore, of expecting any such witness of the Spirit as some expect, viz: a discovery of your adoption directly, without first discovering the signs of it within you, as if, by an inward voice, He should say unto you, 'Thou art a child of God, and thy sins are pardoned.'" "The Spirit bears testimony to the sonship of believers," says Dr. Dick, "when He brings to light, by His operations upon their souls, the evidences of their adoption; and thus makes their relation to God as manifest as if He assured them of it with an audible voice." "I could not," says Dr. Chalmers, "without making my own doctrine outstrip my own experience, vouch for any other intimation of the Spirit of God than that which He gives in the act of making the Word of God clear unto you, and the state of your own heart clear unto you. From the one you draw what are its promises; from the other what are your own personal characteristics; and the application of the first to the second may conduct to a most legitimate argument, that you, personally, are one of the saved; and that not a tardy or elaborate argument either, but with an evidence quick and powerful as the light of intuition."

Woman, The Mission of. In an admirable sermon on this subject, Dr. Adolphe Monod says:—

"I open to the first pages of the first book, so well named Genesis, because it reveals the secret of all existences in their wonderful origin, and throws out to us, as if spontaneously, the highest philosophy in primitive acts, recounted with the simplicity of primitive times. There, immediately after those few words in which God sums up the general mission of humanity, 'Let us make man in our image,' do we discover another, in which he sums up, in like manner, the special mission of woman, before creating her in her turn: 'It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him a helpmeet for him.' This applies to every woman; not simply to the one who is married; for Eve is not only the wife of the first man; she is also the first woman; and, the representative of all her sex, as Adam is of ours, she presents in herself, as in a sort of miniature, a type of her sex.

"Let us start out with this thought, which presides at your very birth; and let us take, as our guide in developing it, the inspired oracles of the old and new economy. We shall not be in danger of going astray in a path where God himself has marched before us. And well is it that your own heart will achieve the demonstration, and oblige you to say, while listening to the claims of God's Word upon you, Yes, this is truly what I ought to be; this is truly what I ought to do.

"'It is not good that man should be alone.' Loaded with the gifts of God, he still wants something, of which he is himself ignorant, or of which he knows nothing except by a vague presentiment—a helper 'like to himself;' without which life is to him but a solitude, and Eden a desert. Endowed with a nature too communicative to be self-sufficient, he demands a partnership, a support, a complement, and only half lives while he lives alone. Made to think, to talk, to love, his thought is in search of another thought, to stimulate it and reveal it unto itself; his word dies away in sadness on the air, or awakens a mere echo which does violence to it, rather than responds to it; and his love knows not where to fasten itself, and, falling back upon himself, threatens to become a devouring self-love. His whole being, in fine, aspires to another self; but that other self does not exist: 'For Adam there was not found a helpmeet.' The visible creatures which surround him are too far below him; the invisible Being who has given him life, too far above him, to unite their condition to his. Then, God formed woman, and the great problem was solved. Behold here, what Adam demanded; that other self which is himself, and at the same time not himself. Woman is a companion whom God has given to man to charm his existence, and to double it by sharing it with another. Her vocation, by birth, is a vocation of charity.

"To this vocation corresponds the place which God has assigned to woman. It is not an inferior place; woman is not only a helper for man, but a helper 'like to himself.'¹ She ought, then, to march along as his equal, and it is only in this condition that she can bring to him the assistance which he requires. But it is, nevertheless, a secondary and dependent place; for woman was formed after man, made for man, in short, taken from man. This last characteristic speaks volumes to man. Taken from him, 'she is bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh,' and so closely united to him that he cannot depreciate her without depreciating himself. But at the same time, taken from him, she owes to him the life which she breathes and the name which she bears. By what right—I ought to say with what heart—can she dispute with him the first rank? Her position by birth is a position of humility. A vocation of charity in respect to man, in a position of humility next to man: This is the mission of woman. As to the rest, that vocation and that position, revealed by the same acts, resulting from the same principle, are so inseparable in the formation of woman, that we may include them in the general idea of renunciation, bearing in turn upon self-will and self-glory.

“This commentary upon Moses I have taken from Saint Paul recalling to the Corinthians the condition of woman, in order to justify his prohibition to her of praying or prophesying with the head uncovered. This subject does not require him to enlarge upon woman’s vocation of charity; he merely indicates it in saying ‘the woman was created for the man.’

“But observe in what terms he explains her position of humility: ‘But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God. The man is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman; but the woman for the man.’ Is not this the doctrine which I just found in Genesis? But this doctrine the Apostle enforces with a rigor which would be out of place in any other mouth; and for the general idea of dependence at which I pause, he substitutes the more precise one of subordination. He concludes from thence that woman ought, ‘because of the angels,’ who contemplate what is passing upon the earth, and particularly in the church, ‘to bear upon her head a mark of the authority’ under which she is placed. Man, whose birth formed a part of that great work of creation which inspired the angelic songs of joy, being the image and glory of God, owes it to God to appear with the head lifted up to the view of the whole universe. But woman, whose formation is an event of the second scheme, and, so to speak, of a family character, being the glory of the man, owes it to him to remain hidden in a comparatively narrow inclosure, as a modest spouse in her own home.

“The intention of the Apostle is the more marked as the instructions which he gives here are intended for woman in rare cases. For it is only as an exception that a woman can be called to pray or prophesy before men. The order which God has established for a certain end he is free to modify so as the better to gain that end. We sometimes see that in promoting the good of man, a woman is called to depart from the way prescribed to her; it may be to prophesy, as the women of Corinth, as the four daughters of Philip, the deacon, or as the mother of King Lemuel. It may be, as Deborah, to judge a people, or even to preside over a mighty expedition. In such cases woman must obey, and she shall be blessed in her obedience: ‘Blessed above women shall Jaed be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent.’ But then, as ever, aside from what is essential to the extraordinary ministry with which she is clothed, she should remain a woman, according to St. Paul, and, all inspired as she is, to caution the man, should remember that she is ‘the glory of the man,’ and should withdraw herself from the eyes of the world.

“Such being the order of creation, it remains to inquire if the primitive mission of woman was changed by the fall of our race, which disturbed so deeply the work of God. Satan commenced by beguiling the woman, after which he employed her to beguile man: a doubly skillful move, by which he was most sure to succeed with her, because she is weaker than man, and close to man, and because she has greater power over him than he has over her. But has this sweet empire been given to her that she may domineer over the conscience of man, become a snare to him rather than a support, and return to him, for the life which she received from him, sin and death? God punished her for her abandoned charity, by that supreme suffering without which she could not henceforth continue the race of man; and for her unacknowledged humility, by abasing still lower her condition. ‘Thy desires shall be unto thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.’ Woman is compelled to look to her husband for all that she desires—here is her increased dependence; and to live under his authority—here is her dependence converted into submission.

“Think not, meanwhile, that she ceases to be an ‘helpmeet’ unto him. Alas! when was this tender aid more needed? Such is the mercy of God, that the moment in which He humbles woman is also the moment in which He confers upon her a ministry greater and more humane than ever. In order to elevate and re-establish between the two sexes the disturbed equilibrium, it is by a virgin that He will one day give to man the longed-for Restorer, who shall destroy the works of the devil; and the first name under which He announced His Son to the world is that of the ‘seed’ of the woman: ‘And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.’ Thus, the relations are not essentially changed by the fall; the vocation of woman is still one of charity, and her position that of humility. Only everything has taken a more serious character; the charity has become more spiritual, exercised in a more profound humility. Ashamed of herself, and anxious to re-establish herself, woman lives henceforth but to repair the wrong which she had done to man, in heaping upon him, with the consolation which can sweeten the present bitterness of sin, the warnings which may prevent its eternal bitterness.

“Another commentary borrowed from St. Paul: ‘I will that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with brodered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; but (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works. Let the woman learn in silence, with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence; for Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman, being deceived, was in the transgression. Notwithstanding she shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and charity, and holiness with sobriety.' Woman, says the Apostle here, was second in birth and first in sin—double reason why she should continue in an attitude of modesty, silence and submission. Behold here, in no equivocal terms, the place of humility that we have already assigned to woman. But the Apostle would have her make it a place of honor by Christian beneficence. There is a chaste adorning which admirably befits her—that of good works; good works, these are the tresses, the gems, the jewels, the adornings which give her beauty in the eyes of God and man. Nor is this all. Woman shall procure salvation for man, at the same time that she obtains it for herself, by the child-bearing of the promised seed. This salvation a woman shall give to the world, in the fullness of time, by giving birth to the Saviour; but the woman, whoever she may be, will also give it to him in her way, who teaches him to know and love the Saviour. Here again is this mission of charity which we have assigned to woman, and which imposes upon her the obligation, we say rather which confers upon her the privilege, of consecrating herself with redoubled tenderness, not only to the consolation of suffering man, but also to the salvation of sinful man, whose attention she shall turn to Jesus Christ.

“Woman is then, according to Scripture, which is to say according to God, since the creation, and more especially since the fall, a companion given to man, to labor for his good, and above all for his spiritual good, in an attitude at once modest and submissive.

“Thus Scripture instructs us; and nature teaches the same lessons. The task assigned by God to each half of the race discovers itself in their dispositions, reveals itself in their instincts. Consult, now, yourselves, and tell me why you were so created, if not for the mission which we have recognized as yours by the Word of God.

“Your place, we have said, is a place of dependence and humility. Upon this point St. Paul hesitates not to appeal to the instinctive convictions of his readers, when, after forbidding a woman to pray or prophesy with her head uncovered, he adds: ‘Judge in yourselves; is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair it is a shame unto him? But if a woman have long hair, it is a glory to her, for her hair is given her for a covering?’

These principles appear so incontestable to the Apostle that they cannot be denied, except by an unworthy spirit of chicanery, which ought not to be entertained. ‘But if any man seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, neither the churches of God.’ Evidently, the long or short hair characterizes here a general and profound distinction between man and woman.

“When man goeth forth from his house and gives himself to his labor until the evening, he chooses outward activity for his task, public life for his domain and the world for his theatre. What do I say? He presents himself in the sight of the angels, and places himself in affinity with the entire universe. He cannot carry too far the name and the image of that God whom he has a mission to represent, not only upon the earth, but before the whole creation. To resist the feeling which calls him to go forth, in order to shut himself up within the narrow circle of the domestic hearth, this would be on his part weakness, forgetfulness of himself, inidility to his mission; nothing more remains but to put a spindle into his hands and a distaff at his feet.

“But it is altogether different with woman; the heart is her theatre; the domestic life her sphere; the in-door activity her work; and the long hair with which the Apostle is pleased to see her covered is an emblem of an entire existence, hidden and silent, in the bosom of which she accomplishes, most faithfully and most honorably, the primary obligations of her sex. ‘Woman,’ says a great writer of the age, ‘is a flower which emits not its perfume except in the shade.’ To retire from notice, to remain quiet, to devote herself to her dependents, to keep the house, to govern the family, this is her modest ambition. If the wise man paints for us ‘a woman, noisy and turbulent, appearing in the streets, whose feet abide not in the house,’ you will recall the woman to whom this applies.

“Indeed, is not the humble sphere which we assign to woman the one for which her whole being is predisposed and designed beforehand? That more delicate conformation, but more frail; that more rapid pulsation of her heart; that keener nervous sensibility; that exquisiteness of her organs, and even the delicacy of her features; all contribute to make her, according to the expression of Peter, ‘a weaker vessel,’ and render her constitutionally unfit for stern and unyielding cares, for affairs of state, for the labors of the cabinet, for all that yields renown in the world.

“And do not her intellectual powers hold her equally distinct? It is sometimes asked whether they are equal to those of man. They are neither equal nor unequal; they are different; having been wisely adapted to a different end. For the work reserved to man, woman has faculties inferior to those of man, or rather she is not adapted to it. I speak here of the rule, not of the exceptions. That there may be among women some minds fitted for cares confined primarily to the other sex; or that there may be for an ordinary woman some situations belonging to man which she is obliged to fill in default of his doing it, I readily grant, provided these exceptions are clearly indicated by God, or demanded by the interests of humanity. After all, in the mission of woman, humility is but the means, charity is the end, to which all must be subordinated; and why should not God, who has made exceptions of this nature in sacred history, also make them in general history? Be that as it may, I leave the exceptions to God, and to the individual conscience; and, jealous of discussing irritating, personal or even disputed questions, I confine myself here to the rule.

"Now, as a rule, that comprehensive glance into politics and science which embraces the world, that bold flight of metaphysics and of the lofty poetry which, transcending its limits, ventures into the void of thought and imagination, this is not the business of woman. Language even, above all ours (let us not sacrifice this useful remark to the fear of provoking a light smile), language, that simple philosophy of the people, often more profound than that of the schools, this sieve of the common reason, which, of all the bold expressions of the individual mind, allows only those to pass which respond to the good sense of all, proves this. It does not permit a woman to make herself notorious. It will not apply to her the word 'man' accompanied by a feminine termination, except as an expression of ridicule or blame. The epithets taken from public life honor man, but dishonor woman in different degrees. To cite only those examples which the delicacy of this place authorizes, endeavor to say, a 'woman of science,' a 'great woman,' a 'woman of affairs,' a 'woman of state;' in like manner talk of a 'domestic woman!'

"But, on the contrary, while she acts within a narrow circle—narrow in extent, but vast in influence—where we exhort woman, with the Scriptures, to limit her action, she has faculties superior to those of man, or rather which belong to her alone. There she finds her compensation, while she shows herself mistress of the domain, and calls into use those secret resources which I should call admirable, were it not that a more tender feeling inspires me towards her and God who endowed her with them; that practical insight which we might say is all the more 'merring because quick; that glance which seems to prefer to be more brief that it may be more clear; that art of penetrating into hearts by, I know not what subtle road, to us unknown and impracticable; that incessant omnipresence of mind and body at all points at once; that vigilance as exact as unperceived; those numerous and complicated expedients of domestic administration, always at hand; access always open to every appeal; and that perpetual audience given to all the world; that freedom of action and of thought in the midst of bitter pains and accumulated embar-assments; that elasticity shall I say? or that indefatigable weakness; that exquisite delicacy of feeling; that tact so studied, if it were not instinctive; that fidelity of perfection in little things; that adroit industry to accomplish what she will with her fingers; that charming grace with which she animates the sick, cheers the drooping, awakens the sleeping conscience, opens the heart long closed; and, in fine, all the many things which we know not how to discern or to accomplish without borrowing her hands or her eyes.

"But, after all, to what advantage is the statement of these facts, when we can appeal to an inward sentiment, planted by the Creator in the depths of your soul, and which has preceded all personal reflections, all the announcements of others, and even the testimony of the Book of God? That elasticity, that modesty, to which a woman never ceases to pretend, even after she has ceased to keep it—what is this but the proof engraven upon your heart, and transferred irresistibly to your countenance, that order, repose, honor, is found for you in an attitude of dependence and reservedness? Dependence and reserve; the right of which never appears more inalienable than in certain delicate occasions, when the same nature is making a cruel play in efforts of one part against the other, without either obtaining a victory. What woman, conscious of this dependence, has not wished, at least sometimes, the arm of a man for support, and for a shelter the name of a man? But what woman also, in the feeling of this reserve, keeps not her wish within her own bosom, waiting till she is sought—waiting, if need be, till death, hastened perhaps by the inward fire with which she would rather be consumed than let it outwardly be known?

"This invariable order of marriage, which assigns the initiative to man, and the appearance of which you will not allow, is not a refinement of civilization, nor even a scrupulousness of the gospel; it is a law imposed by woman, upon all times, without excepting the most barbarous, and upon all nations, without excepting the most savage. I exaggerate. I have a vague remembrance of having read, in I know not what account of a distant voyage, that a people was discovered among whom woman takes the first step. Only, it is a country where she is degraded to the rank of the brute, and men are cannibals.

"If nature is in harmony with revelation as to the place which becomes your sex—one of humility—it is equally so as to the task belonging to it—one of charity. Here, again, here above all, that which is within the Book is confirmed by that which is within the heart of woman. For what is your natural inclination, if it is not to love? I forget not, in speaking in this way, that your sex is no more exempt than ours from the egotism which reigns in fallen humanity. But try to recollect yourself, and to withdraw into the depths of your being; penetrate beyond the ravages which sin has made there, even to that primitive ground (allow me the expression) which came forth from the hands of God, and tell me if love is not its essence and base. 'More superficial than man in everything else;' a Christian thinker has said, 'Woman is more profound in love.' We are familiar with that touching word of a woman, 'Love is only an episode in the life of man; it is an entire history in the life of woman.' (Madame De Staël.) She might have said yet more; it is her whole being. Your origin itself, as Moses narrates it, sufficiently indicates this. That of man, formed from inanimate dust, has something more supernatural, more striking, more magnificent about it; that of woman, taken from the throbbing flesh of sleeping man, seems more intimate, more loving, more tender.

"But, as regards love, it is less the degree than the character that is important. Love is the depth of your being, but what love? Think, and you will find it to be that which most predisposes you to the vocation of benevolence assigned you by the Scriptures. There are two kinds of love: the love which receives, and the love which gives; the first delights itself in the feeling which it inspires and the sacrifices which it obtains. The second satisfies itself in the sentiment which it approves and in the sacrifices it accomplishes. These two kinds of love hardly exist separate, and woman knows them both. But do I presume too much of her heart in thinking that with her the second predominates; and that her device, borrowed from the unselfish love of which our Saviour has given us an example, is this: 'It is more blessed to give than to receive'? To be loved, I know it well, my sisters, is the joy of your heart; alas! a joy perhaps refused; but to love, to devote yourselves out of love, is the need of your soul; it is the law, even, of your existence, and a law which no one should hinder you from obeying. Man also knows how to love and must love; it is in love that St. Paul sums up all the obligations that married life imposes upon him: 'Husbands love your wives,' as he sums up those of woman in submission: 'Wives submit yourselves unto your own husbands.' But we are now occupied, not with the faculty of the obligation, but with the inclination.

"Now love, it must be acknowledged, is less spontaneous, less disinterested in man than in woman. It is less spontaneous. Man often needs to conquer himself before he can love; woman only needs to listen and to follow her inward impulse. This is the reason, perhaps, why Scripture, which frequently commands the husband to love, refrains from enforcing it upon the wife, as if she were competent, from her nature to supply it. But, above all, it is more disinterested. Man loves woman more for himself than for her; woman loves man less for herself than for him. Man, because he is not sufficient unto himself, loves her whom God has given to him; woman, because she feels herself impelled to love him whom God has given to her. If solitude depresses man, it is because life has no charm apart from an 'helpmeet'; if woman dreads to live alone, it is because life is without an aim, unless she can be an 'helpmeet' to some one. We might say of her, if I may be permitted this reference, for the sake of the serious spirit in which I hazard it, We love her because she first loved us.

"Moreover, what is the sentiment which has become among all nations and languages of the earth the type of a love at once pure, living and profound? It is woman's love; maternal love; maternal love, which exhausts life without exhausting itself, and which, after suffering everything, labors by day and watches by night, considering itself sufficiently repaid with a caress or a smile; maternal love, celebrated as well by moralists as by poets, but whose praises, we believe, may be included in this one: that paternal love, itself, gives it the pre-eminence. What do I say? This same love is that of which God made choice, when He sought among all human affections an emblem for the love which He Himself bears to His people. 'But Zion said, the Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me.' We might expect to see our Father in Heaven replying to this doubt which offends Him, by making an appeal to the love of a father for his child. But no, to a mother's love he appeals; and to this mother He gives the name of woman, as if to give honor to the treasure of riches deposited in the heart of woman, found in the heart of the mother: 'Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee.'

"But if such is the heart of woman, how can we fail to recognize a soil prepared expressly for this vocation of charity, which the Scriptures assign to you close to man? Love not only inspires woman with a desire to furnish this career of devotion, but it also gives her the courage for it. Courage, that is the word. Yes, at the risk of seeming to advance a paradox, I was about to say there is a kind of courage, and that which is the most necessary to do good, which impels your sex much further than ours. I speak not of active courage; here man excels you, and ought to excel. You yield to him without regret the merit of intrepidity which would ill become your sex; and a man of spirit has dared to say, and that without violating the truth, that 'women affect fear as men do courage. I speak of passive courage, which is more constantly required than any other in the daily and humble practice of good works, and of which woman furnishes the most beautiful examples. Man knows best how to do; woman, best how to endure. Man is more enterprising, woman more patient; man more bold, woman more strang. Would you be convinced of it? Behold her in that sorrow of sorrows reserved to her sex, at the cost of which is human life; see her and compare her with man, in solitude, in sickness, in poverty, in widowhood, in oppression, in secret martyrdom. I say designedly secret martyrdom; for in public martyrdom man maintains himself in the rank of honor by the grandeur of the theatre; but when it comes to that martyrdom cautiously and cruelly hidden in the subterranean cells of the Inquisition, be assured the advantage is on the side of woman. God knew all this, when he portioned out life so that woman should have more of sufferings and less of pleasure than man; at least if we do not place in the first rank the pleasure of doing good. This pleasure woman enjoys even in suffering, and attaches herself, by her suffering, to him for whom she suffers.

“To a being thus formed, who dare dispute her vocation of self-sacrifice? a vocation which her heart revealed to her ages before a line of Scripture was given to the world! Tell me not that Scripture alone holds woman to the special obligation imposed upon her to labor for man’s spiritual good, by a holy charity which seeks God and eternity for him before everything else. Admirable to behold! nature has provided for it: not, it is true, sufficiently to make up for the teachings of revelation, but enough to make up for their deficiency, enough to make them perceived. For who does not know that woman’s keener sensibility, her more open heart, her more sensitive conscience, her less logical mind, her finer and more delicate temperament, render her more accessible to piety, while, at the same time, her occupations being less abstruse, less continuous, less absorbing, than ours, leave her more leisure for prayer and freedom for the services of God? Who knows not also that the first conditions of success in spiritual mission which everything contributes to mark out for her, are found less in activity, in word, in direct action, which man almost entirely appropriates to himself, than in that penetrating influence of example, of silence, of self-forgetfulness, which is peculiar to the woman who is truly a woman?”

“Yes, we declare it boldly, if Scripture is not right, if woman was not made for a mission of charity in humility, nature has missed its aim; for woman has been called to one work and prepared for another.

“Yet understand us aright; I have not entered this place to flatter woman, but to sanctify her. In saying that nature has prepared you for the duty which Scripture imposes upon you, I have not meant to say that you are, in your natural state, capable of fulfilling it. By one of those contradictions which the fall has introduced into our race, troubling the work of creation without destroying it, woman is at the same time prepared and unprepared for her vocation; prepared, inasmuch as she possesses peculiar qualities which wondrously adapt themselves to it; unprepared, inasmuch as she has other qualities which interfere with it. ‘It is the enemy who has done this.’ In the same heart where the hand of God deposited the precious germs of a life conformed to the mission of woman, Satan has secretly sowed those noxious germs which choke or neutralize, the first. He has done more. He has sought, with his infernal skill, to corrupt these healthful germs in your heart, and to gather from good seed evil fruit.

“Yes, these precious resources with which the Creator has endowed you to accomplish your work, the tempter knows how to convert into obstacles to this same work. Under his mysterious and formidable influence we see this activity degenerate into restlessness; this vigilance into curiosity; this tact into artifice; this penetration into temerity; this promptness into unsteadiness; this gracefulness into coquetry; this taste into studied eloquence; this versatility into caprice; this aptness into presumption; this influence into intrigue; this power into domination; this sensitiveness into irritability; this power of loving into jealousy; this necessity of being useful into a passion to please.

“The two principal tendencies which we have recognized in woman, humility and charity, have been perverted. The same mental peculiarity which assigns to her the narrow circle of home as her sphere, inclines her to take small views of things, and to centre her attention upon a single point, with a strength proportioned to the narrowness of the field which she embraces; and, little accustomed to doubt either of things or of herself, impatient of contradiction for want of believing more than she can understand, she enters insensibly upon a way of haughtiness, by a road which ought to lead to humility. And then this same necessity of the heart which impels her to love and to self-devotement, exposes her to the danger of self-seeking, even in self-forgetfulness, and of carrying this renunciation to extremes—hardly willing that good should be done unless she can have a hand in it; jealous of the man she would help and please without rivalry; envious of the woman who also aspires to help and please; jealous, envious—note it well—from very strength of love, but a love transformed into passion and self-will, in the dread laboratory of the temper! Then woman, whom we cheerfully believe superior to man in spiritual things, if the essence of holiness is love, and the essence of love sacrifice, applies to evil noble instincts, which might enable her to excel in goodness, and delivers herself up to sin with an abandon, at the same time energetic and heedless, such as man hardly understands; carrying to a greater extent than he, vain glory, egotism, avarice, intemperance, anger, hatred, cruelty, love of the world, and forgetfulness of God, as if she would justify the old adage, ‘the greater the height the greater the fall.’ The heart of woman is the richest treasure upon earth; but if it is not God’s treasure, it becomes the treasure of the devil; and one might be tempted sometimes to think that instead of having been given by God to man to be an ‘helpmeet’ to him, the devil formed her, saying, It is not good that man should be alone; I will make a snare for him.

'Accuse me not of slandering woman. I no more calumniate her now than I flattered her a moment since. I spoke then, and speak still, according to the Bible. The Scriptures, which delineate, with so much complacency, the graces of woman and her humble virtues, present her faults and wandering with a vividness unusual to them, and which they seem to reserve for this subject alone. St. Paul knows no worse scourge for the church than those women whom he describes in his first Epistle to Timothy. 'For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.' In the same book of Proverbs which closes with a sublime description of the virtuous woman, Solomon overwhelms with the strokes of his bitter and almost satirical eloquence, not only the abandoned woman, whose murderous work no one has described with a more horrid horror (ye young, ponder his maxims!), but every woman unfaithful to the mission which she has received of God. The foolish woman, 'who plucketh down her house with her hands;' the brawling woman whose companionship is more grievous than 'to dwell in the corner of the house-top, or in a desert land;' the vicious woman, 'who is as rottenness in the bones of her husband;' the odious woman, who is 'one of the four things which disquiet the earth;' the fair woman without discretion, whose beauty is as 'a jewel in a swine's snout;' the contentious woman, 'this continual dropping in a very rainy day; whosoever hideth her hideth the wind, and the ointment of his right hand which betrayeth itself.' This same Solomon, in old age, gathering up the remembrances of his whole life, confesses that he had vainly sought a woman after his own heart. 'And I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands; whose pleaseth God shall escape from her, but the sinner shall be taken by her. Behold, this have I found, saith the preacher, counting one by one to find out the account, which yet my soul seeketh, but I find not; one man among a thousand have I found, but a woman among all those have I not found.'

'These astonishing declarations the Bible confirms and completes by its narratives, which are so many lessons. After explaining by Eve the entrance of sin into the world, it explains to us by Adah and Zillah, Launch the first polygamist and blasphemer; by the daughters of men ensnaring the sons of God, the corruption of the earth and the deluge; by Hagar, the faith, the charity, the peace of Abraham for a time disturbed; by the women of the house of Laban, the faithfulness of Jacob for long time concealed; by Judith and Basmath, the profane indifference of Esau; by the revenge of an adulterous wife, the injustice of Potiphar; by the daughters of Moab, the most terrible plagues of Israel in the desert; by the daughters of Canaan, her wickedness and idolatry after the conquest; by Delilah, the shameful humiliation of Samson; by the companion of the Levite of Ephraim, a whole tribe cut off; by Bathsheba, David ceasing to be David; by strange women, Solomon serving other gods, and gathering from fall after fall the warnings which he would at a later period give to the world; by Jezebel, wicked Ahab, perjurer and murderer; by Athaliah, the kings of Judah following in the way of the kings of Israel; by Herodias, Herod beheading John the Baptist in spite of himself; by the Jewish women, Paul and Barnabas persecuted and driven from Antioch; by the prophetic woman of the Apocalypse, the corruption of the whole earth. Holy liberty of the Scriptures, which declare equally the good and evil, not to exalt human nature nor to humiliate it, but to give glory to God who creates the good and repairs the evil! This heart of woman, so ardent but so passionate, so tender but so jealous, so delicate but so susceptible, so impulsive but so hasty, so sensitive but so irritable, so strong but so weak, so good but so bad, must be subdued and transformed, in order that the sap of life which inundates it may return to its legitimate course, diffusing itself wholly in the flowers of humility and the fruits of charity!

'Subdued and transformed: but by whom? Ah! from whom could you expect this grace, but from the Son of God, who, not content with having, through the organ of his inspired servants, restored your place and revealed your mission, has come Himself to show you the ideal of it in His life, and to open for you the way to it by His cross? Jesus living, perfect type of the gentle virtues as of the strong, is an example for woman as for man; and Jesus crucified, sole victim who expiates sin, is the only source of this holy love which, varying merely in the application, frees from sin both man and woman. But between man and woman, if Jesus could sooner find access on the one side than on the other, would it not be on the part of woman? He, who is love; He, who 'came not to be ministered unto, but to minister;' He who satisfied himself only in privation and sacrifice; He, in fine, who took upon Him our nature in order to ascribe the highest charity in the most profound humility?

'Am I mistaken, my sisters (it is for you to say), am I mistaken in thinking that there is nothing upon earth more in sympathy with Jesus Christ than the heart of woman? Superfluous question! Ah, no, I am not deceived, or your heart would deny all its instincts! The Christian faith, so truly founded in the depths of humanity that it is not wonderful only because common, adapts itself so marvelously to all the needs of your moral being, that you cannot be truly woman except upon condition of receiving the gospel. The Christian woman is not only the best of women, but at the same time most truly a woman.

Oh, you, then, who would accomplish the humble and benevolent mission of your sex—beneath the cross, or never!

“Indeed, my dear sisters, the first aid which man has a right to expect from you is spiritual aid. It is little to be indebted to you for the consolation of this life of a day, if he owes not to you, so far as it is in your power, the possession of eternal life. Not only that true charity which subordinates time to eternity, demands it of you, but justice itself, as we have shown from the Scriptures. Your sex has an original wrong to repair towards ours, and a spiritual wrong. That with which we reproach you in the fall where we have followed you, if we feel not bound to restrict our reproaches to ourselves, is not that death which you have introduced into the world, neither that embittered life which your sympathy even cannot always alleviate—it is a much greater evil, the only real and absolute evil—Sin, which the first man was doubtless inexcusable in committing, but which he was beguiled to commit by woman.

“Imagine Eve kneeling with Adam beside the corpse of one son murdered by the other, whom the divine curse drives far out upon the wild and solitary earth. In sight of the visible and present fruits of sin, and with the thoughts of its invisible and future results, if the tender look of Adam said not to Eve, ‘Give me back the favor of my God! give me back my peace with myself! give me back the days of Eden, and my sweet innocence, and my holy love for the Saviour and for thee!’—doubt not that SHE said all this to herself! To her, it seemed very little to heap upon him the consolations of earth, if she could not bring to him those of Heaven; and, unable to repair the wrong she had done him, she urges, she implores him to turn his weeping eyes to the Deliverer promised to repair all, to re-establish all, and to open to the fallen but reconciled race a second Eden, more beautiful than that to which the sword of the cherubims henceforth forbade entrance. If such are the sentiments of Eve, let her be blessed, although she be Eve! With this heart, Eve approximates Mary; and in the woman who ruined the world by sin, I discover already the woman who will save it by giving to it the Saviour.

“Well, now, this that she would do, do yourselves. Though no one of you has been an Eve to man, yet be each of you a Mary to him, and give him a Saviour! This, this is your task! But if you respond not to it, refusing to pass your life in the exercise of beneficence, you shall fail of your calling; and, after having been saluted of man by the name of ‘good woman,’ ‘deaconess,’ or ‘sister of charity,’ you shall be accounted of God, ‘as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal!’ But, how can you give the Saviour to others, if you do not possess Him in your own heart? Women who hear me, yet again—beneath the cross, or never!

“We say nothing of those holy women of the Old Testament, who died in faith before coming to the Saviour, ‘not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off and embraced them;’ neither of the pious Sarah, nor the modest Rebekah, nor the tender Rachel, nor the heroic Deborah, nor the humble Ruth, nor the sweet wife of Elkanah, nor of the prudent Abigail, nor of the interpid Rizpah, nor of the retiring Shunamite. We confine ourselves to the women of the New Testament.

“Beneath the cross, Mary, more touching now than at the cradle, offering herself without a murmur to the sword which pierces her soul, associates herself with the sacrifice of her son by a love more sublime than any other after that of the adorable Son, and presents to us a type of the Christian woman, who knows not how to aid and to love but in keeping her eyes fixed upon ‘Jesus, and him crucified.’ Beneath the cross, Anna, the prophetess, type of the faithful woman, gives glory first, in this same temple, where ‘she served God day and night with fastings and prayers,’ to Him whom the aged Simeon had confessed by the Spirit, and in spite of her fourscore and four years, renews the energy and activity of youth ‘to speak of Him unto all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.’ Beneath the cross, Mary of Bethany, type of the contemplative woman, eager for the one thing needful and jealous of that good part, sits now at the feet of Jesus and feeds in silence upon the word of life; and at another time, in the same silence, anoints those blessed feet with pure spikenard, of great price, and wipes them with the hairs of her head, as if she could not find a token sufficiently tender of her respect and love. Beneath the cross, Martha, her sister, type of the active woman, sometimes lavishes her unwearying attentions upon a brother whom she loved, sometimes busies herself for the Saviour whom she adored, serving Him in every-day life, invoking His aid in bitter suffering, and blessing Him in the joy of deliverance. Beneath the Cross, the Canaanitish mother, type of the persevering woman, surpassing in faith and light those apostles whom she wearies with her cries, triumphs over the silence, refusal, disdain even, by which the Lord himself seems to contend against her invincible prayer, and wrests from Him at last, with the cure so much desired, the most brilliant homage that any child of Adam ever obtained: ‘Oh, woman, great is thy faith! be it unto thee as thou wilt.’ Beneath the cross, Mary Magdalene, freed from seven devils, type of the grateful woman, surpassing these same apostles in love and courage, after them at Calvary and before them at the sepulchre, is also chosen from among them all, the first to behold her Lord as He comes forth from the tomb, and charged to carry the good news of His resurrection to those who would announce it to the world. Beneath the Cross, Dorcas, ‘full of good works and alms deeds,’ type of the charitable woman, after a life consecrated to the relief of the poor and of the widows of Joppa, in her death shows what she was to the Church by the void she left in it, and by the tears she caused to flow; and, in the same spirit, Phœbe, the deaconess of Cenchrea, "a successor of many," and in particular of the Apostle Paul, gives birth in all succeeding times, by her example, to a multitude of deaconesses, clothed or not—it little signifies—with this official title before men. Beneath the cross, Priscilla, type of the servant of Jesus Christ, shares with Aquilla, her husband, many of those perils incurred to preserve to the Church of the Gentiles their great missionary, or engages in those conversations by which the faith of the eloquent Apollos was enlightened and strengthened; and, in the same spirit, Lydia hazards her life by opening her house to the apostles, which, transformed at once into a church, becomes the centre of evangelical charity in Philippi and Macedonia.

"What more shall I say? Shall I speak of Julia, and Lois, and Euodias, and Sinyche, and Mary, and Persis, and Salome, and Tryphena, and Tryphosa, and of the many women of the gospel, and of so many others who have followed in their steps, the Perpetuas, the Monicas, the Mary Calamys, and the Elizabeth Frys? Beneath the cross, with the Bible in hand—this Bible, to which no human creature owes more than she, both in respect to the world and to Christ—beneath the cross—it is there that I love to see woman! Restored to God, to man, to herself, so worthy in her submission, so noble in her humility, so strong in her gentleness, gathering all the gifts she has received to consecrate them to the services of humanity, with an ardor which we hardly know how to exhibit except in passion, she obliges us to confess that she who effaced our primitive holiness, is also she who now offers of it, on this apostate earth, the brightest image."

Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church. This Committee was organized in New York city, December 12th, 1878.

Its formal organization was the culminating of work commenced years before in widely separated sections of the Church. Women's societies for Home Missions date back to the commencement of the century. "The Female Cent Societies" of New Hampshire, established in 1805, have raised in that State over $100,000 for Home Missions. Similar societies existed in other States. In the larger number of churches, however, woman's work took the form of "sewing societies," and was satisfied with the preparation of one or more "boxes" of clothing for home missionaries. In 1830 Rev. Sheldon Jackson became Superintendent of Presbyterian Missions for the Rocky Mountain Territories. Within his field were all the Mormons, nearly all the Mexicans, and a large number of the Indians of the United States. He early realized that the only effective method of reaching them with the gospel was through mission schools. But the charter and custom of the Board of Home Missions prevented its engaging in school work. In 1867 a few Christian women of different denominations, under the lead of Mrs. E. T. Throop Martin, formed a Union Missionary Society, to establish schools in New Mexico and Arizona. This suggested to Dr. Jackson the formation of a Woman's Home Mission Society of the Presbyterian Church, to carry on, in connection with the Board of Home Missions, the school work among Mexicans, Mormons and Indians. He at once commenced its advocacy in the newspapers and public addresses, and when, in 1872, he commenced the publication of the Rocky Mountain Presbyterian, it was made the special advocate of Women's Home Mission Societies. In 1873 the Presbyteries of Colorado and Wyoming (Utah), under his leadership, recommended the organization of distinct societies of women for home missions. In the same year he prepared and published a blank constitution for their use. In this movement he was ably seconded by Rev. Henry Kendall, D.D., Senior Secretary of the Board of Home Missions.

Together they persistently kept woman's work in Home Missions prominently before the Church and Committees of successive General Assemblies, with the following results:—

The Assemblies of 1872 and '73 recommended that the women, not content with making "boxes of clothing" the measure of their interest in Home Missions, should also contribute money.

The Assembly of 1874 reiterated the recommendation to raise money, designated the months of October, November and December as the time, and directed the Board of Home Missions to appoint in the various centres suitable women, who should take the oversight of the work.

The Assembly of 1875 took a long step forward, and recommended the organization of a distinct Woman's Home Mission Society, with auxiliary societies, under the advice and control of the Board of Home Missions or its officers. Upon this several Synods and Presbyteries recommended the formation of societies.

The Assembly of 1876 took another advanced step, and recommended to the Synods to appoint committees of women to co-operate with the Board in this special work. In response to this the seven Synods of Albany, Cincinnati, Colorado, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Pittsburgh appointed committees.

With the increase of "Woman's Societies" the school-work began to assume such proportions that it had to be recognized. Consequently, the Assembly of 1877, recognizing the fact of its existence, formally authorized the Board of Home Missions to assume the charge of it and enlarge it as rapidly as the Woman's societies provided the funds.

At the Assemblies of 1875-6-7, Drs. Kendall and Jackson conducted popular meetings in behalf of this movement, which have been since continued by the Woman's Executive Committee.

Although the General Assembly of 1875 had recommended the organization of a Woman's Home Mission Society, and fourteen Synods had appointed auxiliary committees, yet up to 1878 the movement had not culminated in a central society.

In view of this, Dr. Sheldon Jackson, during the Winter and Spring of 1878, corresponded with women known to be deeply interested in Home Missions in different parts of the Church, with reference to a convention for the organization of a central Society during the meeting of the General Assembly at Pittsburg. This convention met in the First Presbyterian Church of Pittsburg, on the 24th of May, 1878, with Mrs. W. A. Herron in the chair and Mrs. W. N. Paxton, Secretary. The result of the meeting was the appointment of a committee of twelve ladies to confer with the Ladies' Board of Missions in New York, as to their willingness to devote themselves as a society exclusively to Home Missions, thereby becoming the Woman's Home Mission Society of the Presbyterian Church. In case the Ladies' Board declined the proposal, then the committee were empowered to call another meeting and complete an independent organization. Mrs. S. F. Scovel was made chairman and Mrs. O. E. Boyd, secretary of this committee.

The conference took place in New York city, July 11th, 1878, the committee having spent the preceding day at Elizabeth, N. J., in special prayer for the presence and direction of the Holy Spirit.

The Ladies' Board declining to make the proposed change in their organization, the committee called a convention of the Synodical Committees to meet in New York city, December 12th, 1878. This meeting resulted in the formal organization of the Woman's Executive Committee of Home Missions, with Mrs. Ashbel Green, President; Mrs. S. F. Scovel and Mrs. J. B. Dunn, vice-Presidents; Mrs. F. E. H. Haines, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. J. D. Belle, Recording Secretary; and Mrs. M. E. Boyd, Treasurer. The columns of the Rocky Mountain Presbyterian being offered, that paper was made the official organ of the Committee. In the Spring of 1880 "The Woman's Board of Missions of the Southwest," and in February, 1882, "The Woman's Board of Home and Foreign Missions of Long Island," connected their home work with the Executive Committee. In April, 1883, "The Ladies' Board of Missions of New York" discontinued their home department, and their work in the State of New York was happily and harmoniously consolidated with the Woman's Executive Committee, making one grand National Society of Presbyterian women.

The growth of the movement is shown by the following statistics: In 1876, seven Synods, auxiliary; in 1877, fourteen; in 1878, twenty-two; in 1879, twenty-seven; and in 1882, when the Synods had been consolidated into the twenty-one in the United States, eighteen were auxiliary. The receipts were, for the year 1879 (three months), $2287.32; 1879-80, $11,467.49; 1880-81, $27,793.24; 1881-82, $53,081.83; 1882-83, $67,557.32.

The senior Secretary, Mrs. F. E. H. Haines, displayed great executive ability in the management of the affairs of the Society, and in its formative period was its life and front. From 1879 to 1883 about fifty leaflets have been printed and circulated by the tens of thousands. The Society has also organized and held a large number of public meetings in various parts of the Church.

Wood, Rev. Charles, is the only son of (elder) John J. and Mary Wood, and was born in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y., June 3d, 1851. Having graduated at Haverford College, Pa., in 1870, he entered the Theological Seminary at Princeton, where he completed his professional education in 1873. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of West Chester, in 1872, and immediately upon graduation from Princeton was called to the Central Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y., over which he was installed in 1874. Resigning his charge in 1878, he went abroad for a year's study in Germany and a two years' trip around the world. Upon his return, in November, 1881, he became pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y., where he still continues.

Mr. Wood is gifted with a rare physique, capable of prolonged and continuous labor. His methods of work are systematic and successful, each hour's task being accomplished with almost unvarying exactness within the hour. The church life of his pastorate has been vigorous, constant and fruitful, numerous conversions and increased liberality marking every year. With a spirit of earnest piety, he has united the intelligence of much reading and the culture of extended foreign acquaintance and study. As the pulpit successor of two moderators of the General Assembly, Drs. John C. Lord and Henry Darling, his mental and social powers have been early put to the test. As the delegate of the Presbyterian Church of the United States to the General Assemblies of Scotland in 1879, he had the approbation of all auditors. His preaching has been designated as "complete in analysis, accurate in statement, chaste in style." He is a frequent contributor to periodical literature, mostly of sketches of travel. His published volumes are: "A Memorial of Dr. John C. Lord," and "Summerings in Europe."

Wood, Rev. Francis Marion, was born at Fairton, N. J., June 23d, 1834, and graduated at New Jersey College in 1858. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton. He was stated supply of the Broadway Church, Cincinnati, O., in 1861, and of the Bethel Church, Toledo, 1861-2. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Miami, August 23d, 1862. He was pastor at Jersey, O., 1862-9; pastor elect at Clifton, 1850-1; pastor at Marshall, Mich., 1851-6; stated supply of Howard Street Church, San Francisco, Cal., 1876; pastor at Oxford, Ohio, 1876-9, and since 1881 has been stated supply of the Church at Xenia, O.

Wood, Rev. Frank A., was the eldest child of Prof. Alphonso and Lucy (Baldwin) Wood, and was born in Meriden, N. H., February 10th, 1845. He was graduated at the University of the City of New York, with honor, in the year 1868. During senior year in college, he became assistant in the Astor Library, which post he filled until May, 1871. In consequence of an appeal made in behalf of the Syria Mission, by Rev. Dr. Jessup, Mr. Wood decided to fit himself for service in that field. Passing through the seminary, he was licensed to preach, April 18th, 1871, and in the following month was graduated, among the foremost of his class. Having received an appointment to the Syria Mission, he was ordained an evangelist, by the Presbytery of West Chester, October 24th, 1871. The next day he was married, and sailed with his wife for their field of labor.

After ten months' study of the Arabic, Mr. Wood was sent to Zahléh, a new station on the eastern slope of the Lebanon. There he labored two years and a half, when, upon the departure of Mr. Calhoun, he was appointed to take his place as Principal of the Abeih Academy. He faithfully discharged the duties of this post, ever making it his chief object to bring his scholars to a saving knowledge of Christ Jesus. In January, 1878, it was decided to close the Academy, and Mr. Wood was to have been removed to the Sidon field; but in May, he was attacked with severe illness, and died on the 20th of July.

One of his brother missionaries has testified in these words: "I never heard him speak an angry word; I never saw him do a selfish act. Wherever he went he won all hearts. He was a cheerful toiler. He was never discouraged. He would always look on the bright side. He always had a light heart for his Master's service. He was a sun-shining Christian. His influence over his brethren was like electric currents. He thrilled them with his enthusiasm. He being dead, yet speaketh."

Wood, Rev. Halsey A., was born September 7th, 1793, in Bullston, Saratoga county, N. Y.; studied theology in Princeton; was settled as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Amsterdam, in the Spring of 1816, and died November 26th, 1825. He was a man of fine personal bearing, of an eminently genial spirit, of a vigorous and discriminating mind, of admirable social qualities, of eminent devotedness to his work as a minister of the gospel, and greatly blessed in his labors.

Wood, James, D. D., was born near Saratoga, N. Y., July 12th, 1799; graduated at Union College in 1822; studied theology at Princeton, and was licensed by Albany Presbytery. Dr. Wood was successively pastor at Amsterdam, N. Y.; Agent of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church; Professor in the Theological Seminary of the Northwest (while located at Hanover and New Albany); Associate Secretary of the Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia; President of Hanover College, Ind.; Moderator of the General Assembly in 1864; and first President of Van Rensselaer Institute, Hightstown, N. J., where he died April 7th, 1867.

Dr. Wood was regarded by his brethren as one of the best, wisest and most useful ministers of our Church. The important positions which he was called upon to fill are proofs of the high estimation in which he was held. His sound judgment, dignified manners, amiable temper, combined with his learning and energy, secured for him a wide and happy influence in the Church. He was eminently a good man. His theology was of the soundest Westminster type. He was devotedly attached to young men, especially to those seeking the ministry. His excellent tract on the "Call to the Sacred Office" is more often sought for by our pastors to place in the hands of young men than any other production of the kind. In all the places in which he lived and labored he secured the esteem and affection of the community, as one whose life was a bright example of the gospel which he faithfully preached.

Wood, Jeremiah, D. D., was born November 11th, 1801, in Greenfield, N. Y.; graduated at Union College, in 1824, and entering Princeton Theological Seminary in 1823, remained there over two years. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, August 16th, 1826, and began his labors at Mayfield, N. Y., within the limits of that Presbytery, on November 26th, of the same year. He was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Albany, January 10th, 1828, and continued his work as a stated supply at Mayfield until September 2d, 1840, when he was called to be pastor at that place; was installed September 22d, 1841, and continued to labor on in the same field until his death, through a period of very nearly fifty years.

Dr. Wood was a man of clear intellect and of unusual power in the pulpit and in debate. He was a wise counsellor, and his opinions always commanded respect among his brethren. His deep piety, consistent life and faithful labors made him an uncommonly successful pastor, and he was truly beloved by his people. During his long ministry he was permitted to see many glorious revivals among them. In one of these, in 1873, the membership of his church was almost doubled. He died June 6th, 1876, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

Woodbridge Presbyterian Church, New Jersey, is one of the oldest in the Presbyterian body. An early settler is quoted as writing home to Scotland, in 1684, "There are here very good religious people. They go under the name of Independents, but are most like to Presbyterians." The church for a time was really a town institution, under a kind of "Church and State" arrangement. Under "Town Meeting" management, the earliest form of church service seems to have been a union of Independency, Presbyterianism and Establishment. We have the first notice to secure a minister in 1669. The Rev. Samuel Treat was the first secured; his term of service was brief. Several followed him, in an equally brief way, until 1679, when, sending to England and making an appeal to Rev. Richard Baxter, Rev. John Allen was sent them. He had charge of the church for about seven years, and died among them, greatly honored and beloved.

Rev. Archibald Riddle who had been imprisoned in Scotland for preaching in the open air, followed him. In turn he was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Shepherd, who remained the minister of the town until 1707, when the more distinctively Presbyterian organization was effected under the lead of Rev. Nathaniel Wade; an old church record states this fact and the membership at that time. The church was received into the Presbytery of Philadelphia in 1710. Rev. John Pierson, of Connecticut, followed Mr. Wade and proved a most efficient pastor for about forty years. Under him a royal charter was obtained from Queen Anne, to a considerable grant of land, which in part still constitutes the cemetery and parsonage. Rev. Nathaniel Whitaker succeeded Mr. Pierson for five years. Rev. Azel Roe, D.D., followed him in 1763. Under him a union was effected between the Church of Woodbridge and Metuchen, by which for a number of years they had one pastor and one Session, though distinct in their temporalities; that arrangement ceased about 1790. Dr. Roe's pastorate reached a period of fifty-three years, extending through the Revolution. He sleeps with his people. Dr. Henry Mills succeeded him in 1816, afterward elected to a Professorship in Auburn Theological Seminary. The Sabbath-school of the church—one of the oldest in New Jersey—had its origin under him. Rev. William B. Barton assumed the pastorate in 1822, and died after a work of nearly thirty years. In 1852 Rev. Wm. M. Martin accepted a call, and was succeeded by Rev. George C. Lucas, in 1863—both still living and working—followed again by the present incumbent, Rev. Joseph M. McNulty, D.D., installed in July, 1874.

The church in that long history has had some precious revivals. An Episcopal Church was organized from it in 1711, and a Congregational Church in 1875. It has never been very large, but always quite strong and influential. It has had three buildings on or near the same site. The first one was erected in 1675. The second one was about thirty feet square, unpainted, inside or out; no steeple or bell and no stoves. It had two doors of entrance, one at the end and one at the side, with one stairway at the left of the pulpit. This gave place to the present structure in 1803. The latter has been elegantly remodeled, inside and out, with the addition of a spacious and beautiful Sabbath-school room, parlors, etc., since the commencement of the present pastorate.

Woodbridge, Sylvester, D. D., was born in Sharon, Conn., June 15th, 1813, and graduated from Union College in 1830. He pursued his theological studies at Auburn and Princeton, and was ordained and installed at Westhampton, L. I., by Long Island Presbytery, April, 1836. His subsequent fields of labor, in all of which he has labored diligently and with success, have been Hamstead, November 1st, 1837; Benicia, Cal., 1849; Howard Street Church, San Francisco, 1870; and Woodbridge Church, San Francisco, 1876; of which he still has charge. Dr. Woodbridge preaches the gospel with plainness and power, and is successful in winning souls to Christ.

Woodbridge, Timothy, D. D., was born in Stockbridge, Mass., November 24th, 1784. He entered Williams College in 1799. In the course of his Sophomore year he lost the sight, first of one eye and then of the other, and the remainder of his life was passed in total darkness. In 1809 he became a student in the then new Theological Institution at Andover, and in due time was regularly licensed to preach the gospel. He accepted an invitation to preach at Green River, Columbia county, N. Y., in 1816, and two years later was formally set apart as the pastor of that church. Here he continued, laboring with great zeal and diligence, twenty-six years, and during this time he had the pleasure to witness, in connection with his labors, several powerful revivals of religion. From 1842 to 1851 he was the successful pastor of the Church at Spencertown. Subsequently, until his death, he lived in comparative retirement, preaching occasionally, giving important aid to the cause of education, and ready to lend a helping hand to every good cause. It may be doubted whether, as a "blind preacher," he had his equal since the days of Waddell.

Woodhull, Rev. George Spafford, was the son of the Rev. John Woodhull, of the class of 1766, at Princeton College. After graduating at that Institution (1790), he studied law for two years, and medicine for one year, but determining to enter the ministry, he was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, November 14th, 1797, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Cranberry, N. J., June 6th, 1798. Here he remained until 1820, when he was chosen pastor of the Church in Princeton. For twelve years he labored here faithfully and successfully. In 1832 he resigned his charge, and spent the last two years of his life as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Middletown Point, N. J., where he died December 25th, 1834. He was eminently blameless and exemplary in his life, eminently peaceful and happy in his death.

Woodhull, John, D. D., was born in Suffolk county, Long Island, and graduated at Princeton College in 1766. He studied theology with the Rev. John Blair, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1768, and commenced his career with much more than ordinary popularity. On one occasion, while preaching as a licentiate, sixty persons were hopefully converted by hearing him preach in a private house. He had many calls, but chose to settle at Leacock, Lancaster county, Pa., where he was installed, August 1st, 1770. Dr. Woodhull was a strenuous Whig, and while in this charge advocated the cause so eloquently from the pulpit, that he succeeded in enlisting, as soldiers, every male member of his congregation capable of bearing arms, he going with them, as chaplain. In 1779 he succeeded the Rev. William Tennent, at Freehold, N. J. During many years of his ministry he conducted a grammar school, and superintended the studies of young men preparing for the ministry. He was a trustee of Princeton College for forty-four years.

Woodruff, Rev. Benjamin, was the son of Samuel Woodruff, an eminent merchant of Elizabethtown, N. J. After graduating at Princeton College, he pursued the study of theology, probably with his pastor, Rev. Elisha Spencer. In due time he was licensed to preach, and on March 14th, 1759, was ordained pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Westfield, N. J. During the forty-four years of his ministry at Westfield, he greatly endeared himself to his people by his preaching and pastoral intercourse, and always and everywhere commanded profound respect. He died April 3d, 1803.

Woods, Henry, D. D., was born on July 2d, 1837, in Marion county, Mo. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1857; and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1862; having meanwhile spent the Summer vacation of 1861 in conducting the department of Mathematics in his Alma Mater. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Baltimore. After supplying the First Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, O., for six months, he was elected its pastor, and was ordained and installed October 22d, 1862. Here he remained, with great acceptance and success, until April, 1867, when, suffering from the effects of an attack of diphtheria, which troubled him in pulpit service, he accepted the Chair of Ancient Languages in Washington and Jefferson College. Upon the consolidation in 1869, he became Professor of Latin, and this place he has held ever since, except an interval of three years, during which he filled the Chair of Greek. During nearly all of this period of service in the college, he has also preached the gospel, having for a time supplied the Church of Upper Ten Mile, the Second Church of Washington, and, since 1871, the Church of East Buffalo.

Dr. Woods is an accurate scholar, a graceful writer, a pleasing and effective speaker, and, by reason of his finely balanced character and winning manners, is a general favorite. Being conservative in spirit, he never fails to hold the ground which he has achieved. His excellent judgment and tender sympathy also make him a centre of loving confidences. Students and parishioners alike hold him in the highest personal respect. His ministry has been blessed with spiritual fruits, notably so in 1879, when sixty-six converts were added to the roll of his church. He was a member of the General Assembly in 1876 at Brooklyn, and by that body was appointed its delegate to convey fraternal salutations to the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church.

Woods, James S., D. D., was born in Cumberland county, Pa., April 18th, 1793; graduated at Dickinson College, under the Presidency of Dr. John McKnight; obtained his theological education at Princeton, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick in 1817. His first settlement was in Mifflin county, Pa., whither he came in 1819. From this time until 1822 he labored as an evangelist in the Valley of the Juniata, from Lewistown to Shade Gap. Through this field, embracing McVeystown, Newton-Hamilton and Shirleysburg, he laid the foundations for the present churches. Here he is claimed as the father of Presbyterianism. Often he preached in private houses, school-houses and barns. He resided, at first, in the vicinity of McVeystown, and was called, in 1822, to take charge of the Lewistown and McVeystown churches. In the Spring of 1823 he moved to Lewistown, and continued the pastor of the church there until the time of his death, a space of nearly forty years.

Although Dr. Woods gave but little time to literary studies after his entrance upon the work of the ministry, he was a good classical scholar. He taught a school while he resided at McVeystown, and for some time after his settlement at Lewistown had charge of the Academy, a classical school he was instrumental in building. Textual, evangelical, methodical and earnest, Dr. Wood's preaching everywhere commanded attention and secured edification. The cause of Temperance found in him an early and enduring friend. He was beloved by his brethren, and by the people among whom he labored. He was a good man, a devoted minister, and an exalted though lowly Christian. He turned many to righteousness, who will shine as the stars, forever and ever.

Woods, Rev. John E., was born in the bounds of Bethel congregation, eight miles south of Pittsburg, Pa., May 29th, 1831. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1852, and was licensed by Ohio Presbytery in April, 1856. After being pastor for two years at Bentonsport, Iowa, he settled in Lithopolis, Ohio, and in July, 1859, he was installed by Columbus Presbytery as pastor of the church in that place. In his ministerial labors at Lithopolis he was, in a high degree, able and faithful, and also very successful. The church was much edified, both in respect of improvement in spirituality and increase of the number of communicants and hearers. Under his ministry there was a season of "refreshing" in 1860-1. He died August 25th, 1862. Mr. Woods was a good man, of sound intellect and devoted piety; of amiable disposition, modest and unobtrusive in his deportment; conscientious and punctual in the fulfillment of his obligations. As a minister, he was faithful to his trust and made "full proof of his ministry."

Woods, Hon. William Allan, was born in

HON. WILLIAM ALLAN WOODS.

Marshall county, Tenn., May 16th, 1837. He graduated at Wabash College, with high honor, in the class of 1859. The next year he served as Tutor in his Alma Mater, and the next as teacher in the Academy at Marion, Indiana, where, after a diligent study of the law, he was admitted to the Bar. In March, 1862, he removed to Goshen, Elkhart county, and began the practice of his profession—manifesting such ability as soon brought him to the front rank. In 1867 he represented his county in the Legislature, and was recognized as one of the most useful members. Three years later he was chosen Judge of the Circuit Court, and in 1878 was re-elected to that office without opposition.

Judge Woods had only fairly entered on his second term when, in 1880, he was chosen one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of Indiana, and served in that high office till his resignation in May, 1883. At the time of his resignation, he was Chief Justice, and was commissioned to the office which he now holds—United States District Judge for the District of Indiana, succeeding the Hon. Walter Q. Gresham, the present Postmaster-General.

Judge Woods, as a speaker, is distinguished by clearness and force. He is a gentleman of wide and sound learning and of admirable courtesy. As a Resolved, That we enter upon the work of establishing the University of Wooster, with the single purpose of glorifying God, in promoting sanctified education, and thus furthering the interests of the Church, and its extension over the whole earth.

Resolved, That we will, in every way possible, strive to imbue all our operations with the spirit of Christianity, and bring religious influence and instruction to bear earnestly upon all who may be connected with the Institution."

The University has been carefully conducted in the spirit of its founders, by the selection of Christian teachers, loyal to the Presbyterian Church, and by the active promotion of piety among the students. A strong religious sentiment has prevailed. Several revivals of religion have been enjoyed.

There have been in attendance, since the opening in 1870, 1510 students, of whom 339 have been young women; 907 have been in the Collegiate Department. It has graduated 317 students, of whom 11 have been

Judge, he is distinguished for his knowledge and comprehensive grasp of the law, and the application of it to the case in hand. Of studious habits, well-balanced mind, conscientiousness in the discharge of his official duty, he is a man of whom his country may well be proud and be thankful for in a day when there is such need of integrity, combined with great ability, in public functionaries. He is an elder of the Presbyterian Church.

Wooster, University of, at Wooster, Wayne county, O., was founded in 1866. It belongs to the Synod of Ohio. The citizens of Wooster gave twenty-one acres of land, "beautiful for situation," and buildings costing upwards of $100,000. The churches subscribed an endowment of $250,000. And on September 7th, 1870, it was opened with fifty students, the Rev. Willis Lord, D. D., President, assisted by an able Faculty.

The spirit of the University may be learned from the following resolutions, passed at the first meeting of the Board of Trustees:—

young women. It has sent forth into the field 75 ministers of the gospel, who are laboring in twenty States of the Union; and it is represented by ministers and teachers in the mission fields, both at home and abroad. Not less than forty others of its alumni are preparing to enter the ministry, and in the present classes are not less than fifty students who have the ministry in view.

The flourishing and popular Medical Department of the University is located in Cleveland.

A Musical Department, organized in 1882, under the leadership of Professor Karl Merz, is meeting a long felt want at Wooster, and is a wonderful success.

The Rev. A. A. E. Taylor, D. D., succeeded Dr. Lord, as President, in 1875. His administration has been eminently successful, and, worn down by the cares of ten years' laborious service, he has just retired (June, 1883), to the great regret of all the friends of the University. His successor is Dr. S. F. Scovel.

The motto of Wooster University is CHRISTO ET LITERIS, and the extraordinary growth of this youthful Institution (566 students, in all departments, in 1883) speaks, in language not to be mistaken, of the advantage of building our educational enterprises on the sure Foundation, Christ, and of keeping our colleges under the watch and care of the Church.

Worden, James Avery, D. D., was born at Oxford, O., December 10th, 1811, and graduated at Miami University in 1861. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Mohawk, February 14th, 1867; stated supply of the First Church, Oswego, N. Y., 1866, and co-pastor 1867-71. He became pastor of the Second Church, Steubenville, O., in 1872, and continued in this relation, with success, until 1878. He was Superintendent of Sabbath-school work in the Presbyterian Board of Publication, in 1878-80; and since that time has been Secretary of Sabbath-school work, in the same Board, devoting himself zealously and acceptably to the claims of his office.

Word of God. Sometimes Scripture ascribes to the Word of God certain supernatural effects, and often represents it as animated and active: "He sent his word and healed them" (Psalm cxvii, 20). It also signifies what is written in the sacred books of the Old and New Testament (Luke xi, 28; James i, 22), the divine law which teaches and commands good things and forbids evil (Psalm cxix, 101), and is used to express every promise of God (Psalm cxix, 25, etc.), and prophecy or vision (Isa. ii, 1). This term is likewise consecrated and appropriated to signify the only Son of the Father, the uncreated Wisdom, the second Person of the most holy Trinity, equal to and consubstantial with the Father. John the Evangelist, more expressly than any other, has opened to us the mystery of the Word of God (John i, 1-3).

"There were," says Mr. Ayre, "foreshadowings of this term in the Old Testament (c. g. Ps. xxiii, 6; cxvii, 20; cxix, 89; Isa. xl, 8). In such passages we can scarcely limit the meaning to an uttered word or command. Many truths were announced indistinctly in the earlier revelation, which received by degrees a fuller embodiment, and were at length brought into thorough prominence in the gospel. Thus names that at first seemed but to express a divine attribute were seen afterwards to indicate a divine Person. So the 'word' was taken up by Jewish writers with perhaps somewhat of a Messianic application. The term is adopted by the Chaldee paraphrasts. Thus in Deut. xxvi, 17, 18, it is said: 'Ye have appointed the word of God a king over you this day, that he may be your God.' The Alexandrian Jew, Philo, continually speaks of the Logos. But his philosophy, a mixture of Platonism and Judaism, was imperfect, and his language far from precise.

"When great religious truths are to be unfolded to men, existing words must be used as the instruments of such teaching. They very probably will require a heightening or a limitation of their sense; and this a divinely instructed teacher will take care to supply. St. John, appropriating the term Logos, or Word, as fitly describing One from whom the divine utterances proceeded, shows at once what he meant by declaring, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made' (John i, 1-3). There is an unmistakable difference between the idea thus conveyed and that of Philo. The Word here spoke of is not merely an attribute. He is a Person, existing before all creatures, from the beginning, the Form of created things, eternally with God, God himself. He, manifested in flesh, developed that fullness of grace and truth which ancient sages, in whom nevertheless He spoke, had but partially proclaimed. He was essentially the life of the world, from whom came the illumination and vivifying principle in man must proceed.

"Words could not more emphatically express the dignity of the Only-begotten, or the transcendent glory of the manifestation of the 'Word of Life' (John i, 1-2); and truly indeed are we taught to desire to receive out of His fullness 'grace for grace' (John i, 16)."

Work, Rev. William Ramsay, son of Andrew and Anna (Anderson) Work, was born in Lancaster county, Pa., October 10th, 1810. He was graduated from Washington College, Pa., in 1831; spent eighteen months as a teacher in the Academy at Lancaster, Pa. (1831-1835); studied for two years in Princeton Seminary (1835-1836), and one year in Allegheny Seminary (1837-8); was licensed by the Presbytery of New-Castle, April 18th, 1838; was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at White Clay Creek, Del., by the same Presbytery, December 23d, 1840; was installed also jointly over the Christian Church, December 22d, 1845; was released from the pastoral charge of these churches, April 14th, 1848. He then removed to Pottstown, Pa., where he found the Cottage Seminary for young ladies, and was its Principal, and the stated supply of the Pottstown Presbyterian Church, from 1848 to 1858. In 1858 he took up his residence in Philadelphia, and organized the congregation and built the Trinity Presbyterian Church, which he served as stated supply from 1858 to 1861. From 1861 to 1863, he was an agent for the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He then spent four years as agent for Lincoln University, and six years as agent for Howard University. For several years he was without a charge, but diligently engaged in various services for the Church. His life was given to useful work, and his quiet, modest, gentle ways won the respect and affection of many with whom he met. During a long illness he suffered greatly, but waited patiently and peacefully until his release came. He died December 27th, 1882, in his seventy-third year.

Worrall, John M., D. D., third son of Rev. Isaac and Jane (Houghland) Worrall, was born, May 25th, 1825, in Clark county, Indiana, near the city of Louisville, Ky., which city had been the home of his ancestors, and to which he was also removed in childhood. He was graduated at Anderson's Collegiate Institute, in June, 1848, taking the first honors of his class.

He studied theology at the New Albany Theological Seminary, now the Seminary of the Northwest, and was graduated in June, 1851. In May, of the same year, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Albany. In November following he was ordained and installed pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church of Oxford, Ohio, known at that time as the University Church.

In October, 1851, he was transferred to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Covington, Ky., where he labored for nearly twenty-three years, with tireless energy and marked success. In June, 1877, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Eighth Presbyterian Church of Chicago, where he remained for five years, removing thence in June, 1882, to the city of New York, to become the pastor of the Thirteenth Street Presbyterian Church, where he is now laboring.

Dr. Worrall's ministerial life of thirty-three years in one special aspect meets fully the apostolical injunction: "Always abounding in the work of the Lord." Few have equaled, probably none surpassed, him in the amount of work done outside his own field in the way of aiding his brethren during periods of special religious interest. At such times his services were always in urgent demand. In the palmy days of the old Synod of Kentucky a place among the foremost of her orators was freely conceded to him.

Dr. Worrall is a man of commanding presence, easily approached, looking always at the brighter side, and ever reflecting on others the radiance of his own sunny spirit. As a pastor, he wins the universal confidence and affection of his people, by his large sympathy, quick and delicate perception and judicious counsels. In the midst of pressing pastoral cares little time has been left him for purely literary work, but from time to time sermons, addresses and contributions to the religious press have appeared from his pen.

Worrell, Charles Flavel, D.D., son of Joseph and Elizabeth (Edwards) Worrell, was born in Chester county, Pa., June 30th, 1805. He was graduated from Lafayette College, Pa., 1836. From college he went immediately to Princeton Seminary, where he spent four years, and was regularly graduated, 1840. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Newton, October 2d, 1839. During his last year in the Seminary, 1839-40, he supplied, for much of the time, the churches of Knowlton and Blairstown, in Newton Presbytery, and in 1840-41, still residing in Princeton, he preached half his time at Titusville, N. J. He was ordained an evangelist by Newton Presbytery, December 16th, 1841. From July, 1841, he supplied, for half his time, the Second Upper Freehold (now Perrineville) Church, and from April 1st, 1843, for his whole time supplied the same church until March 9th, 1843, when he was installed pastor. Here he labored twenty-five years, until he was released, March 9th, 1868, after which he supplied the Plumsted Church, at New Egypt, N. J., for one year, 1868-69. His next and last charge was at Squan Village, N. J., where he was installed January 31st, 1872, and released October 6th, 1880. He then retired, in very infirm health, to his farm at Perrineville, N. J., where he died, January 27th 1881.

Dr. Worrell was a man of great activity and energy, a plain but Scriptural and impressive preacher, earnest and faithful as a pastor. He was an eminent proficient in music, and by his vocal powers added greatly to the interest of his services.

Worts, Rev. Conrad, probably licensed in Germany, was taken up as a probationer by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, September 3d, 1751, and installed pastor of the Church in Rockaway, N. J., June 5th, 1752. He was dismissed October 21st, 1761, and probably entered into the German Reformed Church.

Wotherspoon, Rev. Robert, a native of Scotland, was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Congregation at Apoquimimy, May 13th, 1711. He bought a farm in 1715, which still belongs to his descendants. He died in May, 1718.

Wray, Rev. John, was born in Donegal, Ireland, in the year 1800. He studied theology in Princeton, N. J., and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, July 18th, 1841. For nine years (1841-50) he was a missionary of our Board of Foreign Missions, at Allahabad, India, and, returning on account of ill-health, served the Church at Beechwoods, Pa., twenty-one years. In 1871, owing to blindness and the infirmities of age, he retired from active service. He died at Brockwayville, Pa., August 16th, 1883. Throughout his final illness he maintained his patient, trusting, cheerful spirit. He was highly esteemed by his brethren, and by the community in which he lived and labored, as a faithful and earnest minister of Jesus Christ. He is the man of whom a little heathen girl, when asked, "What is holiness?" said, "Holiness is living as Mr. Wray lives."

Wright, Benjamin Franklin, was born in Warrington, Pa., August 30th, 1808. He resided in Hartsville and Green county, Pa., till 1847, when he removed to Philadelphia. In 1855 the suburbs and rural districts of the county of Philadelphia were consolidated under one city government. The next year, 1856, he was elected to the Common Council. After being two years in this office, he resigned, and was appointed Building Inspector of the city, in which capacity he served three years, and subsequently being appointed by the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania, he served as Building Inspector eleven years more, at a period when Philadelphia was growing in size and population with rapidity unequalled in its history, and when the labors and responsibilities of the office were very arduous. During this period he was chosen again a member of the Common Council. He was in important positions in the city more than sixteen years, and was widely esteemed and respected. He was a consistent and useful member of the Presbyterian Church. Having lost several members of his family by death, the remains of all of whom were buried at Neshaminy, he took a deep interest in the erection of the chapel at the graveyard there, in 1871. Unexpectedly to all his friends, Mr. Wright's death occurred suddenly, in Philadelphia, March 6th, 1876, when he was in the sixty-eighth year of his age. After appropriate funeral services in the city, and in the cemetery chapel at Neshaminy, his body was interred there, among his kindred.

Wright, Edward W., D. D., the son of Rev. John Wright, was born in Lancaster, Ohio, April, 1817; was educated in Miami University; studied theology at Princeton and Allegheny, and was licensed and ordained as an evangelist by Logansport Presbytery in October, 1839. From 1840 he was pastor of the Church in Lafayette, Ind., for five and a half years. He then acted as agent, in the West, for the Presbyterian Board of Education, when he accepted a call from the church in Delphi, Ind. This relation continued for twenty years, his labors only ceasing with failure of strength to labor longer. In this field he had marked success, and was greatly beloved by his people. Being advised by his physician that removal from the malarious region where he had so long resided might restore his health, at least, in part, he accepted the librarianship of the Board of Colportage of Pittsburg and Allegheny Synods, and entered upon his new duties with great zeal, wisdom and success, but was called to his rest, September 17th, 1865.

Dr. Wright, as a minister, ever sought to magnify his office. He was vigilant to protect and advance every interest entrusted to his care. His mind was eminently wakeful; he was a true watchman; he loved his work, and felt his personal accountability to his God and Saviour. He possessed fine social qualities, and manifested his sympathy with every class in society. As a preacher, he was instructive, Scriptural and edifying. His sermons always afforded proof of patient and prayerful study, and they were delivered in a solemn and reverential manner. His life was one of usefulness, and his end was peace and resignation to the will of God.

Wright, Edwin S., D. D., was born in Bethany, Pa., March 31st, 1815. After completing his theological course at Andover Seminary, he engaged in teaching a year and a half, in Virginia. He was then settled as pastor of the Congregational Church in Aeworth, N. H. After a pastorate of ten years, he supplied for seven months the Second Presbyterian Church in Newark, N. J., during the absence of the regular pastor, Rev. J. Few Smith, D. D. Subsequently, he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Fredonia, N. Y., for fourteen years, and of the Presbyterian Church at Ripley, N. Y., for twelve years. He now resides at Amherst, Mass. Dr. Wright is an excellent preacher, and has been singularly happy in his pastoral relations. The churches under his care have been built upon solid foundations and in the spirit of unity and peace. By his counsels of prudence he has commanded influence and respect among his people and in ecclesiastical bodies.

Wright, John, was one of the first members of the Session of Rehoboth Church, in the Presbytery of Redstone, and a man of considerable prominence and influence. He first appears in the West as acting commissary to Colonel Forbes' Scotch Regiment in recapturing Fort Duquesne after Grant's defeat. He took an active part in public affairs, his name appearing on the minutes, an exceptional case, as John Wright, Esq. As much as any one else, he was influential in the establishment of Rehoboth Church. He lived to be ninety-four years old. His grandson, Williamson Wright, Esq., of Logansport, Ind., says: "My grandfather had at the Forks of Yough a blockhouse and stockade, and on a visit to see him, in 1826, I remember his placing his trembling hand on my head, turning my youthful eyes to his, and saying, 'My son, thank God you live in these days, when you can go to church without a rifle. There is where the old blockhouse stood which your father has told you of, and when our log church was not safe, we resorted to it with our rifles in hand, taken from those stacked inside our church door, to protect our women and children to get into the blockhouse.'"

Wright, Rev. John Eliot, was born in Lafayette, Indiana, December 17th, 1842, and was graduated by Jefferson College, in 1862. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Logansport, in 1864, and, returning to Princeton Theological Seminary, he completed the full course of study in 1865. Being ordained by the Presbytery of Allegheny, December 27th, 1866, and installed in the Second Presbyterian Church, Allegheny, as co-pastor with Rev. L. L. Conrad, he continued in this position till 1868, when he accepted a call to the Church of Greenville, Mercer county, Pa. From 1871 till 1878 he was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, and from 1878 till 1882 he was engaged in serving the Church of Madison, Wisconsin. After this he labored, for a short time, in the Jefferson Park Church, Chicago. Having removed to Philadelphia, he was installed pastor of the Market Square Church of Germantown, April 25th, 1883.

Mr. Wright is of cordial and inspiring address, with cultivated tastes and great quickness of observation and movement, an instructive and persuasive preacher, with habits of logical and accurate sermonizing; a watchful and diligent pastor, taking comprehensive oversight of all interests in his charge, and experiencing encouragement in constant accessions under the stated preaching of the Word.

Wright, Rev. William John, LL. D., was born in Weybridge, Vt., August 3d, 1831; graduated at Union College, N. Y., and studied theology at Union Seminary, New York, and at Princeton, N. J. He was ordained an Evangelist by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, June 20th, 1863. He was co-pastor at Ringoes, N. J., 1865-7; pastor at Pomeroy, Ohio, 1868-71; stated supply at Wellsburg, W. Va., 1875. He was Professor of Mathematics at Wilson College, Pa., 1876-7; evangelist at Cape May, N. J., and Burlington, Vt., 1880. He is at present pastor of the church at Morris Plains, N. J. Dr. Wright has published several works on mathematics, which display ability and have attracted considerable attention.

Wright, Rev. W. W., was born near Huntsville, Alabama, about the year 1822. He graduated at Lane Seminary in 1847, and entered upon his labors in North Alabama. He removed to Walnut Hills, Ohio, in 1848. He subsequently preached at Reading and Sharon, Ohio, and at Covington, Kentucky. He died in Covington, July 5th, 1862. He was a man of amiable disposition, genial, a good scholar, warm-hearted, earnest preacher, and a popular pastor.

Wyalusing Presbyterian Church, Pa. Wyalusing is eminently historic ground. For more than a century this place has been favored with the preaching of Christ's glorious gospel, and the fruits of that preaching are now being enjoyed by the fourth generation of those who, through much sacrifice, established here the sanctuary of the Most High.

Near this place, and within the bounds of this congregation, there was established a Christian Mission, in the latter half of the seventeenth century, by the Moravians or United Brethren, which, under God, was productive of good results, especially among the Indians of the region.

After the abandonment of the Indian Mission of Friedensheuten, the first public Christian worship held in this valley was in the house of Mrs. Lucretia Miner York, under the direction of an old man whose name was Baldwin, living near Browntown, in the latter part of the year 1785. This old man and his wife, with Mrs. York, were the only religious persons at that time in this neighborhood. These two families agreed to meet every Sabbath for religious worship, and invited their neighbors to join them. The old man read a psalm and offered prayer, and Mrs. York's son, Manassah Miner, read a selected sermon. The good effects of this service were soon apparent. Attendance upon the meetings became quite general, Sabbath profanation in a great measure ceased, and the good order and morals of the community greatly improved. Thus commenced in the wilderness the public worship of Jehovah, which has ever since been maintained in this valley.

Of Mrs. York, who was the nursing mother to this church, and whose descendants have ever since formed a large portion of its membership, it may not be amiss to say a few words. Lucretia, daughter of Manassah Miner, was born in Stonington, Ct., February, 1730. The family is said to have belonged to the Royal house of Prussia, were strict Protestants, and possessed of considerable wealth. In her eighteenth year she was married to Amos York. Mr. Miner, having given his daughter a considerable tract of land near the mouth of the Wyalusing creek, in 1773 Mr. York moved his family to Wyoming, and the following Spring moved up the river and settled upon his lands. The difficulties which culminated in the War of the Revolution soon commenced, and Mr. York was known to be an ardent Whig.

On the 12th and 13th days of February, 1777, snow fell to an unusual depth. On the next morning, the 14th, Mr. York, while at a neighboring settlement, was captured by a band of Indians, hurried from his family, and marched to Canada. The journey was one of incredible hardship and suffering. Mr. York was subsequently exchanged, and arrived at his native place, in Connecticut, where he died nine days before his family reached there.

The helpless family—a mother and eight children, her son seven years of age and her youngest child only three weeks old, were thus left, in the depth of winter, without protection, with but little clothing, bedding or provisions, the Indians having plundered them of most of their substance, in a land of strangers, and surrounded by enemies. They soon removed to the old Indian village, where several white families were then living, and the next Spring went down the river, to Wyoming. She was present at the terrible battle which was fought there, in which her son-in-law, Capt. Aboliah Buck, was killed, leaving her widowed daughter with an infant four months old. As soon as it was safe to do so, she set out with her son, eight daughters and her orphan grandchild, for her home in Connecticut. In the year 1785 she returned to Wyalusing, where she resided until her death, October 30th, 1818, in the eighty-eighth year of her age, respected and beloved by a large circle of relatives and acquaintances. She was a woman of remarkable energy, deep piety, and ardently attached to the doctrines of the Church, and ever manifested, even to her dying day, the warmest interest in its welfare.

In the years from 1786 to 1793 several pious families settled in the neighborhood. The Rev. Ira Condit visited them occasionally, as a missionary, and on the 30th day of June, 1793, organized the first Presbyterian church in the whole valley drained by the North Branch of the Susquehanna. The meeting was held in a log school-house which stood very near the place where this church now stands. The organization consisted of thirteen members, whose names are as follows: Uriah Terry, Lucretia York, Justus Gaylord, Jr. and Lucretia, his wife, Zachariah Price and Ruth, his wife, Mary Lewis, Abigail Wells, Sarah Rockwell, Anna Camp, James Lake, Thomas Oviatt, and Hannah Beckwith. Uriah Terry was at the same time ordained and installed Ruling Elder.

In 1795 the Rev. Daniel Thatcher visited the church, and the record shows that they contributed for him $1.06, an amount which, though small in itself, was large when we take into the account the means of its members, and the small amount of money in circulation among them. Isolated by many miles of dense forests from older settlements, with but few implements of agriculture, living in log houses in an uncleared country, none being able to cultivate but a few acres of land, and having but just enough provisions to subsist on, the only wonder is how they could have given so much. At this time the meetings were held in the old school-house where the church was organized, and though several of the members lived some miles distant, with only foot-paths through the woods to their dwellings, none having wagons and but few having horses, yet it was seldom that one was absent from the appointed place of worship.

On the 23d of September, 1809, the Rev. Manassah Miner York commenced his labors at Wyalusing, and was ordained in the October following by Rev. Messrs. Hoyt and Benedict. Mr. York was abundant in labors, and as the fruit of his toil many were added to the church.

Mr. York being an ardent admirer of Congregationalism, the church was induced to assume that form of church government. This change was made the more easily from the fact that most of the settlers here were from Connecticut, holding their land under Connecticut titles, were in frequent correspondence with their friends at home, and were by education familiar with Congregational usage. Then there were no Presbyterian churches near with which this could affiliate; also the Congregational churches of that day usually adhered strictly to the Westminster Standards. In fact, this church always maintained its adherence to those Standards firm unto the end.

Accordingly, on the 23d of September, 1809, the church assumed the Congregational form of government. At this meeting Mr. York was called to be pastor of the church and was ordained and settled the 27th of October following, and in 1811, the church having adopted the constitution of the Luzerne Association, became a part of that body. During the nine years which Mr. York remained with the church it continued to enjoy a large measure of prosperity, and every year witnessed additions to its membership. After Mr. York left, there was no stated preaching for several years. Rev. Salmon King and Ebenezer Kingsbury were occasionally present and administered the sacrament. In 1826 the church was visited by a committee of Presbytery, and initiatory steps were taken which ultimately resulted in the church becoming Presbyterian again. As the valley of the Wyalusing became more thickly settled, the meetings were most frequently held in the school-house at Merryall. As this became too strait for the increasing congregations which assembled there (for in those days they came from Stevensville, Wyalusing and Terrytown), the question of having a more suitable house of worship had been frequently discussed, and after a great deal of exertion a subscription sufficient to warrant the undertaking was raised, and Mr. Justus Lewis agreed to build the house, which was commenced in 1828 and dedicated nearly three years afterward. As showing something of the difficulty with which such an undertaking was carried on in those days, Mr. Lewis says that on that subscription he did not receive one dollar in money, but took grain, produce, lumber, or whatever the people could spare, to the amount which had been subscribed. In 1830 Rev. Simon R. Jones commenced preaching for the church and continued for nearly two years. He is said to have been a very kind-hearted man and a fluent preacher.

In 1831 (March 31st), the church having had under consideration for some time the subject of changing its ecclesiastical connection, unanimously passed the following resolution:—

Resolved, That we unitedly agree to become a Presbyterian church."

This resolution was signed by twenty-six persons—just double the original number with which the church was first organized, although nearly one hundred had been added to the church on profession and several by letter. Of these some had died, two or three had been excommunicated, some had moved out of the county, and others had been dismissed to form adjacent churches. On the 7th of April the church called Mr. George Printz to the pastorate, and on the 2d of June following, the Presbytery of Susquehanna met with the church. This is the first meeting of Presbytery at Wyalusing of which there is any record. At this meeting Aden Stevens, John Taylor, William Bradshaw, Hiram Stevens and Chester Wells were ordained ruling elders. Mr. Printz was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Wyalusing and Braintrim, serving the latter church one-fourth of the time, and the recently completed church edifice at Merryall was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God. Thus Presbyterianism was again established in this valley, and the church, entering its new house, under the stated services of its pastor enjoyed several years of uninterrupted prosperity and increased in numbers and influence. The Session of the church at once commenced making regular contributions to the benevolent operations of the Church, which have been continued to the present.

On the 8th of December, 1833, the congregation invited the Rev. S. F. Colt to become their pastor, which invitation he accepted and commenced his labors with the church the beginning of the next year. In the early part of Mr. Colt's pastorate, considerable religious interest was manifested in the congregation, and at the communion, April 7th, 1844, eighteen persons were added to the church. During this year the parsonage for the church was commenced at Merryall, and after much exertion, was completed, at an expense of $850. Mr. Colt served the church acceptably for about ten years, when, at the request of Presbytery, he resigned the pastorate to take charge of the Susquehanna Collegiate Institute, an Institution under the care of the Presbytery, and which was erected mainly through Mr. Colt's efforts. At this time the members of the church were scattered over a large extent of territory, and it was Mr. Colt's policy to gather them together in their several neighborhoods for religious worship, preparatory for separate church organizations. In this way were laid the foundations of the churches of Herriek, Stevensville, Meshoppen, Rush and Wyalusing Second, which were organized about the time or soon after Mr. Colt left Wyalusing.

On the 12th of January, 1851, a committee of Presbytery, raised in answer to a petition of several members of the old church and some others, met in the school-house near by this spot and organized the Second Presbyterian Church of Wyalusing. Thus this town became the birth-place of two Presbyterian churches, which have exercised a marked influence on the religious interests of the people of this valley. The Second Church was constituted with the following named persons: John R. Welles, Mary A. Welles, Ellen J. Welles, William H. Welles, Deborah A. Stafford, A. F. Eastman, H. S. Clark, Henry Gaylord, Martha Gaylord, Lorinda H. Gaylord, Gustavus A. Gaylord, Urania Stafford, Joel Stafford, Nathan Stafford, Lydia Stafford, Mary E. Ingham, Deborah E. Ingham, Moses Eibenberger and Elizabeth his wife, James Gamble and his wife Isabel, William Gamble and his wife Irene, and Elizabeth Gamble, N. X. Gamble, Abigail T. Gamble, and Deborah B. Gamble, in all twenty-seven persons. John R. Welles, Henry Gaylord and William Gamble were ordained elders, and Rev. John White was the stated supply of the church until the Spring of 1857. During Mr. White's stay here nine persons were added to the church, most of them by letter from other churches. The erection of this building was commenced before the church was organized, and was dedicated to the worship of Almighty God the next year.

In January, 1858, the Rev. Thomas S. Ewing was installed pastor of the church, and continued in this relation until August 31st, 1861. On the first Sabbath in September of the same year the present pastor, Rev. David Craft, began preaching in the church on Sabbath morning, and at Fairbanks, Terrytown and Sugar Run on alternate Sabbath afternoons. On October 11th, 1863, the members residing on the other side of the river, eleven in number, were dismissed to form the Church of Terrytown, which was organized by a committee of Presbytery on the 15th of the same month. On the 16th of January, 1866, the congregation, in connection with the Church of Terrytown, called their stated supply to become their pastor, and he was installed by a committee of Presbytery over this church, the 28th of February following, and the next evening installed pastor of the Terrytown Church. The Terrytown Church requiring his services every Sabbath afternoon compelled the abandonment of the station at Fairbanks. The churches of Wyalusing and Terrytown shared in the revival with which the churches of the Presbytery were visited in the Winter of 1866. And in the Winter of 1869 that community enjoyed another season of deep religious interest.

Wyche, Rev. Robert P., was the son of slave parents, Norwick Wyche and Lucinda (Bridgers) Wyche. He was born in Granville county, N. C., July 13th, 1850. For five years he worked on a farm, but at the age of fifteen he learned his father's trade, that of a carpenter, and for four years he pursued this employment. Having learned to spell and read at a night-school, he became anxious for a liberal education, but knew not how this was to be obtained. Finally, in 1870, when he was twenty years old, the way was opened for him to follow out the desire of his heart, and he entered Biddle Institute, Charlotte, N. C. Here his upright character and industry soon won for him the esteem and confidence of his teachers, and when his scanty means gave out they procured for him a scholarship. Mrs. A. C. Brown, of New York city, was the kind donor of this scholarship, which was continued through his entire normal and collegiate course. He aided himself by teaching during his vacations.

In 1877 he was graduated from Biddle University, and in the Autumn of the same year was taken under the care of the Catawba Presbytery, as a candidate for the ministry. After two years spent in studying theology at Biddle, his health having become somewhat impaired, he was advised to lay aside these studies for a time, and accordingly accepted a position as teacher in the Mt. Tabor graded school, Columbus, Tenn. At the end of the year the Presbytery called him to supply the Charlotte Church, and he was licensed to preach the gospel. He pursued his theological course while supplying the church as a licentiate. He was graduated from the Theological Department of Biddle University in 1881, and was ordained in the Autumn of the same year as an evangelist. In this work he is still engaged.

A man of sterling worth, characterized by modesty and good judgment, faithfulness to duty and earnestness of purpose, he is doing an excellent work for his race by helping on, both by precept and example, their moral improvement and elevation.

Wylie, Rev. A. McElroy, was born in Bloomington, Ind., December 12th, 1833, and was graduated at the State University, of which his father was then President, in the class of 1852, after which he taught the classics privately for three years in Philadelphia. He is a brother of Judge Wylie, of Washington, D.C., and the son of the late Rev. Dr. Andrew Wylie, who became President of Washington College, Pa., in 1812, subsequently was President of Jefferson College, of the same State, and died at the head of the Indiana State University. From his father he has that sterling Scotch-Irish blood which is so famous for manliness, truthfulness, grit and tenacity. Mr. Wylie pursued his theological studies at the Episcopal Seminary of Virginia, where his devotion to study, and his ability as a thinker and writer placed him in the first rank of the institution. After a service of twelve years in the Episcopal ministry, he entered the Presbyterian Church, to which his forefathers had belonged, at the time of the reunion of the old and new school branches in 1870. For a year he devoted himself to writing for the press, and in this work displayed remarkable versatility of talent as well as vast general information, and achieved marked success. Preferring pastoral work, he accepted the charge of the Presbyterian Church at Nyack, N. Y., succeeding the Rev. Dr. Francis L. Patton. Some time since he resigned this charge, and became pastor of the church in Newtown, Bucks county, Pa., which relation still continues. Mr. Wylie's strong points are intense love of truth, originality of thought, keen, independent research, and a disposition to get at the foundation of things. His style is clear and simple, and yet picturesque. He defines, expounds and elucidates truth, and teaches rather than arouses, and thrills by eloquence and oratory. Firmness of will, singleness of purpose, disinterested, unselfish, laborious and energetic devotion to study and work have ever characterized him.

Wylie, Rev. John, the son of Rev. James and Susan McF. Wylie, was born in Stillwater, N. Y., October 2d, 1842. He graduated, with honor, in 1861, at New Jersey College, and studied theology at Princeton. In the vacation of his second year at the Seminary, he was employed by the Mission Board of the Canadian Presbyterian Church, at Silver Hill, Canada West, and his sojourn and labors there were signally blessed to the people of his care. He was licensed by New Brunswick Presbytery, and ordained by it, at the same time with his brothers, Richard and James S., April 23d, 1861. For a year he was stated supply of the Witherspoon Presbyterian Church, Princeton, N. J., an organization of colored people. He then settled at Eugene city, Oregon, as pastor of the church in that place, where he was eminently successful. His missionary spirit led him to forego very tempting offers in the Eastern States and in California, and carried him far away to the frontier, where, after nobly contending for the faith, while he was able, literally being spent in the service of the Lord, he laid his armor aside and entered into rest, January 27th, 1866. His grateful people have erected over his grave a suitable monument.

Wylie, William, D.D., was born in Washington county, Pa., July 10th, 1776. He attended the school taught by Rev. T. Dod, in Washington, Pa., and continued after the school was removed to Canonsburg, Pa., where, under the control of Mr. David Johnston, he pursued his classical studies successfully. Emigrating to Kentucky, he studied theology there, supporting himself by teaching, and was in due time licensed by West Lexington Presbytery. March 5th, 1802, he was installed pastor of Upper and Lower Sandy and Fairfield churches, at that time in the Presbytery of Ohio. February 6th, 1805, he joined the Presbytery of Redstone, and was shortly after installed pastor of Rehoboth and Round Hill churches, remaining in this connection until 1810, when he removed to Uniontown, Pa. During his residence here he preached in the court-house and in the orchards and groves in the vicinity, and thus worked faithfully and zealously until, when he left, there were the elements out of which there was shortly gathered a vigorous and growing church, with a house of worship and a strong Presbyterian influence pervading the whole community. In 1823 he removed to Wheeling, Va., and labored as stated supply for the Wheeling and West Liberty churches until 1832.

Dr. Wylie's tall stature, his peculiarly solemn and expressive features and tones of voice, mingled with great personal dignity, gave him unwonted power as a preacher. As a pastor, he was kind and sympathizing. He died in Wheeling, Va., on Sabbath morning, the 9th of May, 1853, aged eighty-two years. He had continued actively engaged in the ministry until he had passed his eightieth year, when he sustained serious injury from a fall, by which he was ever after deprived of the use of his limbs; yet he so much loved the preaching of the everlasting gospel that he was, at his own request, at various times carried to the house of God, and addressed profoundly interested and admiring congregations from his arm chair, with an ability and unction not much below his former years. During his protracted and lingering season of confinement and suffering his spiritual enjoyments were of a high order, and could not fail to commend the gospel to all who visited him. The last period of his ministry, including some twenty or more years, was spent in pastoral connection with the First Presbyterian Church of Newark, Ohio, and thither his body was removed, to repose among those whom he had long loved and faithfully served in the gospel.

Wynkoop, Rev. Stephen Rose, son of David and Ann (McNair) Wynkoop, was born at Northampton, Bucks county, Pa., November 24th, 1806. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., with honor, in the class of 1829. After leaving college he was engaged in teaching, first in Albany, N. Y., and afterward in Stenbenville, Ohio. In 1833 he was invited by the Prudential Committee of the American Board to proceed to the west coast of Africa, with his friend and classmate, Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, for purposes of missionary exploration. They sailed from Baltimore, November 28th, 1833, and returned to New York, April 13th, 1834, having made careful examination of the coast from Monrovia to Cape Palmas. Their report was adopted by the Board, and Mr. Wilson returned to Africa. Mr. Wynkoop, however, remained at home to prosecute his theological studies, and, his health being considerably impaired by fever contracted in Africa, all further idea of the mission was given up.

After supplying for some months the pulpit of the Tabernacle Church in Philadelphia, he received an invitation to preach in the First Church of Wilmington, Del. After his ordination, August 7th, 1838, he began his ministry in Wilmington; was installed pastor, June 22d, 1839, and labored there for nearly twenty years, with unwearied diligence, fidelity and marked success. This relation, on account of impaired health, was, to the deep regret of his congregation, dissolved April 13th, 1858. For three years thereafter he lived in New Haven. The years 1862-68 were largely spent in travel at home and abroad, accompanied by his wife. In 1869 they removed their residence to Princeton, N. J. In 1870-72, they made an extensive tour around the world, visiting the missions in Japan and China, spending more than a year with their missionary son in Northern India, and returning home by way of Egypt and the Holy Land.

It was a great sorrow to Mr. Wynkoop to be laid aside from the more active duties of the ministry. He did good, however, in every opportunity that offered, by voice and pen. He was a man of wide sympathies, genial and kindly in manner, peculiarly attractive to children, yet grave withal; a wise counsellor, a trusted friend, and greatly loved by those who knew him. He died, June 8th, 1876, bearing full testimony, to the last, of his perfect trust in the God and Saviour he had served so long.

Wynkoop, Rev. Theodore S., was the oldest child of the Rev. Stephen K. and Aurelia (Mills) Wynkoop, and was born in Wilmington, Delaware, November 22d, 1839. He was received into the full communion of the church when fourteen years of age; entered Yale College in 1857, and graduated in 1861, when he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1864. In October, 1864, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church (O. S.) of Huntington L. I., then just organized. During his four years' pastorate, the church built a house of worship, and grew rapidly, experiencing a fruitful revival of religion. In the Theological Seminary Mr. Wynkoop had become greatly interested in foreign missions, especially in connection with the weekly missionary prayer-meeting, which all then connected with the Seminary will remember; this interest was strengthened by subsequent correspondence with various missionary friends; and when, in 1868, the Furrukhabad Mission of North India formally called him to that field, he resigned his pastorate and went to India, being appointed to Allahabad, where he remained so long as he continued to labor in India. Besides the ordinary duties of the foreign missionary, Mr. Wynkoop took part in starting the Indian Evangelical Review, which has maintained itself with success, to the present time, as the common organ of all Protestant missionaries in India. He also did excellent service for several years as Secretary of the North India Tract Society, in promoting the formation of a Hindi and Urdu Christian literature. In 1872 he was actively instrumental in planning and beginning the Theological Training School of the Synod of India, in which he labored, with great diligence, until 1876, when having but just returned from a six months' furlough in America, he was reluctantly compelled, by the death of his father, to give up his missionary work for an indefinite time. In 1878 he was called to the Western Presbyterian Church of Washington D. C., where he has been laboring till the present time, with acceptance and success.

Yantis, John Lapsley, D. D., was born of John and Priscilla Yantis, on the 14th of September, 1801, in Lancaster, Garrard county, Ky. His father was prominent in the legislative assemblies, both in Kentucky and Missouri. The early education of Dr. Yantis, though not thoroughly collegiate, was in some respects better, under the careful training of Rev. Samuel Finley. He was licensed by Transylvania Presbytery in April, 1829, and was ordained to the full work of the ministry in 1830. His first charge was Stanford and Lancaster, Ky. In 1833 he moved to Saline county, Mo., as the pioneer minister of the Presbyterian Church. Private and school-houses were his first church buildings. Liberty, Richmond, Dover, Columbia, Fulton and Lexington were his successive fields. He established an important school at Sweet Springs, in 1849. In 1852 he removed to Oregon and sowed the seeds of Presbytorianism for three years. He was then called back to Missouri to take charge of Richmond College. In 1859 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Danville, Ky. He moved again to Missouri in 1861, and after preaching again to several different churches, he died very suddenly, on May 28th, 1882.

Dr. Yantis' character was striking and unique. With an originality that is seldom found, he threw out his great thoughts that riveted the attention of the learned and unlearned. He wrote some, read much and thought a great deal. His quickness and strength of perception enabled him to grasp and simplify the most difficult subjects. His manner of delivery was straightforward, bold, earnest and impressive. His frankness and honesty made him respected and honored by all good people. He abhorred all "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain." He had no patience with deceit or vanity. He was as gentle as a lamb, with the boldness and strength of a lion. While he left no volume of writings, his work as an evangelist and minister has made a lasting impression upon thousands, and he was not only a pioneer, but one of the fathers, of Presbyterianism in Western Missouri.

Yates, Rev. William Black, son of Joseph and Elizabeth Ann (Saylor) Yates, was born in Charleston, S. C., February 19th, 1809. He united, on profession of his faith, with the Scotch Presbyterian Church of Charleston, S. C., in 1829; spent a year in the Union Theological Seminary, Prince Edward, Virginia; entered Princeton Seminary in 1830, and remained there nearly one year; completed his theological course in the Columbia, S. C., Seminary, and was graduated thence with its first class; was licensed by the Charleston Union Presbytery, April 3d, 1833; was stated supply of the First Church in Charleston, S. C., during the absence of the pastor in Europe, in 1833; was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, December 8th, 1835, having been engaged for some months previous in labor among the seamen, to which his entire life was thenceforward devoted, as chaplain and pastor of the Seamen's Bethel in Charleston. For this work he had special qualification. His frank, fearless, straightforward character gave him instant power over the sailors, and nobly did he use it, never failing to embrace an opportunity for their moral and religious welfare. The Seamen's Bethel was made prosperous and flourishing, and the name of "Parson Yates," as he was familiarly and affectionately called, was widely known and honored. His congregation often included some who would enter no other sanctuary. The rough sailor hushed the words of profanity in his presence, and blaspheming lips learned to pray. For forty-six years he gave himself, with unwearied diligence, to this work, until the weight of years and the pressure of disease compelled him to transfer it to other and younger hands. He died, July 19th, 1882.

Yeisley, Rev. George C., son of Jacob and Elizabeth S. Yeisley, was born in Baltimore, Md., January 21st, 1849. He graduated from the Baltimore City College in 1865. Entering the Sophomore class in the College of New Jersey he graduated, with honor, in the year 1870. He pursued his theological studies in the Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, North, March 26th, 1873. Upon leaving the Seminary he took charge of the Presbyterian Church of Rogersville, Tenn., for six months. Receiving an invitation to become the assistant of the Rev. John C. Backus, D. D., of Baltimore, he accepted the position and discharged its duties, with great acceptance, for two years. In November, 1875, he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Hudson, N. Y., and was installed by the Presbytery of Columbia, December 30th, 1875.

Mr. Yeisley's endowments fit him in a special manner for the work of the ministry. His ability as a writer and speaker was marked in his early youth, and in college he ranked as one of the first orators of his class. These gifts he has diligently cultivated, making them instrumental, through the blessing of God, to the salvation of souls and the up-building of the Church. His sermons, clear and direct in style, are earnestly and impressively delivered. He is a faithful pastor, winning the love and confidence of his people by his sincere and constant interest in their welfare. His administrative ability is evinced in the temporal prosperity of the Church at Hudson. During his pastorate debts of long standing have been removed, and the church property has been extensively repaired and beautified. His brethren in the ministry have recognized his fidelity as a presbyter by electing him Moderator of Presbytery and Synod, and by confiding to him the chairmanship of several important committees. His present church is Mr. Yeisley's first pastoral charge, and after a ministry, at this date, of more than eight years, he remains in Hudson, to the satisfaction of his people, and his increasing usefulness in the community.

Yeomans, Edward Dorr, D. D., son of the Rev. John W. Yeomans, D. D., was born at North Adams, Mass., September 27th, 1829. In 1842 he finished the Junior year at Lafayette College, of which his father was then President, before he had reached the fifteenth year of his age. His father then moved to Philadelphia and endeavored to enter him for the Senior year at the University of Pennsylvania, but the rules of the Institution forbidding the graduation of one so young, he pursued his studies at home, under his father's direction. Subsequently he received the honorary degree of Master of Arts from Princeton College. After studying theology under his father's direction, at Danville, and then for a year at Princeton Seminary, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Northumberland, April 21st, 1847, at the early age of seventeen and a half years. After his licensure, he was stated supply at New Columbia, Pa., 1847-9; Principal of the Academy at Danville, Pa., 1847-50; pastor at Warrior Run, Pa., 1854-8; pastor of Fourth Church, Trenton, N. J., 1859-63; pastor of St. Peter's Church, Rochester, N. Y., 1863-7, and pastor of the Central Church, Orange, N. J., where he died, August 25th, 1868.

Dr. Yeomans was an excellent preacher and a faithful pastor. His literary labors, outside of his regular ministerial labor, were mainly in the line of German translation. He rendered into English "Schaff's Apostolic Church" and "Schaff's Lectures on America." He had superior ability in this department of literary labor. His mental faculties were naturally of a high order, and they had been carefully and unremittingly cultivated. His piety was deep and all-controlling, and of the most cheerful type. He was a man of the strictest integrity. He was remarkably genial, and was possessed of the rare faculty of adapting himself to every class of society and of winning the respect and affection of all.

Yeomans, John William, D. D., was born in Hinsdale, Mass., January 7th, 1800. He graduated at Williams College in 1824, with the second honor in his class. He was for the succeeding two years Tutor in the College, after which he pursued a regular course of theological study in the Seminary at Andover, Mass. In 1828 he was installed pastor of the Church at North Adams, Mass. In 1832 he became pastor of the First Congregational Church, Pittsfield, Mass. In 1831 he was called to the First Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J. In 1841 he accepted the Presidency of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., and in 1845 he became pastor of the Mahoning Church, Danville, Pa., in which relation he continued until his death, June 23d, 1863.

Dr. Yeomans was a man of strong and original mind. His industry was remarkable. As a preacher, he was instructive, impressive and often highly eloquent. His powers of observation and retentive memory had richly furnished his mind, and made his conversation valuable. He was tender-hearted and devoted in his attachments. Above all, he was a man of faith and prayer, of deep, intelligent and Scriptural piety. And his religion, both in thought and practice, both personal and pastoral, was moulded throughout by an earnest faith in the historical covenant of grace, as contained in the Scriptures. Upon the doctrine of this covenant he loved to study, to preach and to speak. And as a distinct fruit of his faith and practice in it, he saw all his children continue steadfast in the way of the Christian life, and two of his sons ministers of the gospel. Dr. Yeomans was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1860.

Yerkes, Stephen, D. D., was born June 27th, 1817, in Bucks county, Pa. He graduated at Yale College, in the distinguished class of 1837, as one of its foremost scholars. Studied theology privately under the care of the Presbytery of Baltimore and under the direction of the late Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge, while engaged in teaching in the city and county of Baltimore. Was licensed October 8th, 1840. Ordained and installed pastor of what is now Chestnut Grove Church, Baltimore county, in 1843; and of Bethel Church, Harford county, in 1848. While engaged almost constantly in preaching, either as pastor or stated supply of various churches in Maryland and Kentucky, his great life work has been that of instruction. He was Principal of the Classical Department of Presbyterian High School of Baltimore from 1839 to 1843; and conducted a boarding school for boys in Baltimore county, 1843 to 1852. He was then elected Professor of Ancient Languages in Transylvania University at Lexington, Ky., where he remained until 1857. During all this time he acted as pastor of Bethel Church, seven miles from Lexington, and was greatly beloved by the people of his charge, and they by him. In May, 1857, he was elected by the General Assembly, which met in Lexington that year, Professor of Oriental and Biblical Literature in Danville Theological Seminary at Danville, Ky. His Professorship was changed, in 1869, to that of Biblical Literature and Exegetical Theology, in which he has remained ever since, although during this time, under two temporary suspensions of the work of the Seminary, he occupied for one year the chair of Greek, and for another year that of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Centre College at Danville.

As an instructor in all these various departments, Dr. Yerkes has been eminently successful, and is well known as a thorough teacher. As a preacher, he is always heard with pleasure and profit, by those who love the gospel in its purity and simplicity. His modes of thought are characterized by great exactness and logical clearness, while his manner is that of one thoroughly in earnest and full of his subject, without any effort at mere oratorical effect. Out of the pulpit his manner combines a serious dignity with sincere cordiality, winning for him many warmly attached friends wherever he is known.

Young, Rev. George Drummond, son of William and Sarah Drummond Young, was born at Wilmington, Del., July 9th, 1804; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1831, and at Princeton Seminary in 1837. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Wilmington, April 11th, 1837, and was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, October 21st, 1837. For some time after his ordination he preached at Perryville and Charlestown, Md. He then set his face westward, and preached, as stated supply, at Hartford, Ohio, from September, 1839, until 1847; was installed pastor of the Church at Ellsworth, Ohio, by the Presbytery of Trumbull, June 1st, 1847, and was released from that charge June 10th, 1849; then at Southington, Ohio, from July 1st, 1849, to June, 1851; then at Augusta, Ill., from June 3d, 1851, to 1858; and lastly, at Camanche, Iowa, from May 1st, 1858, to 1872. After the latter date he resided at Lyons, Iowa, in ill health. In all the years of his active ministry he was a faithful, earnest and successful preacher of the gospel. He died January 16th, 1880. He was an Israelite indeed, in whom was no guile.

Young, John Clarke, D.D., was born in Greencastle, Pa. His father was an excellent elder in the Presbyterian Church of that place. He was educated at Dickinson College, under the celebrated Dr. John Mason. His theological course was pursued at Princeton. In the third year he was chosen Tutor in the college. After finishing his studies, and being licensed, he was first called to the Church in Lexington, Ky. His preaching there made a profound impression, and his ministry was successful in a high degree. After a few years, Dr. Young was called to the Presidency of Danville College, where his life-work was afterward spent. He was popular with the students, and greatly revered by the friends of the college. His ministry was greatly blessed to the awakening and conversion of the students. He organized a second church in Danville, to which he stately ministered for many years, and where the students attended. He took an active part in the discussions on slavery and emancipation in Kentucky, and was the author of a report on the subject in the Synod.

Dr. Young was Moderator of the Assembly which met in Philadelphia in 1853, and presided over the deliberations of that body with great ability and universal acceptableness. The latter years of his life were marked by disease, which terminated his usefulness in 1857. Dr. Young was an able and sound divine, a faithful and successful teacher, of a logical mind and warm heart. His loss to the Church and the cause of learning was deeply deplored, and his memory is fondly cherished by all who knew and loved him.

Young, Loyal, D.D., was born in Charlemont, Mass., July 1st, 1806. After studying privately, with Rev. Asa Brooks, of Virginia, and Rev. A. G. Fairchild, D.D., of Pennsylvania, he entered Jefferson College, and graduated in 1828. He graduated at the Western Theological Seminary in 1832; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio, June 21st, 1832; was ordained by the Presbytery of Allegheny (now Butler), December 4th, 1833, and at the same time installed pastor of the Church of Butler, Pa. This pastoral relation he sustained, acceptably and usefully, for nearly thirty-five years.

In 1868 Dr. Young was installed, November 10th, over the church of Buckhannon, and November 11th, over the Church of French Creek, by the Presbytery of West Virginia. He continued in the former of these about two years, and in the latter more than seven years, when he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Parkersburg, W. Va. Here he labored five years. Since retiring from that field, he has labored as a missionary at Winfield, Point Pleasant and Pleasant Flats, in Putnam and Mason counties, W. Va. Dr. Young is a man of decided ability, and has been very useful in his long ministry. He is the author of a Commentary on Ecclesiastes, and of three or four minor works. He was the Principal of the Witherspoon Institute, in Butler, Pa., and of the French Creek Institute, in French Creek, W. Va. He was for some years a Director in the Western Theological Seminary. He was honored by the Synod of Pittsburg in being twice elected as their Moderator, and by the Synod of Allegheny in being once elected theirs. He has also been honored by his Presbyteries in being sent by them seven times as their delegate to the General Assembly.

Young, Robert, Esq., ruling elder, was the eldest son of Henry and Anne Young, and was born in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., January 3d, 1769. He emigrated to Western Virginia, in the Fall of 1811. He was a prominent actor in the organization of the Presbyterian Church of French Creek, and, with Aaron Gould, its first ruling elder. He was a Justice of the Peace, for many years, of Lewis and afterward of Upshur county. He visited, two or three times, all the families of Lewis county, Va., while assessing the property, and, in behalf of the American Bible Society, supplied with the Bible all that were destitute. All his children arriving at maturity, eight in number, united with the Church of French Creek. One of his sons, Rev. Loyal Young,

D. D., and two of his grandsons, are Presbyterian ministers; three of his sons and six of his grandsons became ruling elders; and four of his posterity became ministers of other evangelical churches. His influence for good was great.

Young, Rev. Samuel Hall, is the sixth son of Rev. Loyal Young, D. D., and Mrs. Margaret P. Young (Johnston). He was born at Butler, Pa., September 12th, 1847. Having acquired a good classical education at the Witherspoon Institute, of Butler, he went to Michigan with the view of studying law under his brother, Watson J. Young, Esq., of Benzonia, in that State. At a revival in that place in the Winter of 1867-8, he was one of the converts, and immediately dedicated himself to the gospel ministry. After further study and teaching, he entered the Junior class of the University of Wooster, Ohio, where he was graduated, June 30th, 1875. He studied theology one year at Princeton and two years at Allegheny. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of West Virginia, and was ordained by the same Presbytery, May 5th, 1878, as an evangelist to Alaska. In the June following he went to Fort Wrangle as a Home Missionary, where he organized the first Presbyterian Church in Alaska. Great success has crowned his labors there among the Stickeen Indians, he having been preceded there by Mrs. J. R. McFarland, whose pioneer work as a teacher cannot be too highly estimated. Rev. S. Hall Young married Miss Fannie E. Kellogg, who also preceded him as a teacher to Sitka, Alaska, and who has organized an Industrial School for Indian boys at Fort Wrangle.

Young, William C., D. D., was born April 23d, 1842, in Danville, Ky. His parents were the Rev. Dr. John C. and Cornelia Crittenden Young. He took both his collegiate and theological course of education at Danville, the former at Centre College, of which his father was then President, the latter at Danville Seminary. He graduated from college in the Class of '59, and spent the following year in teaching in the Classical High School in Holly Springs, Miss. After two years spent in general reading and traveling, he entered the Seminary in 1862, and before graduation, in 1866, accepted a call to the Second Presbyterian Church, Covington, Ky., where he remained till 1870, spending seven months of that year in Europe and Palestine. He moved to Madison, Ind., in the Fall of 1870, where he spent nearly two years as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church. In 1872 he accepted a call to Fullerton Avenue Church, Chicago, Ill., where he remained until the Spring of 1878, when he returned to his native State, and has since resided, having accepted a call to the Central Presbyterian Church, of Louisville, Ky. Dr. Young has been greatly blessed in his labors in all the fields he has been called to occupy. He justly stands high as a preacher, being able, earnest, instructive and impressive. As a pastor, his course is marked with fidelity, and as a presbyter he is true to duty, and wields a strong influence.

Youngs, Rev. David, a grandson of the Rev. John Youngs, the first minister of Southold, Long Island, was born in that town in 1719, and graduated at Yale in 1741. Dr. Hopkins, of Newport, speaks very favorably of his fervency of spirit and of his successful endeavors for the unconverted. He was ordained by New Brunswick Presbytery, October 12th, 1743; in 1746 joined New York Presbytery, and became a member of Suffolk Presbytery in May, 1749. He died, before May, 1752.

Zahnizer, Rev. George Wright, was born in Mercer, Pa., March 19th, 1823. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1846, and was, for a time, Tutor in the college. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Erie, April 10th, 1851. He was ordained by the same Presbytery, September 7th, 1853, and installed as pastor of the congregation of Conneantville, Crawford county, Pa. He was released from this charge on the 13th of April, 1859, and dismissed to the Presbytery of Huntingdon, when he became pastor of the church in that place, in which relation he continued until 1875. He has been stated supply of the Second Church of Mercer, Pa., since 1875. Mr. Zahnizer is an able and faithful preacher, and has been largely blessed in his ministry.

Zeal. An earnest temper which may spring from either commendable or imperfect and evil motives. It is often ascribed to God (2 Kings xix, 31; Isa. ix, 7; xxxvii, 32; Ezek. v, 13). And men are sometimes commended for the zeal they show, when it is an enlightened zeal, and evinces itself in exertions for God's glory (Numb. xxv, 11-13; 2 Cor. vii, 11; ix, 2). But sometimes zeal for God is assumed as a cloak for selfishness, as in the case of Jehu, who desired to gain the crown of Israel, but "took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord" (2 Kings x, 16, 31). Ignorant or misdirected zeal may incline men to persecute the Church and true servants of Christ (Rom. x, 2; Phil. iii, 6). Zeal, to be a Christian grace, must be grounded on right principles, directed to a right end, and must not be a transient emotion (Gal. iv, 18).

Zenos, Rev. Andreas C., was born at Constantinople, Turkey, August 13th, 1855. He graduated at Robert College, Constantinople, in 1872. He was teacher for a time in the University of Athens, Greece. He studied theology in the Seminary at Princeton, N. J., and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, March 31st, 1880. He was stated supply at Elmer, N. J., in 1880; ordained by the Presbytery of Lackawanna, September 29th, 1881, and since that time has been pastor of Harmony Church, Brandt, Pa., where he is acceptable and successful in his labors.

Zion, Ploughed as a Field. The prophet Micah predicted: "Therefore, shall Zion, for your sake, be ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest" (iii, 12). How literally and strikingly this prophecy was fulfilled!

Now, as soon as the Roman army had no more people to slay or to plunder, because there remained none to be the objects of their fury, Caesar gave orders that they should now demolish the entire city and temple. . . . It was so thoroughly laid even with the ground by those that dug it up to the foundation, that there was left nothing to make those that came thither believe it had ever been inhabited.—Josephus, Jewish War (Lib. vii, c. 1, § 1).

After the final destruction of the temple by the arms of Titus and Hadrian, a ploughshare was drawn over the consecrated ground as a sign of perpetual interdiction.—Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. 23.

At the time when I visited this sacred spot (Mount Zion) one part of it supported a crop of barley, another was undergoing the labor of the plough.—Richardson, Travels.

Zion (German) Presbyterian Church was organized at Fosterburg, Madison county, Ill., October 12th, 1857, by Revs. J. G. Schaible and H. Blanke, with twenty members. Up to the Fall of 1877 the church was served by three ministers—H. Blanke, J. H. Reints and August Busch, who entered upon their work in 1857, 1869 and 1873, respectively.

The first elders were Fred Wortman and C. Breuken. Afterwards P. A. Scheldt, Earnest Wortman and C. F. Lobbig. In August, 1878, the church adopted the time service method, at the same time reducing the board to two, C. Breuken and P. H. Scheldt. This church has had a membership of one hundred and thirty-nine, in all, from the beginning. Its present membership is eighty-nine. A house of worship was built soon after the organization, which cost about five hundred dollars. A parsonage was erected at the same time, at a cost of about four hundred dollars. Additions have been made to the parsonage since, so that the present value of the church property, including house of worship, parsonage and grounds, is about $1500. Since the Fall of 1877, this church was without a pastor. During the Spring and Summer of 1878 it was served by a licentiate, Albert F. Beyer, then a student of Danville Seminary, whom the church elected their pastor, and who was ordained over them May 14th, 1879, by a committee of Alton Presbytery. The church building is situated in T. 6 N., R. 9 W., Sec. 11, N. E. quarter of S. W. quarter of the section.

Zively, Rev. John Henry, was born at Shelbyville, Tenn., October 29th, 1821. He studied theology at Lane Seminary, 1844-45; at Union Seminary, New York, 1845-47; and was ordained April, 1848. He was stated supply at Midway, Ky., 1847-49; pastor at Huntsville, Ala., 1849-51; stated supply at Austin, Tex., 1851-53; and Evangelist, Tex., 1853-.

SUPPLEMENT.

I LOVE Thy kingdom, Lord !
The house of Thine abode ;
The Church our blest Redeemer saved
With His own precious blood.

I love Thy Church, O God !
Her walls before Thee stand,
Dear as the apple of Thine eye,
And graven on Thy hand.

If e'er to bless Thy sons
My voice or hands deny,
These hands let useful skill forsake,
This voice in silence die.

For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend,
To her my cares and toils be given,
Till toils and cares shall end.

Beyond my highest joy
I prize her heavenly ways,
Her sweet communion, solemn vows,
Her hymns of love and praise.

Sure as Thy truth shall last,
To Zion shall be given
The brightest glories earth can yield,
And brighter bliss of heaven.

Abbey, Rev. Edward William, was born at Glenora, N. Y., March 12th, 1848. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1871, and at Lane Seminary in 1874. He was ordained by the Vincennes Presbytery, April 28th, 1875. He was pastor at Terre Haute, Ind., 1874-9; at Logansport, 1880, and took charge of the Church at Hamilton, Ohio, at the close of the year 1880. He is an instructive and impressive preacher, and his ministry has been attended with success.

Abbott, Rev. Pitson Joseph, was born at Cobleskill, N. Y., August 11th, 1833. He graduated at Union College in 1861, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Albany, October 17th, 1866; was stated supply at Sidney, N. Y., 1861-8; at Chazy, 1868-71; pastor at Jefferson, 1872-4; stated supply at Canonsville, 1874-5. He died at Centre Village, N. Y., May 11th, 1875.

Abernathey, Rev. John Jefferson, was born at Dunlapville, Ind., September 7th, 1836. He graduated at Miami University in 1860, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was Principal of White Water Academy, Md., 1863-4. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Louisville, August 8th, 1866; was stated supply at Pennsylvania Run, Ky., 1864-9; and Big Bend, 1867; teacher at Bell Grove and Edenwood, 1868-71; pastor-elect at Ridgewood, 1869-72. He died at Terre Haute, Ind., October 12th, 1873.

Abomination of Desolation. This phrase seems to be used (Dan. xi, 31) as a general designation for whatever denotes the triumph of idolatrous power over the sanctuary of God. Its more particular reference in the New Testament is to the Roman armies under Titus (Dan. ix, 27; xii, 11, compared with Matt. xxiv, 15). The images of their gods and emperors were delineated on the ensigns of the Romans; and the ensigns themselves, especially the eagles, which were carried at the heads of the legions, were objects of worship; and therefore, according to the style of Scripture, an abomination. The horror with which the Jews regarded them sufficiently appears from two facts mentioned by Josephus—Pilate's attempt to put his troops in winter quarters at Jerusalem, and Vitellius' proposing to march through Judea to attack Aretas, king of Petra. The people supplicated and remonstrated against both, on religious accounts, to such a degree that Pilate was obliged to remove his army and Vitellius to march his troops another way. Jerome informs us that the Jews themselves applied Dan. ix, 27, to the Romans.

The appearance of their idolatrous banners, therefore, at Jerusalem, was the prophetic sign that "the desolation thereof was nigh." The evangelists Matthew and Mark add to our Lord's prediction in a parenthesis, "Whoso readeth, let him understand;" hereby intimating that this event was approaching, though yet future, when their histories were published, and that the reader who consulted his own safety would do well to retire seasonably from the devoted city (Matt. xxiv, 15; Mark xiii, 14). In forty years from the time "the Messiah was cut off" by wicked hands (to use the sublime language of Bossuet), "the Roman eagle descended and Judea was no more!"

Abraham, Rev. Andrew, was born at Florida, N. Y., October 12th, 1818. He graduated at Union College in 1841, and at Union Theological Seminary, 1848. He was ordained October 13th, 1848; Foreign Missionary at Mapumulo, South Africa, 1849-74; spent 1874-5 in the United States, and resumed his missionary work at Mapumulo, in 1875.

Absolution signifies acquittal. It is taken also from that act whereby the priest declares the sins of such as are penitent remitted. The Romanists hold absolution a part of the sacrament of penance, and the Council of Trent, and that of Florence, declare the form or essence of the sacrament to lie in the words of absolution, "I absolve thee of thy sins." According to this, no one can receive absolution without the privacy, consent and declaration of the priest; except, therefore, the priest be willing, God himself cannot pardon any man. This is a doctrine as blasphemous as it is ridiculous. The chief passage on which they ground their power of absolution is that in John xx, 23: "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." But this is not to the purpose; since this was a special commission to the apostles themselves, and the first preachers of the gospel, and most probably referred to the power he gave them of discerning spirits. By virtue of this power, Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead, and Paul struck Elymas blind. But, supposing the passage in question to apply to the successors of the apostles, and to ministers in general, it can only import that their office is to preach pardon to the penitent, assuring those who believe that their sins are forgiven through the merits of Jesus Christ, and that those who remain in unbelief are in a state of condemnation. Any idea of authority given to fallible, uninspired men to absolve sinners, different from this, is unscriptural; nor can we see much utility in the terms ministerial, or declarative absolution, as adopted by some divines, since absolu-tion is wholly the prerogative of God; and the terms above mentioned may, to say the least, have no good influence on the minds of the ignorant and superstitious.

Acker, Rev. Henry Jacob, was born at Catskill, N. Y., November 24th, 1832. He graduated at Williams College in 1856, at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1859, and was ordained June 23d of that year. He was stated supply at Greenport, Long Island, N. Y., 1859-60; pastor at Amity, N. Y., 1860-63; in the employ of the American Tract Society, 1865-69; pastor at Pleasant Valley, N. Y., 1869-72; teacher and stated supply at Brainerd, N. Y., 1872-73. He died at Brainerd, January 3d, 1874. His funeral was at Pleasant Valley Church, in whose churchyard his body rests. Mr. Acker was an enthusiastic worker in the service of his Lord. He wrought with all his might, and with great simplicity of purpose. His death was peaceful and triumphant.

Adams, Rev. Frederick H., born in London, England, June 23d, 1823. Graduated at the University of New York, 1858, and at Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., 1861. Was ordained April 25th, 1865, and was stated supply at Constantia, N. Y., 1861-4; at Marquette (L. S.), Mich., 1865-6; at Salina, Mich., 1867-9; at Wilson, N. Y., 1870-5; and at New Hartford, Conn., 1875.

Adams, Rev. John Quincy, was born in Ogdon, Monroe county, N. Y., August 8th, 1819. His father, a farmer, was for many years an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and died in 1869. His mother is still living, to be a blessing in the home and church of her son. He graduated from Rochester University in 1874, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1877. He was stated supply and pastor elect of the Presbyterian Church, Mexico, N. Y., till November, 1878. He was ordained by Syracuse Presbytery in June, 1878, and was pastor of the Walnut Street Church, Evansville, Ind., from December, 1878, to October, 1881, when he was obliged to leave on account of ill health. He has been pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Boulder, Col., 1881. Mr. Adams is a good preacher, and has been faithful and successful in his ministry.

Adoption. An act by which one takes another into his family, owns him for his son and appoints him his heir. The Greeks and Romans had many regulations concerning adoption. It does not appear that adoption, properly so called, was formerly in use among the Jews. Moses makes no mention of it in his laws; and the case of Jacob's two grandsons (Gen. xlviii, 10) seems rather a substitution.

Adoption, in a theological sense, is that act of God's free grace by which, upon our being justified by faith in Christ, we are received into the family of God, and entitled to the inheritance of heaven. This appears not so much a distinct act of God, as involved in, and necessarily flowing from, our justification; so that at least the one always implies the other. Nor is there any good ground to suppose that in the New Testament the term adoption is used with any reference to the civil practice of adoption by the Greeks, Romans, or other heathens, and therefore, it is not judicious to illustrate the texts in which the word occurs by their formalities. The Apostles, in using the term, appear to have had before them the simple view, that our sins had deprived us of our sonship, the favor of God, and the right to the inheritance of eternal life; but that, upon our return to God, and reconciliation with Him, our forfeited privileges were not only restored, but greatly heightened, through the paternal kindness of God. They could scarcely be forgetful of the affecting parable of the prodigal son; and it is under the same view that St. Paul quotes from the Old Testament, "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

Adoption, then, is that act by which we who were alienated, and enemies, and disinherited, are made the sons of God and heirs of his eternal glory. "If children, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ;" where it is to be remarked, that it is not in our own right, nor in the right of any work done in us, or which we ourselves do, though it should be an evangelical work, that we become heirs; but jointly with Christ, and in His right.

To this state belong, freedom from a servile spirit, for we are not servants but sons; the special love and care of God our heavenly Father; a filial confidence in Him; free access to Him at all times and in all circumstances; a title to the heavenly inheritance; and the Spirit of adoption, or the witness of the Holy Spirit to our adoption, which is the foundation of all the comfort we can derive from those privileges, as it is the only means by which we can know that they are ours.

The last mentioned great privilege of adoption merits special attention. It consists in the inward witness or testimony of the Holy Spirit to the sonship of believers, from which flows a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our present acceptance with God, and the hope of our future and eternal glory. This is taught in several passages of Scripture:—

Rom. viii, 15, 16: "For ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God." In this passage it is to be remarked, 1. That the Holy Spirit takes away "fear," a servile dread of God as offended. 2. That the "Spirit of God" here mentioned is not the personified spirit or genius of the gospel, as some would have it, but "the Spirit itself," or Himself, and hence He is called in the Galatians, "the Spirit of his Son," which cannot mean the genius of the gospel. 3. That He inspires a filial confidence in God, as our Father, which is opposed to "the fear" produced by the "spirit of bondage." 4. That He excites this filial confidence, and enables us to call God our Father, by witnessing, bearing testimony with our spirit, "that we are the children of God."

Gal. iv, 4-6: "But when the fullness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons; and because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." Here also are to be noted, 1. The means of our redemption from under (the curse of) the law, the incarnation and sufferings of Christ. 2. That the adoption of sons follows upon our actual redemption from that curse, or, in other words, upon our pardon. 3. That upon our being pardoned, the "Spirit of the Son" is "sent forth into our hearts," producing the same effect as that mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans, viz., filial confidence in God, "crying, Abba, Father." To these texts are to be added all those passages, so numerous in the New Testament, which express the confidence and the joy of Christians; their friendship with God; their confident access to Him as their God; their entire union and delightful intercourse with Him in spirit.

This has been generally termed the doctrine of assurance, and, perhaps, the expressions of St. Paul, "the full assurance of faith," and "the full assurance of hope," may warrant the use of the word. But as there is a current and generally understood sense of this term, implying that the assurance of our present acceptance and sonship implies an assurance of our final perseverance, and of an indefeasible title to heaven; the phrase, a comfortable persuasion or conviction of our justification and adoption, arising out of the Spirit's inward and direct testimony, is to be preferred.

There is, also, another reason for the sparing and cautious use of the term assurance, which is, that it seems to imply, though not necessarily, the absence of all doubt, and shuts out all those lower degrees of persuasion which may exist in the experience of Christians. For our faith may not at first, or at all times, be equally strong, and the testimony of the Spirit may have its degrees of clearness. Nevertheless, the fullness of this attainment is to be pressed upon every one: "Let us draw near," says St. Paul to all Christians, "with full assurance of faith."

It may serve, also, to remove an objection sometimes made to the doctrine, and to correct an error which sometimes pervades the statement of it, to observe that this assurance, persuasion or conviction, whichever term be adopted, is not of the essence of justifying faith; that is, justifying faith does not consist in the assurance that I am now forgiven, through Christ. This would be obviously contradictory. For we must believe before we can be justified; much more before we can be assured, in any degree, that we are justified; this persuasion, therefore, follows justification, and is one of its results. But though we must not only distinguish, but separate, this persuasion of our acceptance from the faith which justifies, we must not separate it, but only distinguish it, from justification itself. With that come in, as concomitants, adoption, the "Spirit of adoption," and regeneration.

Advent, THE SECOND (ἡ παρουσία τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ἀληθινοῦ, Matt. xxiv, 27; τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ ζωντος, 1 Thess. iii, 13); a phrase used in reference to the revelation of Christ from heaven, predicted in the New Testament; His "appearing, the second time, without sin, unto salvation." This stupendous event was often foretold by Christ Himself, and is prominently exhibited throughout the apostolic writings. "The Son of Man," said Jesus, "shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels" (Matt. xvi, 27). After His ascension, the announcement was made to His disciples: "This same Jesus . . . shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven" (Acts i, 11). "Behold, he cometh with clouds," says John, "and every eye shall see him" (Rev. i, 7). "When he shall appear, we shall be like him" (1 John iii, 2). St. Paul represents Christians as "looking" and "waiting for the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. i, 7). As to the time of His coming, we find Him saying to his disciples: "There be some standing here who shall not taste of death till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xvi, 28). "Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel until the Son of Man be come" (Matt. x, 23). "They shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. . . . This generation shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled" (Matt. xxiv, 30-34). "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh" (James v, 8). As to the purpose of His coming, we read: "Then shall he reward every man according to his works" (Matt. xvi, 27). "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout . . . and the dead in Christ shall rise first," (1 Thess. iv, 16). "He shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom" (2 Tim. iv, 1). "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be" (Rev. xxii, 12).

Various opinions have prevailed as to the meaning of these and similar declarations, and as to the time and manner of their accomplishment. In some of the apostolic churches, as, for instance, at Thessalonica, there were some who regarded the advent as imminent. At any hour Christ might come! That this, however, was not the apostolic belief, is evident from 2 Thess. ii, 3, 4, where St. Paul affirms that "that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition." Events were thus to occur, prior to the advent, which rendered its being so near as they supposed impossible.

Among the early post-apostolic Christians, we find the expectation of the advent becoming blended with that of the millennium, or thousand years of rest and blessedness anticipated for the Church on the earth. Persecuted by the Pagan oppressor, it was a delightful solace to believers, in those dark and evil days, to regard Christ as being about to come in person to terminate the sufferings of His faithful people, and receive them to be partakers of His glory. Then, at His appearing, His enemies should be overthrown, His departed saints raised from their graves to meet Him, and His entire Church exalted to a position of security and triumph, in which they should reign with Him over the earth and thus enjoy a rich pre-libation of the everlasting blessedness of heaven. These expectations, as cherished by some, were doubtless characterized by Scriptural sobriety and judiciousness; but, in the minds of others, they were tinged with much that was fanciful and extravagant, and that was evidently derived rather from the Jewish synagogue than from the school of the apostles.

After the triumph of Christianity over Paganism, at the opening of the fourth century, these views began to decline. Basking in the sunshine of imperial favor, and giving law from the throne of the Cæsars, the Church seemed to herself to have already entered on the millennial rest. The advent, therefore, came to be regarded as an event which should follow, not precede, the millennium. It was thus projected into the far distant future, and was to be the prelude to the consummation of all things.

Some of the early Reformers, among whom was Luther, entertained a view similar, in some respects, to this. To them, at that advanced period of the world's history, it seemed that the millennium must have already run its course, and as if, therefore, the coming of Christ and the end of the world were nigh. Others, however, recognizing in Papal Rome the mystic Babylon of the Apocalypse, and finding themselves engaged in the very heat of conflict with it, and unable, moreover, to discern, in the dark ages that had preceded, anything like the blessed rest they anticipated for the Church, were led to the adoption of views more in accordance with those generally entertained at the present day. These may be epitomized as follows:—

There are many earnest and devout Christians who maintain it to be the duty of the Church to anticipate the advent as nigh, and to live in daily expectation of the coming of her Lord. Her attitude, say they, should be that expressed in the words of the apostle: "Looking for the blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us" (Titus ii, 13). The command of Christ to His disciples is obligatory on His people now—Be ye "like unto men that wait for their Lord" (Luke xii, 36). "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come" (Matt. xxiv, 42).

But how, they ask, can the Church maintain this attitude of expectation, if she believes that a thousand years are to elapse before the advent? The advent, therefore, must be pre-millennial. Christ will soon appear visibly to establish His kingdom and introduce His universal reign. The Church, with her present agencies and instrumentalities, is inadequate to the conversion of the world. Her present work, therefore, is, by the preaching of the gospel, to make up the number of the elect. These, at His coming, shall constitute "the Bride, the Lamb's wife;" that "glorious Church" which Christ "shall then present to himself, having neither spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing." Then all His enemies shall be put under His feet. The earth shall be purified by fire, and wickedness consumed out of it. Along with the fullness of the Gentiles, the Jews shall be brought into the Church and restored to their own land. Then, either in the earthly Jerusalem below, or, as some imagine, in the heavenly Jerusalem visibly manifested above it, Christ will reign with His risen and glorified saints. Then "all nations whom he has made shall come and worship before him," and "all the ends of the earth see the salvation of God."

There are others to whom these anticipations, fascinating as they are to many, seem based on erroneous interpretations of Scripture. Christ's kingdom, they argue, is not a kingdom of the future merely; it has already come. It began when He ascended, and sat down as "Lord of all" (Acts x, 36) at the right hand of the Father. Then He was "made head over all things to the Church" (Eph. i, 22). Christ, therefore, reigns now, and "must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet" (1 Cor. xv, 25). "All power in heaven and on earth" having been "given" to Him, He already possesses all that is requisite for the fulfillment of His purposes and the extension of His reign, visibly and manifestly, throughout the world. His kingdom, which began to be manifested when, on the day of Pentecost, through the outpouring of the Spirit, multitudes were brought to the obedience of the faith, will come with growing power and fullness till it has come universally, and the Father's "will is done on earth, even as it is done in heaven."

As to its being the duty of the Church to be looking and waiting for the coming of her Lord, they maintain that several, at least, of the passages from which this is inferred have been misunderstood, and have reference, not to that real and personal coming which is yet future, but to that spiritual coming, in the exercise of judgment on the Jewish Church and nation, which is now past. They affirm, moreover, that even those who maintain this to be the duty of the Church, are themselves unable to fulfill it, inasmuch as, expecting, as they do, certain events to precede the advent, they must necessarily be looking out rather for those events than for the advent which is to follow them. For example, from certain Old Testament prophecies, it is generally maintained by them that, prior to the advent, the Jews, while yet unbelieving, will be restored to their own land; that after dwelling there for a season in peace, and attaining to considerable prosperity, a confederacy of nations will be formed against them; that they will be assailed by the armies of Gog; and that, just in this crisis of their fate, Christ will appear visibly for their deliverance. Then, converted to the faith of the gospel, they will say: "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!" How, then, can pre-millenarians, entertaining such expectations, be looking daily for the coming of the Lord! They must necessarily be looking rather for those events which they believe shall precede it. But this is precisely the position of post-millenarians, though the events anticipated by them, including, as they do, the millennium, must occupy a much more lengthened interval of time. The advent, however, say they, is an event of such surpassing interest and importance, that, however far distant in the future it may be, to the eye of faith it should ever appear as nigh. They insist, moreover, on this, as inconsistent with a pre-millennial advent, that there is not in the New Testament any passage having undeniable reference to the advent, in which Christ is said to come for the purpose of reigning on the earth. He is represented as coming to raise the dead, to judge the world, and distribute to men their final awards; but never as coming to establish His kingdom or begin His reign. Why not? Because, say they, His kingdom is already established and His reign already begun. The advent, therefore, cannot be pre-millennial. It must be a post-millennial event.

Resembling this view, though, in one important respect, differing from it, is that held by a third class of Christians. Believing that Christ's coming is to follow the millennium, not precede it, they maintain that the character of this era has been altogether misunderstood; that, instead of being a period of rest and triumph for the Church, it is to be a period of trial and conflict; and that, if not already past, it is rapidly hastening to a close. According to this view, the coming of Christ, with the end of all things, is drawing nigh.

This article would be incomplete were we not to notice another view which has recently been put forth with considerable power, and is now finding acceptance with many. According to this hypothesis, the second advent is past already. Christ Himself foretold its nearness. He was to "come in his kingdom" before some of his disciples "tasted death;" before they had "gone over the cities of Israel;" before that generation had "passed away." Christ's own declarations regarding His advent, say they, thus invariably either affirmed or implied that it was near. They were fulfilled, partly in His coming, by the outpouring of His Spirit on the day of Pentecost, to establish His reign among men; and partly in the judgments which, in that generation, fell on the Jewish community, by which the Mosaic economy was abolished, and the age (αἰών) or "world" that then was, brought to a final end. The reference to the advent in the "Acts of the Apostles," and in the Epistles, they maintain, are but reproductions, somewhat varied, of Christ's own declarations; while, in nearly all of them, it is evident, either from the language employed or the connection in which it stands, that the writers were looking for the advent before the passing away of the then existing generation. Along with Dr. Owen (see his sermons on 2 Pet. iii, 11), they imagine the prediction of St. Peter—"the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up"—to foretell, not the destruction of the world, but the destruction of Judaism, and the passing away of the heavens and earth of the Levitical dispensation. Believing the Apocalypse to have been written prior to the destruction of Jerusalem, they think it has reference mainly to that event, and perhaps, in connection with it, to the overthrow of pagan Rome.

According to this hypothesis, Christ has already come. He is already seated "on the throne of his glory, and before him even now are gathered all nations." The judgment is now going on; the wicked are passing away "into everlasting punishment, and the righteous into life eternal." Men become consciously the subjects of this judgment, as they pass from the sphere of the visible among unseen and everlasting things.

It will be perceived that this hypothesis leads to the following conclusions: That Scripture nowhere foretells the destruction of our world; that the human race may be propagated on this earth forever; that if the advent be passed already, so also is the resurrection which was to precede it, and which must, therefore, have been a resurrection of souls from Hades, and not of bodies from the grave; or, if a resurrection of bodies, then not a visible resurrection; and finally, that the resurrection now takes place at death, in the emerging from the mortal frame of a body, which, invisible to human eye, is spiritual, incorruptible and glorious.

Many grave and apparently insuperable objections to this hypothesis will at once suggest themselves to the mind of the thoughtful reader; but it is not necessary that these should be stated here.—Kitto's Dict.

Aikman, Robert, D. D., was born in the city of New York, June 29th, 1816. Leaving school at an early age, he was employed as a clerk in mercantile affairs, until about twenty-one years old. Then, turning toward the ministry, he prepared for college, and was graduated from Yale in the class of 1843. After teaching a year he entered Union Theological Seminary, in New York, completing his course in 1847, and was licensed to preach by the Fourth Presbytery of New York, on the 9th of April. He was soon called to the charge of a mission field in Coventry, Rhode Island, and was ordained to the gospel ministry by the Congregational Association of that State, November 11th, 1847. In March, 1850, he became assistant pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Troy, N. Y., then under the care of Rev. N. S. Beman, D. D. Resigning that position he was called, December 3d, 1851, to the pastorate of the Third Presbyterian Church of Elizabeth, N. J., then beginning its existence, over which, as its first pastor, he was installed, March 1st, 1852. After a pastorate there of seventeen years he was called to the charge of the First Presbyterian Church of Madison, N. J., and installed as pastor, June 2d, 1869. He continues still in that charge, faithful in duty, and with the Divine blessing attending his labors. He is an able preacher, and highly esteemed by his brethren.

Albigenses, a body of reformers about Toulouse, and the Albigenses in Languedoc, who sprung up in the twelfth century, and distinguished themselves by their opposition to the Church of Rome. They were charged with many errors by the monks of those days, but from these charges they are generally acquitted by the Protestants, who consider them only as inventions of the Roman Church to blacken their character. The Albigenses grew so formidable, that the Catholics agreed upon a holy league or crusade against them. Pope Innocent III, desirous to put a stop to their progress, stirred up the great men of the kingdom to make war upon them. After suffering from their persecutors, they dwindled, by little and little, till the time of the Reformation, when such of them as were left fell in with the Vaudois, and conformed to the doctrine of Zwinglius and the disciples of Geneva. The Albigenses have been frequently confounded with the Waldenses, from whom it is said they differ in many respects, both as being later far in point of time, as having their origin in a different country, and as being charged with divers heresies, particularly Manicheism, from which the Waldenses were exempt. (See Waldenses.)

Alexander, Rev. Samuel R., was a native of Bourbon county, Ky. After being licensed to preach the gospel, he went to the region of Vincennes, Ind., in 1823. The services of his installation, in Vincennes, were held in the court-house. There was then no Presbyterian church in the county. He was pastor of the Indiana Church, so called because there was then no other Presbyterian church in the territory, perhaps the only Protestant church of any kind. In 1854, after a pastorate of thirty years, he resigned the charge. Subsequently, as health permitted, he labored in other churches. He died near Vincennes, February 17th, 1884, in the eighty-second year of his age. His interest in the church was steadfast. He was a constant attendant on public service, frequently assisting. He lived and died a good servant of the Master.

Allbright, Rev. William Hervey, was born in Blisworth, Northamptonshire, England, November 25th, 1819, being the oldest of the ten children of John and Elizabeth Allbright. He united with the "General" Baptist Church of Blisworth, in 1869, and transferred his membership to the First Presbyterian Church of Camden, N. Y., 1871, having come to this country in 1870. Pursuing his preparatory studies in Camden Union School and Whitestown Seminary, he graduated from Hamilton College, in due course, 1876, and from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1879. On June 6th of that year he was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Auburn, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Cayuga, which position he still holds, January 1st, 1884.

Of robust health, evangelical, earnest and untiring in pulpit and pastoral work, he has decided encouragement in the edification of his church and the co-operation of his people.

A notable and grateful feature in Mr. Allbright's experience is his having, as neighboring successful pastors in the same city, two of his theological classmates, the Rev. Charles Carroll Hemenway, of the Central Presbyterian Church, and the Rev. George B. Stewart, of the Calvary Presbyterian Church, the three accepting, before graduation, the calls to their respective charges, almost under the shadow of the Seminary.

Allen, Heman Hoyt, D. D., was born in Canton, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., October 16th, 1828. His parents were Marcus and Lucia Allen, who were born and married near Middlebury, Vt. His grandfather Allen was a cousin of Col. Ethan Allen, of Ticonderoga fame. His grandmother Allen was a sister of Myron Winslow, one of the earliest, if not the first, of American missionaries. On the mother's side he is a descendant of Henri Luis Fabrique, one of those who escaped from Lyons in the horrors of St. Bartholomew. On the father's side, Scotch-Irish Presbyterian; on the mother's side, French Huguenot; it will be seen there was no special love for Romanism in that stock. Dr. Allen's father moved West in August, 1832, when the son was not quite four years old. Though he was so young at the time, he distinctly remembers passing Niagara Falls. The family settled in Harrison county, Ind., but in October, 1838, removed to Breckinridge county, Ky. Shortly after, the first and only Presbyterian church in the county was organized at Cloverport. The family were part of its original membership. The father was elected an elder, and remained so until his death, in 1866.

He was received to the communion of the church in the Spring of 1846, in his eighteenth year. He remained on his father's farm till his twenty-first year, when, having decided to enter the ministry, he began the work of getting an education, not having one dollar with which to begin. He was received under the care of the Presbytery of Louisville in the Spring of 1849. He entered the Freshman class of Centre College in September, 1851, and graduated in 1855, being the Valedictorian of the class. Hon. John Young Brown, Col. W. C. P. Breckinridge, Gov. Thomas T. Crittenden, Revs. H. M. Scudder and William George were among his classmates. He entered Danville Theological Seminary in September, 1855, and graduated in April, 1858, and was licensed by the Presbytery of Louisville, at Cloverport, April, 1858. In June following he took charge of churches at Cynthiana and Mount Pleasant, Harrison county, Ky., remaining there one year. He was installed pastor of the Bethel Church, near Lexington, in September, 1859. This church had long been under the ministry of Rev. Robert Marshall, so well known in the early ministry of Kentucky. Having connected with the pastoral work that of teaching a school, a severe attack of throat disease compelled him to give up preaching and to resign his charge, in April, 1861. For four years he was the successful Financial Agent of the Danville Theological Seminary and Centre College. In February, 1865, he resumed ministerial work, preaching to the churches at Glasgow and Mumfordsville, Ky., one year. In January, 1866, he became editor of the Western Presbyterian, in Louisville, Ky., and for four years, by his judgment and skill, rendered important service to the Church. He was called to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church, St. Charles, Mo., in October, 1870, where he remained for two years, and was greatly blessed in his work. During that time a beautiful house of worship was erected, at a cost of over $16,000, and more than one hundred members were added to the church. He returned to Kentucky in October, 1872, to be the pastor of Olivet Church, Shelby county, which pastorate he resigned, in September, 1877, and accepted a call to the Church at Princeton. Failing health compelled him to relinquish this charge in the Spring of 1880. Through his untiring efforts, and at much personal sacrifice, the Princeton Collegiate Institute was founded, under the care of the Presbytery, and he became its Principal in the Fall of 1880, where he is still laboring, with much success. He was a member of the General Assemblies of 1870 (Re-union) and 1880; was Moderator of the Synod of Kentucky in 1876, and has been an efficient member of the Board of Trustees of Centre College, and of the Board of Directors of Danville Theological Seminary for ten years past, having been President of the latter Board for several years.

Dr. Allen loves his Church and State and country. He is a staunch believer in and defender of the doctrines and polity of the Church; preaches with ability and excels in addresses, and as a debater and counsellor, in ecclesiastical bodies.

Allen, Rev. Perry S., was the youngest child of Richard B. and Mary Allen, and was born in Salem congregation, Butler county, Pa., July 4th, 1853. His preparatory training for college was at West Sunbury and Glad Run academies, and his college course at the University of Wooster, O. He graduated at the Western Theological Seminary, the youngest member of his class, in 1877. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Butler in 1876, and the following summer supplied the churches of Cochranton and Milledgeville. At the end of his seminary course he accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Edenburg, Clarion county, Pa., where he labored for about eighteen months. He was called from this field to the First Presbyterian Church of Sharon, Pa., in September, 1878, where he served four years, when he was called to Warren, Pa., where he still is the pastor, beloved by his people and successful in his labor.

Allis, Rev. John M., is the second son of Thomas C. and Julia A. (Mather) Allis, and was born in Danville, Canada, December 15th, 1839. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1866, and at Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1869. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New York, in 1868, and was ordained to the gospel ministry by the Presbytery of Albany, in 1869.

For two years he was in charge of a mission church in connection with Dr. Sprague's Church, of Albany, N. Y. He was then called to the First Presbyterian Church of Lansing, Michigan.

His wife's failing health sent him to Southern California, where he served several Home Mission churches in one charge, from which work he was called to the Larkin Street Presbyterian Church of San Francisco, Cal., which he served nearly five years. In 1880 he became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Lafayette, Ind., and remained until called, in 1883, by the Board of Foreign Missions, to take charge of the work of establishing a normal school and a theological seminary in connection with the mission work in Valparaiso, Chili, S. A. A man of vigorous and cultured intellect and earnest purpose, he presents the truth of the gospel forcibly and faithfully; while in all pastoral and general Christian work he is devoted, energetic and untiring.

Analogy of Faith. When any passage is explained by a reference, not to any one or more texts, but by a reference to the general tenor of Scripture, it is then said to be interpreted according to the ANALOGY, OR RULE OF FAITH. We have examples of this kind of reference in Gal. v, 11, and again in 1 Cor. xv, 3, 11, where the apostle states the facts and doctrines connected with the death and resurrection of Christ, and then proceeds to prove other facts and doctrines from them.

This analogy of faith is called in the Bible, "the Scriptures" (1 Cor. xv, 3, 4); "all the law," as in Gal. v, 11; and "the mouth of all the prophets" (Acts iii, 18). "The analogy of faith" is the expression used by the Apostle Paul, in Rom. xii, 6, where he exhorts those who expound the Scriptures (or prophesy) to do it according to the proportion or analogy, the measure or rule of faith.

The expression, therefore, is identical with "the whole tenor of Scripture;" and the doctrine which is founded upon it is taken from all the texts relating to one subject, when impartially compared; the expressions of each being restricted by those of the rest, and the whole explained in mutual consistency.

(1) God is set forth in Scripture, for example, as a Spirit, omniscient, and holy and supreme. All passages, therefore, which seem to represent Him as material, local, limited in knowledge, in power or in righteousness, are to be interpreted agreeably to these revealed truths.

(2) If, again, any expositor were to explain the passages of Scripture which speak of justification by faith as if it freed us from obligations to holiness, such an interpretation must be rejected, because it counteracts the main design and spirit of the gospel.

(3) In Prov. xvi, 4, it is said, "The Lord has made all things for himself; yea, even the wicked for the day of evil." The idea that the wicked were created that they might be condemned, which some have founded upon this passage, is inconsistent with innumerable parts of Scripture (Psa. cxlv, 9; Ezek. xviii, 23; 2 Pet. iii, 9). The meaning, therefore, is, as determined by the analogy of faith, that all evil shall contribute to the glory of God, and promote the accomplishment of his adorable designs.

It is thus that philosophy interprets natural appearances. When once a general law is established, particular facts are placed under it, and any appearance that seems contradictory is specially examined; and of two explanations of the apparent anomaly, that one is selected which harmonizes best with the general law.

The use of the parallel passages of Scripture in determining whether language is figurative or literal is of great moment. God, for example, often represents himself as giving men to drink of a cup which he holds in his hand; they take it, and fall prostrate on the ground in fearful intoxication. The figure is used with much brevity, and without explanation, in some of the prophets (Nahum iii, 2; Hab. ii, 16; Psa. lxxiv, 8). In Isaiah li, 17-23, it is fully explained, and the meaning of the image becomes clear. The intoxication is desolation and helplessness, more than can be borne; and the cup is the fury (or righteous indignation) of Jehovah.

In reading Acts ii, 21, we find it said, that "whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be saved;" and the question may be asked, What is meant by calling upon the name of the Lord? Matthew tells us, that "not every one that saith Lord! Lord! shall enter into the kingdom of heaven;" so that the passage is not to be understood in its literal and restricted sense. On referring to Romans x, 11-14, and 1 Corinthians i, 2, we find that this language, which is quoted from the prophet Joel, implied an admission of the Messiahship of Christ, and reliance on the doctrines which he revealed.

It is obvious that, while the figurative meaning of a word has generally some reference to its literal meaning, it must not be supposed to include in the figurative use all that is included in the literal; similitude in some one respect, or more, being sufficient to justify the metaphor.

Christ calls his disciples his sheep, and the points of comparison are, clearly, his affection for them, his care over them, and their confidence and attachment to him. Common sense discovers and limits the application of the terms. Christ himself is called, with smaller limits, the Lamb, with special relation to his character and sacrifice. So sin is called in Scripture a debt; atonement, the payment of a debt; pardon, the forgiveness of a debt. But we must not hold these terms so rigidly as to maintain that, because Christ died for man's sin, therefore all will be finally saved; or that, because he has obeyed the law, therefore sinners are free to live in sin. Men are dead in sin, but not so dead as to be free from the duty of repentance; nor are they guiltless if they disregard the Divine call. These principles are sufficiently obvious when applied to passages which contain figures founded upon material objects. They are even more important, though less easy, when applied to passages which contain figures taken from human nature or common life. More errors, probably, have arisen from pushing analogical expressions to an extreme than from any other single cause; and against this tendency the sober, earnest student of the Bible needs to be specially upon his guard.

To ascertain, therefore, the meaning of any passage of Scripture, whether the words be employed figuratively or literally, we must ask the following questions: What is the meaning of the terms? If they have but one meaning, that is the sense. If they have several, we then ask, Which of those meanings is required by other parts of the sentence? If two or more meanings remain, then, What is the meaning required by the context, so as to make a consistent sense of the whole? If, still, more than one meaning remains, What, then, is required by the general scope? And if this question fail to elicit but one reply, What, then, is required by other passages of Scripture? If, in answer to all these questions, it is found that more than one meaning may still be given to the passage, then both interpretations are true; and we must fix on the one which best fulfills most of the conditions, or must look elsewhere for some further guide.

It is important to observe that, whether the language we examine be figurative or literal, and whether it be used in history or in prophecy—in allegory or in plain discourse—these rules are equally applicable. There is not one rule for tropes, and another for words in their proper sense; nor is there one rule for interpreting the words of the parables of Scripture, and another for interpreting the words of its historical statements. It is true that in history or narrative we expect to find words used in their literal sense; while in poetry or allegory the figurative may be expected to predominate. We apply, however, the same rules, needing some, indeed, more in one case than in the other; but still taking the sense which the words express, as that sense is defined and limited (if it be so) by the whole of the sentence, by the context, by the scope of the writer, and by other parts of the Bible.

Anderson, Hon. D. C. The subject of this sketch is a ruling elder in the Jackson Street Presbyterian Church, Mobile, Ala. He is the son of Samuel T. Anderson, one of the pioneers of Tennessee, and was born in the town of Pulaski, Tenn., 1816. He received his education in the same town, chiefly under the tuition of that eminent Christian scholar, the Rev. William S. Lacy. He studied law with the late Judge Bramlet, of Pulaski, Tenn., and was admitted to the Bar in 1838. In the course of that year he removed to Alabama, and settling in Demopolis, pursued the practice of his profession in that place until the year 1850, when he removed to Mobile, where he now resides. In 1843 he was elected a member of the Alabama Legislature, and in 1844 was chosen Presidential elector on the Whig ticket.

In 1853 Mr. Anderson was elected by the Legislature Solicitor of the Mobile Circuit, which office he filled for the space of four years. It was in the discharge of the duties of this office that his great abilities as a lawyer and his sterling principle as a man became conspicuous. In entering upon the office he felt that he assumed the obligations of a sacred trust, which in the integrity of his heart he strove to meet.

The result was, that the administration of the criminal law in the district soon assumed a higher tone. The law became a terror to the evil. Those who were found to be law breakers he prosecuted with relentless zeal and consummate skill, regardless of what might be their social position, or wealth or power.

He was again elected to the Legislature, and served from 1872 till 1876. He was elected Speaker of the House for his second term, which office he filled with distinction.

As a lawyer, Mr. Anderson excels in addressing the jury. He is a pleasing and impressive speaker. His style is chaste, his language simple and select; his manner earnest and dignified. His bearing toward the Bench, the Bar and the jury is courteous and frank, commanding the confidence and respect of all. In disposition and temperament he is genial and kind; of a warm and generous sympathy; a sincere and steadfast friend. From all exhibitions of envy or malice he is singularly free. His acquaintance with polite literature is extensive. Few men, not professional theologians, are as well acquainted with the best orthodox exegetical productions of the day. Having no fondness for controversial writings, his tastes have led him to the higher plane of experimental and devotional studies. These pursuits have fitted him to be an able teacher of the Bible class, a work in which he takes delight. In all the relations of life he has maintained the character of a high-toned Christian gentleman; honored and beloved in his family, in the church and by his friends; in his pastor a prudent counsellor, an appreciative listener, a liberal supporter and a sympathizing friend.

Anderson, Rev. Robert Burton, D. D., was born in Granville county, N. C., January 8th, 1833. His father was a native of Kilmarnock, Scotland, and his mother a daughter of Col. Robert Burton, an officer of the Revolution. The family removed to Lincoln county, N. C., during the childhood of their son, who early attended the Old Field schools, and afterward was prepared for college at the Caldwell Institute, under Dr. Alexander Wilson. He was graduated from Princeton College in 1854. In 1856 he professed his faith in Christ, and in October, 1856, entered Columbia Seminary, remaining three years. In April, 1859, he was licensed by Concord Presbytery, and supplied several churches until 1862. In May, 1862, he was ordained by Concord Presbytery, and installed over Bethel Church. He supplied the Church of Concord Town awhile, and then became Principal of the Yorkville Female Institute, in South Carolina, and supplied Bethesda Church. Declining a call to that church, and also one to Holly Springs, Miss., he took charge, in 1871, of the churches of Morganton and Newton, and was installed pastor over them in 1875, by Concord Presbytery, where he now is.

In 1881 he received the degree of D. D. from the Southwestern Presbyterian University.

Dr. Anderson is an impressive preacher, and his discourses have the charm of freshness, fervor and felicity of statement. While he holds tenaciously the old evangelical doctrines, his methods of presentation are often new, original and striking. No audience ever tires under his discourses. The genial kindness of his heart, and the charm of his conversation, combine to attach to him all who come within the sphere of his influence. His discretion and administrative ability induced his brethren to elect him as Chairman of "Committee of Oversight," whose business it is to watch over all the churches of the Presbytery.

Archæology, Summary of its Testimonies to the Bible. W. R. Cooper, Secretary of the Society of Bible Archæology, says: "From the monuments of Assyria come to us fresh confirmations of the Old Testament; that mighty empire has witnessed for the truth of the Bible in an unexpected manner, and with no uncertain voice. From the ruins of her palaces has her history been disinterred, and from the mutilated walls of her temples have her theology and poetry been restored. The conquest of Larestan is recorded in the annals of Samanidra and the cylinder of Tiglath-pileser describes his invasion of Palestine. The names of Nebuchadnezzar, Hezekiah, of Omri, Ahaz and Uzziah, have been made out. The very clay which sealed the treaty between the kings of Judah and Assiria, with the impresses of their joints rolled upon it, is preserved in the Nineveh gallery. The fragments of Assirionian, in twenty thousand fragments, contains among other scientific treatises such as astronomical notices, grammatical essays, tables of verbs, genealogies, etc., an historico-geographical account of Babylonia and the surrounding countries. As far as these fragments have been translated, the district and tribal names given in the Bible correspond very closely with them."—Faith and Power, 1884, p. 296.

Armes, George Wells, youngest son of Owanil and Olive Armes, was born July 11th, 1830, at North Hallow, Mass. In 1844 his parents removed to Western Michigan, where their four sons were reared on a farm, amid the privations and hardships of frontier life, and were taught to labor and practice economy, the elements of their future success. At the age of eighteen George was given his time, and having accumulated a few hundred dollars, emigrated to California in 1852. He united with Howard Presbyterian Church, on possession of his faith, March 21st, 1859. In May, 1862, he became superintendent of the Sabbath school, and in 1864 was elected an elder in that church, and served in both capacities until his removal to Oakland, in 1865. During that year he was elected ruling elder and superintendent of the Sabbath school of the First Presbyterian Church of Oakland; has held both positions until the present time. He is now also President of the Alameda and Contra Costa Bible Society of the Alameda county S. S. Association, and of the Oakland Branch of the C. L. S. C. (also) Trustee of the State C. L. S. C., and of the San Francisco General Association.

While not seeking promotion, Mr. Armes has been unambiguously elected to these and many other important positions, and has so discharged the duties devolving upon him as to secure most satisfactory results and perfect harmony among all his co-workers. With a handful of the obedient, he has marked executive ability. He is an indefatigable worker, and always ready to help a good cause at any expense of labor and scholarship. He is entirely devoid of vanity or peevish quarrelsomeness, and in a manner enthusiastic, persistent, hopeful, and persevering, stands with the strong tokens of a genuine piety, beneath the snow on the roof of his home, he wears that good cheer which Mr. Armes has had occasion to find hard in his business, that of a man whose brother, Charles Williams, was a successful partner, and elder of the First Presbyterian Church of Oakland, and for his infirmity of old age, he has been a great blessing to all good enterprises, and is a great benefit to the church and the public.

Atkinson, Charles Moody, A. M., D. D., youngest child of Moses L. and Charlotte D. Atkinson, was born in Newburyport, Mass., June 17th, 1819. He served as an apprentice to the watchmaker's trade four years; was prepared for college by Rev. John C. March; graduated at Amherst College, 1844; Principal of Follenburg Academy, Greenfield, Mass., 1845; graduated at the Union Theological Seminary, 1848; licensed to preach by the Congregational Association of New York and Brooklyn, 1848; ordained at Grenada, Mississippi, by the Presbytery of Lexington, South, 1849; General Agent and Corresponding Secretary of the Synod of Mississippi, 1852; pastor of Madison Presbyterian Church, Canton, Miss., 1856-65; evangelist of the Presbytery of Central Mississippi, till 1874; acting pastor, Durant, Miss., till 1878; since 1878, evangelist of Presbytery of New Orleans for the Tiche county, La., with the care of the churches at Thibodeaux, Morgan City and Centerville; Moderator of the "United Synod" South, at Huntsville, Ala., 1860, and of the Synod of Mississippi, 1867. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by King College, Tennessee, 1875. The degree of A. M., from Amherst College, Mass., 1847.

Authenticity of the Scriptures. The term Scriptures signifies writings in general, but is appropriated to the Word of God, which is also, by way of eminency, called the Bible or book, because it is incomparably the best of all books. The sacred books are divided into the Old Testament and the New Testament. The former includes those books which were written under the old dispensation of the covenant of grace, or prior to the incarnation of the Son of God; the latter includes those books which were written after the commencement of the new dispensation, or posterior to the advent of Christ. The apostle Paul lays a foundation for this distinction; for he uses the phrases Old Testament and New Testament, and in one instance designates the writings of Moses and the prophets by the former title. 2 Cor. iii. 14. The word canon literally signifies a rule, and was early used to designate the inspired Scriptures, which form a perfect rule of faith and life.

The sacred Scriptures are now collected into one volume, but that volume contains a considerable number of separate books, written by different persons and in different ages. How, then, do we ascertain the authenticity and genuineness of each of these books, and what do we regard them as canonical, to the exclusion of all others? In determining a question of this kind we must employ the same method which we use to determine the genuineness of any other book is the same as that of a question. How do we know that the books which bear the names of Homer, Horace, Theocritus, etc., were really composed by them, and that the uniform testimony of all succeeding ages?

In the same way do we ascertain that the writings of the apostles and evangelists are genuine: we have the testimony of their contemporaries and immediate successors, who are the most competent witnesses in this case. The task of searching the records of antiquity has been undertaken by learned men, and executed with great industry and zeal. The result of their inquiries is, that the books now included in the New Testament were received as inspired by the primitive Church, and numerous passages were quoted from them by the earliest Christian writers; that catalogues of these books, which coincide with ours, are inserted in the works of different authors who flourished in the third and fourth centuries; and that these books were publicly read in Christian congregations, and were continually appealed to by Christian writers, as the standard of faith, and the supreme judge of controversies. The canon of the Old Testament is ascertained by a short process: we know that the Jews arranged their sacred books into three classes, the Law, the Prophets and the Hagiographa, or holy writings. Now, our Lord, just before His ascension, thus addressed His disciples: "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms concerning me." Luke xxiv, 44. The Psalms are here put for the Hagiographa, probably because they were the principal books, or occupied the first place in that division. Our Lord, by adopting this common division of the sacred books, which comprehended all the Hebrew Scriptures, ratified the canon of the Old Testament, as it was received by the Jews. This, however, does not determine what particular books were then included in the sacred volume; but on this point we have the testimony of the Jewish historian, Josephus, who indeed does not name the books of the Old Testament, but he numbers them, and so describes them that there is scarcely room for any mistake. His testimony is corroborated by that of several of the early Christian fathers, who have furnished us with catalogues of the books of the Old Testament, from which it appears, that the canon then existing was the same as that which we now possess. Besides, a Greek translation of the Old Testament, known by the name of The Septuagint, was made two hundred and seventy years before the Christian era, in which are the same books that are at present found in the Hebrew copies. Avery, Rev. Eugene H., was born at Sherburne, Chenango county, N. Y., May 17th, 1837. The subject having removed to Illinois, in 1847, his youth was passed on a prairie farm. He graduated at Iowa College, Wisconsin, in 1858. After teaching for a year in a classical school at Galena, Ill., he pursued his theological course at Union Seminary, New York. He then spent a year in European travel. Having obtained in April, 1863, after preaching for a short year, in Roscoe, Ill., he became the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Warren, Ill., in June, 1864. Here he remained for nearly six years, and, on February 1st, 1870, entered upon his labors in Sioux City, Iowa. This was a rapidly growing frontier city, — a gateway to the great regions beyond. He proved to be just the man for that important pulpit. For our Church in Sioux City, in northern Iowa, Nebraska, and Dakota he did a most valuable and successful work. After nearly twelve years in that field, and leaving a new church building behind him, he was reluctantly released by his congregation and his society, to accept a call to the Church of Vinon, Iowa, perhaps, the largest church in Iowa. Here he still lives and labors, with great acceptance and ever increasing influence in the community, Diocese and State. He is also President of the Board of Trustees of Coe College, at Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Awakening is the term descriptive of the beginning of conversion as a divine work, because in Scripture parlance the unrepentant sinner is "asleep" (Eph. v, 14). According to the mental and moral condition of the sinner will be the outward form of the awakening, either sudden or slow, vehement or quiet. It must, however, be acknowledged, that a genuine Christian life is quite conceivable without any "awakening" at all, for many grow up in unbroken fellowship with God, and enter into conscious faith and love and joy; not, it is true, without conviction of their lost condition, and repentance of sins, but without any perceptible beginning of a Christian experience. It is to be borne in mind that the "awakening" in any case is only a beginning; the awakened one is not yet converted, regenerated, only on the way to conversion; hence it is possible for such persons to fall asleep again, as has frequently been the case. This truth explains the wholesale falling-away which usually follows a great revival. The machinery of revival produces many converts who are awakened, but who never get any further. But, when God speaks, the soul hears and obeys. Those who are the subjects of His grace, walk through life the exponents of righteousness.

Baldwin, Rev. Dwight, M. D., was born at Durham, N. Y., September 29th, 1798, and graduated from Yale in 1821, and from Auburn, 1829. Ordained at Utica, by the Presbytery of Oneida, October 6th, 1830, he embarked for the Sandwich Islands, and was stationed at Waimea, in Hawaii, from 1831 to 1836, and then transferred to Lahaina. A medical education materially aided his missionary work and added to its results. He corresponded to his associates who have made so enviable record for themselves, and who, besides what they have done for the people for whom they immediately labored, have so effectively vindicated the cause of evangelizing the most hopeless of the heathen.

Baldwin, John C., was born in Vermont, but spent his business life in New York city, and on retiring from trade, sought a quiet home in Orange, N. J., managing large commercial operations with signal success; his donations began with his profits, kept pace with them, and reached an immense sum. He gave $20,000 for the endowment of the Presidency of Wabash College, and in 1867 contributed $10,000 to Hamilton College. He also bequeathed to Middlebury College, Williams College, Hamilton College and Wabash College, each, over $30,000. It appearing, after Mr. Baldwin's death, that he had promised $15,000 to Maryville College, Tenn., intending to present it as a gift, that sum was paid by the other colleges, leaving their several portions $27,969. He directed that the money should be securely invested, and its income applied towards the support and education of indigent students, members of some Christian Church, holding the doctrine of the divinity of Christ as held by the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, preference being given to those who stand highest in the grade of scholarship, and scholarship being equal, preference to be again given to those who purpose to devote their lives to the gospel ministry. It has been understood that Mr. Baldwin disbursed more in benevolence during his life than he bequeathed to it at his death, and he kept up his giving while "the last enemy" was assailing him, and fell with offerings to loved friends and prized objects in his hands.

Baptism is a Sacrament of the New Testament instituted by Christ. John, the harbinger of Christ, was the first who administered baptism, by divine authority. The Lord "sent him to baptize with water;" and "there went out unto him all the land of Judea, and they of Jerusalem, and were all baptized of him in the river of Jordan, confessing their sins" (John i, 33; Mark i, 4). Jesus, after he entered on his public ministry, employed his apostles to baptize those who came to him; for "Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples" (John iv, 2). The baptism of John was a sign of faith in Christ as shortly to be revealed; whereas the baptism of the disciples of Jesus was an expression of faith in him as already come. But baptism was not formally appointed as a perpetual ordinance in the New Testament Church until after the resurrection of Christ, when He gave the following commission to His disciples: "Go ye, therefore, and teach," or make disciples of "all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. xxviii, 19, 20). These words not only contain an express institution of baptism, but also a plain intimation of the will of Christ that this ordinance should be continued in the Church in all succeeding ages; for He promised to be with His disciples in executing His commission, not only to the end of that age, but "to the end of the world." Baptism has, accordingly, continued to be practiced by all sects of Christians, with the exception of the Quakers. It appears to them that, as it is the distinguishing character of the gospel to be the dispensation of the Spirit, the baptism of water was only a temporary institution, and is now superseded by the baptism of the Spirit. But it cannot be questioned, that the apostles did use the baptism of water after the dispensation of the Spirit had commenced. The apostle Peter makes a distinction between being baptized in the name of Christ and receiving the Holy Ghost; and he actually dispensed baptism to those who had previously received the Holy Ghost (Acts ii, 38; x, 47). It appears, therefore, to have been the judgment of Peter that the baptism of the Spirit does not supersede the baptism of water.

HOW ADMINISTERED.

The administration of baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, signifies that we are baptized by the authority of the persons of the Holy Trinity. They all concurred in giving this institution to the Church, as they all co-operated in our salvation, of which it is a sign. It is a memorial of the love of the Father, in sending his Son to be the Saviour of the world, of the love of the Son in assuming our nature and dying for our sins, and of the love of the Spirit in coming forth to purify our souls. The united wisdom, and power and grace of the subsistences in the Divine essence were displayed in the redemption of fallen man, and our admission to the new covenant is their conjunct act.

Again, the administration of baptism in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, signifies that we are baptized into the faith and profession of the Holy Trinity. We are baptized to their name. This mysterious doctrine of our religion, that there are three Persons in one undivided essence, equal in power and glory, is explicitly and solemnly recognized: and it follows, that whoever afterward denies this fundamental truth, under whatever pretext, whoever ascribes divinity to the Father alone, and pronounces the Son and the Spirit to be inferior to him, renounces the faith which he was bound by the most sacred engagements to maintain. But a simple acknowledgment of the Trinity does not fulfill the design of our baptism. We are required to regard the persons of the Godhead with devout affections, corresponding to the manifestations of them in redemption; to look up with reverence and love to the Father as our Father; to feel our obligations to the Son, and to depend upon him alone for pardon and eternal life; and to expect from the Holy Ghost those gracious operations and aids by which we shall be sanctified and prepared for heaven, and those consolations which will be a source of peace and transcendent happiness, amidst the difficulties and distresses of life.

IMPORT OF BAPTISM.

Our Confession of Faith, Chapter xxviii, Section 1, says: Baptism is a sacrament of the New Testament, ordained by Jesus Christ (Matt. xxviii, 19), not only for the solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church (1 Cor. xii, 13), but also to be unto him a sign and seal of the covenant of grace (Rom. iv, 11; Col. ii, 12), of his ingrafting into Christ (Gal. iii, 27; Rom. vi, 5), of regeneration (Tit. iii, 5), of remission of sins (Mark i, 4), and of his giving up unto God, through Jesus Christ, to walk in newness of life (Rom. vi, 3, 4); which sacrament is, by Christ's own appointment, to be continued in his Church until the end of the world (Matt. xxviii, 19, 20).

This section declares the ends of baptism: 1. It is a solemn admission of the party baptized into the visible Church, and to all its privileges. "It supposes the party to have a right to these privileges, before, and does not make them members of the visible Church, but admits them solemnly thereto. And therefore it is neither to be called nor accounted christening, that is, making them Christians, for the infants of believing parents are born within the covenant, and so are Christians and visible church members; and by baptism this right of theirs is acknowledged, and they are solemnly admitted to the privileges of church membership." 2. It is a sign and seal of the covenant of grace, and of the benefits of that covenant. These benefits are, ingrafting into Christ, or union with Him; the remission of sins by virtue of the blood of Christ; and regeneration by the Spirit of Christ. It is not intended that remission of sins and regeneration are inseparably connected with baptism; for our Confession, in a subsequent section (5th), expressly guards against the opinion "that all that are baptized are undoubtedly regenerated." 3. It is a sign and seal of the party baptized being devoted to God, and engaged to walk in newness of life. Baptism is a dedicating ordinance, in which the party baptized is solemnly given up to God to be His and for Him, now, wholly and forever. He is, as it were, enlisted under Christ's banner, to fight against the devil, the world and the flesh. He is bound to renounce every other lord and master, and "to serve God in holiness and righteousness all the days of his life."

SUBJECTS OF BAPTISM.

These are, not only believing adults, but the children of believing, covenanting parents. Anti-pedobaptists found what they consider as an unanswerable argument against the baptism of infants upon the connection of faith with baptism. "If it is," they say, "required that he who is baptized should believe, it follows that children ought not to be baptized, because they are not capable of faith." The argument has a specious appearance, which imposes on superficial thinkers; but when it is thoroughly canvassed, it will be found to be destitute of force. When our Lord says, "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved." He no doubt teaches that baptism should be administered to a believer; but if we infer that none but a believer should be baptized, let us observe the consequence which will follow from His words. Faith is made as necessary to salvation as baptism; and it is as fairly deducible from His words that none can be saved, as that none should be baptized but believers. Thus, children are excluded from heaven, as well as from this initiatory rite. This, however, our adversaries will not allow. They admit, as well as we, that many children are saved; and, consequently, admit that what is required from adults in order to their eternal happiness is not required from infants. If they will be consistent, they must further admit that this text speaks of adults alone; and, consequently, that the argument drawn from it against the baptism of infants is a sophism, more being contained in the conclusion than in the premises. It evidently speaks of adults, for it supposes them to be capable of faith. But because faith is made necessary to their baptism, it is not made necessary to the baptism of infants, any more than it is necessary to the salvation of infants because it is necessary to the salvation of adults. And with respect to infants, since, according to our antagonists, the thing signified is granted to them, it will not be easy to assign a good reason why the sign should be denied.

The duty of baptizing the children of believing parents, says an able writer, is evident from the following considerations:—

1. This duty is reasonable in itself, and in accordance with our best affections. In the children of those we love, we all naturally feel a peculiar interest. A good prince would wish, and would provide, that the children of his beloved and faithful friends should be placed in near relation to himself. And shall it be supposed that the Prince of Life will not regard, with tokens of peculiar favor, the children of His covenant people?

2. The analogy of God's covenant dealings in past ages is in favor of the doctrine of infant baptism. In all the covenants which God has hitherto made with men, children have been connected with their parents. Thus it was in the covenants with Adam, with Noah, with Abraham and with David. God dealt favorably with the children of Lot for their father's sake, and He declares himself to be a God keeping covenant with those that love him "to a thousand generations." How unlikely, then, that in the covenant of the Christian Church God has swerved from the invariable economy of His covenant dealings, and sundered the connection between believing parents and their children?

3. Had children been deprived of their interest in the covenant under the gospel dispensation, believing Jewish parents in the primitive Church would undoubtedly have complained. In the days of the apostles, many thousands of the Jews believed, who were "all zealous of the law." They were tenacious even of their former burthens; and would they cheerfully relinquish their accustomed privileges? Yet we hear not a word of complaint on the subject. There was no objection to the gospel, by friend or foe, on this ground. It is morally certain, therefore, that in respect to covenant relations and privileges, "their children were as aforetime" (Jer. xxx, 20).

4. It is a conclusive argument in favor of infant baptism, that baptism is now substituted in place of circumcision. In support of this proposition it may be observed:—

(1). That the visible Church has been substantially the same under both dispensations. It has held essentially the same doctrines, enjoyed the same spiritual promises, and professed the same religion, the religion of the Bible. The religion of the Old Testament is not distinct from that of the New, like the religion of Brahma or Mohammed. In all essential particulars it is the same, and has been professed by the Church in all ages.

The Church, under both dispensations, is represented as the same in various passages of the Scripture. The ancient predictions of the ingathering of the Gentiles, and of the future prosperity and glory of the Church were made, not to a new Church to be established under the gospel, but to the Zion of the Old Testament, the Church at that time existing in Israel (see Isa. lx, and xlix, 20, 21). Our Saviour predicted that many should "come from the East, and from the West, and sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in 'the same' kingdom of heaven," the same visible Church, from which "the children of the kingdom," the Jews, "should be cast out," and that the same "kingdom of God," in which the Jews had been unfaithful, "should be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof" (Matt. viii, 11, 12; xxi, 43). In perfect accordance with these predictions, Paul represents the Gentile believers as grafted into the same olive tree from which the Jews, for their unbelief, were broken off, and into which the converted Jews shall be grafted again (Rom. xi, 17). In view of these representations, nothing is more certain, than that the visible Church, under both dispensations, has been substantially the same body. But baptism is now, what circumcision was formerly, an instituted pre-requisite to a regular standing in the visible Church. Consequently, baptism is substituted in place of circumcision.

(2) The covenant of the Church, under both dispensations, has been essentially the same. This is evident from the identity of the Church. The Church is constituted by its covenant, so that, if the former is unchanged, the latter must be. The covenant of the Church under the former dispensation was the covenant with Abraham. Consequently this, in its full and spiritual import, must be regarded as the covenant of the Church now. The covenant with Abraham has never been abolished. It is spoken of in the Old Testament as "everlasting," and in the New as to exist "forever" (Gen. xvii, 7; Luke i, 55). It is represented by Paul as a covenant of "promise," and as "confirmed of God in Christ," and we are assured that the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul it, and render it of no effect (Gal. iii, 17). Believers under the gospel are spoken of as children of the covenant with Abraham (Acts iii, 25). It is on account of their interest in this covenant that they are denominated "Abraham's seed" (Gal. iii, 29), and that Abraham is so often represented as the father of all them that believe. "He received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised, that he might be the father of all them that believe" (Rom. iv, 11). It is evident from Scriptures such as these, that the covenant of the Church, like the Church itself, has been essentially the same under both dispensations; and that this covenant is the covenant with Abraham. But of this covenant, baptism is now what circumcision was formerly, the visible token. Hence, baptism has come in place of circumcision.

(3) Baptism and circumcision are of precisely the same import. Circumcision was both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it represented the circumcision of the heart, or regeneration. "Circumcision is of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter" (Rom. ii, 29). As a seal, it confirmed "the righteousness of faith," or the covenant of grace (Rom. iv, 2). Baptism, too, is both a sign and a seal. As a sign, it is an emblem of "the washing of regeneration," or the baptism of the Holy Ghost. As a seal, it assures those who receive it, and whose characters are conformed to its sacred import, that their faith is imputed to them for righteousness. It thus appears that when the ancient token of the covenant was abolished, an ordinance was established in the same Church, and appended to the same covenant, of precisely similar import. How is it possible, then, to resist the conclusion, that the latter is substituted for the former?

(4) The Scriptures countenance the idea that baptism is substituted in place of circumcision. "Beware," says the apostle, "of the circucision," or those persons who lay an exorbitant stress on the rite of circumcision; "for we," we who have been baptized, "are the circumcision, who worship God in the spirit" (Phil. iii, 2, 3). Again, to the Colossians, he says, "Ye are circumcised, with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ, buried with him in baptism" (Col. ii, 11, 12). In other words, ye are circumcised, having been baptized. It is admitted that the circumcision and baptism here spoken of are both spiritual. But if the two ordinances are spiritually the same, and the one was instituted in the Church on the removal of the other, is not this the substitution of the one for the other?

(5) The primitive Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Our limits forbid us to cite particular passages. Whoever will take the trouble to consult "Wall's History of Infant Baptism," vol. i, chapters 6-15, will find that many of the early fathers, as Justin, Cyprian, Basil, Ambrose, Augustine and Chrysostom, speak expressly on this point. They considered baptism as the Christian circumcision, and as standing in the place of circumcision.

But if this is true, and if such was the understanding of the Church in the times nearest the apostles, then the question about baptizing infants is at an end. There certainly was a command to circumcise infants; and if baptism is substituted in place of circumcision, the same command is valid in favor of their baptism.

5. The Jewish proselyte baptism furnishes a conclusive argument for the baptism of children. At the time of our Saviour's appearance, and long previous, the Jews had been accustomed, not only to circumcise their proselytes, but to baptize them. And they were accustomed to baptize children with their parents. In proof of this, see "Wall's Introduction to the History of Infant Baptism." But when our Saviour gave the command, "Go ye and teach (or proselyte) the nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," must not His disciples have understood Him to intend that kind of baptism to which both He and they had been accustomed, viz. the baptism of children with their parents? How could they have understood

Him in any other way? Under these circumstances, instead of needing an express command to authorize the baptism of children, the disciples needed an express prohibition to prevent their doing it. But no such prohibition was given.

6. Christ and His apostles taught and practiced, just as we might expect, on supposition they intended that children should be baptized, and just as we should not expect on the contrary supposition. In order to determine what we might or might not expect of Christ and His apostles, it will be necessary to keep in mind the established customs of the period in which they lived. In the Jewish Church, children had always been connected with their parents. They early received the token of the everlasting covenant. Also the children of proselytes were connected in covenant with their parents, and entitled to the initial rites of circumcision and baptism. And now what might be expected of Christ and His apostles, on the supposition they intended to put an end to this state of things? Not silence, surely. Silence would be a virtual approbation of it. On this supposition, they would have lost no opportunity of insisting that the ancient covenant connection between children and parents was abolished, and must no more be recognized in the rites of the Church. But did they pursue such a course? Never, in a single instance.

What, then, might be expected of Christ and His apostles, on supposition they intended that the established covenant connection of children with their parents should be continued? Not, indeed, that they should enjoin it by express precepts; for this would be to enjoin expressly what every one already understood and practiced. But they would be likely often to allude to this connection with approbation, and to drop expressions which implied it. They would be likely, also, as occasions occurred, to baptize households, when those at the head of them made profession of their faith. And this, it hardly need be said, is the course which our Saviour and the apostles actually pursued. Christ applauded the practice of bringing infants to receive His blessing, and declared that "of such is the kingdom of God" (Luke xviii, 15). He spoke of little children being received in His name, or as belonging to Him (Mark ix, 37, 41). Peter taught believing parents that the promise was to them and to their children (Acts ii, 39). Paul affirms that "the blessing of Abraham," an important part of which consisted in the covenant connection of his children, "has come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ;" and he denominates the children of believing parents holy (Gal. iii, 14; I Cor. vii, 14). He repeatedly baptized households on the profession of parents, or of those who had the charge of them. Lydia believed, and she and her household were baptized. The jailer believed, and he and all his were baptized straightway. Paul also baptized the household of Stephanus (I Cor. i, 16).

7. The testimony of history is conclusive in favor of the practice of infant baptism. It has been observed already, that the Christian fathers considered baptism as having come in the place of circumcision. Justin, who wrote only about forty years after the death of John, says: "We have not received this carnal circumcision, but the spiritual circumcision; and we have received it by baptism." Is it not manifest from this passage what must have been the opinion of Justin in regard to the important question before us?

Irenæus, who wrote a few years later than Justin, says: "Christ came to save all persons who by Him (renewantur in Deum) are baptized unto God, infants and little ones, and children, and youths, and elder persons." The only objection to this testimony is, that Irenæus here expresses baptism by a word which literally denotes regeneration, putting, by a common figure, the thing signified for the sign. That he really intended to express baptism by this word is so evident from his use of it in other instances, and from the general usage of the fathers, that Dr. Wall does not hesitate to speak of the above passage as an "express mention of baptized infants." And Whiston, a learned Baptist, admits the same. "This," says he, "is a thing undeniable by any modest arguer."

Tertullian, who was contemporary with Irenæus, although he advises to delay baptism in the case of infants and unmarried persons, yet speaks most expressly of infant baptism as a prevailing and established practice.

Origen, who was born within eighty-five years of the death of John, and was descended from Christian ancestors who must have lived in the apostolic age, speaks repeatedly and expressly of infant baptism, and declares that the practice had come down from the apostles.

Subsequent to this period, infant baptism is mentioned often, and in the most positive terms, by all the principal Christian fathers, as Cyprian, Optatus, Basil, Gregory, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome and Augustine. It is recognized in the acts of councils, as well as the writings of individuals. It is represented as resting on apostolic example and authority. Indeed, the right of infants to baptism was denied by no one in the primitive Church, except those who rejected water baptism altogether. Pelagius, in his controversy with Augustine, had strong inducements to deny it, so strong that he was reported by some to have done so; but he repels the charge as an injurious slander. "Men slander me," says he, "as if I denied the sacrament of baptism to infants." "I never heard of any, not even the most impious heretic, who denied baptism to infants."

Dr. Wall, who has so thoroughly investigated the history of infant baptism as to leave little to be done by those who come after him, assures us that the first body of men, of which he can find any account, who denied baptism to infants, were the Petrobrusians, a sect of the Abbigenses, in the former part of the twelfth century. And Milner says that, "a few instances excepted, the existence of Anti-pedobaptism seems scarcely to have taken place in the Church of Christ till a little after the beginning of the Reformation."

Such, then, is the history of infant baptism; and the argument from this source, in favor of the divine origin and authority of the practice, is deemed conclusive. If infant baptism does not rest on the ground of apostolic example, how can it be accounted for that it should have been introduced so early into the Church, and prevailed so universally, and that, too, without a whisper of dissension, or a note of alarm? We have catalogues extant of all the different sects of professing Christians in the four first centuries—the very period when infant baptism must have been introduced, if it were not of divine original—in which the differences of opinion which obtained in those times respecting baptism are particularly recounted and minutely designated. Yet there is no mention of any, except those who denied water baptism altogether, who did not consider infant baptism as a divine institution. Is it not certain, then, that infant baptism is a divine institution; that it is not an innovation, but was sanctioned by the apostles themselves? On this ground, and this only, "all sacred and profane history relating to the subject appears plain and consistent, from Abraham to Christ, and from Christ to this day."

It has been objected against the administration of baptism to infants, that it can be of no advantage to them, because they are incapable of understanding, or even perceiving the transaction. But, besides that it may be productive of the most beneficial effects at a future period, when they come to know its meaning, and reflect upon its solemn obligations; it is of no small moment that it introduces them into the society of the people of God. If the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much, we ought to set some value upon the prayers which are offered up by ministers and people for the young, who are to succeed them in the profession of the truth. If a religious education is of unspeakable benefit, it is one of the happy fruits of their baptism, in which their parents engaged to instill into their minds the principles of piety and morality. If the company of good men, their counsels, their admonitions, their example, are calculated to be useful, they enjoy these in consequence of their adoption into an association separated from the world lying in wickedness.

MODE OF BAPTISM.

Our Confession of Faith (chap. xxviii, section 3), says:—

"Dipping of the person into the water is not necessary, but baptism is rightly administered by pouring or sprinkling water upon the person."*

* Heb. ix, 10, 19-22; Acts ii, 41, xvi, 33; Mark vii, 4.

"We are, indeed, perfectly satisfied," says the Rev. Thomas Dickson Baird, "that if the mode of baptism had been at all essential to its valid administration, we would have had more specific instructions, either by precept or example, in relation to it. But as the mode in general use is denounced with great confidence, and those who have been received in this form are declared unbaptized and still out of covenant with God, it is not unimportant to inquire whether these things are so." He then proceeds to the following argument in support of the mode of baptism by affusion or sprinkling:—

I. The typical actions and representations by which baptism was prefigured under the former dispensation.

Some of the principal actions to which we refer were washing with water, anointing with oil and sprinkling with blood, which were employed to represent the purification and unction of the Spirit, and the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. In allusion to this, the apostle speaks of the laver, or washing-place of regeneration, the anointing of the Holy Ghost, and the blood of sprinkling. In the sacrament of the Passover, the sprinkling of blood was typically employed, as well as in the ratification of the Sinai covenant, and at other times similar ceremonies were used (Ex. xii. 7, and xxiv. 6-8, with Heb. ix, 18-22). In the consecration of Aaron and his sons, we find washing with water, sprinkling with blood and anointing with oil, the principal ceremonies used. We are not informed of the mode of washing; but the circumstances are not favorable to the impression that immersion was employed. The laver was placed between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, that the priests might "wash their hands and feet thereat." It could not be large, as it had to be carried through all their journeys. If, therefore, they were washed all over, it is probable that it was by affusion. It is a confirmation of this view, that, in allusion to this laver, the apostle says: "According to his mercy he saved us, by the washing (or laver) of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, shed upon us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." From this phraseology, as well as from the circumstances we have noticed, it appears very plain that this washing was all performed by affusion, or shedding upon the subject to be washed; but the hands and feet are particularly specified as the parts to be washed thereat. The blood was applied to the extremities of their right ears, thumbs and toes, and the altar and the people were sprinkled, as well as the priests. The priests, too, were anointed with the oil by its being poured on the head. This ointment, which they were forbidden to imitate, was peculiarly fitted to represent the inimitable graces of the Spirit. This ointment was never renewed, say the Jews, after the captivity, on which Patrick says, "Providence overruling that want, as a presage of the better unction of the Holy Ghost in gospel times, the variety of whose gifts was typified by the variety of these sweet ingredients." Leprosy was a loathsome disease, to which our moral corruption is frequently compared, and the mode of ceremonial purification, as typifying the efficacy of the blood and Spirit of Christ when sprinkled upon the conscience, is thus recognized by David in his expression of penitence: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." Hyssop, scarlet wool, water and blood, were the ingredients necessary in preparing and applying the purifying mixture. Would our limits permit we might multiply references; but in the washing with water, which represents the sanctifying influences of the Word and Spirit of God—in the application of blood, which refers to the atoning sacrifice of Christ—and in anointing with oil, which emblemizes the unction, gifts, and graces of the Holy Spirit—all are represented as poured, shed, sprinkled, applied with the finger, and similar methods of partial application, and especially to or on the head. And surely these actions refer to the same things represented in baptism.

II. The prophecies and exhortations of Scripture, in relation to the subject.

In the predictions respecting the dispensation of the Spirit, we usually, not to say always, find some term employed expressive of affusion or sprinkling. Wisdom is represented as saying, "Turn you at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you; I will make known my words unto you" (Prov. i, 23). Isaiah, speaking of the desolations of the Jews, intimates that they would continue "until the Spirit be poured out upon us from on high" (Isa. xxxii, 15), plainly referring to the affusion of the Spirit under the gospel dispensation. Again, the same prophet says, in another place, "For I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring" (Isa. xlv, 3).

The prophet Ezekiel, speaking of the same events, says, "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean; from all your filthiness, and from all your idols will I cleanse you" (Ez. xxxvi, 25). And in a promise securing to his people the permanence of these blessings, he says, "Neither will I hide my face any more from them; for I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God" (Ez. xxxix, 29). This mode of application is also used in relation to the special influences of the Spirit. "I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the Spirit of grace and of supplications" (Zech. xii, 10). Thus we see the constant phraseology of the Bible, in relation to these things, is altogether on the side of affusion or sprinkling. There is, therefore, nothing of weight to sustain the form of immersion, and still less to exclude all other modes of application.

III. The practice, or examples, recorded in the New Testament.

1. Of these examples the first that occurs is that of John's baptism. Although not Christian baptism, John's is introduced with much confidence as an example of the mode, and the only Scriptural mode of administration. To this assumption it may be objected, that it would be necessary to sustain the exclusive mode by showing, not only that some had been immersed, but that none had been baptized in any other form, or otherwise some precept to forbid it. The friends of immersion are bound to do this, or their position is not supported.

With respect to John, the language of the sacred historian is, that they "were baptized of Him in Jordan" (Matt. iii, 6), and that "Jesus when he was baptized went up straightway out of the water" (v, 16). It has been demonstrated by a number of writers, that into and out of, which appear to contain the whole strength of the argument, are as correctly translated to and from, and, frequently, will not bear any other meaning. But our limits, and a wish to be understood by the most unlearned, remind us of the expediency of passing this view, more especially as it has been conclusively done by others. To the English reader, however, we would say, that the most zealous advocate of immersion, if dipping his feet in a small vessel, or passing through a small pond, even less than a foot deep, would never think of using other language than that he went into the water, or through the water, and had come out of the water. Let this be marked as a truism, and then let us inquire, why it is that going into or coming out of water, on all other occasions, are unhesitatingly applied to partial, and even to very little wetting; but when they are applied to baptism, they must intend nothing less than the submersion of the whole body.

But why was much water, or many waters or streams so necessary, if a partial application were sufficient?

Judea was a warm country; ablutions of various kinds were very frequent, by habit, for health and comfort, and for religious forms, and water for these washings and for drinking, for such a multitude, in a country in many parts of which waters were scarce, required a place such as the neighborhood of Jordan, where water was plenty. This is a very plain case. But still more: running water was much prized by the Jews, often called living water, and in the observance of some of their rites it was positively required. For the cleansing of the leper—for the water of purification—and for other uses. (See Num. xix, 17; Lev. xiv, 5, 51, 52). In Jeremiah, Jehovah is denominated the "fountain of living waters" (Jer. ii, 13 and xvii, 13). Our Saviour, at the well of Samaria, and on the great day of the feast, uses the same figure to represent heavenly or spiritual blessings; and in the Apocalypse the believer is promised an introduction to "living fountains of waters," and to "drink of the waters of life." It is, therefore, no way surprising, that for the use of the multitude and for the purpose of a religious rite, a running stream or streams should be selected. If, then, John went so far as to lift the water with a vessel or with his hand, he went into the water and came out of it; and if he had any regard to the Old Testament observances, it was applied by sprinkling or by affusion. Assuredly, however, there is nothing to prove that immersion was the form, or that no other is lawful in the administration of this sacrament.

2. The day of Pentecost affords us the next example. Christ said to his disciples, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high" (Luke xxiv, 49). Again, "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, not many days hence" (Acts i, 5). Now, if baptism means immersion, they must have been immersed with the Holy Ghost. We shall see, however, in what form this baptism was effected. "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled the house where they were sitting. And there appeared cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts ii, 2-4). The rushing sound filled the house—those present were filled with the Spirit, not immersed with it—and the symbol of its communication, gifts and operations, sat on their heads, as tongues of flame. This was in exact correspondence with the actions, types and predictions of the Old Testament, and the sprinklings and outpourings there mentioned. Certainly, then, immersion has nothing to sustain it in the prophecy or in the fulfillment, in the type or in the antitype.

We next remark, that when Peter addressed the collected multitude, it was the third hour of the day, according to the Jewish reckoning, that is, nine of the clock—after this the discourse took effect, but how much time he occupied we know not, only the historian says that, "with many other words he exhorted them." Now there is no risk in the assertion, that, under these circumstances, immersion was not only improbable, but impossible. We hear nothing of preparation for immersion in the place where they were—nothing of their retiring for the purpose; matters which would scarcely have been passed over by the history had they taken place; and the same remark will apply to the baptism of Paul, Cornelius, the jailer, and others. We conclude, therefore, that neither the time occupied—the circumstances attendant—the multitude assembled, nor the language in which the transactions are recorded, will at all sustain the opinion of immersion having been the mode of baptism on that occasion.

3. The last instance our limits will permit us to notice, is that of the Ethiopian (Acts viii, 36). Let us then notice, that the Ethiopian was reading the prophet Isaiah; that the Bible was not divided into chapters for twelve hundred years after the time when this occurred; the division was by prophecies or subjects, not by chapters; that the prophecy which the eunuch was perusing is in the 53d, and commenced at the 13th verse of the preceding, or 52d chapter; and that the last verse of the 52d chapter, in this prophecy of the Messiah, says, "So shall he sprinkle many nations." It was from this very prophecy that Philip "began at the same Scripture and preached to him Jesus." Now when the passage they took spake of sprinkling, would the preacher say, not so, it must be immersion. Is it at all probable, that the Ethiopian or Philip would think of immersion, when considering this part of Scripture? Again, when the eunuch yielded his assent to the gospel offer, and they had come to a stream, the abrupt manner of the exclamation would evince that they had no water, and perhaps no vessel in company. Whether surprise, or joy, or both, were expressed, his exclamation, "See, here is water," or as the original, "See! water!" evinces much interest in the thing, but little about the form. But the history says, "And they went down both into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him." The argument here is short. If into necessarily means immersion, Philip was immersed as well as the eunuch, for they went both into the water. As this is not supposable and not pretended, into does not necessarily mean immersion, and from all the circumstances we cannot see that it is supported here or anywhere else in Scripture.

1. From what has been said, we infer that no language of Scripture, and no practice of the Church, proves one single case of unquestionable immersion, in the administration of baptism.

2. That in some of the instances of baptism recorded, immersion was not only improbable, but seems to have been impracticable.

3. That the use of the word into, to mean immersion exclusively, is a straining of language beyond its proper or legitimate use, and entirely gratuitous.

4. That, therefore, immersion is not necessary; but the ordinance is rightly administered by sprinkling or affusion, which best represents the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus and the affusion of the Holy Spirit.

Barkley, Rev. James Morrison, the oldest living child of John C. and Eliza (Morrison) Barkley, was born near Statesville, N. C., November 22d, 1846. He graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1876, and the following September he entered the Theological Seminary, at Princeton, where he graduated three years later. As a student, he was faithful to his work, and very popular and useful among his fellows, over many of whom he exercised strong Christian influence. Licensed to preach on April 8th, 1879, by the Presbytery of Monmouth, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Wickliffe Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., by the Presbytery of Newark, May 9th, of the same year. His pastorate there, in a church which had been divided and depleted by dissensions, was greatly blessed. The church filled, the membership increased, and the spirit of Christian unity returned.

In the Summer of 1882 he was invited, for the second time, to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Hillsdale, Mich. Much to the regret of his Newark charge, he was constrained by the state of Mrs. Barkley's health to accept the call, and entered upon his new work October 1st, 1882.

Mr. Barkley was born, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, in the old "Seceder" Presbyterian Church, and was brought up on Rouse's version of the Psalms and on the Assembly's Shorter Catechism. Recrunt neither to his blood nor to his training, he joins warm and generous fervency of spirit with virile and contented adherence to established convictions. His sermons, some of which have been published in pamphlet form, and his devoted pastoral labors, attest this twofold fidelity. He has always been peculiarly interested in Christian work among young men, and has more than once been solicited to accept responsible positions in connection with Young Men's Christian Associations.

Barnum, Russell, a ruling elder, departed this life at Sing Sing, N. Y., September 19th, 1883. Mr. Barnum had been a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church for the period of fifty-five years. For nearly fifty years he was an elder in the church at Sing Sing. A good man and true, earnest and devout in spirit, he loved the Church of God, and, according to his ability, it was his delight to serve her interests. He was a man of simple faith, true to his convictions of duty, punctual and diligent in all that pertained to his office as an elder, earnest and faithful in all his duties as a professed disciple of Jesus Christ. Greatly respected by all, "having served his generation, he fell on sleep."

Barr, Rev. John Campbell, is the second of eleven children of Samuel and Sibella (Bell) Barr, and was born in Huntingdon county, Pa., on the 4th day of January, 1824. His literary studies were pursued at Tuscarora Academy and at Jefferson College, Canonsburg, Pa. He graduated at this latter Institution in 1850. He studied theology in Cincinnati, in a seminary conducted for a few years by Rev. Drs. N. L. Rice, James Hoge and Willis Lord, and was licensed by the Cincinnati Presbytery in the Spring of 1853. He performed missionary work and taught in the western part of Ohio and in Indiana till the Fall of 1855, when he was called to the Church of Princeton, Ill., where he was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Rock River. In the Fall of 1857 he moved to Malden, Ill., to take charge of a new field, in which he was instrumental soon after in organizing a church, of which he became pastor. He continued in this field seven years, during six of which he supplied Arlington also, a church which he gathered and was instrumental in organizing. In 1864 he was called to a church newly organized at Geneseo, Ill., where he continued seven years; and in the Fall of 1871 was called to the Church of Alexandria, Huntingdon county, Pa., where he still remains as pastor. Mr. Barr is a good preacher, and a faithful and successful laborer in the Master's vineyard.

Barron, D. H., D.D., was born at Pine Grove Mills, Centre county, Pa., August 29th, 1828. He received his academical training at Milwood Academy, under the Rev. James Y. McGinnes, graduated at Jefferson College in 1855, and at the Western Theological Seminary in 1858. He was licensed in 1857 by the Presbytery of Allegheny City, was called to the Church of Mount Pleasant, and ordained and installed pastor by the Presbytery of Redstone, in 1858. He was called to the Church at Hollidaysburg, Pa., his present charge, in the Fall of 1861, and so has been pastor there over twenty-two years. Dr. Barron is an instructive and impressive preacher, and a faithful and valuable presbyter. His pastoral duties are discharged with great fidelity. His ministry has been largely blessed. He is held in high esteem by his brethren. His long pastorate at Hollidaysburg attests his prudence, usefulness and acceptableness, and has greatly endeared him to his congregation.

Bartholomew's Day, The Massacre of St. August 24th, 1572. On August 18th the wedding took place, in Paris, of Henri of Bearn, King of Navarre, the head of the Huguenot party, and Margaret of Valois, a sister to Charles IX, and daughter of Catherine de Medici. On this occasion a great number of Huguenot noblemen had assembled in Paris, and the impression which they made on the court and the populace seems to have been one of mingled hatred and fear. An incident added to the general threatening state of the situation. By a freak of his fickle mind, Charles IX seemed to have thrown himself into the arms of Admiral Coligny, and prepared to make front against the dowager-queen, his mother, the Duke of Anjou, his brother, and the party of the Guises. In view of this danger, the idea of Catherine, which she had often hinted at to her two sons, and repeatedly intimated to the papal legate and the ambassador of Philip II, namely, to kill all the Huguenots, suddenly ripened. At three o'clock in the morning of August 24th, Admiral Coligny was murdered in his house, and his body was thrown out of the window. He had been wounded on Friday, August 23d, and was sick in bed. Then the tocsin of Saint Germain-l'Auxerrois was sounded, and the general massacre began. The retinue of the bridegroom, lodged in the Louvre, was slain in the courtyard. All over the city the houses of the Huguenots were ransacked and pillaged and fired, and the inmates were drawn down into the street to be slaughtered. Those who attempted to flee were pursued and hunted like game. The king stood himself, and fired from a window in the palace. Between five and six thousand persons were thus killed in Paris, and by royal order the same scenes were enacted in all the great cities of France, Orleans, Bourges, Troyes, Lyons, Rouen and Toulouse. In all, about thirty thousand persons were murdered. As soon as the news was received in Rome, the canons of St. Angelo were fired, a solemn Te Deum was sung, and the Pope struck a medal, bearing on the one side his own portrait, and on the other a picture rudely representing the massacre. Roman Catholic writers defend the Pope, on the ground of ignorance, but it took, at all events, some time to make the medals.

Bateman, Rev. Newton, LL.D., was born in New Jersey, July 27th, 1822. He graduated at Illinois College in 1843, and studied theology at Lane Seminary, 1843-4. He was principal of a classical school in St. Louis, Mo., 1845-6; Professor in St. Charles College, Mo., 1847-50; principal of public school in Jacksonville, Ill., 1851-7; principal of Female Academy, 1857-8; State Superintendent of Public Instruction, 1858-74; and President of Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., 1875-81.

Beattie, Rev. T. Cumming, is the oldest son of David and Isabella Beattie, and was born in Scotchtown, N. Y., July 23d, 1854. He graduated at Princeton College in 1878; studied theology at Union Theological Seminary one year, and graduated at Princeton Seminary in 1882. June 27th, 1882, he was ordained and installed pastor of the large and flourishing church of Chester, N. Y., where he still continues, blessed in his labors and beloved by his congregation.

Beggs, Joseph, D.D., was born near Dunganon, county Tyrone, Ireland, September, 1830. He entered Belfast College in 1848, and spent one year under the instruction of the celebrated Dr. Henry Cooke. He then removed to this country, and immediately entered Lafayette College at Easton, Pa., from which institution he graduated in 1851, with the highest honor, as valedictorian of his class. He then took the full course at Princeton Theological Seminary, receiving his diploma in 1855. In May of the same year he was ordained by the Second Presbytery of Philadelphia, and installed as pastor of the Church of Roxborough in Philadelphia. In that charge he at once commenced a mission at the Falls of Schuylkill, a district of the city close by. On November 7th, 1856, he had that new mission organized into a church, and, in 1859, became its pastor. Under his ministry it soon grew into an important, self-sustaining congregation, and built a fine house of worship as well as an excellent parsonage, which are unincumbered with debt.

That church has proved one of the most successful enterprises in its Presbytery, and will soon celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of his installation as its first and only pastor.

Dr. Beggs is justly regarded as one of the wisest and most influential pastors in the city. For many years he has been the Stated Clerk of his Presbytery, and has taken an active part in all the affairs of that body, being looked up to for counsel and aid in every undertaking for the promotion of the cause of Christ and His Church within its bounds. In the year 1873 he was a delegate from the Presbyterian Church of this country to the General Assembly of Ireland, and delivered an address before that body in its meeting in Belfast, which was listened to with marked attention. The honorary degree of D. D. was conferred on him, in 1882, by Lafayette College, of which he was an alumnus.

Bell, David S., a younger brother of William A. Bell, entered into service as an elder in Tinkling Spring Church, not very many years before his brother finished his career. He had been, in very early life, the subject of religious impressions, which, as was too often the case forty-five years ago, were misapprehended by religious advisers, and he was prematurely admitted to the communion. But preserved by God's providence from going into courses of flagrant vice, and retaining the results of a pious mother's teachings, he was brought, a second time, to make a profession of faith, and thirty years or more of consistent living in the midst of great trials has proved the sincerity of his profession. He was, soon after this last step, called into the eldership. Here his characteristic sound sense, his earnest piety and his enterprise and energy have conspired to develop in him the most excellent feature of a ruling elder. Like his brother, he has always been ready for the post of duty, even when a post of sacrifice of personal ease and comfort; with increase of age, there does not appear any decrease of the most lively interest in the welfare of the church of which he is a member, or of the Church at large. Such is the confidence in his prudent and wise foresight, that he has acquired the cordial support of his colleagues in his measures, as well as that of the bulk of the people; and yet he has not presumed in putting himself forward, nor assumed the position of a dictator. It is a blessing of inestimable value to a church, to have such a man in the eldership. Though advanced in years, he has not yet reached a period when the infirmities of old age are likely to arrest his usefulness, and his position in one of the largest and most efficient churches of Lexington Presbytery will lead all to pray that his valuable life may be yet continued many years, and God's blessing be on him through all changes, till the last great change may introduce him to hear the plaudit, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Bell, William Allen, was introduced into the eldership of the Staunton Church, Va., at an early period of his adult life. The eldest son of pious parentage, he became, on reaching mature age, at once a comfort to his parents by his early piety, and an example to the younger members of the family. He soon settled on a farm, near Staunton, and became a successful tiller of the soil. With no ambition for office, he never sought its distinctions or its cares, but addressed himself to the honest and honorable vocation of a farmer, with the sound common sense which marked his character and an intelligent comprehension of his duty, derived, in part, from his native powers of discrimination between right and wrong, and, in part, from habitual association with his seniors in age and superiors in knowledge. On entering upon the duties belonging to the eldership, he displayed, at once, those enlarged and enterprising views of the position he held which at once placed him in the front rank with many of longer experiences. He was not only his pastor's fast friend and judicious counsellor, but the leader in every effort for increasing the pecuniary resources and developing the power of the church, as God's chosen agency for making the world better. Until, at a comparatively recent period, deacons were elected and ordained, he himself brought to the management of the secular interests of the church the same enterprise and efficient energy which he has evinced in the conduct of his private affairs, and after the Board of Deacons was constituted, he continued to take care for securing its full efficiency. He always made his arrangements to attend meetings of the higher courts to which he was appointed, with conscientious fidelity, at whatever risk might be incurred to his private interests. At one period, of several years' duration, owing to peculiar causes, no one of his colleagues was able to attend such meetings, and his regularity in that duty procured for him the complimentary title of "Standing Committee of Staunton Church to attend Synod, Presbytery, and often General Assembly." His last days, in 1877, were days of pain and suffering in the flesh, but the "joy of the Lord" was his exceeding "strength" to the closing hour.

Bell, William B., was born in Stafford county, Va., January 17th, 1811; removed to Montgomery, Ala., in 1834, and engaged in mercantile business. In 1842 the firm of W. B. and A. R. Bell was formed, and continued until 1875. During this long period of thirty-three years, and amidst no ordinary vicissitudes, and embarrassments at times, Mr. William Bell, with his worthy associate brother, maintained a character of stainless honor. In his vocation, as a merchant, he had the confidence and respect not only of his particular friends and customers, but of the community, for his undeviating rectitude and irreproachable purity and correctness of principle. In all matters of business, his own and others, intrusted to him, he discharged the obligations involved in them with scrupulous integrity. As a gentleman, he was courteous in his manners, and in all his intercourse in society kind and respectful. He was a man of sound judgment; cautious in forming his opinions, he was still more so in expressing them. He had a benevolent spirit, that disposed him not only to judge charitably, but to bestow favors whenever it was in his power. He had great strength of purpose, and though he pursued his objects noiselessly, he pursued them with untiring patience and perseverance.

As a Christian, his piety was intelligent and earnest, yet modest and unassuming. His whole deportment was that of a sincere follower of the meek and lowly Jesus. At an early period of his Christian life Mr. Bell was, by the unanimous suffrage of the church, elected to the sacred and responsible office of ruling elder. Having accepted and been solemnly set apart to the office, he was careful to "stir up the gift" that was in him, so that his service was most acceptable and useful. Few men better understood than he did the duties and responsibilities of the office of ruling elder, or had a more intelligent and unswerving attachment to the doctrines and government of the Presbyterian Church. He was eminently fitted by grace, and diligent endeavor and constant exercise, to fulfill the duties of his office. His true and tender heart carried very largely and lovingly the weight of the spiritual interests of the church, counselling and encouraging its members and in every pious way caring for them. His influence for good was seen and felt in everything pertaining to the prosperity of the church. He was always welcome among the families of the church, who knew him about as well as they did their pastor, and greatly respected and esteemed him. His interest in the children of the church and congregation, his anxiety for their religious instruction, and his zeal for the welfare of their souls, were such as to secure to him the warm affections of parents and children. He was superintendent of the Sabbath school for seventeen consecutive years; and in this department of service for Christ his efforts were made to the extent of his opportunities.

Mr. Bell was widely known to the ministers of the Presbyterian Church, and was greatly esteemed by them. His presence in the ecclesiastical courts of Presbytery and Synod, to which he was frequently delegated, and his counsels and services, were highly valued.

His last years were years of great physical debility and prostration. But his Christian trust and hope never forsook him; and amid the perishing elements of the outward man might be discerned very clearly the features of the inward man, renewed after the image of Him who created him.

Long ere the shadows of his evening fell around him he was fully prepared—"perfected"—"made meet" for the blissful realms of glory. He departed this life, at his residence in Montgomery, on the morning of the 1st day of January, 1879, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

"The memory of the just is blessed."

Benevolence, Bonificence. The former is the love of mankind in general, accompanied with a desire to promote their happiness, and is distinguished from the latter, which is the practice, while benevolence is the desire, of doing good. Benevolence must be universal, reaching to every man without exception; but beneficence cannot be so universal, for it is necessarily confined by several considerations, such as our knowledge of objects and their different circumstances, as well as our own abilities and opportunities of exercising them. The duties of benevolence include those we owe to men, purely on the ground of their being of the same species as ourselves, those we owe to our country, those we owe to families and individuals, and those we owe to God. The objects of our beneficence are likewise all those who are in the sphere of our influence and action, without respect of party or sect. The means of beneficence are communication of temporal supplies (Gal. vi, 6), prayer (Jas. v, 16), sympathy (Rom. xii, 15), Christian communion (Col. iii, 16).

Bible, The Anterior Probability of Its Character. "Whilst I attempt to show, as now I desire to do, that the Bible should be just the book it is, from considerations of anterior probability, I must expand the subject a little; dividing it, first, into the likelihood of a revelation at all; and secondly, into that of its expectable form and character.

"The first likelihood has its birth in the just benevolence of our heavenly Father, who, without dispute, never leaves His rational creatures maddled by some sort of guiding light, some manifestation of Himself, so needful to their happiness, some sure word of consolation in sorrow, or of brighter hope in persecution. That it must have been thus an a priori probability has been all along proved by the innumerable pretences of the kind so constant up and down the world; no nation ever existed in any age or country whose seers and wise men, of whatever name, have not been believed to hold converse with the Godhead. We may judge from this how probable it must ever have been held. The sages of Old Greece were sure of it, from reason; and not less sure, from accepted superstition, those who revered the Brahmin, or the priest of Heliopolis, or the medicine man among the Rocky Mountains, or the Llana of old Mexico. I know that our ignorance of some among the most brutalized species of mankind, as the Bushmen in Caffraria and the tribes of New South Wales, has failed to find among their rites anything akin to religion; but what may we not yet have to learn of good even about such poor outcasts? How shall we prove this negative? For aught we know their superstitions at the heart may be as deep and as deceitful as in others; and, even on the contrary side, the exception proves the rule; the rule that every people concluded a revelation so likely, that they have one and all contrived it for themselves.

Thus, shortly, of the first: and now, secondly, how should God reveal Himself to men? In such times as those when the world was yet young, and the Church concentrated in a family or an individual, it would probably be an immediate oral teaching; the Lord would speak with Adam; He would walk with Enoch; He would, in some pure, ethereal garb, talk with Abraham, as friend to friend. And thereafter, as men grew and worshippers were multiplied, He would give some favored servant a commission to be His ambassador: He would say to an Ezekiel, 'Go unto the house of Israel and speak my words to them.' He would bid Jeremiah, 'Take thee a roll of a book and write therein all the words that I have spoken to thee.' He would give Daniel a deep vision, not to be interpreted for ages, 'Shut up the words and seal the book even to the time of the end;' He would make Moses grave His precepts in the rock, and Job record his trials with a pen of iron. For a family, the Beatific Vision was enough; for a congregated nation, as once at Sinai, oral proclamations; for one generation or two around the world, the zeal and eloquence of some great 'multitude of preachers;' but, indubitably, if God willed to bless the universal race, and drop the honey of his words distilling down the hour-glass of Time, from generation to generation, even to the latter days, there was no plan more probable, none more feasible, than the pen of a ready writer.

Further, and which concerns our argument. What were likely to be the characteristic marks of such a revelation? Exclusively of a pervading holiness, and wisdom, and sublimity, which could not be dispensed with, and in some sort should be worthy of the God; there would be, it was probable, frequent evidences of man's infirmity, corrupting all he touches. The Almighty works no miracles for little cause; one miracle alone need be current throughout Scripture: to wit, that which preserves it clean and safe from every perilous error. But, in the succession of a thousand scribes, each copying from the other, needs must that the tired hand and misty eye would occasionally misplace a letter: this was no nodus worthy of a God's descent to dissipate by miracle.

Again: the original prophets themselves were men of various characters and times and tribes. God addresses men through their reason. He bound not down a seer 'with bit and bridle, like the horse that hath no understanding,' but spoke as to a rational being, 'What seest thou?' 'Hear my words;' 'Give ear unto my speech.' Was it not then likely that the previous mode of thought and providential education in each holy man of God should mingle irresistibly with his inspired teaching? Should not the herdsman of Tekoa plead in pastoral phrase, and the royal son of Amoz denounce with strong authority? Should not David, whilst a shepherd, praise God among his flocks, and when a king, cry, 'Give the King thy judgments?' The Bible is full of this human individuality; and nothing could be thought as humanly more probable; but we must, with this diversity, connect the other probability also, that which should show the work to be divine; which would prove (as is literally the case) that, in spite of all such natural variety, all such unbiassed freedom, both of thought and speech, there pervades the whole mass a oneness, a marvelous consistency, which would be likely to have been designed by God, though little to have been dreamt by man.

Once more on this full topic. Difficulties in Scripture were expectable for many reasons; I can only touch a few. Man is rational as he is responsible; God speaks to his mind and moral powers; and the mind rejoices and moralities grow strong in conquest of the difficult and search for the mysterious. The muscles of the spiritual athlete pant for such exertion, and without it they would dwindle into trepid imbecility. Curious man, courageous man, enterprising, shrewd and vigorous man, yet has a constant enemy to dread in his own indolence; now, a lion in the path will wake up Sloth himself; and the very difficulties of religion engender perseverance.

Additionally: I think there is somewhat in the consideration that, if all revealed truth had been utterly simple and easy, it would have needed no human interpreter; no enlightened class of men, who, according to the spirit of their times, and the occasions of their teaching, might, 'in season and out of season, preach the word, reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long suffering and doctrine.' I think there existed an anterior probability that Scripture should be, as it is, oftentimes difficult, obscure, and requiring the aid of many wise to its elucidation; because, without such characteristic, those many wise and good would never have been called for. Suppose all truth revealed as clearly and indisputably to the meanest intellect as a sun in addition is, where were the need or use of that noble Christian company who are everywhere man's almoners for charity and God's ambassadors for peace?

A word or two more, and I have done. The Bible would, as it seems to me probable, be a sort of double book; for the righteous and for the wicked; to one class a decoy, baited to allure all sorts of generous dispositions; to the other a trap, set to catch all kinds of evil inclinations. In these two senses, it would address the whole family of man; and every one should find in it something to his liking. Purity should there perceive green pastures and still waters, and a tender Shepherd for its innocent steps; and carnal appetite should here and there discover some darker spot, which the honesty of heaven had filled with memories of its chiefest servants' sins, some record of adultery or murder wherewith to feast his maw for condemnation. While the good man should find in it meat divine for every earthly need, the sneerer should proclaim it the very easiest manual for his jests and lewd profanities. The unlettered should not lack humble, may, vulgar, images and words, to keep himself in countenance; neither should the learned look in vain for reasonings; the poet for sublunaries; the curious mind for mystery; nor the sorrowing heart for prayer. I do discern, in that great Book, a wondrous adaptability to minds of every calibre; and it is just what might antecedently have been expected of a volume writ by many men at many different eras, yet all superintended by one master mind; of a volume meant for every age, and nation, and country and tongue and people; of a volume, which, as a two-edged sword, wounds the good man's heart with deep conviction, and cuts down 'the hoary head of him who goeth on still in his wickedness.'

"On the whole, respecting faults, or incongruities, or objectionable parts in Scripture, however to have been expected, we must recollect that the more they are viewed, the more the blemishes fade and are altered into beauties.

"A little child had picked up an old stone, defaced with time-stains; the child said the stone was dirty, covered with blotches of all colors; but his father brings a microscope, and shows to his astonished glance that what the child thought dirt is a forest of beautiful lichens, fruited mosses, and strange lilliputian plants, with shapely animacules hiding in the leaves, and rejoicing in their tiny shadow. Every blemish, justly seen, had turned to be a beauty; and nature's works are vindicated good, even as the Word of Grace is wise."—Topper's "Probabilities an Aid to Faith."

Bigler, Hon. William, was born at Shermansburg, Pa., January 1st, 1811. He received a fair school education, learned the printing business with his brother, from 1830 to 1833, at Bellefonte, and established and carried on successfully a paper in Clearfield for a number of years. He subsequently disposed of his paper and entered into mercantile pursuits. In 1841 he was elected to the State Senate, chosen Speaker in the Spring of 1843, and at the opening of the session of 1844. In October following, he was re-elected to the Senate. In 1849 he was appointed a Revenue Commissioner. In 1851 he was elected Governor of the State, serving for three years. During his term of office several very important measures were adopted by the Legislature, the principal of which were the establishing the office of County Superintendent of Common Schools, and the founding of the Pennsylvania Training School for Feeble-Minded Children.

In January, 1855, Governor Bigler was elected for the term of six years to the United States Senate, where he discharged his duty with ability and fidelity. He was a prominent delegate of the Constitutional Convention of 1873, and to his labors are ascribable a number of the beneficial features of this instrument. He was one of the earliest and most earnest champions of the Centennial Exposition of 1876, and represented Pennsylvania in the Board of Finance, and his efforts ministered greatly to its successful issue. A short time after this memorable occasion he departed this life, at his residence in Clearfield, Pa.

Governor Bigler was a gentleman of dignified bearing, firm purpose, good executive ability and honest efforts and aims. He was a useful elder of the Presbyterian Church at Clearfield, and threw his influence in favor of what he believed would exalt humanity and glorify God.

Big Spring Church, Newville, Pa. The early Presbyterians of Cumberland Valley had a fondness for naming their churches after springs. Hence we find in that territory Falling Spring, Rocky Spring, Middle Spring, Big Spring and Silvers Spring.

The Rev. Thomas Craighead (elsewhere noticed), was the first pastor of Big Spring congregation, or Hopewell, as it was then called. He entered into this relation with it in 1738. In regard to his salary, it is only recorded that, "A list of subscriptions being produced, the commissioners agreed that Mr. Craighead shall have the benefit of all future subscriptions." Previously to this settlement it would seem that Mr. Craighead was stated supply at Carlisle and Silvers Spring (or Upper and Lower Pennsborough), for, in 1738, it was ordered by presbytery "that the two societies in Pennsburg pay to Mr. Craighead the two-thirds of sixteen pounds for the half year that he was appointed to supply there, and that the people of Mr. Craighead's congregation make up the other third."

About the time of Mr. Craighead's settlement at Hopewell, there was some difficulty existing between that congregation and the one at Upper Pennsborough, in relation to the proposed erection of a meeting-house by the former. The nature and issue of this difficulty, the subjoined extracts from the Presbyterial Records will serve, in some degree, to explain:—

"June 22d, 1737. A supplication from the people of Hopewell being presented, requesting the concurrence of Presbytery to draw a call to Mr. Thomas Craighead, the Presbytery, finding some inconvenience in reference to the situation of one of their houses, don't see cause to concur with them at present, but do appoint Mr. Black to supply at Pennsboro' on the last Sabbath of July, and on the week following to convene that people and the people of Hopewell, at James McFarlan's, in order to inquire if Pennsboro' will agree that Hopewell build a meeting-house at Great Spring, and make a report thereof at our next."

"August 31st, 1737. Mr. Black reports that he supplied at Pennsboro', and convened the people and those of Hopewell on the Monday following, and heard them confer about the meeting-house proposed to be built at Great Spring, but the parties did not agree about the same."

Subsequently, "Presbytery voted, by a great majority, not to alter the bounds of the congregation of Pennsboro'," and "disapproved the people of Hopewell building a meeting-house just on the border of Pennsboro' congregation."

Mr. Craighead, though called in 1737, was not installed until October, 1738. This service was conducted by the Rev. Alexander Craighead, an "edict," by order of Presbytery, having been sent "to be published timeously before." After Mr. Craighead's decease, in June, 1739, Mr. James Lyon, of Ireland (and, at the time of his invitation, under the care of the Presbytery of New Castle), supplied the pulpit at Hopewell for some months. After his term of service had expired, Big Spring was connected with Rocky Spring and Middle Spring, as a charge. The Sessional records of the last mentioned congregation state (1742) that "the minister and elders of Big Spring, Middle Spring and Rocky Spring met at Middle Spring, in order to settle the division of the minister's labors among the three congregations." The arrangement agreed upon at this meeting was "that the minister's labors be equally divided in a third part to each place, as being most for the glory of God and good of his people." It was also, "upon the motion of the elders of Big Spring, left to them, the people, and Mr. Blair, to converse among themselves in respect to the subscriptions of the Big Spring congregation." Mr. Blair was installed pastor of these churches, December 27th, 1742. (See Blair, Rev. John.)

The next point at which it is possible to write with any confidence of the regular occupancy of the pulpit at Big Spring, is 1759. In that year the Rev. George Duffield was installed over Carlisle and Big Spring. According to the terms of his call, one-third of his time was to be given to Big Spring and two-thirds to Carlisle. In 1761 an effort was made by the former congregation to obtain the half of Mr. Duffield's labors, but this effort was not sanctioned, for reasons which were regarded as satisfactory by Presbytery, and among which was an apprehension that Mr. Duffield's constitution would not be able to endure, any length of time, the fatigue of being the one-half of his time at Big Spring. Mr. Duffield was called, in 1771, to the pastorate of Old Pine Street Church, Philadelphia. (See his Sketch.)

Mr. Duffield's successor at Big Spring was the Rev.

William Linn. The congregation at this time seems to have increased sufficiently to justify them in securing the time and labor of a pastor for themselves alone. When, precisely, Mr. Linn was called to this pastorate, cannot be ascertained, for it was registered in that portion of the Records of Presbytery which cannot be found. It was, however, there is strong reason to believe, before the year 1778. In 1781 Mr. Linn was released from the charge, at his own request, that he might accept the Presidency of Washington Academy, in Somerset county, Maryland.

A call, dated 21st March, 1786, was presented by the congregation to the Rev. Samuel Wilson, which was accepted. Mr. Wilson remained with them until his death, which occurred in March, 1799. In this call (a copy of which is yet in the hands of the descendants of Mr. Wilson, at Newville), the congregation engaged to pay him "the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds, Pennsylvania currency, in specie, and allow him the use of the dwelling house, barn and all the clear land on the glebe, possessed by our former minister; also, plenty of timber for rails and firewood; likewise a sufficient security for the payment of the above mentioned sums during his incumbency." The Rev. Joshua Williams was called to Big Spring in 1801, and installed, April 11th, 1802. (See his Sketch.)

Soon after the withdrawal of Dr. Williams from the Church at Big Spring (1830), the Rev. Robert McCachren, a native of Chester county, Pa., and a licentiate of the Presbytery of New Castle, was called to be its pastor. This call he accepted, and in this relation he continued until it was resigned in October, 1851. Mr. McCachren's labors were not without encouraging success. The number of members added to the congregation during his connection with it was four hundred and eighty-five. During the second year of his ministry the church was favored with a season of the revival of religion, which resulted in an accession of seventy-three to the list of communicants. Some of the precious fruits of that awakening remain there to this day. Mr. McCachren, since his resignation, has not accepted of another charge. He still resides in Newville, preaching as he has opportunity, and highly esteemed by the community in which he has so long lived. Mr. McCachren's successors have been, Rev. J. S. H. Henderson, 1852-62; Rev. Philip H. Mowry, D. D., December, 1863-8, and Rev. E. Erskine, D. D., who has filled the pastorate since 1870.

The earliest elders of Big Spring Church now known were John Carson, John McKeegan, John Bell, David Ralston, Sr., Thomas Jacobs, Alexander Thompson, William Lindsay, Acheson Laughlin, all of whom served under the ministry of the Rev. Samuel Wilson, and some of them part of the time of his successor.

The first church erected at Big Spring stood in the graveyard now in use by the congregation, within vacated by the Indians. Here he spent the remaining forty-four years of his long life, and was completely identified with and took an active part in all that pertained to its interest in both temporal and spiritual things. He was one of the original members of the Presbyterian Church, organized April 1st, 1837, and became a ruling elder, December 8th, 1849. Hence, as he departed this life July 27th, 1879, he was a member for forty-four years, an elder for thirty years, and Superintendent of the Sunday school for twenty-five years, always manifesting a deep interest in the school.

Mr. Bliss was a man of unusually sound judgment, great firmness of purpose, deep conscientiousness, and hence, was relied on in Church and State. His brethren in the Church sought and highly valued his counsels; and the same was the case in the political world, and he was often called upon to occupy honorable positions in the State.

A lawyer by profession, he gained not only an honorable position at the Bar, but also a goodly share of this world's goods, which he bountifully used for the Church and for all worthy benevolent objects. He held himself to be the Lord's steward.

Body, Man's, Changing Perpetually. J. P. Cooke, Professor of Chemistry, in Harvard University, says: "The materials of our bodies are being constantly renewed, and the great mass of their structure changes in less than a year. At every motion of your arm, and at every breath you draw, a portion of the muscles concerned is actually burnt up in the effort. During life, in some utterly mysterious manner, beyond the range of all human science, the various gases and vapors of the atmosphere, together with a small amount of a few earthy salts, are elaborated into various organized structures. They first pass into the organism of the plant, and thence are transferred into the body of the animal; but no sooner are they firmly built into the animal tissues than a destructive change begins, by which, before long, they are restored to the air or the soil, only to renew the same cycle of ceaseless change. Life, during its whole existence, is an untiring builder, the oxygen of the atmosphere a fell destroyer, and when at last the builders cease, then the spirit takes its flight into the eternal world, and leaves the frail tenement to its appointed end. Dust returns to the dust, and these mortal mists and vapors to the air.

"I know that there are some who entertain a vague fear that these well-established facts of chemistry conflict with one of the most cherished doctrines of the Christian faith; but, so far from this, I find that they elucidate and confirm it. Modern scientific discoveries have shown that our only abiding substance is merely the passing shadow of our outward form; that these bones and muscles are dying within us every day; that our whole life is an unceasing metempsychosis, and that the final death is but one phase of the perpetual change. Thus the idea of a spiritual body becomes not only a possible conception, but, more than this, it harmonizes with the whole order of nature; and now that we can better trace the process of growth in the organic world, and understand more of their hidden secrets, the inspired words of Paul have acquired fresh power, and convey to us a deeper meaning than they ever gave to the early Fathers of the Church. Chemistry has shown us that it is the form alone (not the substance) of our mortal bodies which is permanent, and that we retain our PERSONALITY under constant change; and lastly, in organic nature, the sprouting of the seed, the breaking of the bird from the egg, the bursting of the butterfly from the chrysalis, and ten thousand other transmutations not less wonderful, which we are daily witnessing around us, all unite their analogy to elucidate and confirm the glorious and comforting doctrine of a material resurrection in form."—Religion and Chemistry, pp. 103-106.

Book of Life, OR BOOK OF THE LIVING, OR BOOK OF THE LORD (Psa. lxxix, 28). It is very probable that these descriptive phrases, which are frequent in Scripture, are taken from the custom observed generally in the courts of princes, of keeping a list of persons who are in their service, of the provinces which they govern, of the officers of their armies, of the number of their troops, and sometimes even of the names of their soldiers. Thus Moses desires God rather to blot him out of his book than to reject Israel (Exod. xxxii, 32). When it is said that any one is written in the book of life, it means that he particularly belongs to God, is enrolled among the number of his friends and servants. When it is said, "blotted out of the book of life," this signifies erased from the list of God's friends and servants; as those who are guilty of treachery are struck off the roll of officers belonging to a prince. It is probable, also, that the primitive Christian churches kept lists of their members, in which those recently admitted were enrolled; these would take a title analogous to that of the book of life, or the Lamb's book of life; as this term occurs principally in the Revelation, it seems likely to be derived from such a custom (Rev. iii, 5; xxii, 19). Something of the same nature we have in Isaiah iv, 3, where the prophet alludes to such as "were written among the living in Jerusalem;" that is, enrolled among the citizens of that city of God, to which the Christian Church was afterwards compared. In a more exalted sense, the book of life signifies the book of justification; or the register of those who through grace have been chosen to eternal life in Christ (Luke x, 20; Phil. iv, 3; Rev. xiii, 8; xvii, 8; xx, 12, 15; xxi, 27).

Bovelle, Rev. John V., son of Dr. Stephen Bovelle, by his second wife, was born June 6th, 1799, at Abingdon, Va. He was educated at Washington College, Tenn., and was licensed to preach, in 1819, by the Presbytery of Abingdon. In 1821 he was elected successor to Rev. John W. Doak, M.D., D.D., in the Presidency of Washington College. He held this office eight years, during which time he was also pastor of the Salem and Leesburg churches. In the Spring of 1829 he removed to Edgar county, Ill., and died there, November 18th, 1830. He was held in high esteem as an eloquent and forcible preacher of the gospel.

Bovelle, Stephen, D. D., of Huguenot descent, was born in Cumberland county, Pa., in 1770, and was educated at Dickinson College, under the Presidency of Dr. Nisbet. When he was about twenty-one years of age his father removed his family to the territory of Ohio. Stephen being the oldest child, soon afterward went to Kentucky, put himself under the tuition of Dr. David Rice, and under him studied theology. He was licensed to preach in 1796 or 1797. In 1798 he left Kentucky and went to Abingdon, Va. After two or three years he became a member of the Presbytery of Greenville, Tenn. Upon its dissolution, in 1801, he had assumed the pastorate of the Sinking Spring and Green Spring Churches, in Virginia, within the bounds of the Presbytery of Abingdon. Here was his home for nearly thirty-five years. Besides his pastoral work he was much of the time engaged in teaching. In 1811, and again in 1819, he made, by appointment of the General Assembly, missionary tours into Indiana. In 1837 he removed to Missouri. He died at the age of seventy, in December, 1840, at Paris, Ill., while visiting relatives in that place.

Dr. Bovelle commanded a wide influence as an instructive preacher of the Word. An occasional sermon published in the National Preacher called forth from Dr. A. Alexander, the remark, it is said, that he knew of no minister of our Church in the Western country, who could write a better sermon than Dr. Stephen Bovelle.

Boyd, Adam, was the son of John Boyd and Elizabeth Young, daughter of Sir William Young. He was born in Pennsylvania in 1746. His grandfather, John Boyd, was born in or near Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1690. Born in this country, the grandson yet inherited the peculiarities of the Scotch character. By occupation Mr. Boyd was a carpenter. He was still a young man when the War of the Revolution opened, and entered into the conflict with patriotic order, serving through four campaigns, and participating in the battles of Brandywine, Germantown and Princeton, as an officer. At the close of his military career he held the place of chief of transportation. In 1783 he removed from Cumberland county to Harrisburg, and made it his permanent home. Here he was elected an elder of the Presbyterian Church, in 1794. Mr. Boyd bore a high reputation among his fellow-citizens, and was often selected by them for positions of honor and trust, serving as the presiding officer of the first Town Council, as County Treasurer for many years, as County Commissioner, as Director of the Poor, as Chief Burgess, and in other important trusts. As a citizen and public officer, he stood very high in the estimation of the people, and was honored with office as long as he would consent to accept it. He was a man of fine abilities and literary taste, decided in his opinions, of industrious habits and strictest integrity. In person, he was stoutly built, of blue eyes, sandy hair and fair complexion, benevolent in heart and life, kind and genial in countenance and bearing. As an officer of the Church, he was greatly esteemed and beloved, and enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him. The interests of the Church and of Zion at large engaged his warm devotion. His death occurred on May 14th, 1811, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the twenty-first year of his eldership.

Boyd, Rev. Joseph R., pastor of the Church of Lancaster, O., was born in Guernsey county, O., July 23d, 1835. His parents were members of the United Presbyterian Church, at New Concord, O. He graduated at Franklin College in 1859, entered the United Presbyterian Seminary that Autumn, and was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Allegheny, in the Spring of 1862. After spending another year in the seminary, he settled in a church in the neighborhood of where he was born and brought up. Having preached there four years, he was sent to a mission field under the care of the Presbytery of Xenia, at Wilmington, O.; where he remained two years, and while there changed his views on the matter of close communion. Leaving that field and the church in the Autumn of 1869, he immediately settled at Liberty, Indiana, and connected himself with the Presbytery of Whitewater. In the pastorate of this church he continued until 1872, when he received and accepted a call to the church of which he now has charge, and in which, during the twelve years of his ministry, he has labored with a good deal of success. He is a practical and faithful preacher, conscientious in discharging duty, prosecutes his work with energy, and is esteemed for his consistent and exemplary character.

Bradford, Rev. William H., was born in Cooperstown, N. Y., August 5th, 1814, the youngest of ten children of Esek and Huldah (Skinner) Bradford, and of the sixth generation from William Bradford, second Governor of Plymouth Colony. He prepared for college at the Cortland Academy, Homer, and graduated from Hamilton in 1833, with Rev. Julius Foster, Rev. S. P. M. Hastings, Rev. Dr. David Malin and Prof. Oren Root among his classmates. He then studied law for two years, designing, perhaps, to make that his profession; but he had publicly professed the Saviour in the Church at Homer, while attending the academy there, and his vows to the Lord turned him to the ministry. Finishing the curriculum at Auburn Theological Seminary, he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Cayuga, and in 1838 was ordained by the Presbytery of Tioga, and installed in Berkshire, N. Y., the only parish in which he ever settled. In 1840 he entered the office of the New York Evangelist, and spent seventeen years there as assistant and principal editor. The main work of his life was performed in this situation, and performed with consummate grace and ability. The most unassuming and gentle of men, he wielded a ready and powerful pen, guided by a faultless taste and supplied by large and varied knowledge, escaping the irritations which editors almost universally produce, and yet free and frank and positive in what he wrote. He died, April 1st, 1861. Mr. Bradford inspired invariable respect, and there was a charm about him that drew all hearts to him. Seldom are intellect, intelligence, cultivation and energy so combined with modesty and attractiveness.

Briggs, Charles Augustus, D. D., eldest son of Alanson T. and Sarah (Berrian) Briggs, was born in the city of New York, January 15th, 1841.

CHARLES AUGUSTUS BRIGGS, D.D.

He studied at the University of Virginia, 1857-60; the Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1860-63, and the University of Berlin, Germany, 1866-69. Four years were spent in mercantile pursuits with his father, in the city of New York. He became pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Roselle, N. J., in 1870, and Professor of Hebrew and Cognate languages in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, in 1871, where he still remains. In 1880 Dr. Briggs became one of the founders and managing editors of the Presbyterian Review. Besides numerous articles and addresses in various newspapers, periodicals and encyclopedias, he translated and edited, in association with others, the commentaries on the Psalms and Ezra in Lange's Commentaries and also Biblical Study in 1883. Dr. Briggs is a gentleman of genial spirit and winning address. He is a diligent and enthusiastic student, a vigorous writer, an independent thinker, and holds a high rank as a scholar. He fills most acceptably the Professorship which he now occupies in the Theological Seminary of which he was once a student, and is highly esteemed by his brethren for his excellent social qualities, Christian character and acknowledged erudition.

Brown, Rev. Edward John, is the second child of Matthew and Martha Brown, who were natives of Argyleshire, Scotland. He was born December 22d, 1849, where Avondale, a suburb of Cincinnati, now stands. He was graduated from Hanover College, Hanover, Ind., with the valedictory of his class, in the year 1873. He then entered Lane Theological Seminary, and taking the full course, graduated in 1876. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Cincinnati, in the Spring of 1875. During the Summer of 1875 he supplied the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church of London, Ohio. After supplying the Presbyterian Church of Harrison, O., about a year, from the completion of his theological course, he accepted a call to the pastorate of said church, and was ordained and installed, April 26th, 1877. He resigned this charge October, 1882, and accepted an invitation to supply the First Presbyterian Church of Newton, Kansas. Mr. Brown is a man of sincere piety, strict integrity and large benevolence, ever ready to assist by his means, as well as by his sympathy, the needy and the unfortunate. He is a faithful pastor, and preaches with earnestness and plainness, desiring to be understood by his audience.

Brown, Samuel Robbins, D.D., was born at Ellington, Ct., June 16th, 1810. He graduated at Yale College in 1832. He was Professor in the Deaf and Dumb Institute, New York city, 1832-5; in Columbia Theological Seminary, 1836-7; in Union Theological Seminary, 1837-8. He was ordained October 14th, 1838; Foreign Missionary, Hong Kong, China, 1838-46, without charge; New York city, 1847-9; teacher at Owasco, N. Y., 1850-2; pastor (R. D.) Sandbeach, N. Y., 1852-8; Foreign Missionary, Kanagawa, Japan, 1859-63; Foreign Missionary, Yokohama, Japan, 1862-7; United States, 1867-70; Foreign Missionary, Nagasaki, Japan, 1870.

Bush, Rev. Samuel W., was a native of Virginia, but brought up in Albany, N. Y., in a religious circle, and in the First Church, largely under the ministry of the sainted Dr. Henry R. Weed, and with the fine advantages of the academy of which Dr. T. Romeyn Beck was the principal, and Rev. Dr. Peter Bullions the classical professor. On reaching his majority, he read law at Lenox, Mass., and edited a newspaper, but some time after his admission to the Bar he returned to the ministry, and pursued theological study at Auburn Seminary, passing through the full course, 1836-9. He exercised his ministry at Skaneateles, Norwich, Cooperstown and Binghamton, and filled the chaplaincy of the Binghamton Inebriate Asylum for ten years, and until his death, in the seventieth year of his age, March 21st, 1877. Modest and retiring, he did not "mind high things," and yet his appearance and manners as a gentleman, his good understanding and intelligence, his manifest sincerity and his unflinching and unfailling devotion to his calling, introduced him into cultured congregations, and made him acceptable and useful to them. Particularly was he adapted to the last post he held. His sympathy and gentleness, and patience and Christian benevolence, his assiduity and judgment, made him the best of counsellors and succorers for the victims of vice whom he sought to reclaim, and among them, perhaps, he performed the most valuable labor of his life.

Bushnell, Ebenezer, D.D., was born November 18th, 1822, at Granville, Ohio, to which village his parents Thomas and Charlotte (Bailey) Bushnell removed from Norwich, Conn. Of the same stock sprang Dr. Albert Bushnell, the heroic African missionary, his cousin and dear friend. Entering the Western Reserve College in his twentieth year, he graduated in his twenty-fourth. In spite of hindrance from weak eyesight, he came out third in a class which claimed a number of able men. Studying under the Faculty of Theology, then joined to Western Reserve, he was licensed to preach April, 1848. Becoming Tutor in the college he was not ordained until June 15th, 1851, at Burton, Ohio, where he was pastor until April 1st, 1857, the date of his removal to Tremont, Ohio. Here he labored over twenty-five years, resigning in September, 1882, to return to the service of his alma mater as Treasurer of the new Western Reserve University at Cleveland. Meantime he had served his Synod, the Western Reserve and afterwards the Toledo, as Stated or Permanent Clerk, for about twelve years, and his college as Trustee from 1861. In 1879 he was made, by President Hayes, Visitor at Annapolis Naval Academy and an honored guest at the White House. In close cooperation with Mr. Hayes, he helped to establish the Burchard Library, endowed 1873, by the President's uncle, a parishioner and devoted friend, and the Green Spring Academy, founded 1881. While earnestly serving the public, he educated seven sons and daughters, and used to say: "I take seven children to church and am always sure of a congregation." Dr. Bushnell, as a preacher, leader and man has been a light that "shineth unto all that are in the house," his house being his own Church, Presbytery, Synod and University. He has never published save for them, and that in the newspapers of the day. He is a laborer who makes every field filled by him productive, and among the fruits are loving friendships in many hearts, marked with not a single thorn.

Bushnell, Rev. Horace, the second child of Rev. Horace and Caroline (Hastings) Bushnell, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, March 31st, 1836. Having graduated at Farmers' College, in 1859, he entered Lane Theological Seminary the same year, and completed the regular course of study in the Spring of 1862. He was licensed to preach by the Miami Association of Congregational ministers, in the Spring of 1861, but ordained by Madison Presbytery (N. S.), September 30th, 1863.

During fourteen years he supplied various small churches in Southern Indiana, and in the Spring of 1877 removed to Kansas, and was sent by the Synodical Missionary to Minneapolis, a new town on the Solomon river. Here he remained for nearly five years, when, being called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Concordia, in the same State, he removed there, and was installed pastor, January 11th, 1882, in which relation he still continues. He is a good preacher, active in the Master's service, and has the divine blessings on his labors.

Butler, Rev. Henry Seymour, A. M., was born in the city of New York, December 19th, 1840. He was the youngest child of Henry and Martha (Hinsdale) Butler, who gave him to the ministry from his birth. Having graduated at the College of New Jersey, in 1862, he taught the Academy at Mahopac Falls, N. Y., for more than a year, and then entered the Theological Seminary in Princeton, from which he received his diploma in April, 1866, being at that time a Tutor in the College.

Having received a call from the churches of Columbus and Bustleton, N. J., he was ordained, in October, 1866, by the Presbytery of Burlington, and duly installed. This pastoral relation was dissolved, on account of sickness, in April, 1868, and the year following was spent in supplying pulpits in Westchester, N. Y., and elsewhere.

With restored health he accepted a call to Clearfield, Pa., and in June, 1869, entered upon a pastorate of nearly fifteen years in that place. In January, 1884, he received a unanimous call to the Presbyterian Church of Blirstown, N. J., and was installed by the Presbytery of Newton, in April of that year, becoming, by his office, President of the Board of Trustees of the Blirstown Presbyterian Academy. Mr. Butler was Moderator of the Presbytery of Huntingdon, in the years 1876 and 1877, and of the Synod of Harrisburg, in 1880-81, and, by appointment of the General Assembly, Convener of the new Synod of Pennsylvania, at Harrisburg, in October, 1882. With deep regret and sorrow he was dismissed from the Presbytery of Huntingdon to take up the work to which God had called him, in New Jersey, February 5th, 1884.

Calhoun, Rev. Simeon Howard, was born in Boston, August 15th, 1804, and died at Buffalo, December 14th, 1876. He was graduated at Williams College in 1829; studied law; was converted, and came back to his Alma Mater as Tutor. In 1837 he went to the Levant, as Agent of the American Bible Society; but in 1844 became a missionary under the American Board, subsequently under the Presbyterian Board. His field of operation was the Seminary at Abeik, on the slopes of Lebanon. He returned home in 1874. Mr. Calhoun was a most devoted missionary, and the epithet he bore, the "Cedar of Lebanon," proves how he was regarded. He was rarely gifted, yet content to spend his life in comparative obscurity. He published, in Arabic, Scripture Helps, Beirut, second edition, 1869.

Calvin in the Prayer Book. A recent writer quotes the highly respected authority of J. H. Blunt, in his "Annotated Book of Common Prayer," against the charge that certain important parts of the Episcopal Prayer Book, viz.: the Sentences, the Exhortation, Confession and Absolution, were borrowed from Continental Presbyterian liturgies. Mr. Blunt says: "It must be concluded that those who revised the Prayer Book in 1552 were entirely responsible for its composition." "The General Confession appears to be an original composition of some of the revisers;" and "the Absolution was composed by the revisers of 1552, evidently with the old form of absolution which was used in the Prime and Compline services before them."

It might be sufficient to reply to this that the Prayer Book of 1549 had none of these features, while the Strasburg Liturgy of John Calvin, which was published in England between that date and the issue of the Revised Book of Common Prayer, contained them all. The Strasburg Protestants had taken refuge from persecution in England, where they had a congregation of their own at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire.

Their pastor, whose name was Latinized into Pollanus, had published, in 1551, an edition of their Order of Worship. This was in the hands of the revisers of the Anglican Liturgy; and since no scruple was felt at borrowing aid from Presbyterian sources in the preparation of this work, or in carrying forward the English Reformation in general, it would seem to be plain, prima facie, to what source the revisers of 1552 were indebted for the new elements thus introduced. That there were in the Sarum Missal, and in the older liturgies from which it was compiled, forms corresponding to some of these—the Absolution, for instance—it is by no means intended to deny. On the other hand, in none of them is there anything closely resembling the "Exhortation" or the "Sentences." Candid Episcopal writers, therefore, like Bishop Brownell (Commentary on the Prayer Book, page 73), Archbishop Lawrence (Sermons on the Thirty-nine Articles, page 209), and Rev. Evan Daniel, the most recent and exact writer of all, in his "History and Contents of the Book of Common Prayer," do not hesitate to admit these facts. The latter says: "From this work (the Strasburg Liturgy of John Calvin, published in England by Valerandus Pollanus) we probably derived the Introductory Sentences, and the Exhortation, Confession and Absolution."

Calvinism. This name "is used to designate, not the opinions of an individual, but a mode of religious thought, or a system of religious doctrines, of which the person whose name it bears was an eminent expounder. There have been from the beginning only three generically distinct systems of doctrine, or modes of conceiving and adjusting the facts and principles understood to be revealed in the Scriptures: the Pelagian, which denies the guilt, corruption and moral impotence of man, and makes him independent of the supernatural assistance of God. At the opposite pole is the Calvinistic, which emphasizes the guilt and moral impotence of man, exalts the justice and sovereignty of God, and refers salvation absolutely to the undeserved favor and new creative energy of God. Between these comes the manifold and elastic system of compromise once known as Semi-Pelagianism, and in modern times as Arminianism, which admits man's original corruption, but denies his guilt; regards redemption as a compensation for innate, and consequently irresponsible, disabilities, and refers the moral restoration of the individual to the co-operation of the human with the divine energy, the determining factor being the human will."

Although Calvin was not the first to formulate the system which goes by his name, to him, nevertheless, justly belongs the praise of presenting to the world the first and grandest work of systematic divinity—of recasting Augustinianism in its Protestant form, and of handing it to the modern world stamped with its great author's name. By him Calvinism and its correlatives, Presbyterianism in the Church and Republicanism in the State, were, though not invented, advocated and disseminated with transcendent ability and success. From him his doctrines passed to that "apostolical succession" of Bullinger, Turretin, Witsius, John Owen and Jonathan Edwards, to the Synod of Dort (1618-19) and the Westminster Assembly (1638), and so to the churches of France, Switzerland, Holland, England and Scotland, to the Independents, the Baptists, and to the Presbyterians in all lands.

In glancing at Calvin's "peculiar way of apprehending the truth," Dr. Henry, of Berlin, says:—

"The decisive rule of knowledge he found in the Holy Scriptures. Justification through Christ he made his central doctrine. But Calvin was not content to look through the glass darkly. He wished to go behind it, by the help of illumining thought, and with a sublime courage, born of faith, wished every disciple of his to do the same. A child beholds the sky and thinks no more about it. Calvin looks at the spiritual firmament like an astronomer. In his thoughts he gazes upon God's countenance and upon his decrees. This all men dare not do. They fear to penetrate the unfathomable abyss. Calvin, void of fear and bold, is borne thither upon the wings of his living faith. He knows that he is one of the elect of God. His predominant thought, that God only is powerful, that before Him man is nothing, a vessel of God's wrath or of God's grace, as God pleases, led him, however, to constant prayer to the living God; greatly in contrast with the habits of modern thinkers, to whom God is but a law, to whom self is God. Starting from this great thought, Calvin shows that our Maker, with foreknowledge of salvation and destruction, determined beforehand that both should be; that there should be saved souls and lost souls; and decreed their safety or their ruin. Here we find an abyss of the world spiritual, for none know how sin, with its results, is a thing possible to the Holy One, who has decreed our existence as it is. Zwingli had taught the same truth as did Calvin. Luther had also unfolded it to Erasmus, when the latter declared that man could deliver himself by good works. They did not explain the mystery. Its solution lies in the secret counsels of the Most High. Calvin dwells upon this mysterious truth, which lies behind that grace of God which overwhelms him. We here cry: 'Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past finding out!' But Calvin felt God's Spirit moving him to blazon triumphantly the great thought of God's sovereignty and the utter dependence of man, in order to dash in pieces the self-righteous hypocrisy of Romanism to its very foundations, just as Augustine, in his day, smote Pelagian self-righteousness. Eternal judgment resounds in his words with thunder tones, alarming mortals. This same strong grasping of great foundation truths has given to Calvin's theology its peculiar coloring, to Calvin's soul its lovely piety, and to the world a new impulse. If the reproach met him that he did away with free will, he answered with renewed force, 'Commune with your own heart; it will condemn your slothfulness; your conscience will bear witness to your moral freedom.' The Church of Calvin abounded in active benevolence. Many Christian souls may not be able to follow Calvin in this flight of his thought, yet these same souls will render their thanks to God that Calvin taught the deeper meaning of the Lord's Supper; that he preserved the sacrament from becoming a mere memorial act, after the conception of Zwingli."

"There can be no better criterion of the character of a system of religious doctrines than the effects which the belief of them produces. 'Grapes do not grow on bramble bushes. Illustrious natures do not form themselves on narrow and cruel theories. . . . The practical effect of a belief is the real test of its soundness. Where we find an heroic life appearing as the uniform fruit of a particular mode of opinion, it is childish to argue, in the face of fact, that the result ought to have been different.' 'A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit.' Of this test Calvinism has no reason to be either ashamed or afraid."

Calvinism is productive of the highest degree of moral excellence. "I am going to ask you," says Froude, who is sometimes spoken of as an assailant of Calvinism, "to consider how it came to pass that, if Calvinism is indeed the hard and unreasonably creed which modern enlightenment declares it to be, it has possessed such singular attractions in past times for some of the greatest men that ever lived, and how, being, as we are told, fatal to morality, because it denies free will, the first symptom of its operation, wherever it established itself, was to obliterate the distinction between sins and crimes, and to make the moral law the rule of life for States as well as persons. I shall ask you again, why, if it be a creed of intellectual servitude, it was able to inspire and sustain the bravest efforts ever made by man to break the yoke of unjust authority? When all else had failed, when patriotism has covered its face and human courage has broken down, when intellect has yielded, as Gibbon says, 'with a smile or a sigh,' content to philosophize in the closet and abroad to worship with the vulgar, when emotion and sentiment and tender imaginative piety have become the handmaids of superstition, and have dreamt themselves into forgetfulness that there is any difference between lies and —; the slavish form of the belief called Calvinism, in one or other of its many forms, has borne ever an inflexible front to illusion and mendacity, and has preferred rather to be ground to powder like flint than to bend before violence or melt under encraving temptation." In illustration of this he mentions William the Silent, Luther, Knox, Andrew Melville, the Regent Murray, Coligny, Cromwell, Milton, Bunyan, and says of them: "These were men possessed of all the qualities which give nobility and grandeur to human nature—men whose life was as upright as their intellect was commanding and their public aims untainted with selfishness, unalterably just where duty required them to be stern, but with the tenderness of a woman in their hearts, frank, true, cheerful, humorous; as unlike sour fanatics as it is possible to imagine any one, and able in some way to sound the key-note to which every brave and faithful heart in Europe instinctively vibrated."

For attestation of the truth, that Calvinism has uniformly raised the moral standard of both individuals and communities by exalting the Sovereignty of God, and emphasizing the moral law, we have but to compare the Waldensians with the other Italians, Geneva under Calvin's rule with its condition before or since, the Huguenots with their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, the Jansenists with the Jesuits, the English Puritans with the courtiers of Charles II, and finally, all those sections of America settled by the Puritans and the Presbyterians of Scotland, France and Holland with those settled by men of other faiths, North America with South America.

Calvinism has ever been the ardent and effective friend of civil liberty. Charles I, of England, gave as the reason why his father, James I, had subverted the republican form of government of the Scottish Church, that the presbyterial and monarchical forms of government did not harmonize. And De Tocqueville, admitting the same, calls Calvinism "a democratic and republican religion." Calvinism created, under God, the Dutch Republic, and made it "the first free nation to put a girdle of empire around the world." "It would certainly be unjust and futile," says Motley, "to detract from the vast debt which that Republic owed to the Genevan Church. The Reformation had entered the Netherlands by the Walloon gate (that is, through the Calvinists). The earliest and most eloquent preachers, the most impassioned converts, the sublimest martyrs, had lived, preached, fought, suffered and died with the precepts of Calvin in their hearts. The fire which had consumed the last vestige of royal and sacerdotal despotism throughout the independent Republic had been lighted by the hands of Calvinists.

"Throughout the blood-stained soil of France, too, the men who were fighting the same great battle as were the Netherlanders against Philip II and the Inquisition, the valiant cavaliers of Dauphiny and Provence, knelt on the ground before the battle, smote their iron breasts with their mailed hands, uttered a Calvinistic prayer, sang a Psalm of Marot, and then charged upon Guise or upon Joyeuse, under the white plume of the Bearnese. And it was on the Calvinistic weavers and clothiers of Rochelle that the Great Prince relied in the hour of danger, as much as on his mounted chivalry."

On every side we find the clearest evidence that Calvinists have been the devoted friends of civil liberty. Such was Switzerland, not only during those periods when she was most free, but those in which she struggled, however unsuccessfully, for her freedom. Such were the Protestant non-conformists from the days of the Reformation to the death of Queen Elizabeth. Such were the Presbyterians in the days of the first Charles. Such were those noble men, the Huguenots of New York and New Jersey, as well as others of their suffering companions, who fled from France, and sealed their testimony with their blood, on the fatal revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Such also were the Puritans of New England, who, through the favor of Divine Providence, opposed, though not a bolder, a more successful resistance to despotic power. With the courage of heroes and the zeal of martyrs, they struggled for and obtained the charter of liberty now enjoyed by the British nation. Even the historian Hume, whose prepossessions all lay on the side of absolute monarchy, and who was sufficiently prejudiced against the Bible, was constrained to the confession, "that the precious spark of liberty had been kindled, and was preserved by the Puritans alone, and that it was to this sect the English owe the whole freedom of their constitution."

The vast influence of Calvinism in achieving American Independence is too well known almost to require any definite and detailed statement. "We are," says Bancroft, "proud of the free States that fringe the Atlantic. The Pilgrims of Plymouth were Calvinists; the best influence in South Carolina came from the Calvinists of France. William Penn was the disciple of the Huguenots; the ships from Holland, that first brought colonists to Manhattan, were filled with Calvinists. He that will not honor the memory and respect the influence of Calvin, knows but little of the origin of American liberty."

The steadfast and self-sacrificing devotion of the Presbyterian ministry and membership, as a body, to their country, during the Revolution, is a fact which stands out with proud prominence on the page of history. "John Calvin," says Ranke, "was virtually the founder of America." "The Shorter Catechism," says Dr. A. A. Hodge, "fought through successfully the Revolutionary War." We find, in 1774, a meeting of the Presbyterians in Cumberland Valley, Pa., convened at Carlisle, passing a series of patriotic resolutions, expressing their sympathy with the cause of oppressed America, and in the name of the Lord of Hosts, declaring their willingness to participate in the dangers of the struggle, whenever the Government might demand their services. And the Mecklenburg Declaration (which see) May 20th, 1775, was adopted by twenty-seven delegates, nine of whom, including the President and Secretary, were ruling elders, and one was a Presbyterian minister.

"That man," it has truthfully been remarked, "will go on a desperate adventure, who shall proceed to hunt out the Presbyterian Tories of that day. Our ministers were Whigs, patriots, haters of tyranny, known abettors of the very earliest resistance, and often soldiers in the field. It was not they, nor any of them, who acted as guides for invading Generals, or who wrote pasquinades for New York journals, or who insulted Washington by senrifle letters. On these points we ask no better task than that of printing a few documents, when the truths suggested shall be denied. The name of a Presbyterian Whig stank in the nostrils of truckling courtiers, renegade Scots and non-juring semi-papists, as much in the colonies as at home, and the Revolutionary struggle was carried on, in a large part of the Middle and Southern States, by the sinew, sweat and blood of Presbyterians."

"Among the Calvinistic churches," says the Rev. N. S. McFetridge, D. D., in his excellent little work, "Calvinism in History" (published by our Board), "the Congregationalists and Dutch Reformed and Presbyterians were the leaders, and none of them took a more active part in favor of independence than the Scotch-Irish Presbyterians. They threw into the movement all the fearlessness of the Scotch, and all the fire and wit of the Irish character. Hence their speeches and sermons and papers and bulletins were at once irritating and amusing to their opponents." Bancroft accredits to them the glory of making the first bold move toward independence, and of lifting the first public voice in its favor. To the Synod of the Presbyterian Church, convened in Philadelphia in 1775, belongs the responsibility, and may we not say the glory? of being the first religious body to declare openly and publicly for a separation from England, and to counsel and encourage the people who were about taking up arms. It enjoined upon its people to leave nothing undone that could promote the end in view, and called upon them to pray for the Congress then assembled.

The relation of Calvinism to education is no less conspicuous and illustrious. The little republic of Geneva became the sun of the European world. The Calvinists of France, notwithstanding all their embarrassments, immediately founded and sustained three illustrious theological schools at Montauban, Laumur and Sedan. The peasantry of Scotland excel in intelligence those of other European peoples, thanks to the parish schools. In this country, it has been said, for the first two hundred years of our history, "almost every college and seminary of learning, and almost every academy and common school even, had been built up and sustained by Calvinists." With Calvinism goes the teacher, with Romanism the priest.

While it is true that every religion and religious party, however impure its creed, or temporary its success, may boast its martyrs, it is nevertheless a fact equally certain and significant that, beyond all others put together, the Calvinistic churches have furnished the martyrs to Christianity since the Reformation. It is only necessary to mention the Wal-denses, the victims of the Inquisition, in Italy and Spain, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the victims of Philip and Alva, in Holland, of "Bloody Mary," and of the "High Commission," and of the "Bloody Assizes," in England, the Puritans and Covenanters, and victims of Claverhouse, and the "Killing Time," in Scotland.

Again, Calvinism is the friend of missions. But in this it is not alone. No church of Christ can forget his command "to disciple all nations." But this can be fairly claimed on behalf of the Calvinistic churches. They have been—alike in priority and in extent of enterprise and devotion—leaders in this great work. They have also excelled in the thoroughness of their mission educational organizations, and in the manly and Christian type of character they have formed in the converts they have gathered of all races and in all lands.

With such elements and achievements, it is not to be wondered that Calvinism, even when considered only in the light of philosophical investigation, has commended itself to the admiration and approbation of men among the most distinguished for intellectual ability.

"Whatever notions of an exaggerated sort" (says Isaac Taylor, the profound author of the "Natural History of Enthusiasm," and the "Physical Theory of the Future Life") "may belong to some Calvinists, Calvinism, as distinguished from Arminianism, encircles or involves great truths, which, whether dimly or clearly discerned—whether defended in Scriptural simplicity of language, or deformed by grievous perversions, will never be abandoned while the Bible continues to be devoutly read, and which, if they might indeed be subverted, would drag to the same ruin every doctrine of revealed religion. Let it be granted that Calvinism has often existed in a state of mixture with crude, or presumptuous, or preposterous dogmas. Yet, surely, whoever is competent to take a calm, an independent, and a truly philosophic survey of the Christian system, and can calculate, also, the balancings of opinion, the antitheses of belief—will grant that if Calvinism, in the modern sense of the term, were quite exploded, a long time could not elapse before evangelical Arminianism would find itself driven helplessly into the gulf that had yawned to receive its rival; and to this catastrophe must quickly succeed the triumph of the dead rationalism of Neology, and then that of Atheism" (Essay upon Edwards on the Will).

Mr. Froede, who has no particular love for Calvinism, says (Calvinism, p. 42):—

"Was it not written long ago, 'He that will save his soul shall lose it?' If we think of religion only as a means of escaping what we call the wrath to come, we shall not escape it; we are already under it, we are under the burden of death, for we care only for ourselves. This was not the religion of your fathers; this was not the Calvinism which overthrew spiritual wickedness and hurled kings from their thrones and purged England and Scotland, for a time at least, of lies and charlatany. Calvinism was the spirit which rises in revolt against untruth; the spirit which, as I have shown you, has appeared and reappeared, and in due time will appear again, unless God be a delusion and man be as the beasts that perish. For it is but the inflashing upon the conscience of the nature and origin of the laws by which mankind are governed—laws which exist whether we acknowledge them or whether we deny them, and will have their way, to our own weal or woe, according to the attitude in which we place ourselves toward them—inherent, like the laws of gravity, in the nature of things, not made by us, not to be altered by us, but to be discerned and obeyed by us at our everlasting peril."

Mr. Bauroff, who, while adopting another religious creed, has awarded to Calvinism the palm for its influence in favor of religious and civil liberty, says, in reference to predestination, one grand distinctive doctrine of Calvinism: "This doctrine inspires a resolute, almost defiant freedom in those who deem themselves the subject of God's electing grace; in all things they are more than conquerors through the confidence that nothing shall be able to separate them from the love of God. No doctrine of the dignity of human nature, of the rights of man, of national liberty, of social equality, can create such a resolve for the freedom of the soul as this personal conviction of God's favoring and protecting sovereignty. He who has this faith feels that he is compassed about with everlasting love, guided with everlasting strength; his will is the tempered steel that no fire can melt, no force can break. Such faith is freedom, and this spiritual freedom is the source and strength of all other freedom" (History United States, vol. ii, p. 461).

Castelar, the eloquent Spanish statesman, says: "The children of the Puritans founded the United States, a liberal and popular government, where human rights were placed above all ideas They harmonized antagonisms which seemed eternal; stability with progress, order with liberty, pure democracy with obedience to the law, the widest freedom of different social tendencies with a powerful nationality and ardent patriotism, the humanitarian with the cosmopolite spirit, indomitable independence of the individual with religious respect to authority."

"There is no system," says a writer of marked ability in our country, "which equals Calvinism in intensifying, to the last degree, ideas of moral excellence and purity of character. There never was a system since the world stood, which puts upon man such motives to holiness, or which builds batteries which sweep the whole ground of sin with such horrible artillery." "Men may talk as much as they please against the Calvinists and Puritans and Presbyterians, but you will find that when they want to make an investment they have no objection to Calvinism or Puritanism or Presbyterianism. They know that where these systems prevail, where the doctrine of men's obligation to God and man is taught and practiced, there their capital may be safely invested." "They tell us," he continues, "that Calvinism plies men with hammer and with chisel. It does, and the result is monumental marble. Other systems leave men soft and dirty; Calvinism makes them of white marble, to endure forever."

Campbell, Rev. George Stuart, M. A., is the youngest son of Rev. James R. Campbell, D.D., a missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church to India. He was born, November 5th, 1848, in the Bay of Bengal, under the American flag, during the return of his parents from a visit to the United States. At an early age he accompanied his mother and sisters to this country, and attended the Classical Institute of which Dr. Charles Short, now Professor of Latin in Columbia College, New York, was for many years the Principal. During this time, in the twelfth year of his age, he made a profession of religion in connection with the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia. Remaining in Ireland when his mother and sisters returned to India, he graduated at the Queen's University, Belfast, and afterwards studied theology in the Irish Presbyterian College and in the halls of the Reformed Presbyterian and Free churches of Scotland. Having received licensure from the Free Presbytery of Edinburgh, in 1870, he returned to America, and putting himself under the care of the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia, he attended a session in the Theological Seminary at Princeton. Having received invitations from several different congregations, he accepted a call from Williamstown, N. J., and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place, November 7th, 1871. After five years of very successful labor at Williamstown, in connection with which he supplied the churches at Bunker Hill and Franklinville, he accepted a call to Phoenixville, Pa., where he remained pastor for four years, when he was called to his present position as pastor of the Richmond Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, being installed December 16th, 1880.

Mr. Campbell's work in the ministry has been greatly blessed. The debt resting on churches to which he has ministered has been greatly reduced or entirely removed, and extensive and handsome improvements have been made in their places of worship. There have been large accessions to their membership, and the efficiency of all their operations has been greatly increased. Mr. Campbell is a preacher of sound, evangelical doctrine, and his perspicuous style, with his eloquent delivery, render him an impressive speaker. Always ready for every good word and work, his indefatigable industry, perseverance and faithfulness have been rewarded with great success. His courteous manners and obliging disposition render him greatly beloved.

Campbell, James Robinson, D. D. Mr. Campbell was born near Armagh, county Tyrone, Ireland, in the year 1800. He arrived in Philadelphia in 1824, and while serving as a clerk he devoted his spare time to study, under the care of that distinguished classical scholar, the late Joseph P. Engles, Esq., many of whose pupils have obtained great eminence. His theological studies were pursued under the Rev. Dr. Samuel Brown Wylie, pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church, in the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary at Philadelphia. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in October, 1831. He embarked for India on the 16th day of November, 1835, in company with Rev. James McEwen, Messrs. Jamieson, Rogers and Porter. His station was Saharanpur, Northwest Province, India. He visited the United States in 1847-8, and his pulpit addresses on the subject of missions are still remembered by many.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in 1856. He died at Landour, Himalaya Mountains, India, on the 18th of September, 1862, in the sixty-second year of his age, having been a Missionary in India over twenty-six years. His widow, Mrs. Mary Cochran Campbell, survived him only a few years, and died in India, on March 19th, 1874, having been actively, zealously and successfully engaged for many years in the cause of Christ, in India.

All of Dr. Campbell's sons who came to manhood have entered the ministry. The eldest son, Rev. Thomas Cochran Campbell, died in Marion, Ohio, June 8th, 1862, after two years' successful work for Christ. The second son, Rev. James Robinson Campbell, is the pastor elect of the Presbyterian Church at Christiana, Del. The third son, Rev. George H. Stuart Campbell, is the pastor of the Richmond Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa.

Having devoted himself to the life of a foreign missionary, and a society having been formed in Merceer county, Pa., by members of the Presbyterian, the Associate, the Associated Reformed, and the Reformed Presbyterian churches, to support a foreign missionary in connection with any one of these denominations, Dr. Campbell was accepted by them, and sent out to India under the direction of the Western Foreign Missionary Society of Pittsburg. He arrived at Saharanpur, his station in India, on November 10th, 1836. There he labored assiduously for twenty-seven years, with the exception of a short period in 1847 and 1848, during which he made a visit to his native land and to America. While in this country, he delivered, in several places, a course of lectures on Foreign Missions in India, which were afterwards published in a duodecimo volume by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. He also contributed largely to the religious press, being a letter-writer of superior excellence. He was indefatigable in his labors, and besides his services at his own station, he made frequent itinerations, and also acted as treasurer for the entire mission. He devoted much of his attention to the education of the native youth, in which he was eminently successful, a large number of those under his care having renounced heathenism and received the Christian religion, several of whom have become ordained ministers and licentiates and catechists and Scripture readers in the upper and lower missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. One of the handsomest churches in Upper India was erected at Saharanpur by his agency. His reluctance to intermit his labors hastened, if it did not cause, his death, which was a fitting close to his long and useful life. Tranquil and triumphant, he passed from earth to heaven: from sacrifice and toil to his eternal rest and reward. He was a man of warm heart, and a judgment remarkably sagacious, energetic, animated, genial, modest, with a profound devotion to the Saviour, which controlled all his actions. In person he was of medium height, well-rounded face, a clear complexion and a robust frame.

Campbell, John, a ruling elder, departed this life, near Bell's Mills, Pa., October 16th, 1883. A long and useful life closed serenely when this venerable man passed away. He was the son of Robert and Rebecca Campbell, and was born in Kishacoquillas Valley, in 1804. The greater part of his life, however, was spent within the present limits of Blair county. At an early age he united with the Presbyterian Church. He took part in the organization of the Logan's Valley Church, nearly fifty years ago, and was at that time elected and ordained a ruling elder. He continued to perform the duties of his office, to the acceptance and edification of the church, until his death. He was a man of fine character, and commanded the respect of all who knew him. His convictions were always positive, and he fearlessly maintained them, without regard to consequences. He was honored also, for many years, as a magistrate. He brought to the performance of his duties a well-stored mind and a sound judgment. His religious experience was not specially demonstrative, but he quietly and fully rested upon the merits of the Saviour, always exhibiting a deep interest in the welfare of his church. His end was peaceful, in keeping with his well-ordered and Christian life.

Cannon, Frederick Edwards, D. D., a native of Massachusetts, was of the class of 1822 in Union College, and of the class of 1824 in Andover Seminary. Ordained October 12th, 1825, he was settled at Ludlow, Vt., from 1826 to 1831, and at Potsdam from 1831 to 1836. Much beloved and prospered in the pastoral charge, his impaired health compelled him to leave it, and entering the District Secretaryship of the American Board, in 1836, he remained in it, performing its duties with diligence and ability, until 1863, when health again impaired required him to resign the office. Dr. Cannon won the regard of his parishioners by his excellence and faithfulness, and greatly blessed them. Traversing the Western part of the State of New York in the interest of Foreign Missions, he was universally known to the churches and ministers and acceptable to them, and the large sum he gathered for this great cause very imperfectly denotes the amount he accomplished for it. Dr. Cannon is a man rarely well-preserved in his advanced years, full of faith and love and all graces, and even more than ever interested in everything that touches the history and progress of the Kingdom. Few men have been more loved and honored in Western New York.

Carle, John, was pastor of the French Reformed or Huguenot Church in New York, from August 14th, 1754, to April 8th, 1761. He was a native of Nismes, in Languedoc, France, and was ordained to the gospel ministry by the Church of Basle, Switzerland. In 1768 he was chaplain of the French Hospital in London. He was of "irreproachable character, very intent upon his studies," and "preached moderate Calvinism."

Carlisle, Rev. Hugh, was admitted into the New Castle Presbytery before September, 1735, probably from Great Britain or Ireland. At that time Newtown and Plumstead, in Bucks county, Pa., obtained leave of Philadelphia Presbytery to employ him, and he joined that body in June, 1736. A call to these churches was presented to him in May, 1737, but in August he declined it, on account of the distance of Plumstead from Newtown. He continued to serve them, and was sent, in November, to supply Amwell and Bethlehem, in Hunterdon county, N. J., with other vacancies. He is mentioned as a member of Lewes Presbytery in 1742.

Carre, Ezekiel, pastor of the Huguenot colony in Narragansett, Rhode Island, 1686. He was born in the Island of Re, near La Rochelle, France, and studied philosophy and theology in the Academy of Geneva, 1670. Before coming to America, he was pastor of Mirambeau, in Saintonge, 1680, and La Roche Chalais, in Guienne, 1682. When he left Narragansett, and whither he went, is not known.

Catholic (throughout all, i. e., general, universal). This word early came into use among Christians to distinguish their Church from the Jewish, which was national; later on, it distinguished the orthodox church from the heretical sects. In modern times it has been arrogantly and absurdly claimed by the Church of Rome; and Protestants usually call hers so, although it were nearer truth to say the Roman Catholic Church. The phrase in the Apostles' Creed, "the Holy Catholic Church," is often ignorantly supposed to refer to the Roman Church, but the word "catholic" merely means "universal," and was not in the first form of the Creed. The phrase is correctly explained by what follows, "the communion of saints." Thus it simply expresses a belief that the Holy Church, the communion of saints, is not confined to one nation, but by the appointment and help of Christ shall be disseminated through all nations.

Chance, J. C., was born in the State of New Jersey (Leesburg, Cumberland county), in the year 1819. He has been a resident of Philadelphia since early childhood, and is well-known in business circles, but more especially in the religious community as a live Sunday-school man and efficient church worker. In the Spring of 1855, under the auspices of the Calvary Presbyterian Church, he located and organized the Olivet Presbyterian Sabbath School, numbering 63 scholars, which now numbers over 700, and ranks as one of the largest and most flourishing in Philadelphia. Out of this school grew the church, which has at the present time over 800 members. To these two enterprises he has devoted his life. In the first annual report of the "Calvary Presbyterian Missionary Association," this item appears: "While others have given their money, he (Mr. Chance) has given his time and money also, and, although it is true that pecuniary means were indispensable to the erection of Olivet Chapel, it is equally true that it would not have been built but for the wisdom in planning the details, the sagacity in securing contributions, and the indomitable perseverance and unceasing efforts of the brother we have mentioned."

Mr. Chance is the first and only Superintendent of Olivet Sabbath School, having held this office twenty-nine years. If statistics can be relied upon, he has occupied this position for a longer number of consecutive years than any other superintendent in the city of Philadelphia. He has also been a ruling elder in this church for twenty-eight years.

Chapin, Louis, was born in West Springfield, Mass., November 3d, 1809, the youngest, and now only survivor, of ten children of Moses A. and Lucina (Graves) Chapin. His education was limited to a few terms in the academies of Springfield, Westfield and Hadley. He removed to Rochester, N. Y., in the Spring of 1827, and for four years was clerk in the forwarding office of the first six-day line of canal boats on the Erie Canal. Subsequently, he engaged in the milling business, both in Rochester and Akron, Ohio. This he relinquished in 1866, and has since dealt in grain. He has been a Trustee in Monroe County Savings Bank for thirty years, twenty-two years its Vice-President, and is now President. Mr. Chapin was a subject of the great revival in Rochester, under the preaching of the Rev. Charles G. Finney, and united with the Third Church in December, 1830. Four years afterward he transferred his relation to the Brick Church, where, in April, 1839, he was chosen and ordained ruling elder, which office he has since held.

Nearly all the time from 1810 to 1878, Mr. Chapin was Trustee and Treasurer of the Society. His connection with the Brick Church Sabbath School began with his membership in the church, and has since continued with little interruption. For three years he was Superintendent, and for over forty-five years has been Secretary and Treasurer. He was Secretary of the New York State Sunday School Teachers' Association, organized in Albany, in January, 1857, and continued as such, or as Treasurer or a member of the Executive Committee, twenty-one years. In 1861 he was elected a corporate member of the A. B. C. F. Missions, and has attended more than half the annual meetings since. He has represented the Brick Church in nearly all the meetings of Presbytery, and been their delegate to every meeting of Synod since the Congregational (Circular) Church, Charleston, S. C., for three months, and the First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md., from June to October, in 1877. Being called to Harrodsburg, Ky., the same year, he served that church, as stated supply, until October, 1878, when he spent several months in Europe. On his return he was ordained and installed as pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Harrodsburg, Ky., October 19th, 1879, where he is now preaching, with great acceptance and success. †

Mr. Chisolm is one of the most promising of the young ministers of the Southern Church. Of more than ordinary administrative ability, and of untiring energy, he has the gift of infusing his own glowing zeal into the hearts of his people, and of developing their capacities for church work. His sermons are prepared with great care, and usually delivered without notes, and in a very attractive and eloquent style which never fails to command attention and excite interest. He possesses, to a large degree, those personal and social qualities which belong to a judicious, thoughtful and sympathizing pastor.

Christianity, Aggressive Character of.

There is a great difference between the knowledge given in consciousness and that attained by the logical understanding. For example, all men know from consciousness what beauty is, but if the question be asked: What is beauty? and the answer be sought from the logical understanding, there is the greatest perplexity and diversity. Dissertation after dissertation and volume after volume have been written in answer to that question. So we all know what Christianity is; but when the question is asked, What is Christianity? the answers become uncertain and divergent. It might seem useless to ask the question if we know without asking, and cease to know when asked. But the difficulty is, men will ask, and will give wrong answers—answers not merely incorrect, but fatally injurious. Of all the theological questions of our day, especially in Germany and among English and American theologians addicted to German modes of thinking, none has been more debated, and none is more vitally important than the question, What is Christianity? If we are to think or speak intelligently of the aggressive character of Christianity, we must know what Christianity is. It has been defined: 1. As a form of knowledge, i. e., the system of divine truth revealed in the Scriptures. 2. As that modus Dei cognoscendi et colendi introduced by Christ. 3. As simply and exclusively a life. By this some mean a form or state of the religious consciousness; while others intend by that expression the theanthropic life of Christ as communicated to His people, humanity restored in Him, as it was corrupted in Adam. The objection to these answers is that they are too limited. (The last, as explained by mysticism, is false.) Christianity is a form of knowledge; it is a religion, it is a life. It is not exclusively the one or the other, but it is all.

LOUIS CHAPIN.

reunion of the Church, and has been a commissioner to the General Assembly from the Presbytery of Rochester, before and since that event, eleven times, seven of which he has been Chairman of the Mileage Committee. Probably no elder is better known by the Church at large or been more actively engaged in its service; certainly none has more thoroughly studied, from year to year, the minutes of the Assembly.

Chisolm, Rev. James Julius, is the second son of James J. and Margaret S. (Bryan) Chisolm, and was born in Charleston, S. C., December 8th, 1852. He graduated at Princeton College in 1874, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1877. He was licensed to preach by Charleston Presbytery in the Spring of 1876. The same year he supplied the

The best way to determine what Christianity is, is to ask what makes a man a Christian in the true and proper sense of the term. A Christian is one who knows and receives as true what Christ has revealed in His Word; whose inward state (religious consciousness) is determined by that knowledge, and whose life is devoted to the obedience and service of Christ. Christianity is, therefore, a system of doctrine, it is an inward life, and it is a rule of action. When, therefore, we speak of the aggressive character of Christianity, we may mean the antagonism of truth to error, the expansive power of the principles of spiritual life, or, the opposition of good to evil, of holiness to sin, in the outward life, or we may include all these, as they all are included in the religion of Christ. Or, as the Scriptures call it the kingdom of God, we may mean by the aggressive character of Christianity, its inherent force, by which it tends to gain more and more the complete control of the individual man and of human society, by controlling all the forms of human thought, the inward character of men and their outward conduct.

1. Christianity is thus aggressive. It does tend and strive to subdue. 1. This is variously taught in the Scriptures. It is compared to a stone cut out of a mountain, which gradually fills the whole earth; to a tree whose branches extend over all lands; to leaven hid in a measure of meal; to a great temple in the process of erection; to the sun in its course through the heavens, and from tropic to tropic.

2. It is deducible from its nature. Truth is necessarily antagonistic to error, and holiness to sin. The one must strive to overcome the other, both in the individual and in the world. Besides, being a religion suited to the necessities of all men, and absolutely essential to their well-being here and hereafter, it cannot be embraced by the individual man without the consciousness on his part of the obligation to uphold and extend it. A Christian, from the very nature of the case, is fired with zeal for the glory of Christ, and with love for his fellow-men. His Christianity makes him an advocate of the truth and a proselyter.

3. It is further proved and illustrated by the history of the Church. The original promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head has expanded into the full system of Christian doctrine. The one hundred and twenty disciples in Jerusalem in the age of the apostles occupied Syria, Egypt, Greece, Italy; and since then Christianity has gained the civilized world. It has banished polytheism and idolatry; it has elevated woman, exalted man and moulded human society.

4. It is proved in the experience of every Christian. His inward life is a progress. He passes from infancy to maturity, from a νηπιος (infant) to a παισιος (grown), and from a παισιος to the full measure of the stature of Christ. The truth becomes better known and more firmly believed. Indwelling sin becomes weaker, and grace stronger, and the outward life is made more and more consistent with the gospel. When this is not true, there is no true life.

II. To what is the aggressive power of Christianity due?

1. It is not due to anything in itself as a system of truth. If revealed to the lost in the other world, it would be powerless. If revealed to fallen man, sent in books or by living teachers to the heathen, it would, if left to itself, be universally rejected. The opposition of Satan and of the evil heart would be too much for it.

2. It is not due to the subjective effect on the hearts of those who are led to embrace it. If nothing were done ab extra but to induce the reception of the gospel, the inward effect and the outward efficiency would fade away.

3. But it is supernatural in its character. It is due to the purpose of God and the co-operation of the Spirit. When a woman puts leaven into a measure of meal, she is sure that the whole will be leavened, because the effect is due to the operation of invariable physical laws. But when the gospel is introduced into a community or a nation, whether it will take root and extend or not, depends on an ab extra sovereign working of divine power. Hence a sense of dependence is to be acknowledged and cultivated. It is because Christianity is the life of God (i. e., of a present Christ), that it must prevail.

4. Although the gospel is thus dependent upon supernatural agency for its preservation and extension, yet human co-operation is ordained as the means. Faith and love are the powers which we are to wield, depending on the Spirit of God.—Charles Hodge, D. D.

Christianity, Its Advance. The following article by Tryon Edwards, D. D., presents the subject elsewhere ably noticed under the head "Progress of Christianity," with some new phases, facts and figures, which cannot fail to be read with great satisfaction:—

"One hundred and twenty years ago Voltaire said, 'Before the beginning of the nineteenth century Christianity will have disappeared from the earth.' But what are the facts? And how has his prediction been fulfilled?"

"In the year 1800, the date on which he fixes for the disappearance of Christianity, there were 24,000,000 English-speaking people, of whom 14,000,000 were Protestants and 5,500,000 Romanists. In 1881, among the same English-speaking people, there were 59,000,000 Protestants and 13,500,000 Romanists.

"During the past century the population of the United States has increased eleven fold and the churches thirty-seven fold. Then there was one church to every 1700 inhabitants; now there is one for every 529. Then the church membership of evangelical churches was only one in seventeen of the population; now it is one in every five. Then our evangelical churches were only 3030; now they are 97,090. Then the communicants were 361,872; now they are 10,065,963. Then the ordained ministers were 2651; now they are 69,870. Then Sunday schools were almost unknown; now the number of teachers and scholars in them is said to be over 14,000,000. And the amount contributed annually by our churches for benevolent and congregational purposes is $106,962,000, of which $31,339,140 is for purely benevolent purposes, and for sustaining the churches and the ministry, $75,552,866.

"When Dr. Dwight took the Presidency of Yale College most of the students counted themselves infidels, and not a few of them had taken the names of noted French infidels, to show their contempt for Christianity. Now, in 21 of our leading colleges, having 4562 students, nearly one-half are professing Christians, and more than one-half of one of the largest classes in Yale College are church members. Yale College alone has sent out over 2000 of its graduates as ministers of the gospel. And of the 361 colleges of the land, by far the greater majority, perhaps nearly all, are Christian in their influence. We have, also, in the United States, 142 theological schools, or seminaries, the special object of which is to train up young men to be preachers of Christianity and pastors of Christian churches.

"In 1804 the British and Foreign Bible Society was organized, and the American Bible Society in 1816; and the former has circulated about 95,000,000 and the latter about 40,000,000 copies of the Word of God; and, counting the issues of other similar societies, some 150,000,000 copies have been issued, and this in 226 different languages, into which the Bible has been translated. And an establishment for the publication of cheap Bibles now occupies the ground in Scotland on which stood the priory from which, in the time of Henry VIII, the Pope's legate published a bull against the printing of the Scriptures.

"In 1800 missions were comparatively unknown. Only fifty years ago there were but 502 missionary stations in foreign lands; now there are 5765; then only 656 ordained missionaries, now 6696; then 1256 other laborers and assistants, now 40,552; and now it is estimated that the communicants in mission churches are 857,332, the adherents 1,813,596, the day schools 9316, and the pupils in them 447,602.

"In looking to particular missions, in India and China, for example, as also in various other countries, we may see the progress of Christianity. Henry Martyn, in his day, said: 'If I ever see a Hindoo converted to Jesus Christ, I shall see something more nearly approaching the resurrection of a dead body than anything I have ever yet seen.' And now a leader of an advanced party of cultivated Hindoos says: 'The spirit of Christianity has pervaded Indian society, and we breathe and think and feel in a Christian atmosphere.' And Max Müller declares that 'Hindooism is dead;' and to Norman McLeod he said: 'From what I know of the Hindoos, they seem to-day riper for Christianity than any nation that ever accepted the gospel.' The number of native Christians in India is said to be nearly 600,000. And as one of the direct or indirect results of Christianity in India there are in that country some 26,000 schools, 80 colleges, and about 3,000,000 pupils.

"In 1800 there were no Protestant missions in China, and forty years ago there were there only five or six avowed converts to Christianity. Now 29 missionary societies are at work in that land, having 1058 missionaries and assistants, 600 stations and out-stations, 400 churches, 18,000 communicants, between 300 and 400 Christian schools, with 7388 scholars, 20 theological schools, with 231 students, 16 missionary hospitals, and 24 dispensaries to aid the sick and suffering. And the Emperor of China has ordered the closing of all the Buddhist temples, and the gospel is freely preached in every part of the empire.

"In Madagascar, where, as late as 1857, some 2000 persons were put to death for adherence to the Christian faith, there are now 1200 churches, 71,585 communicants, 862 schools, with 43,904 scholars, and in the past ten years the native Christians there have given nearly $1,000,000 for the spread of the gospel. The number of converts to Christianity gathered there during 35 years of missionary labor is computed to exceed the number of converts in the whole of the Roman Empire during the first three centuries of the Christian era.

"In 1800 the Sandwich Islands were utterly heathen, given up to the most abominable licentious and idolatrous rites and practices. Now they are not only Christianized and civilized, but they have all the appliances of Christian civilization. In Honolulu there are 300 telephones in use, and some of the planters have been cutting their sugar-cane at night, by the aid of electric lights. Their churches are, in some respects, in advance of those of our own land. The first missions in Japan, which have been so wonderfully prosperous, were started by a contribution of $1000 sent by the Christian converts of these Islands.

"When our missionaries first opened their schools in Syria, they had to beg parents to send their daughters, and as inducements to come, offered them both board and tuition free. Now parents beg missionaries to receive their daughters, and gladly pay both for tuition and board. And there are now 7500 girls in their mission schools, thoroughly instructed in Christianity and in all that may prepare them for the future life.

"In 1835 the first missionaries landed in the Fiji Islands, the people of which were savage and ferocious cannibals, fighting among themselves continually, fattening for slaughter, to be eaten, the prisoners taken in war, and even digging up dead bodies to feast on them. They buried the sick alive, strangled the widows, buried living victims beside every post of a chief's new house, compelling them to clasp it while the earth was heaped up and trodden down upon their heads. Now, in every one of their 80 inhabited islands there is a tidy church and a dwelling-house for the minister or teacher; and in all there are some 900 Wesleyan churches filled with devout worshippers, the schools well attended; and the first sound in the morning and the last at night is that of hymn singing and family prayer, in almost every dwelling.

As other facts of interest, Tokio, in Japan, has its twelfth Presbyterian church, the government daily paper advertises the Bible for sale, and a large convocation of Buddhist priests has been called at one of their famous temples, for the purpose of abolishing the ancient rules forbidding the clergy to marry or to eat flesh meat. And the old slave market in Zanzibar, where formerly 30,000 slaves were sold every year, has been transformed into mission premises, with a church, a mission-house, and a school where Christianity is taught.

Such are a few of the many evidences of the spread of Christianity over the earth, to say nothing of the fact that more has been done in geography, philology, archaeology and ethnology, and in all that civilizes as well as Christianizes, indirectly by Christian missionaries, than by all the royal and national societies in the world that devote themselves exclusively to these objects. Well does Lecky, in his 'History of European Morals,' say, 'The highest conception that has been formed of the sanctity of human life, the protection of infancy, the elevation and final emancipation of the slave classes, the suppression of barbarous games, the creation of a vast and multifarious organization of charity, and the education of the imagination by the Christian type, constitute together a movement of philanthropy which has never been paralleled or approached in the pagan world.' And well may we say, with another, that 'the principles and practices and ideals which are the richest inheritance of the race have been either implanted or stimulated or supported by Christianity.'

"They are, as the same writer says, such as these: 'Respect for woman and for the poorest and weakest; the duty of the prosperous and fortunate to help the unfortunate; humanity to the child, the prisoner, the poor, the needy, the stranger, and even the brute; opposition to every form of cruelty, oppression and slavery; the duty of personal purity and the sacredness of marriage; the obligation of temperance and the right of all to freedom, intelligence and equal political and social privileges, and to worship God according to the dictates of an enlightened conscience. All these principles Christianity inculcates. All these great ends Christianity has, to a wide extent, gained, and is more and more gaining every day. And if everywhere received and acted on, they would make every man a happy man and the wide world a happy world.'"

"Christian," Origin of the Name. The Greek Χριστιανός is a transliteration of the Latin Christianus, the nickname meaning, "partisan of Christ," given by the people of Antioch to the believers in the new religion brought there by those driven from Jerusalem by the persecution after Stephen's death (Acts xi, 19, 26). The name may have been given in ridicule, for the Antiochians were known for their scurrilous wit; but the time had come for naming, in some popular, intelligible way, those who were in religion neither Gentiles nor Jews. The name arose, probably, in the mistake that Christ was a proper name; nevertheless, it was the fittest, most honorable possible; it expressed the distinguishing features of the Christian religion. It is a Person, not a system of ethics or of divinity; it is a Life, not a thought; it is, moreover, Christ, the Messiah, the Son of God, whose partisans we are, not Jesus, the Son of man, a name common among the Jews. The form of the name is suggestive. It is a combination of the two widespread languages, Greek and Latin, reminding us that Christianity desires not concealment, but publicity, and prophesying that in all tongues the name of Christ shall be heard.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE OF PRESBYTERIES.

There are, probably, some slight inaccuracies in the following table (taken from "BarF's Digest"), as, in some instances, the facts are predicated upon defective reports. The figures prefixed indicate the order of seniority among the existing Presbyteries; those annexed, the number of ministers originally composing them severally; those marked with an asterisk were erected by the General Assembly, and usually have six months' precedence of those of the same year erected by the synods. The letters occasionally occurring refer to notes at the foot of the page. The dates of the erection of other Presbyteries, beyond the point to which this table extends, will generally be found in their sketches, elsewhere given.

(a). The Presbytery of Arkansas was erected in 1834, consisting of five members. In 1842 the Synod of Mississippi, finding that it had failed of a quorum for several years, and that but two members remained, reorganized it, by setting off two additional members to it, and ordering a meeting at Little Rock, on Friday before the first Sabbath of January, 1843.

(b). The Presbytery of Indian is composed of the Missions of the American Board in the Indian Territory.

(c). Lodiana Presbytery was constituted by the members, under the act of the Assembly to that effect—Book V, § 128, a.

(d). The Presbytery of Brazos was formed in the same manner as that of Lodiana, and upon application received under the care of the Synod of Mississippi, in 1845.

(a) Nebraska Presbytery was constituted by the members, under the act of Assembly to that effect—Book V, § 128, a.

Clark, Rev. John, was born in the year 1718. is supposed, in New Jersey. He graduated at Nassau Hall, Princeton, in 1759, and when licensed by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, May 9th, 1760, was sent to supply the churches of Tchicken, Allentown and Upper Mount Bethel. He was ordained by the same Presbytery, as an evangelist, April 29th, 1761, and directed to supply the churches of Oxford, New Jersey, and Smithfield, on the Forks of the Delaware, in Pennsylvania. October 13th, 1762, he was installed over the two congregations of the Forks. On November 3d, 1767, he resigned this pastoral relation; on December 27th, 1769, accepted a call to Bethel Church, in Upper Node Forest, Baltimore county, of which he continued pastor until 1775, when the relation was dissolved. He, however, remained at Bethel, as a stated supply, till 1781, when he removed to the West. In this year he became a supply, and shortly after the pastor, of the united congregations of Bethel and Lebanon, at that time under the care of the Presbytery of Redstone. At the era of this settlement Mr. Clark was past the meridian of life, and of very feeble health, and was in appearance grave, sedate and venerable; and as a preacher, solemn and impressive. He died, July 13th, 1797. What was called the "Whiskey Insurrection" occurred, in part, in the bounds of his congregations, and when the attack was about to be made on General Neville's house, by five hundred of the insurgents, he, as a man of God, besought them to desist. In 1787 an extensive revival of religion took place under Mr. Clark's ministry. He was the Nestor of the Presbytery of Redstone.

Clarke, Mrs. Sarah K., of Utica, N. Y., was early widowed, and left to provide for herself and her family. She opened a school, and acquired such repute as a teacher, that when the First Church Sunday school first filled the office of female superintendent, she reluctantly consented to take the place. Dr. M. M. Bagg describes her as "so masculine in her understanding, and so feminine in her instincts and loveliness, as to be the truest, best picture of a 'strong-minded woman.'" "I have no more distinct recollection of my mother," Hovey K. Clarke, Esq., of Detroit, remarks, "than that of her standing at the side of the desk in the Session room and conducting the closing exercises of the school. She continued in this service as long as she lived. My last recollection of her in health is in consultation with Mr. Parmelee, a few days before the fourth of July, 1827, about the approaching celebration of that day by the Sabbath schools of the village." Her spirit in the work she performed is indicated by the following paper, written hastily, on the occasion of the last Concert of Prayer for Sunday schools, as it so happened, that she attended:—

"TUES, June 1th, 1827.

"This evening attended the Sabbath school Monthly Concert; heard much interesting intelligence, and much to call forth the sympathies and prayers of every feeling heart, on beholding the moral desolation, the vice and ignorance, which pervade a great portion of our country. Now, O my Saviour, let the subject of Sabbath schools rest with deep weight on my heart. By the grace of God assisting me, during the present month, I will endeavor, 1st, to make Sabbath schools more a subject of special prayer; 2d, to enlist my friends and acquaintances more in the cause; and 3d, to be more faithful in my duties in the school, and try to make the exercises more interesting and profitable, both to scholars and visitors. And now, O Lord, Thou who dost witness these, my resolutions, grant me grace to put them into practice, and Thou shalt have all the glory."

She died in the midst of her work, 1827, and "great lamentation was made over" her. As her last labors were given to the school, so her last words were addressed to it: "Give my love to the teachers. I hope they will feel their responsibility, and be faithful." The message, printed on a card with a mourning border, was suspended on the walls of the school room, and a copy, with appropriate Scriptures annexed, was given to every teacher and scholar.

Cleland, Thomas Horace, D.D., was born in Mercy county, Ky., December 19th, 1816. He was the second ministerial son of Thomas Cleland, D.D., whose fame is in all the churches of Kentucky. He spent five years at Centre College, Danville, Ky. His theological instruction he received from his father, and spent, besides, two years at Lane and one at Princeton. His first pastorate was at Lebanon, Ky., which relation continued twenty-nine years, from 1841 to 1869. Resigning his charge, he was called to Lawrence, Kansas, but was not permitted long to remain there, owing to an attack of acute rheumatism. Since that time he has ministered to various churches in Kentucky, at Richmond, Perryville, Stanford and Point Lick, where the churches had become weak, through divisions that followed the Civil War, in the border States. Dr. Cleland was blessed with a fine muscular frame, commanding presence and a remarkably musical voice, which won his audience at the beginning. His style was rich, embellished with imagery and illustration; but his preaching was pre-eminently Scriptural and full of unction; and precious revivals of religion have often been the result. He was much sought after on such occasions. His pen has, perhaps, been busier in his later life than his tongue. In 1864 he founded the Western Presbyterian, at Louisville, Ky., and, conjointly with J. L. McKee, was its editor. He was the Kentucky correspondent of the Herald and Presbyter for many years, has contributed regularly to the Truth, at St. Louis, and wrote many able review articles. He was the author of several treatises, among which was the "Glory of the Terrestrial and Celestial." His life has been very useful, and he still preaches with vigor and Scriptural power.

Conn, Rev. Hugh, was born in Macgilligan, in Ireland, about 1685, and graduated at the University of Glasgow. Having come to this country in September, 1715, he received a call from the people of Baltimore county, and was ordained on the third Wednesday of October following, as pastor of the congregation of Patapsco. In September, 1719, he resigned his charge on account of his uselessness there, from the "paucity of his flock," and immediately took charge of the people on the east branch of Potomac and Pamunkey. Bladensburg is the modern designation of his field of labor. On the 28th of June, 1752, while preaching at the funeral of a person who died suddenly, he fell back in his pulpit and immediately expired.

Converse, Rev. Francis Bartlett, son of the Rev. Amasa Converse, D.D., was born in Richmond, Va., June 23d, 1836. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania, in 1856, and studied theology at Princeton Seminary. He was stated supply at Christ Church, New Kent county, Va., 1861-2; ordained by the Presbytery of East Hanover, October, 1862. He is now editor of the Christian Observer, which is published at Louisville, Ky. Mr. Converse is a gentleman of very pleasing address. He is a vigorous writer, and with his able pen, sound judgment and untiring energy and industry, the paper which he conducts has reached large and well-deserved prosperity.

Coon, Henry P., M. D., son of Peter S. and Catharine (Decker) Coon, was born in Columbia county, N. Y., September 30th, 1822. He graduated at Williams College, in 1841, and was for two years thereafter Principal of Claverack Academy. He studied theology at Union and Princeton Seminaries, but was compelled to abandon the purpose to become a minister, on account of throat disease. He then studied medicine, in the University of Pennsylvania, graduating in 1848, and began the practice of medicine in Syracuse, N. Y. He was deacon of the Presbyterian Church of that place until 1852, when he removed to San Francisco, and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1851 he assisted in organizing Calvary Church, took an active part in the building of the church edifice, was elected elder at the first election after organization, and also first superintendent of the Sabbath school. In 1856 he was elected, by the People's party, Police Judge, and served four years, just after the Vigilance Committee ceased their labors, when there was absolute necessity that the most impartial justice should characterize the administration. In this emergency Dr. Coon distinguished himself and did invaluable service to the city.

In 1863 he was elected Mayor of San Francisco, re-elected in 1865, and served, in all, five years. In 1872 he retired to country life, near Menlo Park, and is at present an elder in the Menlo Park Presbyterian Church. Dr. Coon is, in every way, a remarkable man. Of powerful physique, he is equally gifted with force of mind and strength of character. Nor are his moral and religious characteristics any the less marked. The traits of character by which, perhaps, he is most widely known, are conscientiousness and kindness, combined with a judicial cast of mind, rendering him considerate of the rights and feelings of all parties, and anxious, in every relation and position, to do just right.

Cooper, Rev. James H., is the son of the Rev. Ebenezer and Jane (McMillan) Cooper, and was born in Fayette county, Ind., May 3d, 1813. He graduated at Miami University in 1861. He completed his professional education in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. He was licensed to preach by the Ohio Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, in 1861. On September 12th, 1866, he was ordained by the Chicago Presbytery and installed pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian congregation of Mount Vernon, Iowa, and remained there one year. In April, 1868, he was installed pastor of the Reformed Presbyterian congregation of Morning Sun, Ohio, and labored there till the Fall of 1871. During this pastorate he changed his ecclesiastical relationship, and in the Fall of 1870 entered the United Presbyterian Church.

On May 3d, 1877, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Mount Vernon, Iowa, and remained there till July 31st, 1883. At that time he was chosen Financial Secretary of ——— College, and is now actively engaged in laboring in the interests of that Institution.

Mr. Cooper has social qualities of a very high order. He is so full of kindness and sympathy, so attractive, that he is admired and esteemed wherever known. He is an earnest, warm-hearted Christian. He is a sincere, faithful, impressive preacher of the gospel. He labors earnestly for the glory of God and the salvation of souls.

Countermine, John D., the third son of James and Sarah (Morrison) Countermine, was born in Duaneburgh, Schenectady county, N. Y.; graduated, with honor, at Union College, in 1873. The same year he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he completed his professional education, graduating with the class of 1876. He was licensed and ordained by the Presbytery of Albany, and went direct from the Seminary to Esperance, Schoharie county, N. Y. There he spent about three years, when he resigned and became pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Medina, N. Y. Here he remained, enjoying a successful pastorate, till 1882, when he resigned to accept a unanimous call from the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Albany, N. Y. On his leaving Medina, one of the local papers said, "Mr. Countermine is a pleasant gentleman, an attentive pastor and a preacher of more than ordinary ability. He preaches without notes and is an attractive speaker."

Court, Rev. Robert, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Lowell, Mass., Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of Boston, is a Scotchman by birth. He is an alumnus of the University of Glasgow; and won, during his curriculum, the first prize for the best essay in the logic class; third prize in moral philosophy, the Ewing gold medal for best essay on the scholastic philosophy, and the twenty guinea prize on the Sabbath.

Mr. Court studied divinity in the Free Church College, Glasgow. He was ordained in 1869, by the Presbytery of Iowa City. He is in his second charge, having spent five years of home mission work at Malcom, Iowa. He took charge of the Church at Lowell, in December, 1873.

Mr. Court is a man of versatile talent, and of extensive general information; an acute logician, an able controversialist, a genial and large-hearted companion, and an "able minister of the New Testament."

Cowles, Rev. Junius Judson, the second son (and child) of Junius Alanson and Elizabeth Gardner Cowles; was born at Florence, Oneida county, New York, October 15th, 1851. He was graduated from the classical course of Whitestown Seminary, Whitestown, N. Y., June 23d, 1871. In September of the same year he entered Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., from which Institution he was graduated in the Summer of 1875. In the Fall of the same year he entered Union Theological Seminary, New York city, where he completed his professional education. On the 27th of October, 1879, he was ordained to the gospel ministry, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Huntingdon Valley, Pa., by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, North. Mr. Cowles is an instructive and impressive preacher, faithful in his work, and is blessed in his ministry.

Creeds and Confessions. Creed is derived from the Latin Credo. Hence the title should be confined to such confessions of our Christian Faith as commence with the words I believe, or We believe. In the Eastern Church, a creed, or form of words comprehending the articles of faith, was called mathema (the lesson), because it was learned by the catechumens, graphé (the writing), or kanon (the rule). But the most common name in the Greek Church was sumbolon, or symbol, which term has also passed into the West. Hence creeds and confessions are commonly called symbolical books.

There is some difference between creeds and confessions. Creeds, in their commencement, were simply expressions of faith in a few of the leading and undisputed doctrines of the gospel. Confessions were, on the contrary, the result of many a hazardous and laborious effort, at the dawn of reviving literature, to recover these doctrines and to separate them from the enormous mass of erroneous and corrupted tenets, which the negligence or ignorance of some, and the artifices of avarice and ambition in others, had conduced to accumulate for the space of a thousand years, under an implicit obedience to the arrogant pretensions of an absolute and infallible authority in the Church of Rome.

Objections have been urged against all creeds and confessions of faith, but evidently without any sufficient reason. Beyond question, formulas of doctrine and rules for conducting the discipline and worship proper to be maintained in the house of God are not only necessary and expedient, but, as the character of human nature is continually aiming at innovation, absolutely requisite to the settled peace of the Church, and to the happy and orderly existence of Christian communion. Within the limits of Christendom few are found to be in the attitude of avowed hostility to Christianity. The name of Christian is claimed by all, and all are ready to profess their belief in the holy Scriptures, too many reserving to themselves the right of putting upon them what construction they please. In such a state of things, without the aid of confessions, Christian fellowship can exist only in a very limited degree, and the disorder of the Corinthian Church, condemned by the Apostle, would be realized: "I am of Paul, and I of Apollos."

"While the Scriptures are from God," says an able writer, "the understanding of them belongs to the part of men. Men must interpret, according to the best of their ability, each particular part of Scripture separately, and then combine all that the Scriptures teach upon every subject into a consistent whole, and then adjust their teachings upon different subjects in mutual consistency, as parts of a harmonious system. Every student of the Bible must do this, and all make it obvious that they do it by the terms they use in their prayers and religious discourse, whether they admit or deny the propriety of human creeds and confessions. If they refuse the assistance afforded by the statements of doctrine slowly elaborated and defined by the Church, they must make out their own creed by their own unaided wisdom. The real question is not, as often pretended, between the Word of God and the creed of man, but between the tried and proved faith of the collective body of God's people and the private judgment and the unassisted wisdom of the repudiator of creeds."

The truth of creeds, however, does not consist in the authority or in the decrees of men, or of councils, but in their agreement with the Holy Scriptures. The power to give new laws concerning the worship of God, or to give new articles of faith binding the conscience, belongs to no assembly of men or of angels, but to God alone. We are not to believe God on account of the testimony of the Church, but the Church on the testimony of God.

The creeds formed before the Reformation are very few, relate to the fundamental principles of Christianity, especially the Trinity and the Person of the God-man, and are the common heritage of the whole Church.

1. The Apostle's Creed. (See Creed, The Apostles'.) It is of special interest and importance, 1. Because almost the whole of it is expressed in the very language of the Scriptures; 2. Because of its great antiquity, and regular transmission down to the present time; and, 3. Because it is the basis and type of all the other creeds which have been formed by the consent of the whole Church, and approved by general Synods, for the purpose of preventing and refuting the perversions and corruptions of heretics, by explaining more fully its meaning.

2. The Nicene Creed, so called, because it is a paraphrase of that creed which was made at the First General Council of Nice. This latter was drawn up by the Second General Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, and therefore might be more properly styled the Constantinopolitan Creed. The creed was admitted into the Church as a barrier against Arius and his followers. The "filioque" clause was added by the Council of the Western Church, held at Toledo, Spain, A. D. 589.

3. As, subsequently, heretical opinions sprang up in its bosom with respect to the constitution of the person of Christ, the Church was forced to provide additional definitions and monuments of the truth. One heretical tendency culminated in Nestorianism, which maintains that the divine and human natures in Christ constitute two persons. This was condemned by the Creed of the Council of Ephesus, A. D. 431. The opposite heretical tendency culminated in Eutychianism, which maintains that the divine and human natures are so united in Christ as to form but one nature. This was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. These creeds, defining the faith of the Church as embracing two natures in one person, are received and approved by the entire Church.

4. The Athanasian Creed, long supposed to have been drawn up by Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, in the fourth century, to justify himself against the calumnies of his Arian enemies, but now generally allowed to not have been his. Dr. Waterman ascribes it to Hilary, bishop of Aries. This creed obtained in France about A. D., 850, and was received in Spain and Germany about 180 years later. We have clear proofs of its being sung alternately in the English churches in the tenth century. It was in common use in some parts of Italy in 960, and was received at Rome about 1014. It is a grand and unique monument of the unchangeable faith of the whole Church as to the great mysteries of Godliness, the Trinity, of Persons in the one God, and the duality of natures in the one Christ.

The following are the Confessions of the different churches:—

1. That of the Greek Church, entitled, "The Confession of the True and Genuine Faith," which was presented to Mahomet II, in 1453, but which gave place to the "Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Greek Church," composed by Magila, Metropolitan of Kiev, in Russia, and approved, in 1643, with great solemnity, by the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem. It contains the standard of the principles of the Russian Greek Church.

2. The Church of Rome, though she has always received the Apostles', Nicene and Athanasian creeds, had no fixed public and authoritative symbol till the Council of Trent. A summary of the doctrines contained in the canons of that Council is given in the creed published by Pius IV (1564), in the form of a bull. It is introduced by the Nicene creed, to which it adds twelve articles, comprising those doctrines which the Church of Rome finally adopted after her controversy with the Reformers.

3. The Lutherans call their standard books of faith and discipline, "Libri Symbolici Ecclesie Evangelicæ." They contain the three creeds above mentioned, the Augsburg Confession, the Apology for that Confession by Melancthon, the Articles of Smalcald, drawn up by Luther, the Catechisms of Luther, and, in many churches, the Form of Concord, prepared in A. D., 1577, by Ambræsi and others, for the purpose of settling certain controversies which had sprung up in the Lutheran Church, especially concerning the relative activities of divine grace and the human will in regeneration, and concerning the nature of the Lord's presence in the Eucharist.

4. The Confessions of the Calvinistic churches are numerous. The following are the principal: (1) The Helvetic Confessions are three, that of Basle, 1530, the Summary and Confession of the Helvetic Churches, 1536, and the Expositio Simplex, etc., 1566, ascribed to Bullinger. (2) The Tetrapolitan Confession, 1531, which derives its name from the four cities of Strasburg, Constance, Memmingen and Lindan, by the deputies of which it was signed, is attributed to Bucer. (3) The Palatine, or Heidelberg Confession, framed by order of the Elector Palatine, John Casimír, 1575. (4) The Confession of the Gallic churches, accepted at the first Synod of the Reformed, held at Paris, 1559. (5) The Confession of the Reformed churches in Belgium, drawn up in 1559, and approved in 1561. (6) The Confession of Faith of the Kirk of Scotland, which was that composed by the Assembly at Westminster, was received as the standard of the national faith in 1688.* (7) The Savoy Confession, a declaration of the faith and order of the Independents, agreed upon at a meeting of their elders and messengers at their meeting in the Savoy, 1658. (8) The Anglican Confession, or Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, agreed on in the convocation held, London, 1552. They were drawn up in Latin, but in 1571 they were revised, and subscribed both in Latin and English. These Articles constitute the doctrinal standard of the Episcopal churches in England, Scotland and America.

Curtis, Rev. William, Jr., youngest son of Luzon and Henrietta (Danforth) Curtis, was born in the town of Ballston, Saratoga county, N. Y., May 8th, 1841. At the age of twelve he united with the Presbyterian Church in Charlton Village. He graduated at Princeton, with honor, in 1864. The following year was spent in Princeton Theological Seminary. Ill health then compelled him to intermit his professional studies, but returning three years later, he graduated with the class of 1870. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Albany, and ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery, June 15th, 1870. The next year he accepted an appointment from the

* The great Baptist preacher, Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, in reviewing Dr. Mitchell's "History of the Westminster Assembly," remarks that the Confession drawn up by that body "has never been excelled," and adds: "With its seriousness and purity the doctrine of our forefathers still leavens religious society, and we are greatly mistaken if there is not ere long a sickening of men's minds of the modern sillabubs, and a return to the substantial meat of the good old times. Thank God for Scotland; the plague of doubt is not yet so current among her churches as it is south of the Tweed. The land of Knox yet holds to the old faith. God grant that the caterpillars who have begun to breed on Scotland's kail may not be multiplied till they eat up every green thing." By "the caterpillars" he undoubtedly means Professor Robertson Smith and his few followers in Scotland. The appellation is a good one, and it suits exactly the little band in this country walking in their footsteps.

Board of Home Missions, and having organized churches in Lyndon and Osage City, Kansas, ministered to them for three years, when ill health compelled him again to suspend labor. In 1875 he went, as a Home Missionary, to Silver City, New Mexico, but returned the year following to his former charge, in Kansas, where he still labors. For three years past he has been pastor of the Osage City Church alone.

Mr. Curtis has had an eminently successful ministry, though constantly embarrassed by physical weakness. His intellectual gifts are of a high order, but the sources of his power as a preacher are found very largely in his moral and spiritual nature. His absolute simplicity and sincerity, combined with unquestioning faith in God, and earnest devotion to His service, have given to his preaching a peculiar unction and spiritual power.

As a pastor, he has been faithful, wise, sympathetic; always bearing his flock upon his heart, and always regarded by them with affection and perfect trust.

D

Daillé, Peter, a French Reformed or Huguenot pastor, who came to America from Holland, in 1682, probably at the invitation of the Consistory of the Dutch Reformed Church of New York. Daillé had been Professor in the Protestant Academy of Saumur, in France. He was "full of fire, godliness and learning." He gathered the Huguenots whom he found in New York, Boston, Hackensack, New Paltz and other places into congregations, ministering to them stately or occasionally, as he was able. He was pastor of the French Church in New York, 1683 to 1696, and of the French Church in Boston, 1696 till his death, May 20th, 1715, aged sixty-six years. "He was a person of great piety, charity, affable and courteous behavior, and of an exemplary life and conversation."

Darling, Timothy G., D. D., son of Timothy and Lucy (Sargent) Darling, was born at Nassau, Bahama Islands, October 5th, 1842. He graduated at Williams College, Mass., in 1864, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1869, having spent two years at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Brooklyn in 1868. He was assistant to the Rev. J. C. Backus, D. D., LL. D., in the First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md., 1870-73; June 18th, 1873, he was ordained and installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Schenectady, N. Y., by the Presbytery of Albany. Dr. Darling is an able preacher, a faithful pastor, a good presbyter, and has been much blessed in his ministry.

Davidson College. Davidson College is located in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, and was so called in honor of General W. L. Davidson, who fell in an engagement between the British and Americans near that place, in 1781. The college buildings are large, handsome brick edifices, beautifully situated, in the midst of ample, shady grounds. This Institution was first opened in March, 1837, by Rev. R. H. Morrison, D. D., President, with assistant Professors. In 1838 it was chartered by the Legislature. It was opened as a Manual Labor Institution, with about one hundred students, mostly sons of farmers. Three hours a day were devoted to labor; but after a few years' trial, the once popular labor system was abandoned. "The boys would not work," was assigned as a reason by an old college citizen. The college was placed under the control of a Board of twenty-eight Trustees, all men of distinction and eminently qualified for so important a trust. By the constitution of the college, no one is eligible as trustee, professor or teacher but members of the Presbyterian Church. Dr. Morrison's health having failed, he was succeeded by Rev. Samuel Williamson, as President, and from the first opening an able Faculty has sustained the reputation of the college on to the present time, when Rev. Dr. Hepburn so acceptably fills the chair. Its literary societies are well regulated and highly favorable to intellectual improvement. The college libraries number 5000 or 6000 volumes, affording the students an extensive range of reading matter. Being located on the railroad, midway between Charlotte and Statesville, it is of easy access and in a healthy locality. Through the great liberality of its founders, by legacies, and by the indomitable energy of its Trustees and Faculty, the college is well endowed and continues prosperous, sending out many graduates every year.

Davis, Rev. William Vail Wilson, was born in Wilson, Niagara county, N. Y., February 17th, 1851. Having fitted for college at Williston Seminary, Easthampton, Mass., he entered Amherst College, in the Fall of 1869, and was graduated in the class of 1873, among its foremost scholars. After teaching one year as Tutor in Robert College, Constantinople, he pursued his theological studies at Andover, and was licensed to preach by the East Hampshire Association of Congregational Ministers, meeting at Amherst, Mass., in June, 1876. From an Instructorship of Latin in that college, he was called to the pastorate of the Franklin Street Congregational Church, in Manchester, N. H., where he was ordained in September, 1877, and where he remained till October, 1882, when he accepted a call to the Euclid Avenue Presbyterian Church, in Cleveland, O., of which he is now pastor.

Mr. Davis was a superior scholar in college and in the seminary, and has been a hard student in the ministry, and an intense worker in the pastoral office. So far from conflicting, as they too often do, his pastoral work only furnishes material, direction and inspiration for his preaching. He writes out his morning sermon, but does not carry the manuscript into the pulpit; in the evening he preaches without writing, and in both cases the whole man, body, soul and spirit, speaks. He labors for direct results in the edification of the church and the salvation of souls, and he has not labored in vain. The churches under his care have grown in numbers and in graces. He is justly esteemed one of the ablest, most devoted and most promising of our young ministers.

Day, Rev. A. R., son of William Van Kirk and Sarah P. Day, was born in Washington county, Pa., October 2d, 1835. He was educated at Washington College, graduating in the class of 1858. He studied theology at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Pa., graduating in the class of 1862. He was licensed to preach in 1861, and in September, 1862, was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Highland, Kansas, and was sent by the Board of Missions to Denver, Colorado, where he labored earnestly, and with great success, for several years.

Mr. Day was one of the organizers of the Presbytery of Colorado, in 1870, and was its Stated Clerk until he removed to Wisconsin, in 1875. He was chosen Historian of the Presbytery of Colorado, and prepared a history of the Church in that territory for a period of twelve years, which was published. A discourse on "Christianity and Sect," one on "Divine Fatherhood," and one on "Spiritual Vision," are among his published sermons.

As a man and minister, Mr. Day has been highly esteemed in the places where he has labored. Being frank, cheerful, sympathetic, and full of the spirit of tolerance and charity, he has readily won his way to the hearts of the people, not only in his immediate charge, but of the communities with which his lot has been cast. He prepares his sermons with care, and brings to the task the aid of a graceful style and forcible expression, and when in the pulpit he secures an attentive hearing by a pleasant and earnest delivery. His labors have been richly owned of the Master in the conversion of many souls and the upbuilding of the church. In his present pastorate, at Marshalltown, Iowa, this has been pre-eminently the case.

De Bonrepos, David, a French Reformed or Huguenot pastor, who ministered to the French Church in Boston 1686 to 1688, and then became pastor of the newly-formed colony of French Protestant refugees in New Rochelle, Westchester county, N. Y. In 1695 or 1696 he went to Staten Island and became pastor of the French congregation there. He died between June 16th, 1733, and May 6th, 1734.

Deep Run and Doylestown Presbyterian Church, Pa. When William Tennent, in 1726, was sent by the Presbytery of Philadelphia into Bucks county, Pa., it was to supply "Neshaminy and the Upper Congregation." This "Upper Congregation" was afterward, and still is, known as the Deep Run Presbyterian Church, and this earliest record proves not only that said church had an acknowledged existence as far back as 1726, but also that it was organized prior to that date, as it was known as a congregation when Tennent entered upon his labors there.

This congregation was composed of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, a part of the six thousand who settled in Bucks county in 1720. These people were not adventurers. They came with their church and its membership; with their sacred covenant, and often their minister. So that it is not to be supposed that they would long remain without recognized social worship, and a house of God in which to assemble. This house may now be described as being located in Bedminster Township, one mile and a half from the village of Dublin, and seven and a half miles north-west from Doylestown.

Of this church, Mr. Tennent continued stated supply for a period of twelve years, dividing his time equally between it and the Neshaminy church. During Mr. Tennent's pastorate the "Upper Congregation" was formally recognized as a church, and in 1732 was received into the Presbytery of Philadelphia. In 1738, having become somewhat enfeebled by age and abundant labors, Mr. Tennent asked of Presbytery an assistant, and the Rev. Francis McHenry was appointed. He was born in Ireland, in 1710, and came early to this country. On his coming the Upper Congregation took the name of Deep Run (from a stream near by), and asked for the whole of his time, but Presbytery decided that he should preach at Neshaminy and Deep Run on alternate Sabbaths. This continued four years (1742), when trouble arose at Neshaminy, on the Old Side and New Light questions. A division was the result (see Tennent) and another congregation was formed. Mr. McHenry was now installed over the Old Side churches at Neshaminy and Deep Run, holding his office until his death, in 1757. He was a fine scholar, an able preacher, and a man whose godly life gave him influence wherever he was known.

After Mr. McHenry's death, the church had supplies for four years, when Rev. James Latta, of Presbytery of Philadelphia, was invited to become pastor. This invitation he accepted, and continued in the discharge of his duties until 1770. After three years' supply by Presbytery, Rev. Hugh McGill, from Ireland, was installed pastor, and served the congregation for three years. This time the congregation made little delay, but soon called Mr. James Grier. He was born and brought up in the congregation, educated at Princeton, and studied theology under President Witherspoon. He was a preacher of the foremost rank, and a godly man. After a pastorate of fifteen years (1776-1791) he died suddenly, in the forty-fifth year of his age.

Seven years the church then remained dependent on supplies, when Mr. Uriah Du Bois, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, was called to take pastoral charge. Mr. Du Bois was of French Huguenot descent, and studied theology under Dr. Ashbel Green, of Philadelphia. He was ordained and installed in 1798. In 1804 he began preaching in Doylestown, and in 1813 began the erection of a church, which was dedicated on August 13th, 1815. He continued in this pastoral relation until his death, in September, 1821.

Another season of supplies, and Mr. Charles Hyde became pastor. He was a licentiate of the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, and was ordained and installed in 1823. Mr. Hyde was the first minister in whose call and installation the name of Doylestown is found associated with that of Deep Run. After a pastorate of six years, failing health constrained Mr. Hyde to resign his charge. From the Fall of 1829 until November, 1831, the church was ministered unto by appointments of Presbytery. In this latter year Mr. Silas M. Andrews, then a student in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, N. J., was invited to become pastor. Upon the completion of his full course of study, the Presbytery of Philadelphia met in Doylestown, November 16th, 1831, ordained him to the work of the gospel ministry, and installed him pastor over the united congregations of Deep Run and Doylestown, by which he had been called. Thus was begun what was destined to be a long and useful pastorate. Mr. Andrews supplied not only his own churches, but the whole country side with preaching. His work was owned of God and the church prospered under his hand. When he entered upon his labors, he found a membership of ninety-three all told. When he entered upon his rest, he left a membership of three hundred and seventy-seven. On March 7th, 1881, this good man died, in the seventy-sixth year of his age and the fiftieth year of his pastorate. On March 11th his remains were followed to the grave by a sorrowing multitude. As a mark of their love for their deceased pastor, his people erected a marble tomb on the spot of his burial and a beautiful memorial tablet in the church where he so long and so faithfully ministered.

On April 9th, 1881, the Rev. William A. Patton, a graduate of Union Theological Seminary of New York, and a member of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, North, was unanimously called to the pastorate, and was duly installed on May 3d, 1881, entering immediately upon his labors, and continuing therein at this time, successful and beloved.

It ought to be stated here that the congregation at Doylestown has never been organized as a separate and distinct church. In its early history the minister at Doylestown was the pastor at Deep Run; the ruling elders at Doylestown were the Session at Deep Run, and there the members had their church connection, so that the congregation at Doylestown was but an extension of the venerable parent church. Nor has this relation been disturbed. The congregations united constitute one and the same church, having their spiritual officers in common, and equal privileges of membership. The present membership of the church (February, 1884), is four hundred and thirty-nine; Sabbath school, eight hundred. The present organization is as follows: Pastor, Rev. William A. Patton; ruling elders, Benjamin S. Rich, John G. Harris, John Beatty, Carlyle Shepherd, John L. Du Bois, Albert J. Jones, John K. Lovett, Philip H. Fretz and Charles H. Matthews.

De Gignillat, James, pastor of the French Protestant settlement on Goose Creek, S. C., from about 1690 to 1711.

Delivery of Sermons. (A Lecture delivered by the Rev. Dr. Adolphe Monod to several classes of Theological students at Montauban.) "Although the art of recitation depends more on practice than on theory, it nevertheless has certain rules, which must be presented to the mind before you can address yourselves with profit to the exercises which are demanded, and which form the object of this course. In commencing the lectures of the year, I think it my duty to lay these rules before you, or rather to recall them to your memory. In so doing, I limit myself to such general views as may be comprised in a single discourse, and, at the same time, are of universal application.

"GENERAL VIEWS OF THE ART OF RECITATION—ITS IMPORTANCE—ITS DIFFICULTY—ITS NATURE—INVESTIGATION OF A QUESTION.

"It is scarcely necessary for me to call your attention to the IMPORTANCE of a good delivery. Among all human means, there is no one which contributes more to fix the attention of men, and to move their hearts. The discourse which, delivered with forced emphasis or with monotony, leaves the hearer cold, and seems to court inattention, would have attracted, convinced and melted, if it had been pronounced with the accent of the soul and the intonations which nature communicates to sentiment and reason. It is vain to say that this is an affair of mere form, about which the Christian orator should not much concern himself. Even if delivery were a secondary thing with the orator, which indeed it is not—inasmuch as the state of the mind has more to do with it than is commonly thought—it must always have a commanding interest for the hearer, from its powerful influence on his thoughts and inclinations. Harken to two men, who ought to be at home in this matter—Demosthenes and Massillon. The greater the difference between the kinds of eloquence in which they respectively excelled, the more forcible is the testimony which they both bear to the power of delivery and oratorical action. Demosthenes was asked what was the first quality of the orator? 'It is action;' and the second? 'Action;' and the third? 'Action.' Massillon expressed the same judgment, when he replied, on a certain occasion, to one who asked him which he thought his best sermon, 'That one which I know best.' Why so, unless that which he knew the best was that which he could best deliver? We may be allowed to believe that these two great masters of the art exaggerated their opinion, in order to make it more striking; but its foundation is perfectly true. It is not merely a true opinion; it is an experimental fact, which cannot be contested.

"There is nothing in what we have been saying which should startle a pious soul. True piety does not forbid the use of the natural faculties which God has allotted to us, but commands us to use these for His glory, and for the good of our race. What Bossuet so well said of God's inspired servants, applies with greater reason to all others: 'True wisdom avails itself of all, and it is not the will of God that those whom he inspires should neglect human means, which, also, in some sort, proceed from Him.' The motto of the mystic morals is abstain; that of evangelic morals is consecrate. And surely the latter is above the former; for to abstain, it is enough to distrust; but to consecrate, we must believe. Exercise yourselves, then, gentlemen, without scruple, in the art of elocution and delivery; but let it be in a Christian spirit. Let the art of recitation be with you, not an end, but a means. If in your application to this exercise you have no higher aim than recitation itself, and those praises which the world lavishes on such as speak well, you are no longer a preacher; you are no longer even an orator; you are an actor. But if you cultivate elocution as a means of glorifying God, and doing good to man, you fulfill an obligation; and the greater the zeal and labor which you bring to the task, the more may you implore with confidence that grace without which the most eloquent is but 'a sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.'

"This labor is the more necessary, moreover, because the DIFFICULTY of the art which occupies our attention is equal to its importance. This is proved by experience; those who recite well are few. There is, however, a distinction to be observed between the recitation of the actor and that of the orator. The former is much more difficult than the latter; and good orators are not commonly great actors, at least in tragedy. Scarcely one appears in an age. For the actor has two things to do, of which the orator has but one. To the latter it suffices to express the sentiments which he actually experiences; but the former must express the sentiments of another. Now, to express these, he must first make them his own; and this necessity, which has no existence in the case of the orator, demands of the actor a study altogether peculiar, and apparently constitutes the most difficult portion of his art. To transform one's self into a person altogether foreign; to become invested with his manners, character, passions and language; and, nevertheless, to remain master of himself and with the mind free, since it would be a weakness in the actor to confound himself with his part, so far as to forget himself and his acting, this demands a prodigious faculty, and one which seems to depend on certain natural dispositions which are altogether peculiar. It seems as if there were a separate organ for the dramatic art; and it has been remarked that illustrious actors have not always been men of commanding intellect. So that we may make the same distinction between the orator and the actor which Cicero makes between the orator and the poet: masculine poete, funtoratores. We may thank God that we depend less on organization, and that this power of imagination is not indispensable to us; our task is, at the same time, more noble and less complicated. To communicate our thoughts and feelings in a suitable, just and expressive manner, is all that we demand.

"But how does it happen, then, that speakers whose delivery is good exist in no greater numbers? Leaving out of view forensic and parliamentary orators, how comes it that there are Christian preachers who sometimes pronounce their discourses without action, and even without just intlection, and this when neither the sincerity of their belief nor their interest in the subject can be called in question? There is the greater reason to be astonished at this, because the same men often manifest in animated conversation many of the very qualities which we miss in their pulpit exercises, so that they need nothing in order to make them excellent speakers but to be themselves. It is a difficult question; but let us attempt its solution.

"It must be borne in mind, in the first place, that there is a wide distinction between preaching and conversation, however grave, interesting or animated. A discourse in which it is attempted to develop one or more propositions, one person being sole speaker for an hour, before a numerous audience, has, and ought to have, something of continuity and elevation which does not belong to mere conversation. We are no longer in the sphere of simple nature. There must be some calculation of measures, management of voice and strengthening of intonations; in a word, there must be self-observation; and where this begins, the speaker is no longer in that pure simplicity where nature displays and acts itself forth unreservedly. Preaching, likewise, demands certain powers, both physical and moral, which are not possessed by every one, and which are not required in conversation. The two cases, therefore, are not parallel; and this may suffice to show how the same persons may succeed in one and fail in the other.

“This first difference, which is in the nature of things, produces another, which pertains to the orator. In attempting to rise above the tone of conversation most preachers depart from it too much. They inflate their delivery, and declaim instead of speaking; and when the pompous enters, the natural departs. We must not, indeed, expect too much; but whether it be the influence of example, or traditionary bad taste, or the ease of a method in which capacity of lungs goes for labor of reflection and energy of sentiment, the fact is that there is scarcely one among us who does not betray some leaven of declamation, or who preaches with perfect simplicity.

“We may read, recite, or speak extempore. If we read, it is almost impossible to assume a tone entirely natural; either because the art of reading well is perhaps more difficult than that of speaking well, or because the preacher who reads, when he is supposed to be speaking, places himself thereby in a kind of false position, of which he must undergo the penalty. It will be better to rehearse after having committed to memory; the preacher speaks throughout after his manuscript, it is true, but he speaks, nevertheless. Where the speaker has prepared his thoughts and even his words, it is a matter which the auditor need not know, and which a good delivery can ordinarily conceal from those who are not themselves in the habit of speaking in public. The mind, the voice, the attitude, all are more free, and the delivery is far more natural. But can it be completely so? I do not know. Art may go very far, but it is art still; and there is a certain tone of semi-declamation, from which there is scarcely any escape; a tax, as it were, which must be paid to method; to that method which we are, however, far from condemning, and which seems to have been practiced by some of the servants of God in whom he has been most glorified. Finally, will it be possible to avoid the inconveniences just mentioned, and shall we certainly attain a simple delivery, by abandoning ourselves to extempore speaking? I believe, indeed, that this is the method in which one may hope for the best delivery; provided, always, that the speaker has so great a facility, or so complete a preparation, or, what is better, both at once, as to be freed from the necessity of a painful search for thoughts and words. Without this, it is the worst of all methods, for matter as well as for form. But even where one has received from nature or acquired by practice a genuine facility, and has premeditated, with care, the concatenation and order of his ideas, and has even been aided by the pen (which is almost indispensable, in order to speak well), there will, nevertheless, always remain something of that constraint which arises from the research of what is to be said; and while the solicitude about mere words absorbs much of the mind's forces, the orator will hardly preserve freedom enough to secure, in all cases, the tones of nature. In this way simplicity will be injured by causes different from those which affect one who recites from memory, but scarcely less in degree. It is a fact, that with men who abandon themselves to extempore speaking, false and exaggerated intonations are not rare at those moments when they are not perfectly free and completely masters of their diction.

“I have mentioned freedom of mind. It is this, more than all the rest, which brings the preacher into the natural position, and, consequently, into the true intonation. If he could be perfectly at his ease, the greatest hindrance of a just and natural elocution would be removed. But it is this which is chiefly wanting, both in those who speak extemporaneously what has been meditated without extraordinary pains, and even in those who rehearse a discourse which they have learnt by rote. When they find themselves before an auditory, they become agitated. They fear to displease; or, if they are under the influence of higher sentiments, they fear lest they shall not make an impression on their hearers; or, finally, they experience a vague embarrassment of which they take no distinct account themselves, and from which certain pious ministers are not altogether exempt. Sometimes it is the course which intimidates them; sometimes it is the small number of hearers; nay, perhaps, a single hearer, more enlightened, more fastidious, or higher in rank, than the rest; alas, for poor human heart! From the moment that this miserable timidity enters the soul all is lost. The mind's vision is troubled, the thoughts are confused, the feelings are blunted, the voice itself is less firm; the laboring breath fatigues the lungs, and forebodes an approaching hoarseness. If the orator speak extempore, he will be in danger of stopping short; or, by a sort of calculation which takes place almost without his own knowledge, he will seek to hide the poverty of the matter under the show of the manner, and will vent common-place, ill-developed, though, perhaps, just ideas with a solemn voice and a declamatory tone, which will leave his hearers as cold as himself, and which, once adopted, or rather submitted to, will hold him enchained till the end of his discourse.

“We hear much of the talent and facility for speaking. I am far from admitting the principle, which (whether justly or not) is attributed to Jacotot—that all capacities are equal. Yet it is an error which, like most others, is only the exaggeration of a truth. God has shown Himself, in the distribution of His gifts, less frugal and less unequal than it is common to think; and as there is scarcely any soil from which culture may not extract at least necessary food, so there is scarcely any mind which, under proper direction, may not learn to speak in a correct, interesting and impressive manner. The immense differences which we observe between speakers proceed, less than is imagined, from a natural inequality, and much more than we imagine, from that other inequality which depends on human will and human effort. This seems just, and as it should be; and it is true, doubly true, as to pulpit eloquence, in which the moral element holds so considerable a space.

“But to return to the subject which gave occasion to this reflection; the power with which certain men speak, and the excellence of their delivery, arise in a great measure from their ability to put themselves perfectly at their ease in a position where others are embarrassed. If confusion paralyzes the faculties, self-possession multiplies them. Of two men who encounter any danger, it is not always the ablest who best extricates himself; it is commonly he who keeps himself cool; and the greatest genius is good for nothing when frozen by fear. Of what avail would the best faculties be to you, without self-possession? But he who is at his ease says just what he intends, and just as he intends; reflects; checks himself in a moment, if necessary, to seek a word or a thought, and from the very pause borrows some natural and expressive accent or gesture; takes advantage of what he sees and hears, and in a word brings into use all his resources; which is saying a great deal; for ‘the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts.’

“You will, perhaps, tell me that this confidence to which I exhort you is rather a favor to be wished for than a disposition to be enjoined; that it is the happy fruit of temperament, or of success, or of native talent; and that it is not every one that chooses who can be at his ease. I grant that it depends partly on temperament; and this is a reason for fortifying it, if it is naturally timid; so on success; and this is a reason why the young man should use all pains to make a good beginning; so on talent itself; and this is a reason for improving that which may be possessed. But there is another element which enters into this case of manner, and I both wish it for you and enjoin it upon you; it is Faith. Take your position as the ambassador of Jesus Christ, sent by God to treat with sinful men; believe that He who sends you will not leave you to speak in vain; labor for the salvation of those whom you address, as if it were your own; so forget yourself, to see only the glory of God and the salvation of your hearers; you will then tremble more before God, but less before men. You will then speak with liberty, therefore with the same facility and propriety which you possess in the other circumstances of life. If our faith were perfect, we should scarcely be in more danger of falling into false or declamatory tones, than if we were crying out to a drowning man to seize the rope which is thrown out to save him.

“I attribute, therefore, the inferiority of many preachers in oratorical delivery, partly to the difficulty of public and continuous discourses, but partly, also, to the want of certain moral dispositions. Hence it follows that it is by assiduous labor and by spiritual progress that they must become able to carry into the pulpit the same powers of speech which they employ elsewhere. But this particular question has diverted us too far from our subject; it is time to return and give some account of what constitutes THE ART of recitation or acceptable delivery.

“The basis of every art is nature, but nature in a state of embellishment. The basis is nature; poetry and eloquence do not rest on conventional rules; it is the heart and the mind of man—of man as he is—which must be depicted, and which must also be interested. But it has for its basis nature embellished—idealized; imitates it, but it does not copy. When Barthélemy describes to us the massacres of September, in terms which cause us not so much to understand, as to behold with our own eyes; when his bloody muse has no other ambition than that of inspiring the same horror which the hideous spectacle, to which he delights to drag us, would itself have produced, Barthélemy, with all his genius, has been false to his art; here is neither painting nor poetry, but butchery.

“I would not subject myself to the prepossession of a mere artistic view in treating of the recitation of the preachers. Yet it may be said, in general, that this recitation should partake equally of imitation and of nature. Listen to those who speak well; observe them, at times, when they are not observing themselves; retain their intonations, and transfer them to your delivery. But while you adopt, elevate them; imitate, but do not copy. Do not talk in the pulpit. Too great familiarity is almost as great a fault as declamation; more rare, indeed, but nevertheless occurring among certain preachers, and especially such as are uneducated. It is the tone of good conversation, but this tone, ennobled and exalted, which seems to me to be the ideal of oratorical delivery.

“From these general considerations, I pass to those exercises which are soon to occupy us; and the remainder of this discourse will be employed in giving some DIRECTIONS, first for the physical, and then for the moral part of elocution.

“We have just said, and we shall have occasion to repeat it, that the physical part of delivery is secondary, because it is instrumental. In public speaking, as in all the operations of the human understanding, the organs are the mere agents of the mind. But these agents are indispensable, and in proportion as they obey the understanding, other things being equal, will the delivery be effective. We must not, therefore, despise the physical part of delivery. We shall, nevertheless, be brief on this point, where every one will be able, with the aid of a few suggestions, to guide himself.

“The voix should be exercised frequently and carefully. Endeavor to render your voice at the same time distinct, strong, sonorous and flexible; this can be attained only by long practice. Labor to acquire the mastery of your voice. He who possesses this faculty will find resources, even in a refractory voice, and will produce great effects with little fatigue. But most public speakers are the slaves of their voice; they do not govern it so much as it governs them. In this case, even though it has the most precious qualities, it is but a rebellious instrument. No one need fear any injury to the chest from those daily exercises which are necessary in order thus to subdue and discipline the voice. If moderate, they will, on the contrary, strengthen it; and experienced physicians recommend recitation and singing to persons of delicate habit. The most favorable time for these exercises is an hour or two after a meal; the stomach should be neither full nor empty.

“After the care of the voice comes that of pronunciation. There is a natural pronunciation; by which I mean that utterance of the elements of speech which is common to all languages; and there is a conventional pronunciation, or that which each nation adopts for the words of its own tongue.

“The student should begin by making himself perfectly master of the natural pronunciation, and learn to give every vowel its appropriate sound, and to make the organic motions belonging to every consonant. The latter point is the more important. If the purity of the vowel sounds conduce much to the grace of discourse, it is especially the articulation of the consonants which gives it distinctness, vigor and expression. A man who articulates well can make himself heard at a distance without vociferation, even though he lay little stress upon the vowels; and this is the method to which actors have recourse, when they make dying persons speak with a subdued voice; they explode the consonant while they retain the vowel sound. But one who articulates badly will never make himself heard at a distance; and adding force to the vowels will but increase the confusion. It is, further, in the utterance of consonants that the most usual impediments and other faults occur; and there is scarcely any one who may not, on strict observation, detect himself as faulty in some particulars. One speaks thickly; he pronounces the r with the uvula and in the throat, instead of uttering it with the tongue, against the palate. Another lisps; in pronouncing the s he protrudes the end of the tongue between the rows of teeth, and makes the English th, instead of a pure sibilation. Many fail in the ch (English sh), substituting an s, or sort of f, or an awkward ch, produced by an oblique portion of the tongue. There is no one of these faults which may not be corrected by perseverance. You remember the example of Demosthenes, whose principal efforts were directed to the development of his voice, and the utterance of the letter r. It is to be wished that it were more customary to exercise children, at an early age, in the proper formation of sounds and use of their organs; there might thus be obtained, without trouble, results which, at a more advanced age, cost immense pain and valuable time.

“There remains another point, which is almost entirely neglected by public speakers, and which has, nevertheless, great importance; it is the art of taking breath at the right time. A man who takes breath properly will fatigue himself less in speaking three or four hours, as certain political orators do, especially in England, than another in half an hour; and the orators who are able to speak so long are either men who have studied the management of their breath, or men who speak much, but who speak well; for in this case, respiration regulates itself, without separate thought, just as in conversation. But it is by no means the same when one recites a discourse from memory; especially if it is the discourse of another: for in writing we take care, without being aware of it, to adjust the length of the periods to the habitudes of our lungs. But the exercise in which it is most difficult to breathe aright, as being that which is furthest removed from the natural tone, is the exercise of reading; and it is remarked that one is wearied much sooner by reading than by speaking. There are very few persons who can bear half an hour of reading without a slight inconvenience of the organs; but there are many who can speak an hour without trouble. The point of the difficulty is this, to time the respiration so as always to take breath a moment before it is exhausted. For this purpose, it is necessary to breathe quite often, and to take advantage of little rests in the delivery. It might be feared lest this necessity should injure the utterance and make it frigid; but, on the contrary, the rests which are thus employed by one who is exercised so as to use them properly, are as expressive as the voice itself; the slowness which they communicate to the discourse is only that slowness which gives more weight and vigor to the thought; so this happy infirmity becomes an additional power.

“It is, lastly, by breathing seasonably, that the speaker will avoid a fault which is very common and very great; that of letting the voice fall at the end of sentences, which renders the recitation at the same time indistinct and monotonous. This is the abuse of the rule which is pointed out by nature. It is natural to lower the voice slightly at the moment of finishing a sentence, at least in most cases; for there are certain thoughts which, on the contrary, demand an elevation of the voice at the close. But the fall is made too perceptible, and is taken from too great a height, so that there are often three or four words which the hearer catches with difficulty, or does not catch at all. This would be bad enough, even without the additional evil that the expression is weakened at the same time with the voice. As a general rule, the voice should be kept up to the end of the sentence, excepting only that slight depression and, as it were, reflexion, which denote that the sense is terminated. But to do this, you must breathe in time, as it is because the lungs are exhausted that you must lower the voice; for, where there is no breath there is no sound.

"I come now to some directions as to the Moral Part of delivery.

"The expression sufficiently shows the point of view under which we consider the whole art of recitation, and in which we find the fundamental principle which supports all our rules. The principle is this: delivery has its residence, not in the mouth, but in the sentiment and the thought. It depends less on the voice than on the soul. I should have been in danger of being misunderstood if I had not begun by making some reservation in favor of the vocal part of delivery. This I am far from wishing to sacrifice. But now I assume an instrument fully exercised, an organ flexible and strong, a good pronunciation, distinct articulation and easy respiration. When this previous training is accomplished, and when the moment has come for actual speaking, remember that the delivery is above all an affair of the soul; and make it as independent as possible of your organs. It is at bottom, the soul of the speaker, which addresses the soul of the hearer. The organs of speech, on the one part, and the organs of hearing, on the other, are but intermediates between the mind of him who speaks and the mind of him who hears. The more free one makes this communication, the more one forgets the organ, so as to bring out nothing but the soul, the better will be the elocution. Let the soul, the entire soul, with its constant unity, as well as with its infinite movements, look through the utterance, like the bottom of a stream through perfectly limpid water, so limpid that it seems not to exist. The organs should be such docile and faithful interpreters of the thought as to seem not to be present: they should obey to a degree of self-concealment. This is their glory and their mission, and the realizing of this ideal would infer the perfection, as well of the organ as of the sentiment. This is according to our fundamental principle, viz.: 'It is the soul that should speak.' We proceed now to deduce from this certain general directions:—

"1. The delivery should be true, or just; it should give to each thought and each sentiment the tone which belongs to it. Why is such a tone proper to such an emotion of the soul? Why, for example, do we raise the voice at the beginning of a sentence, and let it fall at the end, when we ask a question to which an answer is expected? Why do we invert the method in that species of questions which require no answer, and which are only another form of affirmation? Why does a certain intonation mark a simple assertion, another a doubt, another surprise, another anger, and the like? This is a question which we cannot answer. We are assured it is so in nature; to observe and reproduce it is the business of elocution. But to explain the secret relation which exists between the movements of the mind and the inflections of the voice, is more than any one can do, if we except Him who formed both the human soul and the organs which serve to communicate its impressions. That there are, in regard to this, fixed and well-determined laws, is sufficiently proved by the two following observations. In the first place, all men, without excepting those who never practice public speaking, recognize just inflection, when they hear it: the dramatic art is founded on this remark. In the second place, there are certain inflections which may be called primitive, and which remain invariable, when we pass from one nation and idiom to another, notwithstanding the infinite diversity of all that is conventional.

"But how are we to discover these accents of nature? The first means which offers itself to the mind is to observe them in others; it is excellent; but we cannot employ it in every case. We do not always find an occasion to hear precisely this or that word or sentence, about which we are embarrassed, pronounced by good speakers. I suppose the case, therefore, where we are left to ourselves. How are we to discover the accents of nature? I answer, we must seek them in the soul. We must begin by discerning the inward impression; and this impression, well caught, will conduct us to the intonation. This is the first consequence of the general principle which we have laid down above, or rather it is only the principle itself put into practice.

"It is not meant that random trials must be made of all sorts of intonations, or that bursts of voice must be uttered at hazard. We must sit down, reflect, comprehend, feel and silently interrogate the mind and heart. It is not till after this inward labor that the essays of the voice will be useful; they will succeed in clearing and animating the movement of mind which gave them birth. By these means, one may gradually arrive at the true tone, which once found, and especially found in this way, will abide in the soul's memory, and will return and present itself at the moment of necessity. A very useful method of aiding in this research is to translate the thought into other terms, more familiar than those of the discourse; or, which is still better, to inquire how one would utter an analogous sentiment in the ordinary course of life. This care in tracing the language to the thought, and questioning the soul concerning the inflections of the voice, is the more necessary, from the fact that the same sentence or the same word is susceptible of a multitude of inflections, which the mind alone can distinguish, perceiving as it does the most delicate relations, while the diction and the pen have but a single expression for the whole.

"Take a word—the most insignificant you can find—a proper name, for instance—and this, if you please, a monosyllable, as Paul. For writing and for language, there is but this one word, Paul; but there are ten, twenty, an infinity, for the soul, and the organ it inspires. By the mere way in which an intelligent speaker, or better still, one who speaks without observing how, utters this name, and without waiting for him to add anything, you will be able to discern whether he be about to praise or to blame; to tell good news, or bad; to encourage a design, or to depart from it; to call one afar off, or at hand; to question, or to reprimand. We should never end, if we should try to enumerate all the thoughts which may be included in the utterance of this little name. Now, amidst this infinite variety, what rule shall guide us? What other than that the mind, well exercised and correct, will find in delivery the tone which suits the occasion and the moment of speaking? I cannot, then, repeat too often, speak ex animo (out of the soul). Perhaps you think this is a matter of course, and that the advice is unimportant. But practice will convince you that it is not so.

“Let me be allowed to cite the authority of a man who received from God a rare genius, which, unfortunately, he squandered on vanities—I mean Talma; listen to his own exposition, given in private to some of his friends; for he wrote nothing of importance on his art. It will be seen that his mode of preparation was that of which I have been speaking; and it may be believed that one of the causes of that reform which he wrought in theatric delivery was the care which he bestowed, in searching for inflections in his soul, and in employing his organs only as docile instruments, destined to reproduce the internal impressions.

“The intonations being found, we must give it a degree of intensity greater than one would employ in conversation. From this comes the energy of public discourse. It is needless to say, this energy should bear a proportion to the nature of the subject. It will be at one time the energy of argument, at another the energy of passion; but it will always be the energy of propriety and of truth. This utterance, at once accurate and firm, these inflections, true and struck out with precision, have a peculiar charm for the hearer, and can make a discourse interesting from beginning to end, even in the least animated parts.

“11. The delivery should be simple, or natural. In speaking from the soul, one will speak simply—for the soul is simple. It is only the presence of man which can make us affected; when alone we are always simple, for the single reason that then we are ourselves. The accents of the soul are those of nature. It is these which we are to reproduce; and we must take care not to substitute for these the accents of conventional artifice or of arbitrary choice. It is necessary that the hearer should recognize himself, and that the instinct of his nature should be satisfied with each of our inflections. In other words, we must speak, and not declaim. I have already said, elevate, ennoble the tone of conversation and of common life; but while you elevate, do not forsake it. An able painter does not slavishly copy the traits of his model; he idealizes them, and transfers them to the canvas only after he has subjected them to a sort of transfiguration in his brain; but even while idealizing them, he so imitates them that they may be recognized at once. Thus it is that a portrait may be a perfect likeness, and yet more beautiful than the original. The same thing occurs in good speaking. The tones of common parlance are embellished, and yet they are perfectly recognizable, because their essence is carefully preserved. But to declaim, to take a new tone, because one is in the pulpit—in fine, to speak as no one ever speaks, is a grievous fault; while, strange to say, it is a fault very common, very hard to avoid, and which, perhaps, none of us escapes altogether. For it is far easier to assume a sustained and unaltered tone, than, step by step, to follow thought and sentiment in their infinite sinuosities; and then, there are never wanting hearers of bad taste, for whom the pomp of language is imposing. Nevertheless, consulting only the human effect of your preaching—if this consideration were not unworthy—the man who speaks in the pulpit will rise above him who declaims. Even those who at first suffer themselves to be dazzled by the cadence of periods and the outbreaks of voice, at length grow weary, and are less pleased with the artificial preacher than with him whose very tones make them feel that he thinks all that he says. And what shall I say of the real and useful effect produced by these two preachers? How much more directly, nay, exclusively, will the latter find his way to the heart and conscience! How will his vehement parts be relieved by the calm and simple tone of his habitual manner! How much more truly will he be what he ought, in the sight both of God and of man, by continuing to be himself, and not stepping aside from truth in announcing truth!

“Yes, if you would have a pulpit delivery which shall be dignified and Christian, and which shall make deep impression, speak always with simplicity. Say things as you feel them. Put no more warmth into your manner than you have in your heart. This honesty in speaking—allow me the expression—will constrain you to introduce a more sincere and profound warmth than you would ever have attained in any other way. It will, besides, have a salutary reaction on your writing, and even on your soul. For, displaying things as they are, it will bring your faults to light, and admonish you to correct them.

“I have spoken of the pulpit. If it had been proper here to speak of the stage many similar observations might be made. Great actors no longer declaim; they speak. Talma, whom I have so often named, began by declaiming, as do others. An interesting circumstance made him feel the necessity of adopting a new manner, more conformed to nature; and from that day he became another man, in regard to his art, and produced extraordinary effects. Those who have heard him will tell you that the extreme simplicity of his playing astonished them at first, and that they were tempted to take him for a very ordinary man, whose only advantage over others consisted in a magnificent voice. But they were soon subdued by the power of nature; and the vivid impressions by which they were seized made them understand that the very simplicity of his acting constituted its force, as well as its originality.

“III. The delivery should be varied. We know how monotonous it is in general; and though every one feels the grossness of the fault, few succeed in avoiding it. The best means of doing so is to observe our principle of recitation from the soul. The soul is all full of variety. If there are no two leaves on a tree exactly alike, still less are there two sentiments in a human soul which are perfectly identical. Listen to a man engaged in animated conversation; you will be confounded at the marvelous flexibility of the human mind, and the infinity of shades to which it can adapt itself by turns. All this the vocal organ will deliver, if it confine itself to follow the movements of the soul. It must, therefore, be conceded, that there is no reason why any one should be monotonous in recitation. Take account of the sense of each sentence, of each member of a sentence; you will discover a perpetual mobility in the thought, and will need only to infuse abundance of truth into your delivery to insure for it abundance of variety. There is, in particular, a kind of variety which will be found in this way, and which will spread itself over all the rest; I mean variety in regard to rapidity of delivery. It is natural to speak sometimes slow, and sometimes fast; sometimes, even very slow, and sometimes very fast. Here is a word on which one must dwell a moment; here, on the other hand, is a sentence which must be exploded rather than recited, and which must be pronounced with all the rapidity of which the organs are capable, in consistency with precise articulation. An elocution which levels these inequalities, and in which every sentence takes its turn with a measure always equal, and almost with the same rhythm, contradicts nature and loses half its resources. This monotony must be broken, at all hazards. Better even would it be to employ excessive action and abrupt transitions, though this extreme must also be avoided, because it gives the delivery a theatrical air, or rather because by exaggerating the nature it falsifies it. In general, we speak too fast, much too fast. When any one speaks, the thoughts and sentiments do not come to him all at once; they rise in his mind by little and little. Now, this labor and this delay should appear in the delivery, or it will always fail of being natural. Take your time to reflect, to feel, to let ideas come; and do not make your elocution precipitate, except when determined so to do by some peculiar consideration. This necessary rapidity will give greater movement and vivacity to the delivery; but that other rapidity, which arises only from embarrassment and want of intelligence or reflection, confounds all the inequalities of thought, and engenders a manner which is effeminate, dull, lifeless and uninteresting.

“IV. Together with variety, the delivery should present another condition, without which this variety will itself be without connection and support; it is that of unity. The delivery should be one. In other words, we must use an effort to have a récitation d'ensemble, which results again from the principle which we laid down in the outset. For if the words are manifold, the thought is one and indivisible in the mind. If we were pure spirits, we could communicate it to other spirits of the same nature, without decomposition. But being constrained to clothe it in words, we are constrained to dismember it, and from being simple in our soul, it becomes multiplied in language. To seize and transmit to the hearer this soul thought, to rise from language to the soul, and from the multiplicity of words to the simplicity of intellect, is the great work of a good delivery. Collecting, then, into one general sentiment, the various sentiments of which I have said so much, it will deserve the definition which has been given of the Beautiful, ‘Unity in variety, or variety in unity.’

“This is not to be accomplished, however, always in the same manner. In general, we shall, in a well-constructed sentence, avoid giving prominence to this or that word; causing the whole of it rather to stand forth alike, and supporting it to the end. For it is the genius of our language to accent constantly, but lightly, the end of every word, and consequently, also, the end of every sentence. There are, nevertheless, certain cases where one is obliged to give a saliency to some words, or even to a single word, because this word comprises the capital idea. Even then, however, such words should predominate over the sentence, but not absorb it. It is the thought which should always appear, and always in its unity. A delivery which is broken, jerking, rising and falling by turns, is bad indeed.

“I might add other counsels, but these are such as experience shows to be most useful; and by means of the illustrations which we have commenced, you will yourselves be able to make other applications of one general principle, to which we must continually return, and in which are embodied all the directions we have given.

“I have said nothing about gestures. It is a subject by itself, and one which I have not time to treat at present. Let me merely say that the preacher should make few gestures, and these of a very simple kind, and further, that they should be dictated by the emotions of the soul, as well as by the inflections of the voice.

“To sum up what I have said, if you wish to attain to a good delivery, begin by preparing your mind and your heart. Then, by reflection, with the aid of observation, search for the inflections of the soul, and oblige your organs to conform to these, humbly and exactly. As to the rest, be persuaded you will speak all the better, the more you sink yourselves; that the best delivery is that which turns attention away from the orator, and fixes it upon what he says; and finally, that the highest point of the art, especially in the case of the preacher, is to cause himself to be forgotten."

De Richebourg, Claudius Philip, first pastor of the colony of French Protestant or Huguenot refugees at Manakintown, King William parish, Henrico county, Va., 1699 to 1712. He removed to South Carolina, and became pastor of the French settlement on the Santee. He died in 1719.

Dickerson, Rev. Archer C., D.D., was born at Wilmington, the primitive county seat of Campbell county, Ky., December 18th, 1806. Both parents were from Virginia. United with the Presbyterian Church at Paris, Ky., in his seventeenth year. Educated at Oxford, Ohio, under Dr. R. M. Bishop and Professor W. H. McGuffey. Studied theology under Dr. Bishop, under care of Cincinnati Presbytery, sustaining himself through his literary and theological course by teaching. Licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Clinton, Synod of Mississippi, in 1832. Ordained in 1833. Spent several years missionating in Northern Mississippi, supporting himself by teaching. He came to Bowling Green, Ky., 1839; pastor there seventeen years. Then Presbyterial Missionary for Louisville Presbytery four years. Since and now Home Missionary for several churches, fifty miles apart, requiring travel on horseback of one hundred miles per month, though now in the seventy-eighth year of his age.

As a preacher, Dr. Dickerson is a man of more than ordinary ability. He is clear, clean-cut and logical in argument, persuasive in manner, convincing in his earnestness, and, when truly aroused, overwhelming in appeal—at such times few men excelled him in true pulpit eloquence. The same marked ability and clear-headed perspicuity have ever characterized him as an ecclesiastic. He is ready and able in debate, yet always self-possessed and perfectly courteous to others. With the ambition of some men, Dr. Dickerson could have filled some of the high places in the Church. But with a true modesty and self-abnegation, he has spent a long, laborious life in the service of his Master in obscure mission fields, and to this work is now being given the self-sacrificing labors of a green old age.

Dickinson, William C., D. D., son of Rev. Baxter Dickinson, D. D. and Martha (Bush) Dickinson, was born in Longmeadow, Mass., January 26th, 1827. He graduated at Amherst College, Mass., in 1848, and pursued his theological studies in Union Theological Seminary, N. Y., and at Andover Theological Seminary, graduating at the latter Institution in 1853. He was Tutor in Amherst College in 1851 and 1852. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Central Church, in Middletown, Mass., by a Congregational Council, in April, 1854. From 1859 to 1867 he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Lake Forest, Ill., holding also for four years the Professorship of Languages in Lake Forest University. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Battle Creek, Mich., from 1870 to 1872; of the Second Presbyterian Church in Lafayette, Ind., from 1872 to 1882, and is now pastor of the Presbyterian Church of College Hill, O. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Wabash College, Indiana, in 1878.

Dr. Dickinson is a gentleman of dignified and manly bearing and refined and graceful manners. He is courteous, self-possessed and discreet, and his utterances, public and private, manifest a thoughtful consideration of the feelings and interests of others. His sympathy for those in affliction and trial is warm and tender, but is ever expressed without intrusiveness or ostentation. As a result of these and other personal qualities, he has many friends and few enemies. His preaching is characterized by elegance of diction, aptness and beauty of illustration, and clearness and cogency of reasoning, and his delivery is earnest and effective. His favorite themes are those which bear directly and practically on Christian life and character. Dr. Dickinson is one of the leading Presbyterian ministers in the Central West.

Diefendorf, Sanders, D.D., was born April 24th, 1816, at Minden, Montgomery county, N. Y. Graduated at Yale College, in class of 1836; came to Ohio in 1845 and settled in Holmes county, where he assumed the pastoral charge of Nashville and Hopewell churches. He was thence called to Hayesville, in 1849, to take a Professorship in Vermillion Institute. From there to Athens, O., where he remained two years, was again called to Hayesville, as pastor of the Presbyterian Church and Principal of Vermillion Institute, where he remained until May 18th, 1868, when he was called to Nebraska by the Missouri Presbytery, to found Otoe University. From there he went to New York, in 1873, and was recalled from there to Vermillion Institute, in June, 1876, where he remained until the call of the Master to that rest promised the faithful, in the beginning of the year 1884. (See Vermillion Institute.)

Diver, Rev. Charles Frederick, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., December 15th, 1812. He graduated at Jefferson College in 1839, and at the Union Theological Seminary, New York city, in 1842. He was pastor at Providence, Pa., 1844-47; stated supply at Hublersburg and Spring Mills, Pa., 1847-51; pastor at Waterford, Pa., 1851-52; pastor at Cedarville, N. J., 1852-61, which was the last charge he accepted. He has since resided in Philadelphia, preaching as he has opportunity. Mr. Diver is a member of the Central Presbytery of Philadelphia. He is a gentleman of affable disposition and dignified bearing, an instructive and impressive preacher, a faithful presbyter, and ready for every good work.

Dobbs, Rev. Charles H., was born in St. Francisville, La., June 29th, 1835. In 1859 he graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky., with the second honor of his class. After pursuing his theological studies in the Seminary at the same place, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Ebenezer, in April, 1861, and ordained and installed pastor at Bolton, Miss., in July following, by the Presbytery of Central Mississippi. During the short period of his ministration here he received about forty members into the church. After some time spent in the public service, he was engaged in teaching and in missionary work in Mississippi. In 1867 he was settled as pastor of the church at Washington, Ky. Weakened by division and strife when he came, it grew into unity and strength under his wise pastorate and faithful preaching. Eighty-seven members had been received on profession, and a good church building had been erected, when he resigned, in 1871, to remove to Texas.

Coming here in that year in quest of health and work, he has since then been one of the best beloved and most useful members of the Presbytery of Central Texas. He has, during these ten years, ministered steadily to several, and as pastor to two churches, and in all of them his labors have been blessed, and he has gained and held the full confidence and affection of the people whom he has served. His last pastoral charge was at Robinson, when the church grew from a small beginning to be one of the largest in the Presbytery. But the Presbytery, recognizing his eminent fitness for the evangelistic work, demanded his services in this important sphere of labor.

His zeal and wisdom and success have fully justified the choice. As a preacher, Mr. Dobbs is instructive, earnest and forcible. He handles the Word of God in such a way that his ministrations are welcome and useful in the most cultured towns and in the remote frontier. He is doing an arduous and most valuable work in planting and watering churches in the vast and rapidly developing field in which he has been called to labor. Being in the full prime of physical manhood, and of a vigorous and cultivated intellect, and animated by the true spirit of a self-denying herald of the cross, it may reasonably be hoped that many years of usefulness are yet before him.

Early Presbyterianism in South Carolina. "The first band of emigrants to South Carolina," says Dr. Gillett, "set sail in January, 1670. The period, in England, was one of sharp persecution for Dissenters. Eight years before the terrible Act of Conformity had expelled nearly two thousand ministers from their parishes and pulpits. Cavalier statesmen were unscrupulous enough to take advantage of the fruits of their own bigoted counsels. In the first band, along with the commercial agent, was William Sayle, the Proprietary Governor, 'probably a Presbyterian,' who, more than twenty years before, had attempted to plant an 'Eleutheria' in the isles of the Gulf of Florida.

"The emigrants had hardly landed before they instituted a polity on a liberal basis. Representative government was established, and continued to be cherished. It was in vain that Locke theorized or Shaftesbury speculated. The Utopia of their dreams was not to be realized. It was not long before Dutch enterprise offered the colonists the luxury of cargoes of slaves. From the banks of the Hudson, lured by stories of the fertility of the soil, came an unlooked-for accession to the population. In little more than a year after the arrival of the first colonists, two ships, with Dutch emigrants from New York, arrived, and these were soon followed by others, with their countrymen from Holland. Even Charles II provided, at his own expense—a munificence the more marked for its isolation, and perhaps designed to manifest his sympathy with Carolina rather than New England—two small vessels to transport to Carolina a few foreign Protestants. But the most considerable emigration was from England. The prospect of immunity from the molestations of informers and acts against conventicles and non-conformity tempted Dissenters to a colony where their worship would be tolerated and their rights respected. A company of them from Somers-shire were conducted to Charleston, by Joseph Drake, brother of the gallant admiral, and the fortune which the latter had acquired was employed to plant South Carolina with a people who dreaded the evils of oppression and the prospect of a Popish successor to the throne.

"The condition of Scotland, likewise, impelled not a few to project a settlement in Carolina. But a comparatively small number, however, under the lead of Lord Cardross, who soon returned, crossed the Atlantic. A colony of Irish, under Ferguson, received a hearty welcome, and were soon merged among the other colonists. More important, however, for a short period at least, was the accession to the population from the exiled Huguenots. The French king essayed to torment them into conversion, but he only tormented them out of the kingdom, and not a few found their way to the shores of South Carolina. Here were fugitives from Languedoc and Saintonge and Bordeaux, from Northern and Southern France, Calvinist Protestants seeking the shelter which the worldly policy of High-Church statesmen extended to the adherents of every creed.

“At an early period, also, the population of South Carolina received into its bosom a Puritan element from New England. Although, by the charter of the State, the Church of England was the only one legally recognized, yet it contained provisions favorable to other creeds. The colony, though founded by bigoted Churchmen, was governed by ‘Dissenters.’ Blake was a Presbyterian and Archdale a Quaker. There were also in the colony godly Christians, both prepared for and longing after the edifying ordinances of the gospel.”

“At Charleston, beside the Huguenot Church (1686), originating with the expulsion of Protestants from France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, there was, as early as 1690, a meeting-house for a congregation (known, till 1730, indiscriminately as Presbyterian, Congregational and Independent), of which Benjamin Pierpont (1691-1696-7) was pastor, and whose successors were Mr. Adams and John Cotton, son of the Boston minister. This, at first, may have embraced alike settlers from Scotland and from New England; but the two elements were not altogether congenial, and in 1730 the Scotch demanded an organization of their own.*

“In 1710, a letter from South Carolina, published in London, stated that there were in the colony five churches of British Presbyterians. Some of these may subsequently have become extinct. The Church on Edisto Island † (see its sketch, pp. 208-9) dates from 1717; that of Pon Pon, on Walterborough, of which Stobo, on leaving Charleston, became pastor, from 1728; those of John’s and James’ Islands, from 1734 or 1735; that on Wiltown was many years anterior, while the Independent Presbyterian Church, of Stony Creek dates from 1713. The five early churches must have been those of Charleston, Dorchester, perhaps Wiltown or Edisto, and one or more on the Maritime Islands.”

Eddy, William W., D.D., was born in Penn Yan, N. Y., December 18th, 1825. He was the son of Rev. Chauncey Eddy, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that town. The family afterwards removed

* Dr. Smythe, in his "History of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Charleston," says: "As early as 1690, the Presbyterians, in conjunction with the Independents, formed a church in Charleston, which continued in this united form for forty years. During this period, two of their ministers, the Rev. Messrs. Stobo and Livingston, were Presbyterians and connected with the Charleston Presbytery. After the death of the latter, twelve families seceded and formed a Presbyterian Church on the model of the Church of Scotland. Their building was erected in 1731, on the site of the present, which was completed in 1814."

† In 1705 Henry Brown obtained a grant for three hundred acres of land, which, in 1717, he conveyed to certain persons "in trust for the benefit of a Presbyterian clergyman in Edisto Island."

to Saratoga Springs, where, under the instruction of Dr. Albert T. Chester, now of Buffalo, N. Y., the subject of these lines was prepared for college. He pursued his studies in Williams College, from which he graduated in 1845. After leaving college Mr. Eddy taught school for two years in Jacksonville, Ill. In 1847 he entered Union Theological Seminary, New York city, from which he graduated in the class of 1850. Mr. Eddy was a diligent student, standing as to scholarship among the very first of his class. For about a year and a half after leaving the seminary Mr. Eddy preached, with very great acceptance, in Jersey City, Hartford, Boston and Norwich, Conn. Flattering calls were tendered to him from some of these cities, which, however, he refused to accept, having set his heart upon the foreign missionary field. His father before him had desired and proposed to engage in this work, but had been providentially hindered. His earnest desire and prayer had been that one of his children should go forth in his stead. To this work, as one called of God, and solemnly consecrated to it by parental vows, his son cheerfully devoted his life.

In November, 1853, Mr. Eddy was married to Miss Hannah Maria Condit, daughter of Rev. Robert Condit, D.D., for forty years the pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Oswego, N. Y., himself a warm and earnest friend and supporter of the Foreign Missionary cause.

Immediately after his marriage Mr. Eddy, with his wife, under appointment of the A. B. C. F. M., set sail for Syria, the very field to which his parents, twenty-eight years before, had been appointed, but through failure of health had been prevented from carrying out their purpose. Thus the prayer of these parents, who had themselves been prevented from going to the foreign missionary field, that they might be able to send a substitute in the person of one of their children, was answered.

Having arrived in Syria, Mr. and Mrs. Eddy were assigned to the station at Aleppo, in the North; but when, afterwards, that station was surrendered to the Central Turkey Mission, they removed to Kefr Shima, near Beirut. Soon after this, however, they were sent to Sidon, where they continued their work for twenty-one years, a portion of the time being associated with Rev. J. E. Ford, who had also, together with his wife, been their companion in labor at Aleppo. Under the ministry of these brethren the churches in Sidon, and in many of the neighboring towns, were gathered and organized; and the seminary for girls and numerous other schools in the surrounding country were established, which are still in existence, and are exerting a wide and hallowed influence through all the region. A son and a daughter of Rev. Dr. Eddy, viz: Rev. William K. Eddy and Miss Hattie M. Eddy, and a son and daughter of Rev. Mr. Ford, his former associate, viz: Rev. George A. Ford and Miss Sarah A. Ford, are now in charge of the work in Sidon and in the immediately surrounding field. Thus, instead of the fathers, are the children. In the year 1876 Mr. Eddy received the honorary degree of D. D., from the University of the City of New York. In 1878 Dr. Eddy was called from Sidon to the work of instruction in the theological seminary in Beirut, and to pastoral and editorial work in that city, where he still continues, a very earnest, efficient and faithful laborer in the work to which he has so heartily and unreservedly devoted his life.

Dr. and Mrs. Eddy have been among the most laborious and useful of our foreign missionaries. For more than thirty years they have stood in their place and faithfully done their work, exerting an influence which has been widely extended, and which has been owned and greatly blessed of God in the instruction and salvation of many souls, and in the laying of foundations and establishing of agencies and institutions which shall long live to bless that land in which the Church of Christ has so special an interest.

Educational Board of Aid for Colleges and Academies. This movement in the interest of higher education first took form in the General Assembly of 1877, in the appointment of a committee "to consider the matter of enlarging the functions of the Board of Education," having in view "some plan which should result in the better endowment of our collegiate and theological institutions." This committee was continued by the Assemblies of 1878, 1879 and 1880, and made their report to the Assembly of 1881, recommending that the functions of the Board of Education be enlarged, and that said Board be directed "to inaugurate a system for the aid of colleges," according to the suggestions and principles embodied in the report.

To the same Assembly a report was submitted from the Standing Committee on Home Missions, recommending, in substance, the appointment of "a permanent Committee on Education in the West," to have in charge the locating, assisting and endowing of institutions of learning, "with special reference to the supply of missionaries and teachers for the frontier." Both these reports were finally referred, by the Assembly of 1881, to a "Special Committee on Education," to report to the next Assembly. This committee made an informal report to the Assembly of 1882, which was accepted, and the committee enlarged and continued.

The Committee thus enlarged reported to the General Assembly of 1883, arguing so convincingly in behalf of a denominational work for higher Christian education, that the Assembly, without a single dissenting voice, either in the discussion or in the vote, adopted the recommendation of the committee, and constituted this board. Its character and work were defined as follows:—

A. The name of this board shall be the Presbyterian Board of Aid for Colleges and Academies, and the general work shall have the limitations indicated by its title.

B. The board shall consist of twenty-four members, divided into three classes, composed equally of ministers and laymen, and one class shall be elected each year.

C. The officers of this board shall be a president, vice-president, treasurer and permanent secretary.

D. In the constitution of the board the different parts of the country shall be equitably represented.

E. The headquarters of the board shall be at Chicago, and the executive committee of the board shall be residents in Chicago or in the immediate vicinity.

F. Meetings of the board may be held at different points in the country, as the board shall elect.

G. The province of the board shall be to secure an annual offering from the churches for this cause, to co-operate with local agencies in determining sites for new institutions, to decide what institutions shall be aided, to assign to those institutions seeking endowment the special fields open to their appeals, that clashing between them may be avoided, and to discourage all independent appeals to the Church at large.

H. The funds received by the board shall be devoted either to current expenses of struggling institutions or to permanent endowments.

The funds shall be secured (a) by annual offerings from the churches, mainly for current expenses of the institutions; (b) by special applications for endowment, under the approval and general direction of the board.

1. (a) Every Institution hereafter established, as a condition of receiving aid, shall be either organically connected with the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, or shall, by charter provision perpetually, have two-thirds of its Board of Control members of the Presbyterian Church.

(b) In the case of Institutions already established, and not included under the above provisions, appropriations for endowment shall be so made as to revert to the board whenever these Institutions shall pass from Presbyterian control.

(c) In all other respects the disbursement of funds by the board shall be wholly discretionary with the board, both as to amount and direction, subject always to the control of the General Assembly.

4. That the board be chartered under the laws of the State of Illinois, and be empowered to receive legacies.

Members of the board were thereupon appointed by the Assembly. These met in Chicago, June 19th, 1883, and effected their organization. The board is chartered under the laws of the State of Illinois. Its officers for its first year are Rev. Herrick Johnson, D.D., President; Hon. Homer N. Hibbard, Vice-President; Mr. Charles M. Charney, Treasurer; Rev. Hervey D. Gause, D.D., Permanent Secretary Edwards, Richard, a great grandson of President Jonathan Edwards, was born near Binghamton, N. Y., January, 1803. He removed to Pittsburg, Pa., in 1825, and became a merchant; was one of the founders of the Third Presbyterian Church there in 1833, and its first elder, which office he held till his removal to the West, in 1856. He was for many years Superintendent of the Sabbath school of the church, and by assiduous personal effort, as well as liberal pecuniary support, he was one of the most efficient of its members in making this church a strong and influential one.

On settling at Dubuque, Iowa, he took an active part in the organization and building of the Second Presbyterian Church, and became an elder in it. The rapid growth and success of this church was due largely to his personal influence and support.

In 1862 he returned to Pittsburg, resumed his connection with the Third Church, and was again chosen to serve in the eldership. In May, 1872, on account of a change of residence to the suburbs of the city, he became a member of the Shady Side Presbyterian Church, with which he is still connected (December, 1883).

Mr. Edwards was engaged actively in mercantile and manufacturing business, and in this relation his character was of the highest standing. As a Christian man, he has been marked by the unwavering tenacity of his belief in the vital elements of Christianity, a cheerful yielding to all its calls of duty, at whatever cost, untiring energy in its service, and unusual liberality in money contributions, guided not by impulse, but by settled and well ordered principles. He is emphatically "a man of prayer." One of his sons, Rev. M. D. Edwards, is pastor of Dayton Avenue Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, Minn.

Elder, James, was born in Dinwiddie county, Va., near Petersburg, October 8th, 1809. He removed to Middle Tennessee, and settled near Murfreesboro, Rutherford county, in 1815. He removed again and settled in Marshall county, North Miss., in 1835, before the Indians were removed. Subsequently, he settled in Memphis, Tenn., in 1850, where he now lives. In 1842 he was ordained, by the Rev. Daniel Baker, a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian Church, Memphis, in which office he still continues, faithful and useful. He was one of the original members of the Assembly's Executive Committee when it was established in Memphis.

"Elect Infants." Prof. A. F. Mitchell, in his recent and able work on the Westminster Assembly, thus refers to this phrase in our Confession of Faith.

"The next topic to which I advert is the charge made against the Confession, of teaching that not all infants, dying in infancy, but only an elect portion of them, are saved. Here again serimp justice has been dealt out to it. Its exact words are: "Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit." This statement, it has been averred, necessarily implies that there are non-elect infants, dying in infancy, who are not 'regenerated and saved.' It does not seem to me, when fairly interpreted, to imply any such thing. It might have been susceptible of such an interpretation had it been allowed to stand in the form which it appears to have borne in the draft first brought into the Assembly, 'elect of infants,' not elect infants. But the very fact that the form of expression was changed, shows how anxious the divines intrusted with the methodizing of the Confession were to guard against pronouncing dogmatically on questions on which neither Scripture nor the Reformed churches had definitely pronounced. The statement occurs, it is important to notice, not in the chapter treating of predestination, but in the chapter treating of effectual calling; and is meant, not to define the proportion of infants dying in infancy who shall be saved, but to assert the great truths, that even they are not exempt from the consequences of the fall, but are, by nature, every one of them, in the massa perditionis; that they can only be separated from it, and saved, by the electing love of the Father, the atoning work of the Son, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; and that they, however as yet incapable of the exercise of reason and faith, may, by the Holy Spirit, be regenerated and made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light." (See Infant Salvation.)

Elkton Presbyterian Church, Maryland. As far back as any reliable history or documents furnish evidence, the old town of Head of Elk, now called Elkton, has been the home of Presbyterian families, who worshiped in the ancient churches of Peneader, Head of Christiana, and the churches on the branches of the Elk, now represented by the Rock Church.

Some obscurity would seem, however, to rest on the precise date of origin for the primitive Presbyterian Church in Elkton. Little or nothing attending its early struggles, the steps taken to organize the church, seems to be known. The statement can be made with confidence that "there appears to have been a Presbyterian element" here prior to 1741. The county records show that in the year 1741 a Presbyterian Church was in existence here. Local traditions have also fixed the site of the "meeting-house," a wooden building, in Bow street, on the east side. The deed conveying the church property is worthy of a passing comment. It was executed by William Alexander and Araminta, his wife, on June 1st, 1711, to Robert Lucas, Zebulon Hollingsworth, Thomas Ricketts and Robert Evans, of the county of Cecil, and Province of Maryland, and David Barr, of New Castle county. These may be now but mere names to us. But they stand somewhat as the names found in the closing chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans stood: Asynneritus, Phlegon, Hennaas, Patrobas, Hermes and Philologus, Julia, Nereus and his sister, Olympas, Timotheus, Lucius, Jason. Mere names—not a syllable of their personal history given; but we know, from where they stood, that they were faithful servants of the Lord Jesus Christ. And so we know that those to whom, in the interests of early Presbyterianism in Elkton, this deed of conveyance was given, mere names though they be to us, stood for good Presbyterians—lovers of their own faith and order; true and blue also, if you will have it so; we are not ashamed of our banner. The deed itself conveyed one acre of ground upon which to build a meeting-house, “convenient for people assembling to worship God, and hear His Word preached, and for the use of such ministers of the Protestant persuasion or religion, and particularly the Presbyterian ministers, as shall from time to time attend there to preach and officiate in the service and worship of Almighty God.” It was to be open to others of the Protestant persuasion than Presbyterians. This is the true spirit of Presbyterians—generous recognition of all fellow-laborers in the Lord; open-hearted and open-handed hospitality to them, for Christ’s sake. But there was another clause, which did not work so well for the growth of Presbyterianism. It was “provided, always, that if it should so happen that the said house, so to be erected and built, should be neglected and let decay, or by accident be burnt or destroyed, and not repaired, so that no sermon can be therein preached, nor congregation, therein assembled to worship the Almighty God, for the space or time of three years,” the entire property should revert to the original owners. This fate overtook the church. Owing to divisions resulting from the Great Schism, which for seventeen years split the Presbyterian Church into “Old Side” and “New Side” congregations, the Elkton Church was left unused and neglected for three years, and thus the entire church property reverted to the original owners. Schism is costly. It has proved so in the history of all churches. The story of this division among the churches in this vicinity is thus given by Mr. Heberton in his “Historical Discourse”:—

“The Church of Elk River, now the Rock Church, suffered, as did all the organizations then existing, by this schism, and was divided—the two parties taking the respective names ‘New’ and ‘Old’ sides. The ‘New Side’ congregation of the Rock Church was called ‘East Nottingham,’ and was under the pastorate of the Rev. James Finley, in connection with the Church at ‘Head of Elk,’ as the congregation here at Elkton was then called. We suppose, then, the Elkton Church was of the ‘New Side,’ and may have been the fruit of this schism, by gathering all of that way of thinking into one congregation, who lived in this neighborhood, and perhaps drawing from Pencader and Head of Christiana those who sided with the new departure there.

“When the reunion was consummated, the Elkton Church, being deprived of the pastoral services of Mr. Finley, was left vacant. The records of Presbytery furnish the following action in reference to this dissolution: ‘December 18th, 1760, Judge, that the union between the Congregation of the Head of Elk and East Nottingham be dissolved, and consequently, that the Head of Elk is to be looked upon as a vacancy;’ and Pencader, having languished and been greatly weakened during the continuance of the schism, there seemed to be a natural reason why Elkton should be joined to it; and Presbytery, consequently, under the request of these congregations, united them, and they became one charge. At the same time, Presbytery ordered that there be a meeting-house built for the united congregations, two miles nearer Elkton than where the Pencader Church then stood. This was seemingly disregarded, and the people who worshipped at Elkton, having no pastor here, went to Pencader and Head of Christiana, where the most of them had doubtless originally attended, and the building at Elkton was left unused, and was neglected for the space of three years, when, according to the conditions of the original grant, the acre of ground in the centre of the town reverted to the former owners; and thus was lost to our Presbyterian element a valuable portion of town property.”

Thus closes the first chapter of Presbyterian history in this town. A wide gap ensues—1741–1833. Think what an amount of American history this intervening period covers. Three generations came and went; the American Revolution took its place in history as one of the great epoch-making events in the progress of mankind; a nation was born; that nation made large and rapid strides, till it stood in the van of nations; and yet the ecclesiastical history of Elkton has only a few meagre notes of its existence. “After the erection of the Court House in 1791,” we are told, “it was occasionally used for public worship. There was no church edifice here until the erection of the Methodist Church, after the war of 1812.”

Elkton Church, then, is a resurrection from the grave of an earlier organization. But as such it is an illustration and a proof of the vitality which characterizes true Presbyterianism.

At their meeting in Wilmington, in April, 1831, the Presbytery appointed a committee, consisting of Messrs. Barr, Grier, John M. Dickey, ministers, and Willard Hall and Matthew Kean, elders, to devise and report measures for the more effectual revival of religion within the bounds of the Presbytery; and at the same meeting the report of this committee was adopted, recommending that “four days’ meetings” be held by ministers who were designated for the purpose, in all the churches; and also that a day of humiliation and prayer be observed in each congregation prior to the meeting.

This plan, thus adopted, was vigorously and faithfully carried out by nearly all the ministers and churches in the Presbytery. A great and powerful revival in all the churches was the result. The neighboring churches of Peneader and Head of Christiana partook of the rich blessing. In 1832 "a four days' meeting" was held in Elkton, under the direction of Rev. Dr. Magraw, Rev. Mr. Graham and other ministers of the Presbytery. The services were held in the Episcopal Church, which was kindly offered by the rector and vestry for the purpose. The result of these services was that a number were converted, and much religious interest awakened in the town and neighborhood. In order to gather these fruits, it soon became apparent that steps must be taken to unite the members of the Presbyterian Church residing in Elkton into an organized body, and application was accordingly made to Presbytery. The following entry is found among the minutes of the Presbytery of New Castle, at their meeting held in St. George's Church, April 2d, 1833:—

"An application was made by several members of the Presbyterian Church residing in Elkton, Md., and vicinity, praying to be organized as a church, and also that a committee be appointed to administer the Lord's Supper in that place.

"Resolved, That their request be granted. Dr. Magraw, Messrs. Russell, Graham and Stevens were appointed a committee to organize said church and administer the Lord's Supper; to meet for this purpose on Friday, the 3d day of May."

In accordance with the resolution of the Presbytery of New Castle, at St. George's Church, on the 2d day of April, as just stated, Dr. Magraw, Messrs. Robert Graham and William A. Stevens met in the Court House, in Elkton, May 3d, 1833, for the purpose of organizing a Presbyterian church; and at the same time the members of the Session of Peneader Church met for the purpose of granting certificates to such members of Peneader Church as should desire to join the church then to be organized in Elkton. The following persons then made application and presented their certificates, which were accepted by the committee, to wit: Andrew McIntire, James L. Miles, Mrs. Mary H. Henderson, Mrs. Harriet Miles, Mrs. Mary E. Hollingsworth, Mrs. Maria Rudolph, Mrs. Hannah Scott, Mrs. Anna Smith, Mrs. Ann Mahan, Miss Sophia McCullough, Miss Abby Moore, Miss Mary Ann Scott, Miss Maria Jane Scott, Miss Ann Mitchell, Miss Jane E. Mitchell, Miss Mary Abiela Mitchell (now Mrs. John Stump), and Miss Elizabeth Hays, being seventeen members admitted on certificate. John C. Groome, Trisby Henderson and Edward Wilson were appointed a committee to draw up a constitution for the government of the church. On Saturday, May 4th, Trisby Henderson and Andrew McIntire, being elected ruling elders, were ordained to this office, and thus the church was organized.

The seven pastors of this church have all been filled by worthy men. To name them is to commend them: Rev. Hugh Hamill, Rev. James McIntire, Rev. Horatio S. Howell, Rev. John W. Mears, Rev. John McKim Duncan, Rev. Henry Matthews and Rev. W. W. Heberton.

Elliott, Jared Leigh, D. D., son of Richard and Anne Agnes (Gregory) Elliott, was born in Washington, D. C., June 24th, 1807. Possessed of an adventurous disposition, most of his boyhood and early youth were spent in roving far and wide upon the sea. Was graduated from the College of New Jersey, 1831; spent two years, 1831-33, at Anburn Theological Seminary, N. Y.; then one year, 1833-34, in Princeton Seminary; was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 13th, 1834; and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, October 26th, 1835. His successive fields of labor were: as stated supply at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 1834-35; as stated supply of The Mariner's Church, Philadelphia, 1835-36; as stated supply of the First and Second churches of Washington City, and of the Church at Frederick City, Md., 1836-39; as Chaplain in the U. S. Navy, 1838-42; Agent of the American Seamen's Friend Society in 1843; Chaplain in U. S. Army, 1844-49; Acting Master in the U. S. Navy, 1849-61; Chaplain U. S. Army, 1861-61. As a chaplain in the Navy, he made many long sea voyages, and was attached to the South Arctic Exploring Expedition in 1840. Dr. Elliott died at Washington, D. C., April 16th, 1881, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. He was a man of warm heart and generous impulses, a faithful friend, and a devoted servant of Jesus Christ.

Estes, B. M., was born October 10th, 1832, in Haywood county, Tennessee. Removed to Memphis in 1851; joined the Second Church, Memphis, in 1857 or 1858; was ordained and installed a ruling elder in that church in 1859, and served as such until 1875, when he joined the Union Street Presbyterian Church of Memphis. Soon thereafter he was elected and installed an elder in that church. Subsequently, a new church was erected by the congregation, at the corner of Beal and Lauderdale streets, and the name of the church changed to the "Lauderdale Street Presbyterian Church." He is still a ruling elder in this church, and has been a member of the Executive Committee of Education since its removal to Memphis in 1874. Mr. Estes is an exemplary Christian, and discharges the duties to which the Church has called him with great fidelity.

Evangelist, one who publishes glad tidings, a messenger or preacher of good news. The persons denoted evangelists were next in order to the apostles, and were sent by them, not to settle in any particular place, but to travel among the infant churches, and ordain ordinary officers, and finish what the apostles had begun. Of this kind were Philip, the deacon, Mark, Silas, etc. (Acts xxi, 8). The office of a modern missionary, in some respects, answers to that of a primitive evangelist. The title is more particularly given to the four inspired writers of our Saviour's life.

Evans, Rev. Daniel H., was the fourth son of John D. and Jane (Courtney) Evans, and was born in Ripley, O., April 16th, 1838. He was graduated at Miami University, in 1859; began his theological studies in the Western Theological Seminary the Fall of the same year, and finished at Andover, in 1862. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Pittsburg (N. S.), in 1861, and on the 16th of April, 1863, was ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Monroe. He was stated supply in the churches of Blissfield and Palmyra, in Michigan; then pastor at Grand Haven; after that supply at Minersville, Pa., and, May 5th, 1870, was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Youngstown, O.; and this relation is in happy continuance at date.

Mr. Evans, the sixth pastor of the First Church, is a worthy successor to such faithful ministers as William Wick and Chas. A. Boardman. Called to its pastorate at what seemed to be a critical point in its history, by the exercise of a wise tact, and above all by his evident "determination to know nothing among his people save Jesus Christ, and him crucified," every trace of disagreement soon vanished. As a preacher, he is acceptable to the people. His sermons, though carefully prepared, are delivered without notes. His delivery is quiet, though impressive; always earnest, he is at times eloquent. His thought is clear and Scriptural, and made forcible by a persuasive dignity of manner. In extemporaneous effort he is especially felicitous, never offending critical taste. As a pastor, he is faithful and wise, possessing, in large degree, Christian common sense.

Fourteen years of conscientious and successful labor have endeared him to his people, and given him a secure place in the affections of the community at large.

Evins, Hon. John Hamilton, was born July 18th, 1830, in Spartanburg District, in the State of South Carolina. He is the third son of Samuel N. and Elizabeth C. Evins; a grandson of Alexander Evins, a soldier of the Revolutionary War, and of General Thomas Moore, a soldier of said war, a Brigadier-General of the War of 1812, and a member of Congress from South Carolina. He was brought up in the bosom of Nazareth (Presbyterian) Church, in the District and State aforesaid, in which his father was, for many years, a ruling elder. He was educated at the South Carolina College, and graduated while the distinguished logician and theologian, Rev. James H. Thornwell, was President of that Institution. He connected himself with Nazareth Church, under the preaching of the celebrated revivalist, Rev. Daniel Baker, D. D. He became a lawyer and settled in the town of Spartanburg, S. C., where he still resides. He is now, and has been for a number of years past, a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church of Spartanburg.

Against his earnest protest, he was nominated and elected to Congress from the Fourth District, in which he resides, in 1876, and is now serving his fourth term in that body. As a member of Congress, Mr. Evins has, by his ability and Christian character, won the respect and esteem of all his associates, and few constituencies have ever given their Representative higher proofs of their trust and confidence.

Ewing, John, D. D., son of James and Rebecca (Robb) Ewing, was born at the old family homestead, at Fort Pitt Station, Allegheny county, Pa., and pursued his preparatory studies at Dankap's Creek Academy, Fayette county, Pa. In June, 1854, he entered Jefferson College, from which he was graduated in 1858. In September of the same year he entered the Western Theological Seminary, from which he was graduated in April, 1861. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Pittsburg, December 25th, 1860, and was ordained, as an evangelist, by the same Presbytery, January 1st, 1862. In August, 1861, the Presbyterian Church of Fairview, Washington county, Pa., extended to him a call, which he declined. He supplied this church from August, 1861, till April, 1863, during which time the membership was greatly increased. While supplying the Fairview Church he received a call to the Trinity Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and was installed pastor of that church, May 6th, 1863. After a pleasant and successful pastorate of six years, the relation was dissolved, that he might accept a call to the Presbyterian Church at Clinton, N. J. On October 26th, 1869, he was installed pastor at Clinton, where he labored, with great success, for fourteen years; then the pastoral relation was dissolved, that he might accept a call to the First Presbyterian Church at Plymouth, Pa., over which he was installed, November 7th, 1883.

While a student in college, and in the theological seminary, he was noted for faithful application to his studies. In 1873 he was appointed, by the General Assembly, to represent the Church in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, which met in Edinburgh, in May, 1874. His address before that body called forth the most favorable comments from the press of Edinburgh. He has traveled extensively through Europe. In June, 1882, the College of New Windsor, Md., conferred on him the degree of D. D. Dr. Ewing is highly esteemed by his brethren in the ministry. He possesses rare executive ability, is a diligent student, a faithful pastor and an able preacher.

Exceptional Position of the Bible in the World. The following facts, says Honey Rogers, which show the peculiar position the Bible occupies among books, and the paramount influence it has exerted, cannot be disputed.

1. It is curious to see how wonderfully independent of race has been the welcome given to this book. It has been spontaneously received (by spontaneously, I mean as the fruit of persuasion only, and to the exclusion of all political influence or military violence) by men of far more various races and nations than any other religious books ever have been. I have already conceded that, unhappily for the Bible, those who have misunderstood it, and therefore wronged it, have not always refrained from the above methods—though prohibited by itself—of extending its influence. But still, during the three first centuries, the religion it teaches, and the book which embodies it made their way, without such questionable allies, into almost every part of the "Orbis Romanus;" and since that time, with similar independence of all such aid, has made similar impressions on various heathen communities in all quarters of the world, from Greenland to the Cape of Good Hope, and from Outhloe to Madagascar.

Now, history shows us that the progress of a religion, apart from the fanaticism or ambition which leads men to fight for its diffusion, is almost uniformly circumscribed by race and nationality; and how impassable the barrier which these—fortified by old superstitions and the customs which they consecrate—oppose to it. It is almost impossible, in ordinary cases, to get people to pay any attention at all to an alien religion, except as a subject of curious or learned investigation; and we should be as much astonished at any European becoming a worshiper of Brahma by poring over the Hindoo mythology, as at a student of Homer becoming a devotee of Jupiter.

How is it, then, that the Bible has had so little difficulty in transcending the bounds of race and nationality? By what gift has it been capable of breaking through the barriers which, in general, so obstinately enclose each variety of religious belief? An objector may, perhaps, say it was not so with the Hebrew Scriptures—the greater half of the volume. Why, no; but that rather increases the wonder. The addition of the lesser half altered the complexion and the properties of the whole. That is so buoyant, that it bears up itself and the mass which is attached to it, and which had been almost as little known to the world in general as the contents of other sacred books usually are. Those who received the Old Testament, and accounted it to be the inspiration of the Most High, yet followed the law of other religionists, or nearly so, and, for the most part, kept their oracles to themselves. The rest of the world followed their own law, in caring nothing about alien oracles at all. I have had occasion to observe, in a previous lecture, that the Jews, though not required to reject proselytes—far from it—yet in general did little to make them; they seem to have been only too well pleased to think themselves the exclusive possessors of a divine revelation, and to hug themselves on that superiority. If they received proselytes from among the heathen, it was with no very genial welcome; they acquiesced in their occupying an inferior place in the "Court of the Gentiles," but would have vehemently protested against the "middle wall of partition," which shut them off from the more sacred enclosure being broken down. On the other hand, the Gentiles recoiled as strongly from the Jews as the Jews from them. Both mutually repelled, instead of attracting, one another.

It is, therefore, not a little wonderful that the Bible, though with its larger half, in this sense, a dead weight upon it, and as little likely to pass, by spontaneous reception, from race to race and from people to people, as any other collection of so-called sacred books, has found it comparatively easy to break through the barriers, and, as the ages have rolled on, to migrate, without violence, into new regions, and find a home among tribes separated by every conceivable difference of climate, government, customs, culture and religion, from those which had previously accepted it; among the various nationalities which acknowledged the Roman sway, and among various modern nationalities which succeeded it; among the conquering Goths and other barbarians of the early centuries, and in the South Seas, in Africa, and in Madagascar, in our own time.

Will it be said that it is because this book, alone among sacred books, teaches a religion which is worthy of universal reception, enjoins its universal diffusion, and is alone capable of forming a succession of men heroically bent on making it universal? Doubtless, if this be granted, the mystery is solved. This concedes the special characteristics of the book for which I am contending. It is indeed unlike all other sacred books, if so much can be said for it!

It is true, however, that this strange volume has the power, wheresoever it got it, of prompting men to proclaim and to propagate its contents. Whether we look at the ancient or the modern converts to it, they are somehow instantly bent on proselytism.

2. Among other singularities of this book, if it be a mere production of human genius, like any other book or collection of books of the same size, may be mentioned the prodigious literature which it has evoked. Either it must have claims to attention altogether transcendent to those of any other, even the greatest compositions of human genius, in order to account for men's ceaseless activity in translating, illustrating, explaining, interpreting, propagating, impugning and defending it; or we must conclude that, on this one subject, no inconsiderable portion of mankind has virtually gone mad; or, rather, that each successive portion of the race, each new community or nation, that comes under the fascination of this book, is smitten with this same incurable bibliomania, and proceeds to do in behalf of it, or against it, what it would never dream of doing for or against any other books in the world, sacred or profane! This mysterious book (the whole or parts of it) speaks no less than two hundred languages, and is daily learning to speak more; that is, probably speaks as many as any ten of the very chiefest classics of human genius, however widely translated, put together; more than Homer, Virgil, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, Goethe, Walter Scott, put together; far more than the Vedas and Koran, put together. In numbers less cases, again, it has allured men to do what, so far as we know, was never done on behalf of any other book, howsoever counted "sacred," before. It has induced them, not only to encounter every form of peril and the most enormous self-sacrifices, to get the mere chance of proclaiming the substance of its contents, but to undergo the most gigantic labors, in order to translate it into barbarous and uncouth languages. Nay, more; in a score of cases it has impelled them to submit to the more arduous preliminary drudgery of giving a notation and visible shape to languages which were previously but a "wandering voice," and nothing else. This book it is that first conferred on many a barbarous nation the wondrous art of condensing the volatile vapor of human thought into a visible form, taught them the first elements of those arts which are the necessary condition of all progress and civilization, and opened to them the road which leads on to all the triumphs of human intellect and national greatness. Many such nations—perhaps hereafter to be graced by a muster-roll of names as illustrious, and achievements as great as adorn the history of our own country—may say, as she in great part must say also: "These things we owe to some obscure missionaries, who, like the birds that carry the seeds of forests to desert islands, brought us the germs of all these blessings in giving us the Bible. They first made language visible to us; they analyzed the sounds which it represents, expressed them in an alphabet, reduced them to grammatical forms, compiled a lexicon for us, opened to us the intellectual treasures of all literature and science, and made it possible to have a literature and science of our own."

Meantime, its translators wrought, not for the sake of these vast collateral and adventitious benefits (however much they may have rejoiced in them), but simply for the book's sake, itself; and would have done the work, all the same, if they had been sure that no literature but that one book would ever be known to the people for whom it was translated. Such is the strange enthusiasm it is capable of inspiring!

Similarly, this book has probably done more to fix and preserve the languages into which it has been translated, to retard the progress of change and corruption, than any other single cause whatever. This has been conspicuously a result of our own English version.

And it is only just to remember that many languages, which already had a written character, indeed, but were still so incrustated with barbarism as to make them wholly unfit for the purposes of literature, have been largely indebted to the toil of those who sought to transfuse the contents of this book into these uncouth vehicles for it. This has often done more to purify and polish them, to mould them into forms which science and poetry could deign to use, than any other single cause. This was to a good extent the case with the early translations into our own language and the German. The "Königliche Sprache" of Luther's translation, as a German critic calls it, played no mean part in the development of that language.

The passion for translating the Bible into other tongues has been intense from the very commencement of the Christian era, and may probably be said to have created the taste for translation in general. The ancients seem to have had little that was worthy of the name. Cicero and Quintilian, indeed, speak of the signal benefits the rhetorical student and youthful orator may derive from frequent translation of fine passages from the Greek into their own tongue, just as Lord Chatham commends the same exercise to his son, William Pitt. But the practice of systematically endeavoring to import the masterpieces of Greek literature into the Latin, or vice versa, seems not to have been adopted in the ancient world.

Nor in days when printing was unknown, and there was such infinite toil and cost in making even original manuscripts public, is it any wonder that this sort of literary labor was generally declined. But no such difficulties depressed the energies of men where the Bible was concerned. By about the middle of the second century there were no less than three Greek versions of the Old Testament, in addition to the Septuagint—those of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus. Still earlier, the Peshito-Syriac version, including Old and New Testaments, was completed. About the same time it appeared in Latin (the old Italic). It was translated again into that language by Jerome. By the end of the fourth century the Scriptures were translated in whole or in part—but certainly nearly the whole of the New Testament—into Coptic, Sabidic, Armenian, Ethiopic and Gothic. Nor were the darker ages without their like triumphs. In the sixth century it was translated into Georgian; in the ninth into Slavonic; and various translations of the gospels and other parts of Scripture into Anglo-Saxon and several other Teutonic languages, were executed at intermediate dates. If it be said that reverence for a supposed "sacred" book will account for all this, we must reply—first, reverence for other supposed "sacred" books has never produced anything like it; and secondly, that if, in this case, reverence was so exceptionally powerful, what inspired it?

One of the most interesting books in the world to look at—few, perhaps, except Professor Max Müller, and two or three other accomplished linguists like him, can read more than a few pages of it—is the handsome quarto volume entitled "The Bible of every Land," in which beautifully printed typographical specimens are given of the multitudinous versions of the Bible in all their variety of alphabetic characters. It is impossible to inspect it without feeling what stupendous (and if the Bible be not more to the world than the Koran or the Vedas, Homer or Plato, what utterly disproportionate and wasteful toil man has foolishly expended on this one volume!

How much more must we feel this in contemplating the enormous masses of literature to which it has given birth! This one book, not more than the three-hundredth part of the extant Greek and Roman literature, has probably attracted to it and concentrated upon it more thought, and probably produced more works, explanatory, illustrative, apologetic—upon its text, its exegesis, its doctrines, its history, its geography, ethnology, chronology and evidences, than all the Greek and Roman literature put together. There is scarcely a tractate in it, however short, that has not had more pains expended upon it than many even of the more voluminous ancient writers. In walking through any great library, in inspecting any large catalogue (as that of the British Museum or the Bodleian), one is astonished at the immense bulk of literature which, either directly or indirectly, owes its origin to this one book. It is surprising to see how large a portion of the huge London Catalogue is made up of books which, had it not been for this one, would never have had an existence!

And now, endeavoring for a moment to place myself in the point of view of those who regard this book as a simple collection of tractates, written by a number of obscure men, of no greater actual endowments than those possessed by many others (often their equals, sometimes their superiors), and all of them, with perhaps one exception (I refer to Luke; but even that is doubtful), belonging to one of the most despised of human communities, I am lost in amazement at that insanity (I can call it, on that hypothesis, by no other name) which has kept the most diverse nations, but always those in the very van of all science, learning and civilization, thus everlastingly poring over this book; illustrating, interpreting, attacking, defending it; thinking no pains too great to be bestowed even on its least significant parts, and deeming it of more importance to prosecute this task than to give themselves to the like labors on the very chef-d'œuvres of human genius.

The "Propaganda" for this book is a phenomenon we should in vain seek in the case of any other books, sacred or profane. The Bible Society, for example, may be a fanatical organization; but fanaticism never evoked anything like it in behalf of any other book, however revered as presumed to be inspired, or admired as pre-eminently instinct with human genius. I observe that during the year 1872-73 no less than 2,592,936 copies of the whole Bible, or large portions of it, were issued by the Society. Now, the "Publishers' Circular" tells us that last year (1872) 4811 works of all kinds, including pamphlets, not sermons, and reprints, were published in London; and if we suppose each impression to average 1000 copies (rather a liberal allowance, and perhaps only too flattering to most authors), then the copies of this one old book issued in London exceeded the half of all the copies of the new and old books of the year put together!

A library made up of all the books which have been written solely in defence of the Bible would be an imposing spectacle. About a century and a half ago the great Fabricius gave a Catalogue Raisonné of all the books that had been, directly or indirectly, evoked by Christianity down to his time. Though not exhaustive (some pages, however, are occupied with other subjects) it forms a quarto of more than seven hundred pages. I apprehend that, by this time, a similar work would extend to at least three times the bulk.

Equally striking, in some respects, would be the spectacle of all those works which have been written, more or less, against the book; in general confutation of its claims, or against some of its principal facts and evidences. The volumes thus written for the purpose of correcting men's eccentric love and veneration for it (eccentric on the hypothesis of its merely human origin), showing either that it is substantially incredible, or, like other books, a mixture of wisdom and folly, would form a library of no inconsiderable bulk. If collected from the earliest times (beginning with the fragments of Celsus and Porphyry) to the present day, they would occupy far more than a thousand times the space of the one volume against which they are directed; and would certainly be much more numerous than all the works that all other "sacred" books ever had the honor of provoking either for or against them.

If all these books were placed in one library, and this single one set on a table in the middle of it, and a stranger were told that this book, affirmed to be, for the most part, the work of a number of unlearned and obscure men belonging to a despised nation called the Jews, had drawn upon itself, for its exposure, confutation and destruction, this multitude of volumes, I imagine he would be inclined to say: "Then, I presume this little book was annihilated long ago: though how it could be needful to write a thousandth part so much, for any such purpose, I cannot comprehend. For if the book be what these authors say, surely it should not be very difficult to show it to be so; and if so, what wonderful madness to write all these volumes!" How surprised would he then be to learn that they were felt not to be enough; that similar works were being multiplied every day, and never more actively than at the present time; and still to no purpose in disabusing mankind of this same phrensy! He would learn, indeed, that so far from accomplishing the object, the new volumes are little more than necessary to replace those of this fruitful yet fruitless literature which are continually sinking into oblivion—a fate which may be said, perhaps, with almost equal truth, to await the new works written in its defence. A large mass of these, too, pass every age out of sight, or are known only to the literary student.

But the volume itself survives both friends and foes. Without being able to speak one word on its own behalf, but what it has already said; without any power of explanation or rejoinder, in deprecation of the attacks made upon it, or to assist those who defend it; it passes along the ages in majestic silence. Impassive amidst all this tumult of controversy, in which it takes no part, it might be likened to some great ship floating down a mighty river, like the Amazon or Orinoco, the shores of which are inhabited by various savage tribes. From every little creek or inlet, from every petty port or bay, sally flotillas of canoes, some seemingly friendly and some seemingly hostile, filled with warriors in all the terrors of war paint, and their artillery of bows and arrows. They are hostile tribes, and soon turning their weapons against one another, assail each other, with great fury and mutual loss. Meantime, the noble vessel silently moves on through the scene of confusion, without deigning to alter its course or to fire a shot; perhaps here and there a seaman casts a compassionate glance from the lofty bulwarks, and wonders at the hardihood of those who come to assail his leviathan.

In spite, and perhaps, indeed, in consequence of these attacks (M. Renan's "Vie de Jesus" in particular is said to have had this effect in France), the book is more and more widely diffused, every year multiplies its copies, and every year speaks some new language.

3. It may be said, further, that there is no other book, and I think I might say no other ten books, that have left so many or so deep traces on human literature; none that are so often cited or alluded to; none which have supplied so much matter for apt illustration, or been so often resorted to for its vivid imagery and energetic diction. It has lived on the page, not merely of great divines, such as Barrow or Jeremy Taylor. In such cases, though genius might be stimulated by the literary beauties of the book, reverence for it and familiarity with it might be thought to account for so frequent and spontaneous a use of it. But the remark is applicable to modern literature generally, on which the traces of the influence of this book are incomparably deeper and more legible than those left by any other single volume.

None but those who have been in the habit of inspecting the best portions of modern literature, with the express view of tracing the influence of the Bible upon it, can have any adequate idea of the extent to which it has moulded thought and sentiment, or given strength or grace to expression. Its literary excellencies in general have insensibly extorted the homage and tinged the style of the greatest masters of eloquence and poetry, with little reference to the degree in which they yielded to its claims on their reverence, and in many cases though they rejected those claims altogether. Its apophthegms, its examples, its historical illustrations of human life and character, its moral maxims, its lessons of conduct, its vivid and intense imagery, come spontaneously to the lips, as more exactly or forcibly expressing thought and feeling than anything found elsewhere.

In re-perusing, lately, some of the greatest masters of prose, Bacon, Milton, Cowper, Macaulay, expressly with a view to this subject, I have been surprised to note how often, when struggling to give emphasis to their thought, or to intensify a feebler expression of it, they have laid hold, unconsciously, as it were, of Scripture phrase or metaphor.

In Bacon's Essays, in his "Novum Organum" and his "De Augmentis," one is perpetually struck with the felicity with which passages of Scripture are introduced, and, in the last two works, where one would little expect them. As to Shakespeare, no less than three works have been expressly written to trace the influence of the Bible on his genius and writings. The matchless energy of Milton's diction in many parts of his prose writings is in no slight degree due to the use he has made of Scripture. In that lofty passage in the "Animadversions on the Remonstrant's Defence," conceived in the very spirit of the Hebrew poetry, in which, pledging himself for his immortal poem, he says, "And he that now for haste snatches up a plain unadorned present as a thank-offering to Thee, may then perhaps take up a harp and sing Thee an elaborate song to generations," in that most splendid passage, some phrase or clause of the Scripture adds energy to almost every line. It is a wonderful mosaic indeed, but a mosaic still.

Carlyle's book on the French Revolution, even were its defects as a history all that the most unfriendly critic would make them out to be, will be confessed by all to be one of the most graphic in our own or any other language. Now, it is curious to see how often, in describing the scenes of his tremendous "Trilogy of Tragedies," fragments of Scripture language come unbidden to his pen, as the best and most forcible he can employ. In re-perusing the work recently, for the very purpose of ascertaining the degree in which phrases are interwoven, and examples and illustrations cited, from the Bible, I could not help being struck with their frequency. In truth, however, it is no wonder; for it is not possible to imagine any phraseology more exactly adapted to express the lurid sublimity, or point the terrible moral, of the scenes he describes, than that which the "Law and the Prophets" often launch against communities that have "sown the wind, and shall reap the whirlwind;" that, being incurably corrupt, are threatened with being "swept away with the besom of destruction;" and yet, deaf to warning and chastisement, persist in "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." There is no book in the world in which the inevitable doom which waits on guilt, let its seeming security be what it may, is so vividly set forth as in the Bible; none that so energetically proclaims that "thrones are established only in righteousness," and that nothing else can permanently "exalt a nation."

"There never was," says Carlyle, somewhere, or to this effect, for I quote from memory, "any book like the Bible, and there never will be such another." "Read to me," said the dying Scott to his son-in-law. "What book shall I read to you?" said Lockhart. "Can you ask me?" was the reply. "There is but one;" and bade him read a chapter in the gospel of John. "This collection of books," says Theodore Parker, in a passage of great eloquence, "has taken such hold of the world as no other. The literature of Greece, which goes up like incense from that land of temples and heroic deeds, has not half the influence of this book from a nation despised alike in ancient and in modern times. . . . It goes equally to the cottage of the plain man and the palace of the king. It is woven into the literature of the scholar, and colors the talk of the streets. It enters men's closets, mingles in all the grief and cheerfulness of life. The Bible attends men in sickness, when the fever of the world is on them. . . . It is the better part of our sermons; it lifts man above himself. Our best of uttered prayers are in its storied speech, wherewith our fathers and the patriarchs prayed. The timid man, about to wake from his dream of life, looks through the glass of Scripture, and his eye grows bright; he does not fear to stand alone, to tread the way unknown and distant, to take the death angel by the hand, and bid farewell to wife and babes and home. . . . Some thousand famous writers come up in this century to be forgotten in the next. But the silver cord of the Bible is not loosed, nor its golden bowl broken, as Time chronicles his tens of centuries passed by."

To these testimonies it were easy to add many more—some of them from men wholly skeptical as to any superhuman claims of the Bible on our reverence or belief. I am far from charging them with any insincerity, either in what they admit or in what they deny; but I would fain ask, What must be the qualities of the Bible, coming "from a nation alike despised in ancient and modern times," and whence did it get them, that could prevail on men like these—men of capacious minds, the acutest reason, adorned with all that culture and taste could bestow—to speak of the Bible in terms they never would dream of applying to any other book or books whatsoever!

I would not be misunderstood. I can easily fancy the derisive smile with which those who will not be at the trouble of considering what degree of importance is attributed to each variable element in a complex argument like the present, may say: "This writer seems to think that, because great authors have used the Bible for purposes of illustration more frequently than other books; because it has, no doubt, deeply tinted the literature of the ages and nations familiar with it, that therefore it must be inspired, and of supernatural origin!" Not so. I mention the fact merely as one of the "thousand and one" paradoxical facts insisted upon in these lectures. It is, I think, a strange thing, that one moderately-sized book (if it be no more than the hypothesis of a purely human, and that a Jewish, origin assumes it to be) should have left wider and deeper traces of itself on modern literature than any dozen of the chef-d'œuvres of human genius which grace that literature, and pre-eminently on many of those chef-d'œuvres themselves. Surely it is a curious phenomenon; but it is only one of many which beset us in considering the peculiarities and the exceptional character and fortunes of this singular volume.

Should it be said again, "All this is accounted for by the reverence which it has somehow inspired;" in part, I grant it. But on the hypothesis I am proceeding upon, the purely human, and that, too, the Jewish-human, origin of the book, whence this profound reverence? How should the book have inspired it, and why should the world feel it? Either the Bible is invested with the properties which give it this pre-eminence, or it is not. If it is, whence, considering its source, did it get them? If not, how came the world to invest it with them?

I say, then, it is curious that, supposing the book to be the unaided product of men far less endowed by nature than many writers of Greece, Rome, France, England or Germany, and inferior in culture and education, it should have exerted greater influence, and left deeper traces on literature than any one, or any five, or any ten writers of all these countries put together. It is a curious phenomenon; curious, I say; not a proof that the Bible may not be merely human, but one of the many paradoxes which, on that hypothesis, compel us to ask, as the Jews concerning Christ, "Whence hath this book all this wisdom?"—

"Executive Committee of Education, of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in the United States," (Southern). This Committee was organized at the first meeting of the Assembly, at Augusta, Georgia, December 4th, 1861. It is elected annually, by the Assembly, and consists of the "Secretary of Education," a Treasurer and nine other members. Three must be ruling elders. Five constitute a quorum. The Secretary is the organ of communication between the Committee and the Assembly, and by standing rule has a right to the floor on matters pertaining to his work. He conducts all the Committee's correspondence and superintends its work. Its object is to aid candidates for the ministry, but they must be recommended thereby by their Presbyteries or by their Presbyterial Committees. "All the candidates shall be solely responsible to their respective Presbyteries."

The Secretaries have been, John H. Gray, D. D., from 1861 to 1863; John Leyburn, D. D., from 1863 to 1865; E. T. Baird, D. D., from 1865 to 1871; John N. Waddell, D. D., LL. D., from 1871 to 1879, and E. M. Richardson, D. D., from 1879 to 1884, the present incumbent.

The Committee was located at Memphis, Tennessee, but owing to the events of the war, it was transferred to Richmond, Virginia, in 1863, and was composed of the same persons as the Committee of Publication. This continued until 1871, when it was returned to Memphis.

During the war nothing was done, as the young men were in the army. The contributions, being in Confederate bonds or scrip, became a total loss. In 1861 it was proposed to abolish the Committee, and transfer the work to the Presbyteries. During this discussion nothing could be accomplished, but the Assembly of 1866 resolved to continue the Committee, and not till then did its actual labors commence. Beginning in 1866, with one candidate, there was a steady advance until one hundred and thirty was reached, in 1872. Meanwhile, the contributions rose from $217 to $19,660. The candidates fell off somewhat the next two years, and there being a corresponding decrease of contributions, the Assembly of 1871 tried to resuscitate the work by assigning it again to a distinct committee. The retrograde movement, however, continued until the number receiving aid fell to seventy-four, and the receipts to $10,336. The movement for several years has been upward, inasmuch that the number receiving aid in 1883 was one hundred and thirteen, and the contributions were $15,224. This vacillation was chiefly owing to two causes, over which the Committee had no control: 1. The reduction of receipts and of candidates was at first caused by the commercial straitness which began in 1872, and was followed by the financial disasters of 1873, whose effect was felt for several years. 2. Several of the larger Presbyteries, having each a goodly number of candidates, and finding the Committee straitened, resolved to act independently. Three reasons probably controlled them; a desire to relieve the Committee, the hope of bringing their churches up to their duty at a time of straitness, by pressing the claims of their own sons on them, and the desire to make the support of their own candidates certain. Commercial confidence having been restored, the Committee experiences the benefit of it in the increase of both candidates and contributions. This statement shows, however, that what the Committee has accomplished is not fairly representative of what the Church has done. The Committee is now giving evidence of a very healthy growth. There has never been any complaint as to its administration. In that respect it is believed always to have enjoyed the confidence of the Church.

Executive Committee of Publication of the Southern Presbyterian Church, was organized by the first General Assembly of that Church, held in Augusta, Ga., December, 1861. The headquarters of the Committee were located in Richmond, Va., and Dr. William Brown was elected Secretary. The purpose in view was the publication and circulation of a sound religious literature, as one of the evangelical agencies of the Church.

During the prevalence of the war between the States, great difficulties were encountered by the Committee in its work, but a depository was established, and the publication of a Sabbath-school paper and a paper designed for circulation in the army was commenced. Large amounts were expended in the circulation of religious reading among the soldiers in the armies of the Confederacy. Considering the difficulties that were met, the work during this period was attended with great success. Dr. Brown having resigned, after two years' service, Rev. John Leyburn, D.D., was elected Secretary, and served until the close of the war.

The close of the war found the Executive Committee stripped of all its material and means of prosecuting its work, the fire which occurred at the surrender of Richmond having consumed their office with all its contents. But the General Assembly, which met in December of the same year (1865), took steps to reorganize and to prosecute vigorously this important work, and elected Rev. E. T. Baird, D.D., Secretary. The depository was re-established, the Sabbath-school paper was re-issued, and for some twelve years the work was prosecuted with great apparent success; but in the year 1877 it was found that the business had become so seriously encumbered with debt, that it was deemed best to place the depository in the hands of private parties, and to commit the publication of the paper also to private parties for a time. Rev. James K. Hazen was elected Secretary by the General Assembly of 1877, in place of Rev. E. T. Baird, D.D.

Since that time the work of removing the burden of debt has been so far successful that the Committee have resumed control of the depository, and are now prosecuting its business free from embarrassment and with the best prospect of future success. It has a well-appointed depository, adequate to the supply of our Sabbath schools, churches, ministers and people. A series of Sabbath-school papers is published, consisting of The Earnest Worker, a monthly of thirty-two pages, designed for teachers and scholars, containing an exposition of the International Lessons; The Lesson Quarterly, containing the International Lessons for each quarter; The Children's Friend, an illustrated children's paper, and The Lesson Leaves, with the Sunday-school lessons for each Sabbath. These papers secure the patronage of nearly all our Sabbath schools.

It is the purpose of the Committee to aid the Presbyteries in the work of colportage, by furnishing books and tracts at cost, and if necessary, supplementing the work by donations; also to assist Mission Sabbath schools and feeble churches by grants of such supplies as may be needed. The demand for this work is very great in the field occupied by the Southern Presbyterian Church, and thus far it has been very inadequately met; but the prospect is now hopeful of being able to accomplish far more than ever before.

Extraordinary Means of Deliverance. The following incident in the life of that good man, Rev. William Tennent, Jr., of whom we have elsewhere given a notice, will be read with interest. It was published in his memoir, which appeared in The Assembly's Missionary Magazine, in the year 1806, and which was understood to be from the pen of the Hon. Elias Bondinot, LL.D. Dr. Archibald Alexander, in referring to it in "The Log College," says:—

"There can be no doubt about the authenticity of the facts here stated, however they may be accounted for. The writer has heard the same facts from elderly persons who never had seen this published account; and they were so public, that they were generally known, not only to the people of this part of the country, but they were currently reported and fully believed in other States. The writer has heard them familiarly talked of in Virginia, from his childhood. It is a matter of some regret that the record of this trial cannot be found, yet papers have been discovered among the archives of the State, in which reference is made to this transaction."

"The time of which we are now speaking was remarkable for a great revival of religion, in which Mr. Tennent was considerably instrumental, and in which a Mr. John Rowland, brought up with Mr. Tennent at the Log College, was also very remarkable for his successful preaching among all ranks of people. Possessing a commanding eloquence, as well as other estimable qualities, he became very popular, and was much celebrated throughout the country. His celebrity and success were subjects of very serious regret to many careless worldlings, who placed all their happiness in the enjoyment of temporal objects, and considered and represented Mr. Rowland and his brethren as fanatics and hypocrites. This was specially applicable to many of the great men of the then province of New Jersey, and particularly to the Chief Justice, who was well known for his disbelief of revelation. There was at this time prevailing through the country a noted man by the name of Tom Bell, whose knowledge and understanding were very considerable, and who greatly excelled in low art and cunning. His mind was totally debased, and his whole conduct betrayed a soul capable of descending to every species of iniquity. In all the arts of theft, robbery, fraud, deception and defamation, he was so deeply skilled, and so thoroughly practiced, that it is believed he never had his equal in this country. He had been indicted in almost every one of the Middle colonies, but his ingenuity and cunning always enabled him to escape punishment. This man unhappily resembled Mr. Rowland in his external appearance, so as hardly to be known from him without the most careful examination.

"It so happened that Tom Bell arrived one evening at a tavern in Princeton, dressed in a parson's dark gray frock. On his entering the tavern, about dusk, the late John Stockton, Esq., of that town, a pious and respectable man, to whom Mr. Rowland was well known, went up to Bell, and addressed him as Mr. Rowland, and was inviting him to go home with him. Bell assured him of his mistake. It was with some difficulty that Mr. Stockton acknowledged his error, and then informed Bell that it had arisen from his great resemblance to Mr. Rowland. This hint was sufficient for the prolific genius of that notorious impostor. The next day Bell went into the county of Hunterdon, and stopped in a congregation where Mr. Rowland had formerly preached once or twice, but where he was not intimately known. Here he met with a member of the congregation, to whom he introduced himself as the Rev. Mr. Rowland, who had preached to them some time before. This gentleman immediately invited him to his house to spend the week, and he went home, as the people were without a minister, to preach for them on the next Sabbath, to which Bell agreed, and notice was accordingly given to the neighborhood. The impostor was treated with every mark of attention and respect; and a private room was assigned to him as a study, to prepare for the Sabbath. The sacred day arrived, and he was invited to ride to church with the ladies, in the family wagon, and the master of the house accompanied them on an elegant horse. When they had arrived near the church, Bell on a sudden discovered that he had left his notes in his study, and proposed to ride back for them on the fine horse, by which means he should be able to return in time for the service. This proposal was instantly agreed to, and Bell mounted the horse, returned to the house, rifled the desk of his host, and made off with the horse. Wherever he stopped he called himself the Rev. John Rowland.

"At the time this event took place, Messrs. Tennent and Rowland had gone into Pennsylvania, or Maryland, with Mr. Joshua Anderson and Mr. Benjamin Stevens (both members of a church contiguous to that where Bell had practiced his fraud), on business of a religious nature. Soon after their return, Mr. Rowland was charged with the above robbery; he gave bonds to appear at the court at Trenton, and the affair made a great noise throughout the colony. At the Court of Oyer and Terminer, the Judge charged the Grand Jury on the subject with great severity. After long consideration, the jury returned into court without finding a bill. The Judge reproved them in an angry manner, and ordered them out again. They again returned without finding a bill, and were again sent out with threatening of severe punishment if they persisted in their refusal. At last they agreed, and brought in a bill for the alleged crime. On the trial, Messrs. Tennent, Anderson, and Stevens appeared as witnesses, and fully proved an alibi in favor of Mr. Rowland, by swearing that on the very day on which the robbery was committed they were with Mr. Rowland, and heard him preach in Pennsylvania or Maryland. The jury accordingly acquitted him without hesitation, to the great disappointment and mortification of his prosecutors, and of many other enemies to the great revival of religion that had recently taken place; but to the great joy of the serious and well disposed.

"The spirits hostile to the spread of the gospel were not, however, so easily overcome. In their view an opportunity was now presented favorable for inflicting a deep wound on the cause of Christianity, and, as if urged on by the malice of man's great enemy, they resolved that no means should be left untried, no arts unemployed, for the destruction of these distinguished servants of God. Many and various were the circumstances which still contributed to inspire them with hopes of success. The testimony of the person who had been robbed was positive, that Mr. Rowland was the robber; and this testimony was corroborated by that of a number of individuals who had seen Tom Bell personating Mr. Rowland, using his name, and in possession of the horse. These sons of Belial had been able, after great industry used for the purpose, to collect a mass of evidence of this kind, which they considered as establishing the fact; but Mr. Rowland was now out of their power by the verdict of not guilty. Their vengeance, therefore, was directed against the witnesses by whose testimony he had been cleared; and they were accordingly arraigned for perjury before a Court of Quarter Sessions in the county; and the Grand Jury received a strict charge, the plain import of which was that these good men ought to be indicted. After an examination of the testimony on one side only, as is the custom in such cases, the Grand Jury did accordingly find bills of indictment against Messrs. Tennent, Anderson and Stevens, for wilful and corrupt perjury. Their enemies and the enemies of the gospel now began to triumph. They gloried in the belief that an indelible stain would be fixed on the professors of religion, and of consequence on religion itself; and that this new light, by which they denominated all appearance of piety, would soon be extinguished forever.

"These indictments were removed to the Supreme Court, and poor Mr. Anderson, living in the county, and conscious of his entire innocence, could not brook the idea of lying under the odium of the hateful crime of perjury, he therefore demanded a trial at the first Court of Oyer and Terminer. This proved most seriously injurious to him, for he was pronounced guilty, and most cruelly and unjustly condemned to stand one hour on the Court-house steps, with a paper on his breast, whereon was written, in large letters, 'This is for wilful and corrupt perjury ;' which sentence was executed upon him.

"Messrs. Tennent and Stevens were summoned to appear at the next court, and attended accordingly, depending on the aid of Mr. John Coxé, an eminent lawyer, who had been previously employed to conduct their defence. As Mr. Tennent was wholly unacquainted with the nature of forensic litigation, and did not know of any person living who could prove his innocence (all the persons who were with him being indicted), his only resource and consolation was to commit himself to the divine will, and if he must suffer, to take it as from the hand of God, who, he well knew, could make even the wrath of man to praise him ;* and considering it as probable that he might suffer, he had prepared a sermon to be preached from the pillory, if that should be his fate. On his arrival at Trenton, he found the famous Mr. Smith, of New York, father of the late Chief Justice of Canada, one of the ablest lawyers in America, and of a religious character, who had voluntarily attended to aid in his defence; also his brother Gilbert, who was now settled in the pastoral charge of the Second Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and who brought Mr. John Kinsey, one of the first counsellors of that city, for the same purpose. Messrs. Tennent and Stevens met these gentlemen at Mr. Coxé's, the morning before the trial was to come on. Mr. Coxé requested that they would bring in their witnesses, that they might examine them previously to their going into court. Mr. Tennent answered that he did not know of any witnesses but God and his own conscience. Mr. Coxé replied, 'If you have no witnesses, sir, the trial must be put off; otherwise you must certainly be convicted. You well know the strong testimony that will be brought against you, and the exertions that are making to accomplish your ruin.' Mr. Tennent replied, 'I am sensible of all this, yet it never shall be said that I have delayed the trial, or been afraid to meet the justice of my country. I know my own innocence, and that God, whose I am, and whom I serve, will never suffer me to fall by these snares of the devil, or by the wicked machinations of his agents or servants. Therefore, gentlemen, go on to the trial.' Messrs. Smith and Kinsey, who were both religious men, told him that his confidence and trust in God, as a Christian minister of the gospel, was well founded, and before a heavenly tribunal would be all-important to him; but assured him it would not avail in an earthly court, and urged his consent to put off the trial. Mr. Tennent continued inflexible in his refusal; on which Mr. Coxé told him that since he was determined to go to trial, he had the satisfaction of informing him that they had discovered a flaw in the indictment, which might prove favorable to him on a demurrer. He asked for an explanation, and on finding that it was to admit the fact in a legal point of view, and rest on the law arising from it, Mr. Tennent broke out with great vehemence, saying that this was another snare of the devil, and before he would consent to it he would suffer death. He assured his counsel that his confidence in God was so strong, and his assurance that he would bring about his deliverance in some way or other, was so great, that he did not wish them to delay the trial for a moment.

"Mr. Stevens, whose faith was not of this description, and who was bowed down to the ground under the most gloomy apprehensions of suffering as his neighbor, Mr. Anderson, had done, eagerly seized the opportunity of escape that was offered, and was afterwards discharged on the exception.

"Mr. Coxé still urged putting off the trial, charging Mr. Tennent with acting the part rather of a wild enthusiast, than of a meek and prudent Christian; but he insisted that they should proceed, and left them in astonishment, not knowing how to act, when the bell summoned them to court.

"Mr. Tennent had not walked far in the street, before he met a man and his wife, who stopped him, and asked if his name was not Tennent. He answered in the affirmative, and begged to know if they had any business with him. The man replied, 'you best know.' He told his name, and said that he was from a certain place (which he mentioned in Pennsylvania or Maryland; that Messrs. Rowland, Tennent, Anderson and Stevens, had lodged either at his house, or in a house wherein he and his wife had been servants (it is not now certain which) at a particular time, which he named; that on the following day they had heard Messrs. Tennent and Rowland preach; that some nights before they left home, he and his wife waked out of a sound sleep, and each told the other a dream which had just occurred, and which proved to be the same in substance, to wit, that he, Mr. Tennent, at Trenton, was in the greatest possible distress, and that it was in their power and theirs only, to relieve him. Considering it as a remarkable dream only, they again went to sleep, and it was twice repeated, precisely in the same manner to both of them. This made so deep an impression on their minds, that they set off, and here they were, and would know of him what they were to do. Mr. Tennent immediately went with them to the Court-house, and his counsel, on examining the man and his wife, and finding their testimony to be full to the purpose, were, as they well might be, in perfect astonishment. Before the trial began, another person, of a low character, called on Mr. Tennent, and told him that he was so harassed in conscience, for the part he had been acting in this prosecution, that he could get no rest till he had determined to come and make a full confession. He sent this man to his counsel also. Soon after, Mr. Stockton, from Princeton, appeared, and added his testimony. In short, they went to trial, and notwithstanding the utmost exertions of the ablest counsel, who had been employed to aid the Attorney-General against Mr. Tennent, the advocates on his side so traced every movement of the defendant on the Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, in question, and satisfied the jury so perfectly on the subject, that they did not hesitate honorably to acquit Mr. Tennent, by their unanimous verdict of not guilty, to the great confusion and mortification of his numerous opposers. Mr. Tennent assured the writer of this that during the whole of this business, his spirits never failed him, and that he contemplated the possibility of his suffering so infamous a punishment as standing in the pillory without dismay, and had made preparation, and was fully determined, to deliver a sermon to the people in that situation, if he should be placed in it.

"He went from Trenton to Philadelphia with his brother, and on his return, as he was rising the hill at the entrance of Trenton, without reflecting on what had happened, he accidentally cast his eyes on the pillory, which suddenly so filled him with horror as completely to madden him, and it was with great difficulty that he kept himself from falling from his horse. He reached the tavern door in considerable danger, was obliged to be assisted to dismount, and it was some time before he could so get the better of his fears and confusion as to proceed on his journey. Such is the constitution of the human mind! It will often resist, with unshaken firmness, the severest external pressure and violence; and sometimes it yields without reason, when it has nothing to fear or, should we not rather say, such is the support which God sometimes affords to his people in the time of their necessity, and such the manner in which he leaves them to feel their own weakness when that necessity is past, that all the praise may be given where alone it is due?

"The writer sincerely rejoices, that though a number of the extraordinary incidents in the life of Mr. Tennent cannot be vouched by public testimony and authentic documents, yet the singular manner in which a gracious God did appear for this his faithful servant in the time of that distress which has just been noticed, is a matter of public notoriety, and capable of being verified by the most unquestionable testimony and records.

"This special instance of the interference of the righteous Judge of all the earth ought to yield consolation to pious people in seasons of great difficulty and distress, where there is none that seems able to deliver them. Yet it ought to afford no encouragement to the enthusiast, who refuses to use the means of preservation and deliverance which God puts in his power. True confidence in God is always accompanied with the use of all lawful means, and with the rejection of all that are unlawful. It consists in an unshaken belief, that while right means are used God will give that issue which shall be most for his glory and his people's good. The extraordinary occurrence here recorded may also serve as a solemn warning to the enemies of God's people, and to the advocates of infidelity, not to strive, by wicked and deep-laid machinations, to oppose the success of the gospel, nor to attempt to injure the persons and characters of those faithful servants of the Most High, whom, sooner or later, he will vindicate, to the unspeakable confusion of all who have persecuted and traduced them."

* His affectionate congregation felt deeply interested in his critical situation, and kept a day of fasting and prayer on the occasion."

Falling Spring Presbyterian Church, Chambersburg, Pa. Among the first to explore and settle in Cumberland Valley were four adventurous brothers, James, Robert, Joseph and Benjamin Chambers, who emigrated from the county of Antrim, in Ireland, to the Province of Pennsylvania, between the years 1726 and 1730. The last of these gentlemen, when about twenty-one years of age, settled where Chambersburg now stands, in 1730, and "The Falling Spring" was the name given by him to the place of his settlement, at the confluence of the large spring with the Conococheague Creek, on the bank of the latter.

The families that subsequently located themselves on and near the waters of this spring (which gave the name to the entire settlement, until 1764), were, with scarcely an exception, Presbyterians, and soon organized a congregation. Until the town of Chambersburg was laid out, in the year just mentioned, this congregation was known as the Congregation of Falling Spring, but after that it was called the Presbyterian Congregation of Chambersburg, and also that of Falling Spring.

Col. Benjamin Chambers, who was himself a Presbyterian, made an early appropriation of some suitable ground for a graveyard, school-house, and place of public worship. This was the romantic cedar grove on the bank of the creek in which the present church stands. In this grove, and near the spot which the present edifice occupies, there was erected a small log building, which was used for the double purpose of a school-house and place of worship. This building, as would appear from the following extract from the records of Presbytery, at their sedesunt in 1739, was erected in that year.

"A supplication from the people of Canizagie was presented by James Lindsay, commissioner, wherein they requested that Mr. Cayen's ordination be hastened. The Presbytery inquired of said commissioner what provision they had made for Mr. Cayen's subsistence among them; it was answered, that their subscriptions amounted to forty-six pounds, which they will make good; and what can be had over and above shall be allowed him, and further, they will do what they can to procure a plantation to live upon. The commissioner also learns in writing from that people, signifying that they have agreed about the bounds between them and the West side of Canizagie, West from Alexander Dunlaps to the fork of the creek, and thence the creek to be the line until it come to the line of the Province, and that they have agreed that their other Meeting-House shall be at the Falling Spring."

This old building, as already intimated, was small, and exceedingly plain in its structure. It was formed of logs, entered by a door on the eastern side, and another on the southern, and lighted by long, narrow windows, which were of the width of two small panes of glass, and reached from one end to the other of the building. When this building, as was frequently the case, was not of sufficient capacity to accommodate all who wished to worship in it, the congregation abandoned it, for the time, in favor of the saw-mill of Colonel Chambers, which stood on the bank of the creek, on what is now known as "The Island," and which was surrounded by a lovely green plot. On that grassy space, when it was at all proper, the gathered crowd seated themselves, and received, with interest and eagerness, the messages of God from his commissioned ambassador.

In the year 1767 this rude log building was demolished. Its dimensions were entirely too contracted for the increasing community, and besides, something a little more tasteful was demanded by the advancing spirit of the times. Another edifice, therefore, was erected, in which the sacred services of the Sabbath might be performed. This was considerably larger than its predecessor, being about 35 by 70 feet, and was of better finished material. It stood where the present church stands, though its position was somewhat different, as it presented a side view to the street. One year after the erection of this church, Colonel Chambers, by deed, conveyed to trustees of the congregation and burial ground. The form of this appropriation was as follows:—

"Deed for ground of Falling Spring Church, dated January 1st, 1768, from Benjamin Chambers and Jane, his wife, to Patrick Vance, Matthew Wilson, Edward Cook, Robert Patterson, William Linsley, Jr., William Glass, and William Brotherton, in trust for the Presbyterian Congregation of Falling Spring, now professing and adhering to, and that shall hereafter adhere to and profess the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the mode of Church government therein contained, Witnesseth, That the said Benjamin Chambers and Jane, his wife, as well for their regard to the true religion of the blessed Redeemer, Jesus, the Son of God, and for and in consideration of their regard to the interest and advantage of said congregation, and in consideration of the rents, convey to the Trustees, etc., yielding and paying therefor and thereout unto the said B. C., his heirs or assigns, at the said town of Chambersburg, on the first day of June next, first after this date, the yearly rent or consideration of one Rose, if required."

In 1787 the congregation of Falling Spring was incorporated by Act of Assembly, and has ever since been governed in its property affairs by trustees elected under this charter. At that time it would seem that the congregation was larger than in 1832, though at the latter period the population of Chambersburg was tenfold that of 1786. After the Revolutionary War and peace, a German population supplanted the first settlers, and possessed themselves of most of their choice plantations by purchase, and the families and descendants of these settlers moved west of the mountains.

The present church edifice of the congregation, which was erected in 1803, and has since been somewhat extended in length, is a large, beautiful and comfortable building. Its elevated site, also, is a most desirable one, calling, as it does, for those who worship within the sanctuary to leave the associations and pursuits of a bustling yet fading world, and come up to the service of the Lord. The shadows which fall around it, likewise, from the trees which were standing when the footstep of the white man first broke the silence of the wilderness, are not without their significance, neither is the ivy which covers its walls, as if to bear constant testimony to the truth, that with a steadiness and tenacity which neither sunshine nor storm nor revolving seasons can impair, man's affections should rise above the earth, cleave to the risen Saviour, and cluster around the Church which He hath purchased with His precious blood.

There can be no doubt that the congregation of Falling Spring was for a time supplied by ministers sent from the Presbyteries of Donegal and Newcastle. In the minutes of a meeting of a committee of Presbytery, held at "Canigagig, 16th of November, 1739," it is stated that "Richard O'Cahan, Joseph Armstrong, Benjamin Chambers and Patrick Jack, have publicly engaged to pay to Mr. Samuel Thompson the sum of one pound, five shillings, at or before next meeting of Presbytery, as being the whole of arrears due him by the people at Canigagig." From this record it is evident that, in all probability, Mr. Thompson preceded the Rev. Samuel Caven as pastor of "the people of Conococheague," the name by which the congregations of Greencastle and Falling Spring were then known. Mr. Caven resigned his pastoral relation in 1741. About the year 1767, the Rev. James Lang (or Long, as he was generally called) became the pastor of the Church at Falling Spring for one-half his time, the other half being given to Greencastle, where he resided. In 1792, in compliance with a "supplication" from the united congregations of Falling Spring and East Conococheague, the Rev. William Speer was "appointed, for six months, stately to supply them, in rotation with their present pastor, Mr. Lang, to which arrangement Mr. Lang declared his hearty consent." In 1794 the union between the congregations of Falling Spring and East Conococheague was dissolved, and the latter became the sole charge of Mr. Lang. At the same time Mr. Speer accepted the pastorate of Falling Spring.

After being supplied for a time by appointments of Presbytery, the congregation at Chambersburg, in the year 1800, secured the services of the Rev. David Denny, who was set over them in the Lord, and continued to labor among them until 1838, when, on account of the infirmity of years, his resignation was tendered and accepted. (See his sketch.) After Mr. Denny's withdrawal from his pulpit, the Rev.

William Adam was chosen to fill it, in September, 1839, and did so until April, 1841, when impaired health demanded a cessation of his ministerial labors. The Rev. Daniel McKinley was Mr. Adam's successor, and continued to be pastor of the church for nine years. The Rev. Joseph Clark was installed pastor of the congregation in 1852, and continued in this relation until 1859. The Rev. S. J. Nicholls was called to the pastorate in July, 1860, and remained with the church four years. Mr. Nicholls was succeeded, for brief periods, by the Rev. Messrs. Fine and Janeway. In 1867 the Rev. J. Agnew Crawford, D.D., accepted a call, and still is pastor of the church.

The cemetery of the Church at Chambersburg is one of the loveliest homes of the dead that is anywhere to be seen. Though within the precincts of the town, it is yet, in a great measure, hidden from view, and pervaded by much of the solemn stillness of the country. A wanderer among its tombs might easily imagine himself in some lonely retreat, secluded from the world, and where none would be likely to disturb his meditations or see the falling tear. This beautiful place, which lies in the rear of the church, is skirted on the north by the Conococheague, whose waters flow noiselessly along beneath a steep and high descent. In the direction of its southern extremity, and but a short distance from it, are to be heard the murmurs of the Falling Spring, as it rolls onward, soon to lose itself in the deeper stream to which it pays its tribute. The time was when this spring flowed through the graveyard, in the deep ravine which yet divides it in a direction nearly north and south, but it was at an early day diverted from this channel to its present course, that its power might be employed for a useful and profitable purpose. That ravine is now occupied with a number of majestic trees, which have since grown up in its bosom, and its sides are thickly studded with smaller ones, and bushes of various kinds. This, indeed, is true of the entire yard; it is nearly altogether protected in this way from the rays of the sun. The visitor at once, and with interest, observes the rich shrubbery which adorns the undulating ground on which he treads, the numerous cedars scattered through the enclosure, as if to represent the un fading recollections of the departed which are cherished in many a heart, and the refreshing shade which is spread around him by stately trees which once sheltered the red man in his slumbers after the toils of the day, and which yet maintain their vigor and freshness amid the very ravages of death. Sacred spot! How many warm tears have gushed upon thee! How many crushed hearts have poured forth their wailings upon thy passing breeze! How many affections hast thou seen to bleed, and how many hopes to perish! How many loved treasures hast thou unveiled thy bosom to receive, which now rest beneath the grassy mounds which mark thy surface! How many sad memories continually linger about thee! How many, too, are there, among thy silent and shattered occupants, who, because they died in faith in Him who is the Resurrection and the Life, shall catch with triumph the last trumpet's stirring sound—

"Then burst the chains in sweet surprise,
And in the Saviour's image rise."

Fanaticism (from Latin fanum, "temple"). The term "fanatic" was originally applied to all priests who pretended to receive divine revelation and announced oracles, but more especially to the priests of Cybele and Bellona, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings of the satirists, Horace, Juvenal, etc., the word gradually changed its sense and came to imply something of a fraudulent inspiration, consisting of hollow excitement and empty visions. In this sense it was still used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when applied, for instance, to Cromwell, Mohammed, the prophets of the Church in the desert, etc. At present the term "fanaticism" denotes a state of the mind in which enthusiasm for an idea has been transformed into mere hatred of its opposite.

Fellows, William H., Chancellor, ruling elder, was born in Troy, N. Y., November 10th, 1808. Removed to Charleston, S. C.; thence to Savannah, Ga.; thence to Selma, in 1833. Died, July 16th, 1880. At an early age Chancellor Fellows commenced the practice of law, in Selma, Ala., and was installed ruling elder in 1848. The next year he removed to Mobile, but returned, and was reinstalled, January 4th, 1852. To the day of his death he was straight as an Indian, courteous in manner, and gentle as a woman in language and deportment. His face was always wreathed with a heavenly smile, and his presence in church was an inspiration. For many years he taught a class of old men in the Sunday school, and died in the harness. Of remarkable judgment, and equanimity of disposition, he commanded the unbounded respect and love of the Session and the Church; and whenever he chose to express his decided conviction, this was the end of all controversy. His various pastors all found him a "fellow-helper to the truth," and his funeral text, "An honorable Counsellor * * * which also waited for the Kingdom of God," seemed to strike all as descriptive of the man and the venerable ruling elder.

Fennel, Andrew J., D.D., second child of Calvin and Abigail (Gorham) Fennel, was born in Ira, Vermont, June 21st, 1845. Leaving the farm when seventeen years of age, the next eight years were spent in study and teaching. Afterwards he studied three years in Auburn Seminary, graduating in 1863. He was licensed by the Rutland Association of Congregational ministers, in 1862, and ordained by the same body in 1864. He preached as stated supply of the Congregational Church in Graton, N. Y., 1863-6. In 1846 he was called to the Presbyterian Church in Glen's Falls, N. Y., where he is still actively engaged as pastor of that church. Dr. Fennel is well and extensively known as a sound theologian, a clear and discriminating preacher, and a very successful pastor. He is a man of a very quiet yet genial spirit, and is greatly beloved by all who know him.

First Presbyterian Church, Carlisle, Pa. About the year 1736, the Presbyterians erected a log church on the Conodoguinet Creek, about two miles north of Carlisle, or West Pennsborough, as it was then called, at a place known ever since as the "Meeting-House Spring." No vestige of this building now remains, nor are there any of the oldest residents of the neighborhood who are able to give anything like a satisfactory account of it. The first pastor of this church, the Rev. Samuel Thompson, from Ireland, was ordained and installed November 14th, 1739. It seems probable, however, that for some time previously to Mr. Thompson's settlement the Rev. Messrs. Craighead and Caven had labored there, in the character of stated supplies.

Shortly after Carlisle was laid out a Presbyterian congregation was organized in it, and a church was built. In relation to this movement, Colonel Armstrong, who was an elder of the church, wrote to Richard Peters, as follows:—

"CARLISLE, June 30th, 1757.

"Tomorrow we begin to haul stones for the building of a meeting-house, on the north side of the square. There was no other convenient place. I have avoided the place you once pitched for a church. The stones are raised out of Colonel Stanwix's entrenchments. We will want help in this political as well as religious work."

About the year 1760 a license was obtained from Governor Hamilton, authorizing the congregation to raise, by lottery, a small sum of money to enable them to build a decent house for the worship of God; and in 1766 the minister and others petitioned the Assembly for the passage of an Act to compel the "managers to settle," and the "adventurers to pay," "the settlement of the lottery having been for a considerable time deferred," by reason of the "confusion occasioned by the Indian wars." The Act prayed for was passed. The method of raising money by lottery, for church purposes or any other, was not, of course, at that time regarded as it is now.

The Rev. George Duffield (noticed elsewhere) was installed pastor of the Church in Carlisle, in 1761. A short time afterward the congregation in the county, then under the care of the Rev. John Steele, constructed a two-story house of worship in town, and some time before the Revolution, erected the present "First Presbyterian Church," on the north-west corner of the Centre Square, which, however, has since been several times remodeled and repaired. The two congregations differed somewhat in doctrinal views, and were called the "Old Lights" and "New Lights," in virtue of a division which then prevailed throughout the Synod. "The house in which Mr. Duffield's congregation worshipped," says Dr. Wing, "was situated on the East side of Hanover street, nearly opposite the place where the Second Presbyterian Church now stands. Soon after Mr. Duffield's removal to the Third Church of Philadelphia (1772), this building took fire and was entirely consumed. During the confusion incident to the War of the American Revolution neither congregation appears to have flourished, and soon after the death of Mr. Steele (August, 1779), both congregations worshipped alternately in the stone church, which had now been completed by Mr. Duffield's former people finishing off and occupying the gallery." After the removal of Dr. Duffield to Philadelphia, and the death of Mr. Steele, the two congregations united, and called, in 1785, the Rev. Robert Davidson, D.D., who was an eminent scholar and divine. The following year the congregation thus united was incorporated. Dr. Davidson was removed by death, December 13th, 1812. In connection with him, and as his colleague, the Rev. Henry R. Wilson, D.D., preached some time to the congregation, whilst Professor in Dickinson College.

Before the expiration of the year 1815, the Rev. George Duffield, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and grandson of Dr. Duffield above referred to, received and accepted a call to this church. Ere he had left the Theological Seminary of the Associate Reformed Church in New York, then under the care of the celebrated John M. Mason, D.D., his merit as a rising young preacher had been observed, and a devout poet of that day, in some published lines, put into verse a prophecy concerning him, in these words:—

"Duffield, thine artless eloquence shall win the soul."

He remained in Carlisle eighteen years and six months, gathering into his church during that time seven hundred persons by profession and two hundred by certificate, making an average of about fifty persons during each year of his first pastorate. He resigned the charge in 1835. (See his sketch.) Dr. Duffield ended his days in Detroit, Mich., and his remains rest under the shades of Elmwood, where stands his monument, bearing, among others, an inscription, cut in the old classic language he so loved to study, but which, translated, reads thus:—

"Here lies buried, in the hope of the first resurrection,

GEORGE DUFFIELD,

Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Carlisle, Penna., for twenty years;

Pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Detroit for thirty years.

A man pure in life, holy in piety, imbued with learning; in discourse, in spirit and in faith an example among the faithful."

"After he had served his generation, by the will of God, he fell asleep."

The congregation at Carlisle was subsequently served by the Rev. Messrs. Granger and Burrowes, as supplies, and the Rev. Messrs. W. T. Sprole and E. J. Newlin, as pastors, until the Rev. C. P. Wing assumed the pastorate, in 1848, which he filled with great acceptableness and success, until his resignation of the charge in 1875. The Rev. Joseph Vance succeeded Dr. Wing in 1875 and is still pastor of the church. Around this venerable, historic church many precious memories cluster. It has been the source of a vast influence for good, and still flourishes, with all the elements of extensive usefulness and permanent prosperity.

It gives us pleasure to add to this sketch, that the Second Presbyterian Church of Carlisle is also in a very flourishing condition, and exerting a strong influence through the various channels of Christian activity. It was organized by a committee of Presbytery, January 12th, 1833, in the town hall, with seventy-seven members, who had previously been connected with the First Church. Rev. Daniel McKinley, D.D., was its pastor from 1833 till 1838; the Rev. Alexander T. McGill, D.D., from 1839 till 1841; the Rev. T. V. Moore, D.D., from 1842 till 1845. The succeeding pastors have been the Rev. James Lillie, the Rev. Mervine E. Johnson, the Rev. W. W. Eells, and the Rev. John C. Bliss, who, in 1867 yielded the pulpit to the Rev. George Norcross, by whom it is still occupied. The church in which this congregation worships is large, tasteful and convenient.

First Presbyterian Church, Columbus, Ohio.

The State of Ohio was formerly included in that territory claimed by France, extending from the Alleghenies westward to the Rocky Mountains, and known as Louisiana.

A little more than one hundred years ago, throughout this vast and unbroken wilderness, the only white men were those concentrated about the few and widely separated French military posts and trading establishments. Subsequently the soil of the State was the scene of frequent conflicts, and more than one armed expedition was sent into the country to chastise the Indians, who were the bloody allies of the French during their struggle with the English for the possession of the western country. The question of national supremacy was finally decided in favor of the English, upon the plains of Abraham. During the American Revolution the hostility of the Indians, which at first was excited by the French against the English, was, to the disgrace of the English nation, unnaturally directed against the feeble and unprotected frontier settlements of their revolted colonies, which for years afterward were exposed to sudden attacks, invariably marked by acts of the most wanton and savage barbarity. During this time, and even before, a few adventurers of the Anglo-Saxon race had penetrated into these fertile regions, and carried back to the Atlantic States the most glowing accounts of the great Western paradise. But not until after the close of the War of Independence was public attention much directed towards its settlement.

It is to the honor and glory of the Presbyterian Church that she, at an early day, took measures to follow her children into the Western wilderness, and preach the gospel among the feeble and scattered settlements. And from the earliest period of the State of Ohio her ministers were found laboring, from time to time, and from place to place, as their services seemed to be required. As early as 1805 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, assembled at Philadelphia, Pa., set apart James Hoge, to proceed to Ohio and preach the gospel, and, as if this was not a sufficiently large field, his commission also included "the parts thereunto adjacent." In November of that year Mr. Hoge arrived in Franklinton, which was then a small, though deemed an important, village, on the banks of the Scioto river, opposite to where Columbus now stands (the site of Columbus at that time not having even been laid out), in company with the Supreme Judges, who were preparing to open the first term of their Court in the county of Franklin—then embracing within its limits a large part of the present counties of Pickaway, Licking, Madison, Union, and all of Delaware and Marion, and including a total population of about 2000 souls, and an area of 600 square miles. As a pleasing incident, and marking the respect of the early settlers for religion, we may state that the Supreme Judges not only tendered the young missionary the use of the Court-room, but they, and also the Grand Jury, adjourned to hear him preach. This sermon was preached in the house built and occupied by John Overdier, a room in which was used as a Court-room. This first church and first Court House stood a few rods north of the old Court House in Franklinton.

Mr. Hoge continued to preach, and on February 8th, 1806, the First Presbyterian Church was regularly organized, and on the Sabbath following the Lord's Supper was administered to thirteen members and communicants. This church was the first of any denomination regularly organized within the aforesaid limits. On this occasion, the Rev. R. G. Wilson, then pastor of the Church in Chillicothe, and afterwards President of the Ohio University for a number of years, officiated in the organization of the church, by ordaining the ruling elders, who had been previously chosen by the people at a meeting which had been held for the purpose by the Rev. Mr. Hoge, who was acting under his commission as a missionary. The thirteen persons who were then received as the members constituting the church were: Colonel Robert Culbertson and Mrs. Culbertson, William Read and Mrs. Read, David Nelson and Mrs. Nelson, Michael Fisher and Mrs. Fisher, Robert Young and Mrs. Young, Mrs. Margaret Thompson, Mrs. Susanna McCoy and Miss Catharine Kessler. When the church was organized, Rev. James Hoge was elected and subsequently ordained as pastor; Robert Culbertson and William Read were ordained elders, and Michael Fisher was inducted into this office in September, 1807. Six trustees were also chosen to manage the secular affairs of the congregation, and were continued by subsequent election for a number of years. These were Lucas Sullivant, John Dill, William Domigan, Joseph Dickson, David Nelson and Joseph Hunter. The following families which are here named, with reference at this time to their descendants, were included in the congregation: Robert Culbertson and family, William Read, Lucas Sullivant, David Nelson, William Shaw, John Turner, Adam Turner, Joseph Hunter, John Hunter, J. Hamlin, S. G. Flenmiken, John Dill, Michael Fisher, J. McGowan, George Skidmore, Samuel King, William Brown, Sr., Joseph Park, David Jameson, Andrew Park, John Overdier, Jacob Overdier, Charles Hunter, John Lisle, J. Melvaine, M. Hess, M. Thompson, Robert Young, William Domigan, John McCoy, Joseph Smart, Isaac Smart, S. Powers, Joseph Dickson and Joseph Cowghill. The call from the congregation for Mr. Hoge's pastoral services was dated September 25th, 1807, and contained a promise to pay him the sum of $300, in half-yearly payments, annually, for three-fourths of his time, until they should find themselves able to give him a compensation for the whole of his time, in like proportion. From this feeble beginning, the communicants had increased in five years to seventy-five, and the congregation in a corresponding degree.

In 1812 a brick house for the use of the congregation was erected, mainly through the instrumentality of Lucas Sullivant; before its completion, however, the Commissariat department of the northwestern army, then stationed at Franklinton, took possession of it for the purpose of a storehouse. In March, 1813, a violent tornado, accompanied with rain, blew in the gable end of the building, and wet the grain stored within; the swelling of the large quantity of grain, consequent upon the wetting, burst asunder the walls. The use of the house was, doubtless, a free-will offering to the exigencies of the nation, and the Government subsequently indemnified them for the loss of their building.

Another house was erected in 1815, in place of the one destroyed, in which the congregation continued to worship for several years. This church was pleasantly located at the edge of the village, on the western bank of the Scioto river, of which it commanded a beautiful view, and near to a wooded island, well-known to the early settlers and their descendants as the British Island, from the fact that a detachment of English prisoners, taken during the war, were confined there for a short time.

In the old burying-ground attached to the church were laid many of the volunteer soldiers, who, leaving their comfortable homes and firesides at the call of their country, fell victims to the exposure and pestilence of the camp. Here, too, was the final resting-place of the early settlers.

"Beneath those rugged elms, that yew tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The brave forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

From the first organization of the church in Franklinton, the majority of communicants, and a considerable part of the congregation, lived upon the eastern side of the river, and in those early days it was thought no unusual hardship for the members, both male and female, to attend worship, even during the most inclement seasons of the year, riding on horseback along the bridle-paths, over the present site of Columbus, from a distance which, going and returning, amounted, in some instances, to fifteen or twenty miles.

About the year 1814, the first house erected in Columbus for religious worship was a log cabin, twenty-five by thirty feet, which stood upon a lot on Spring street near Third, and was owned by the Rev. James Hoge. In this house the Presbyterian congregation worshiped alternately with the one in Franklinton until 1818, when it "was deemed expedient, for the accommodation of a majority of said congregation, that a meeting-house be erected in Columbus, for public worship, on such ground as might be selected," and a subscription was started for this purpose.

The proprietors of the town of Columbus generously donated to the society a lot of ground, and the congregation added another thereto by purchase, for the sum of $300, upon a two years' credit. These lots were pleasantly situated on the bank of the Scioto river, at the junction of Town and Front streets. Here a frame house, of the dimensions of forty by sixty feet, was erected, at a cost of $1050. This house contained eighty pews, and could accommodate about four hundred people. At the sale of the pews they netted the sum of $1796.50, the highest valuation of any pew being but forty dollars. This meeting-house was, in fact, composed of three buildings, framed together in such a manner that they could be separated for removal if necessary. It was nick-named "Trinity in Unity."

On July 1st, 1821, the Society resolved that it should thereafter be known and distinguished as the First Presbyterian Congregation in Columbus. In November 19th, 1821, the Presbyterian congregation of Franklinton agreed that their name should be changed into that of the First Presbyterian Congregation of Columbus. It is thus seen that the church first founded in Franklinton, in 1806, was but continued under a new name. In 1821 that part of the congregation residing in Truro preferred a request that a fourth of Mr. Hoge's time should be given to them, which was granted.

January 18th, 1830, it was resolved to erect a new house of worship, and the building was erected. In architecture it was quite an imposing edifice, and a great stride in advance of its humble predecessor; in fact, comparing favorably with the best church edifices in the State at that period. The congregation took possession of their new building for public worship the first Sabbath of December, 1830.

In 1850 Dr. Hoge decided to accept a call made for one-half of his time, or more, by the Trustees of a Theological Seminary at Cincinnati. The Rev. Josiah D. Smith, after supplying the pulpit for six months, was elected co-pastor, and installed in December, 1850, and continued in this relation until 1851, at which time he was installed pastor of The Westminster Church of Columbus. December 24th, 1855, Rev. D. Hall was called to be co-pastor of Dr. Hoge; entered upon the regular performance of his duties the first Sabbath in February, 1856, and resigned his charge soon after. On Friday evening, February 8th, 1856, the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the church was celebrated, with very interesting services. February 28th, 1857, at a congregational meeting, it was resolved to elect two ruling elders, whereupon Dr. Wm. Aul and Alfred Thomas were unanimously chosen. At the same meeting, the resignation of Dr. Hoge as pastor was accepted, and the congregation reluctantly yielding to his request, and recording their grateful sense of his important services, and their affectionate regard for him. (See his sketch.) Dr. Hoge had the following successors in the pastorate of the First Church: Rev. Edgar Woods, June 30th, 1857-February, 1862; W. C. Roberts, D. D., November 11th, 1862-October 21st, 1864; Rev. William R. Marshall, February 27th, 1865-December 1st, 1869; Rev. J. R. Laidlaw, September 23d, 1871-April, 1875; Rev. E. P. Heberton, September 5th, 1875-April, 1877; Willis Lord, D. D., S. S., July, 1877-October, 1879; John W. Bailey, D. D., April, 1881-April, 1883; Rev. Francis E. Marsten, October 4th, 1883.

First Presbyterian Church, Cumberland, Md. There is no known record of the date of the organization of this church, but it is certain that there was preaching at Cumberland, occasionally, by supplies, from the beginning of the present century. The congregation was small and feeble for many years, struggling, as it were, for a mere existence. Among those who ministered in holy things to this feeble church, at different times, were the Rev. Messrs. Hays, Kennedy, Raymond and S. H. McDonald. During the time that Messrs. Hays, Kennedy and Raymond labored here, the church was able to do very little toward the support of a pastor. Messrs. Hays and Kennedy were successively Principals of the Allegheny county Academy, in which they taught for many years. From this source they derived their principal support, and it is probable, expended upon it their principal labors. Mr. Raymond, at a later date, labored a part of his time in Cumberland as a missionary, and was aided from the Missionary Fund. The Presbyterians in Cumberland for many years had no place of worship of their own, but worshipped alternately in the Lutheran Church.

In connection with the Episcopalians, they at one time erected a house of worship, under an agreement that each denomination should have the right to worship in it alternately, according to their respective forms. But in process of time, the Presbyterians were denied their interest and privileges in the building, and the Episcopalians very unjustly appropriated the entire property to their own use. Had the Presbyterians appealed to Caesar to avenge them of their adversary, the Episcopalians would doubtless have been compelled to abide by the terms of the agreement, and restore to the others their privilege or its equivalent. But the Presbyterians, as usual in such cases, chose rather to suffer wrong.

In the year 1838 they erected a house of worship for themselves, 45 by 55 feet, with a gallery in the end, and surmounted by a small cupola and bell. At this time they were efficiently aided by the individual efforts and labors of the Rev. S. H. McDonald, who, for the space of five years, acted as their stated supply. He was succeeded by the Rev. B. Wall, who was installed as the first regular pastor of this church on the second Sabbath of July, 1843. The Rev. J. H. Symmes, after laboring here from December, 1844, until the 10th of April, 1845, was, on that day, installed as pastor of the church by a committee of the Presbytery. The congregation having increased so that the building was too small for their accommodation, in the Autumn of 1849 an addition of eighteen feet was made to the rear, and a lecture-room and Sunday-school room, 20 by 30 feet, mostly in the rear of the church's office as altered.

In the Spring of 1852 the Rev. Mr. Symmes tendered to the Session his resignation as pastor, which was accepted by the Trustees on the 21st of April, who unanimously adopted a resolution, tendering to Mr. Symmes their gratitude for the zeal, ability and industry he had displayed during his pastorate. In March, 1856 the Rev. James D. Fitzgerald, by invitation of the congregation, began ministerial labor there, and in April, 1858, was installed pastor. On June 10th, 1870, the congregation adopted the recommendation of the Board of Trustees in favor of the purchase of the "Domestic" lot, 70 on Washington street, as a site, and resolved to proceed immediately to build a church there. In August, the Trustees' committee, consisting of Messrs. Gordon, McKim, and Mink, concluded to purchase the said lot, fronting sixty feet on Washington street, from G. W. Case and F. M. Baker, for the sum of $18,000. A building committee, consisting of Messrs. J. H. Campbell, J. H. Gordon, F. Morse, William Pitt, and W. W. McKim, was appointed and plans, submitted by Mr. Frank E. Davis, architect of Baltimore, were adopted. In May, 1871, the old church property on Liberty street was sold to the German Reformed congregation of Cumberland for the sum of $5,000. The new edifice was not made until June, 1872. The building site is designated as "Zion's lot," and the corner-stone of the new church took place July 4th, 1871. The ministers present on the occasion were Rev. Drs. Smith and Leyburn, of Baltimore; Rev. L. N. Hays, of Chambersburg, Pa., and Revs. Fitzgerald and Leech, of Cumberland.

In April, 1873, the Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald resigned the pastoral relation. On the 14th of July the congregation unanimously elected Rev. E. B. Kuffenberger to the pastorate. The present pastor, the Rev. J. E. Moffat, began his pastorate in 1878. The membership of the church at present is 254.

First Central Presbyterian Church, of Denver, Colorado. The First Presbyterian Church of Denver, Colorado, was organized December 15th, 1861, by Rev. A. S. Billingsley, acting under a commission from the Board of Domestic Missions, O. S. The services were held in International Hall, on Ferry street, West Denver, then known as "Auraria." Eighteen members—seven males, eleven females—were enrolled. Simon Cort and John Irvine were elected ruling elders. Mr. Billingsley remained with the church only four months, until April, 1862. The little church was then without a pastor until November, 1862, when the ministrations of Rev. A. R. Day, a son-in-law of Elder Cort, began. Mr. Day was then supported in part by the same Board of Missions. He at once agitated the subject of a church building. Major John S. Fillmore, P. M., U. S. A., an Episcopalian, donated a lot 40 x 100 feet, on the northwest corner of the alley between Lawrence and Arrapahoe streets on Fifteenth street; and citizens of all denominations and classes contributed generously towards the erection of the building. The Home Mission Board donated $600 in aid of the enterprise, and a brick structure, 37 x 65 feet, plain but neat, and sufficiently commodious for the time, was begun in 1863, and dedicated in the Spring of 1864.

February, 1865, Mr. Day resigned, and during the ensuing months the pulpit was again vacant. Rev. J. B. McClure, of Fulton, Ill., became pastor in October, 1865, acting until October, 1867; supported in part by the Board of Domestic Missions. Again the pulpit was left vacant until March, 1868, when it was supplied by A. Y. Moore, of South Bend, Ind., for two months, when, not realizing the expected aid previously granted by the Board, Mr. Moore returned to his home. Another six months' vacancy of the pulpit, and the necessary withholding of mission funds conspired to dishearten the little flock. Hitherto the church had enjoyed no connection with any Presbytery, although, with its supposed geographical within the jurisdiction of the Presbytery of Manhattan, Kansas, its pastors having retained their former connections, no dog tags nor reports were sent to any Presbytery, until August 10th, 1869, when the church was received by the Presbytery of Chicago, from which it came by vote into the Presbytery of Colorado, August 10th, 1870.

The church was incorporated according to the laws of Colorado, November 20th, 1868. Its membership was made up of those who had been received by letter from both branches of the Presbyterian Church and from other orthodox denominations. Failing to obtain necessary assistance and encouragement from the O. S. Presbyterian Board, on account of its embarrassed condition, a correspondence was at once opened with the N. S. Presbyterian Board, resulting in the church being visited by Rev. E. P. Wells (who had just been commissioned to Cheyenne, Wyoming), to whom the church extended a call through the Presbytery of Chicago; also asking to be enrolled as belonging to that Presbytery: this was granted and Mr. Wells installed pastor of the church, by Rev. J. H. Trowbridge and Rev. J. H. Taylor, Committee of the Presbytery of Chicago, Sunday evening, November 28th, 1868.

Mr. Wells continued pastor of the church for six years, greatly beloved by his people, and peculiarly successful in pastoral labors among them. During his ministrations there were added to the original number, upon confession of faith, 99; by certificate, 197. The church received aid from the N. S. Board for two years, becoming self-supporting in 1871. In 1871, by virtue of an agreement with a sister church, whereby each should adopt a new and different name, it became known as the Central Presbyterian Church. Rev. Mr. Wells resigned January 1st, 1875, to accept a call to Chicago, and was succeeded by Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., February, 1875. The necessity of a new church edifice had been much felt and discussed during the two or three years preceding Mr. Wells' resignation, resulting in definite action early in Dr. Lord's pastorate.

In May, 1875, lots were purchased on the corner of Champa and Eighteenth streets, the present site, 100 x 125 feet, at a cost of $6250. A meeting to devise ways and means was called May 14th; about $20,000 were at once subscribed. A building committee to co-operate with the Board of Trustees was selected. Plans for the new building, drawn by R. S. Roeschlaub, were adopted at a meeting held May 17th.

May 25th the ladies of the church organized what has since been known as "The Ladies' Organ Fund Society." Aside from the primary object of their organization, they have paid over to the general building fund upwards of $2000.

A contract for the erection of the church, leaving the main auditorium and spire incomplete, was awarded to Kelsey & Evans, October 9th, 1875, at a cost of $32,000. The ceremony of laying the cornerstone took place at two o'clock, P.M., Thursday, January 6th, 1876.

During Dr. Lord's pastorate the old church building proved too small, and for a time the congregation worshiped in Guard Hall. Severe illness during the Winter occasioned Dr. Lord's resignation, in the Spring of 1876. Work upon the new building was hastened, though in the face of much discouragement.

The Rev. Alexander Reed, D. D., having been chosen pastor, arrived from Brooklyn, N. Y., October 25th, 1876, and upon the following Sabbath, October 29th, the first service was held in the new lecture room, Dr. Reed officiating. The Spring of 1877 found the congregation in a much embarrassed condition financially, in debt about $13,000, and painfully in need of the main auditorium. A stranger, Edward F. Kimball, now so distinguished in the Master's vineyard, unexpectedly appeared among the people of the congregation, and upon Sabbath, April 1st, 1877, assisted by the earnest appeals of the pastor, the case was so presented that, subsequently, $30,000 were subscribed.

A contract was let to W. J. Evans for the completion of the work, excepting the spire. Services were held in the new auditorium, Sunday, January 13th, 1878, Dr. Reed preaching in the morning, and Dr. F. M. Ellis, pastor of the Baptist church, in the evening.

The total cost of the building and lots to date is about $50,000.

The rotary system of eldership was entered upon, by action of the congregation, in October, 1872. The board of deacons was formed November 9th, 1873. The first Church Clerk was elected October 18th, 1871.

Dr. Reed, in the prosperity and promise of his pastorate, died, greatly lamented. He was succeeded by the Rev. H. C. Westwood, D.D., who spent two years of very successful pastoral work in the city. On the first Sabbath of August, 1871, Rev. George P. Hays, D.D., began work as pastor. The debt was paid off the following winter. Three colonies have since gone out from the congregation, forming the Thirteenth Avenue Church, Westminster Church and Highland Church. It supports a mission school, sewing school and Chinese Sabbath school. Its annual financial operations for benevolent and home expenses amount to from $25,000 to $30,000.

First Presbyterian Church, Elizabeth, New Jersey. On the night of the 25th of January, 1780, the church edifice which stood upon the spot on which the present house of worship stands was destroyed by fire. Tradition relates that the firing of the building was the act of Cornelius Hetfield, Jr., a Tory refugee, whose father had been a trustee, and was then an honored elder of the church. As the renegade son had destroyed the church edifice, so the father opened the doors of a large "Red Storehouse," on the south side of the creek, near West Water street, that belonged to him, which was fitted up for the purpose and used thenceforward as a meeting-house.

Some idea of the external appearance of the church building which was destroyed may be formed from a description given by Captain William C. De Hart, in his "Passages in the History of Elizabethtown:" "The Court House was a small, frame, shingle-covered building, which had never been adorned with paint, and in the same condition and style of architecture was the adjacent building, the Presbyterian meeting house, both of which respectively occupied the ground whereon now stand the structures devoted to the same object. The church was ornamented by a steeple surmounted by a ball and weathercock, furnished also with a clock. It was the most conspicuous and the most valuable building in the town, hallowed as the structure in which their pilgrim fathers worshiped God, and in which they themselves, so many of them, had been consecrated to God in baptism, and in which the great and revered Dickinson, the honored Spencer, and the still more renowned Whitefield, had preached God's word."

There is good reason for believing that the General Assemblies held under the Proprietors sat in this house, and that so also did the Supreme Court. In 1767 the pulpit was ornamented by the ladies with an "elegant set of curtains, which cost twenty-seven pounds sterling." For many years there was a part of the church not seated, probably reserved as a lobby for the accommodation of those who attended the Legislature and the Courts. The precise date at which the first church edifice was erected on this spot cannot be ascertained. In the early settlement of the town, the "town-house" and the "meeting-house" were one. It is more than probable that one of the first public concerns of the original Associates was the building of their "meeting-house." As early as February 19th, 1665, they held a "meeting-court," at which the whole town was present, and sixty-five men took the oath of allegiance and fidelity to King Charles II. A house of worship had most likely been built before this date; nothing can now certainly be determined as to its size, cost or arrangement.

In a letter addressed to the Elizabeth Daily Journal, of May 12th, 1873, the Rev. Dr. E. F. Hatfield, into whose possession an original document had recently come, purporting to be an agreement or contract between the building committee of the congregation and the carpenters by whom the old meeting house, that was burnt down in 1780, was built, and bearing date 1723-4, A. D.; Dr. Hatfield, in referring to this document, says: "It will thus be seen that the house was built in the Summer of 1724, and was 58 feet in length and 42 in width, and that the audience room was 24 feet in height. . . . An addition to the length in the rear, of 16 feet, was made in 1766 so that its final dimensions were 74 by 42 feet."

The lot on which the house was built included the present burying-ground, and extended on the West to the river (so called), and contained about eight acres. When the Church property was surveyed, in 1766, the Trustees affirmed "that the first purchasers and associates did give the aforesaid tract of land for the use of the Presbyterian Church, the record of which, on or about the year 1719, was either lost or destroyed." This statement was admitted by the Town Committee, and has constituted the only title of record to the present church property for over a century and a half. The meeting-house occupied the site of the present church, but, as it was much smaller, it did not cover much if any more than the front half, the other half containing the graves of most of the first settlers. Graves were sometimes dug under the floor of the church, a custom familiar to the early settlers, and made dear by association with the habits of their ancestors in England, so that nearly the whole area of the First Church at Elizabeth is probably occupied with the dust, which awaits the archangel's trump, of the first two or three generations of the people of the town. It is probable that for a long time the church and adjoining burial-ground was not enclosed, or if at all, only in a rude way. In 1762, immediately after the settlement of Rev. Mr. Caldwell, it was voted by the Trustees that "the burial-ground be enclosed with a close, cedar-board fence; also agreed that a neat pale fence be built to enclose a court-yard in the front and south end of the church."

Some idea of the appearance of the interior of the church at the time it was destroyed may be gathered from the directions given by the Trustees to the new sexton, William Woodruff, elected March, 1766: "Once every three months the alleys below the pulpit stairs and gallery stairs must be washed out and well sanded. For evening lectures you are to get the candles, such as the Trustees shall direct, and illuminate the church in every part, and at the conclusion of prayer before sermon, you are immediately to go up and snuff the pulpit candles and the rest of the candles in the church. When you judge the sermon to be about half finished, you are once more to snuff the candles in the pulpit, and at the Clerk's desk." (The most serious objection to this rule would be the suspicion that the sexton might be open to outside influences to snuff the candles prematurely.) "You are to be very careful of the silk hangings and cushions, that they receive no injury by dust spots. You are to see that the pulpit door be always opened, ready for the minister's entrance, and the Bible opened on the cushion. You are to prevent, as much as in you lies, all undue noises and disorders, and suffer no white boys or girls to be standing or sitting on the gallery or pulpit stairs; and if at any time you cannot prevent unruly behavior during divine service, you are immediately to step to one of the magistrates or elders present, and inform them of the same. You are weekly to wind up and regulate the church clock." Such was the venerable church edifice in its external and internal appearance and in its surroundings. "The church in which Caldwell preached," says Dr. Murray, in his notes, "was cheerfully yielded as a hospital for sick and disabled and wounded soldiers, as some of the aged ones yet among us testify; it was its bell that sounded through the town the notes of alarm on the approach of the foe; its floor was not unfrequently the bed of the weary soldier, and the seats of its pews the table from which he ate his scanty meal."

It cannot be determined with exactness who served the people as pastor, or the pulpit supply, for the first few years of the first settlement of the place. Dr. Hatfield says: "It is safe to conclude that Mr. Jeremiah Peck came to this town, from Newark, as early as 1668, on invitation of the people, to serve them in the ministry of the gospel, and that he is to be regarded as the first pastor of the church in this place." In the Autumn of 1678 he accepted a call to Greenwich, Conn. He was succeeded, in 1680, by Rev. Seth Fletcher. He came from Southampton, and became minister of this town in the Summer or Autumn of 1680. His death occurred in August, 1682. For five years subsequent to his death the church was without a pastor. On September 30th, 1687, the Rev. John Harriman was installed pastor of this church; he died here in August, 1705, and his monument stands in the churchyard. Soon after his entering on the pastoral work here, he opened an account with every one of the subscribers to his support. These accounts were kept in two books; the second, from 1694 to 1705, is now in possession of the Session. The whole number of actual subscribers was one hundred and twenty-four. The subscriptions amounted to £83 Hs. 0d. A very small part only of the subscriptions were paid in cash; the most of them are credited with produce, meat, grain and vegetables; many of them with labor by the day, on the farm, or in building or repairing his house or barn. The work of a pastor was evidently not so circumscribed as at the present day. Besides preaching, pastoral visitation, farming, carrying on a flour mill and a cider press, Mr. Harriman had an agency for furnishing glass to his neighbors. He surveyed lands now and then, he attended the Legislature, as a deputy, through four years, and, like most of his profession in those days, he kept a boarding-school; he dealt also considerably in real estate.

Mr. Harriman was succeeded as pastor by the Rev. Samuel Melyen. The ministry of Mr. Melyen was short. On the 29th of September, 1709, Jonathan Dickinson was ordained and installed as pastor of this church. (See his sketch.) Previous to Mr. Dickinson's settlement as pastor, this church had been independent or Congregational in its form of government; not until forty years after its organization was the first Presbytery, the Presbytery of Philadelphia, constituted. Dickinson, whose sympathies were probably quite decidedly with Presbyterianism, proceeded with a wise caution in the matter of bringing his church into connection with Presbytery, for his people "were thorough Puritans and men of spirit, and slow to part with what they conceived to be their rights." It is probable that he united with the Presbytery of Philadelphia in the Spring of 1717, and that the church soon after joined the same Presbytery. In the following year, September 19th, 1718, it is noted in the records of Synod that "Mr. Dickinson delivered one pound, twelve shillings from his congregation of Elizabeth Town for the fund for pious uses." "This," says Dr. Hatfield, "was undoubtedly the first contribution for Presbyterian purposes ever made by this congregation." The church was represented in Synod for the first time in 1721, by one of their elders, Robert Ogden, a grandson of "Old John Ogden."

The Rev. Elisha Spencer began to supply the pulpit in the Spring of 1749. He remained pastor about seven years. Soon after his departure, Rev. Abraham Kettletas supplied the pulpit. His ministry continued nearly three and a half years. The accounts of the treasurer of the congregation, Samuel Woodruff, show that the salary of Mr. Kettletas was paid by regular weekly contributions on the Sabbath. Mr. Kettletas resigned his pastoral charge in July, 1760, and was succeeded, after a vacancy in the pulpit of a year and a half, by the Rev. James Caldwell, who took so signal a part in the War of the Revolution. Mr. Caldwell was a Virginian, born in Charlotte county, in what was then a wilderness, in April, 1731. A niece of his was the mother of the Hon. John Caldwell Calhoun, of South Carolina, the well-known Senator and prominent Statesman of the South. (See Mr. Caldwell's sketch.) The parish of Mr. Caldwell included the whole of Elizabethtown, and the town included nearly the whole of the present Union county; the towns of Union, Springfield, New Providence, Westfield, Plainfield, Rahway, Linden and Clark, having since been organized out of the ancient territorial domain of Elizabethtown. The old church book shows that, in 1776, there were three hundred and forty-five pew-renters and subscribers in the congregation. The ruling elders at that time were Cornelius Heatfield, John Potter, Samuel Williams and Benjamin Winans; Isaac Woodruff, Jonathan Williams, Caleb Halstead, David Ogden, Isaac Arnett, Jonathan Price, trustees. In the congregation, at the opening of the Revolution, were such men as William Livingston, the noble Governor of the State, who, through a storm of obloquy from some of his former friends, and of bitter and unrelenting hatred and plottings against his life on the part of the Tories and the British, remained steadfast in his devotion to the cause of freedom, to the final victory; and Elias Bondinot, whose sketch is elsewhere given.

In the congregation at this time also, was Abraham Clark, one of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence; he had long been a member of the church, and was one of its trustees from 1786 to 1790. He was chosen seven times as a delegate from New Jersey to the Continental Congress. Here, also, were the Hon. Robert Ogden (Speaker of the Assembly at an earlier day), with his three sons, Robert, Mattinias and Aaron, the last two distinguished officers in the U. S. Army; the Hon. Stephen Crane, speaker of the Assembly; Elias Dayton, and his son, Jonathan, both of them subsequently general officers of the army, and the latter Speaker of Congress; William Peartree Smith, one of the most distinguished civilians of the day; Oliver Spencer and Francis Barber, both of them colonels of the Jersey Brigade, from whom General Maxwell, Commandant of the Brigade, received on all occasions, and some of them of a trying nature, most zealous and efficient co-operation; and other such devoted patriots, not a few. From this one congregation went forth over forty commissioned officers of the Continental Army, not to speak of non-commissioned officers and privates, to fight the battles of Independence.

Mr. Caldwell's successors in the pastorate of the First Church of Elizabeth were, the Rev. Mr. Kollock, Dr. John McDowell, Dr. Nicholas Murray and Dr. Everard Kempshall, all of whom are noticed elsewhere in this volume.

"It is related," says Dr. Kempshall, in his "Historical Sketch" of the Church (1880), "that from the time of commencing the work of erecting the church in which we are now assembled, down to its dedication, in an unfinished state, that is from July, 1781, to January, 1786, the congregation were visited with a special outpouring of the Spirit of God. And from that day on to this hour, God, the God of the covenant, the "God of their fathers," has gone before this people, leading them on from generation to generation, in the way of loving kindness and tender mercy; granting to them the inestimable blessing of dwelling together in "the unity of the Spirit and in the bond of peace;" renewing, from time to time, those seasons of spiritual harvesting after years of patient sowing of the seed of divine truth; and permitting us in this day and generation to be so richly the recipients of blessings, temporal and spiritual, vouchsafed to us in answer to the prayers, bequeathed as a precious legacy, of God-fearing, Christ-loving men and women who, through two centuries have worshiped God on this sacred spot, and having served their day and generation have "fallen on sleep."

First Presbyterian Church, Leavenworth, Kansas. The first sermon ever delivered in Leavenworth, by a Presbyterian minister, was in the Summer of 1855, by the Rev. B. M. Hobson, of Lexington, Mo. The city was just one year old. There was no church building, and the sermon was given from a dry goods box on a street corner. The church was organized, January 1st, 1856, with nine members, by the Rev. C. D. Martin, a missionary of the O. S. Board. It was the first white man's Presbyterian Church in the State; being preceded only by two Indian mission organizations. There was little done until 1857, when the Rev. A. W. Pitzer, D. D., now of Washington, D. C., then a young theological student of Danville Seminary, accepted a call to its pastorate and began his labors in August of that year. A building was erected and dedicated before he came; Sabbath school organized, August 23d, 1857, with 6 teachers and 18 scholars. Mr. Pitzer was ordained, January, 1858, by the Presbytery of Highland, being the first Presbyterian minister ever ordained in Kansas. He remained until 1861, when he resigned his pastorate and cast his lot with the Southern cause. 113 members had been received under him. The church remained vacant until October, 1862, when Rev. William A. Starrett came from Princeton Theological Seminary and supplied for six months. The pulpit was then vacant until June, 1863, when the Rev. George S. Woodward became the pastor. The church prospered greatly under this beloved man. In March, 1867, the First and the Westminster churches were united, keeping their two pastors, Rev. Mr. Woodward and Rev. Dr. J. G. Reaser. In December, 1867, Mr. Woodward resigned, because of failing health, and on December 30th, 1867, the church was divided into its two original parts, the First Church returning to its old building. Rev. William L. Green was called as pastor. Membership now was 160. Mr. Green resigned in October, 1869. In May, 1870, the Rev. William R. Brown was installed pastor. The present commodious church building was erected and dedicated, October 22d, 1871. Over 70 members were added to the rolls of the church. Mr. Brown was obliged to resign his charge by ill health, on February 2d, 1873. The membership was 163 at this time. Rev. William N. Page, D. D., the present pastor, was called June 29th, 1873, and installed, December 7th, 1873. It is the largest and strongest Presbyterian Church in the State, with a membership of 388 and a Sabbath school of 400 members.

First Presbyterian Church, Topeka, Kansas. On December 19th, 1859, Rev. A. T. Rankin, of Highland Presbytery, organized this church at the house of Mr. John Jackson, the members consisting of eight males and nine females. A session was held February 15th, 1860, for securing the right of corporation. The first house of worship was situated on the east side of Kansas avenue, between Seventh and Eighth streets. Rev. Mr. Steele became pastor in 1860. The first letter granted to this church was that of Mrs. Sylvia Blake, from the North Church of St. Louis, Mo., to Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and thence to Topeka; recorded December 23d, 1861. Rev. Mr. Steele died October 12th, 1864, aged sixty-two years. From this date to November, 1865, the church was without regular services. Rev. S. T. McClure, of Vincennes, Ind., a licentiate, came and remained four months. April 5th, 1866, there was a regular call given to Rev. John Ekin, D. D., of the Presbytery of Miami, Ohio. He was installed November 6th, 1866. There were then thirty-seven members. The new chapel, on Eighth and Kansas avenues, was opened November 5th, 1867. November 28th, 1868, Rev. F. S. McCabe came to the church, and January 1st, 1869, was made pastor, which place he filled till April 16th, 1882. October 15th, 1882, Rev. H. W. George, of Geneva, Ill., was called to this church, and January, 1883, was installed. The present membership is about 100.

First Presbyterian Church, Wheeling, West Virginia. So far as can be ascertained, the first regular preaching by any Christian denomination in Wheeling, then a small village, was commenced by the Rev. James Hervey, a Presbyterian minister, about the close of the year 1812. In that year he was licensed to preach the gospel, and soon afterward began to labor in the Forks of Wheeling Church, and in the town of Wheeling.

It is said that when he began preaching in Wheeling there were but three members of the Presbyterian Church here. He continued to preach, for a number of years, on alternate Sabbaths, in these two places. Having no house of worship in the village, a small house on the corner of Market alley, and sometimes the Court House, was occupied as the place of meeting. But in the meanwhile the population of the town was increasing, and then first the Methodists, and next the Episcopalians began to arrive, and each to provide for services according to their order. In this state of things it became apparent to the Presbyterians that they ought not to remain satisfied without a more complete organization, for, thus far, they had preaching only every alternate Sabbath.

The Rev. William Wylie, then preaching at West Liberty, was consequently engaged to supply them the other half of the time, in connection with the Rev. James Hervey. This arrangement seemed, for the time being, to meet the wants of the people, but in the end it brought trouble.

In the old Session book is the following record: "The Presbyterian Congregation in the town of Wheeling was first organized at a public meeting held on Thursday evening, September 4th, 1823; Colonel Archibald Woods, Chairman, and James H. Forsyth, Secretary. The meeting was opened and closed with prayer, by the Rev. James Hervey.

"Original Trustees, Charles D. Knox, Alexander Caldwell, D. B. Bayless, John Laughlin, James H. Forsyth; Thomas Woods, Treasurer; Redick McKee, Secretary."

The congregation was thus incorporated under a Board of Trustees, but it was nearly three years afterward before ruling elders were elected; for the next record we have is this: "The Presbyterian Church in the town of Wheeling, under the pastoral care of the Rev. James Hervey and the Rev. William Wylie, was first organized by the Rev. Elisha McCurdy, agreeably to an order of Presbytery, on Friday, the 26th day of May, 1826.

"Elders elected—Andrew Woods, Sr., Peter W. Gale, Redick McKee."

The original number of members of the church was forty-four, of whom, so far as is known, Redick

McKee, Esq., is the only one now living. (See his sketch.)

On April 15th, 1829, a call was made by the congregation for the pastoral services of Rev. James Hervey. But, evidently, this call was not accepted, for on May 15th, 1830, as the old Session book shows, "the Rev. William Wylie was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church." This pastorate, however, did not continue long, for manifestly there was want of harmony and unity of action among the Presbyterians of the town. They were evidently divided, for the next record that appears is in this language:—

"A meeting, composed of the First and Second Presbyterian congregations of the town of Wheeling, was held at the Presbyterian Meeting House, on Monday evening, 26th September, A. D., 1831, agreeably to the recommendation of the joint committee of the aforesaid congregations."

At this joint meeting of the congregations action was taken requesting Presbytery to dissolve the two congregations and reorganize a new one. In compliance with this request, the Washington Presbytery, at its meeting in Wheeling, October 5th, 1831, formally dissolved the two congregations and in their stead formally erected a new congregation, with the style and denomination of the Presbyterian Congregation of Wheeling.

The new Board of Trustees elected was composed of the following gentlemen: Thomas Woods, Treasurer; James W. Clemens, Secretary; Samuel McClellan, James McConnell, H. French, Archibald S. Todd, Redick McKee and John Ritchie. And on February 4th, 1832, John C. Bayless, Nathaniel Peppard and Redick McKee were elected and installed ruling elders. These, however, resigned or withdrew soon after, and in their places were chosen and installed, on the 11th of April, 1832, N. W. Smith, John Laughlin and Sturley Cutlbert. On the 26th of January, 1834, John C. Bayless and N. Peppard were installed elders. (See the sketches of Rev. James Hervey, D. D., and Rev. William Wylie, D. D.)

The Rev. Henry R. Weed, of the Presbytery of Albany, N. Y., was unanimously elected pastor of the church, February 5th, 1833. For reasons which were satisfactory to himself, he did not at once accept the call, but served as stated supply of the church for more than two years. He was installed as pastor, June 16th, 1835. He continued in the constant and faithful discharge of the duties of his office for many years. In 1860, beginning to feel his physical strength giving way under the weight of increasing years, he suggested to the Session the propriety of calling a co-pastor. In January, 1861, the Rev. John J. Baker, of Augusta county, Va., accepted a call to the office of co-pastor of the church, and commenced and continued to discharge the duties of his office in a satisfactory manner, from March 1st, 1861, until July 1st, following, when he resigned.

The Rev. D. W. Fisher was installed as co-pastor on the first Sabbath of June, 1862. Soon afterward the Rev. Dr. Weed removed to West Philadelphia, where, on December 14th, 1870, he "fell asleep in Jesus." (See his sketch.) Dr. Fisher served the church faithfully and successfully until April, 1876, when, at his own request, the pastoral relation was dissolved. The Rev. David A. Cunningham was installed pastor of the church, October 6th, 1876, and still continues in this relation, beloved by his people, and largely blessed in his labors.

First Presbyterian Church, Williamsport, Pa.
At the sessions of the Presbytery of Northumberland, held in Warrior Run Meeting House, October 3d, 1832, there was presented an application by the members of "Lycoming Church," living east of Lycoming Creek, for the organization of a church to be known as the "First Church of Williamsport." The request was granted, and Presbytery accordingly passed an ordinance, setting off from the Lycoming Church those members living east of Lycoming Creek. On February 9th, 1833, the Rev. Daniel M. Barber, by appointment of Presbytery, organized this church, with an enrollment of thirty-six members. During the first nine years of its existence the congregation worshiped in an old stone building situated on Third street, between Pine and Williams streets, and was served by the following ministers who were stated supplies, viz.: Revs. Daniel M. Barber, Phineas B. Marr and Samuel S. Shedden.

In the year 1838 the Rev. John P. Hudson was elected and installed the first pastor, and has been followed successively by the Revs. E. Bradbury, Alexander Heberton, William Simington, George F. Cain and S. E. Webster. The first Session assumed the Episcopal functions of the eldership on the day of the organization of the church, February 23d, 1833. Alexander Sloan, John B. Hall, Andrew D. Hepburn and John Torbert constituted this Session.

On the 13th day of April, 1841, articles of agreement were made between John Bennet, Jr., Charles Hepburn, Thomas Bennet, Samuel Lloyd and Herman C. Platt, building committee, and David Simpler and Jacob Meekley, builders, to erect a "meeting house to be used for religious worship," on the lot of ground conveyed and confirmed by Andrew D. Hepburn to said Presbyterian congregation, by deed, dated the 2d day of March, A. D. 1841," said lot being on the corner of Market street and Tom alley. Among the subscribers to this first edifice are found the honored names of Watson, Ellis, Bennet, Elliot, Vanderbelt, Hepburn, Packer, Gibson, Hays, Williams, Coryell, Allen, Grier, Carothers, Cummings, Huling, Pollock, Hall, Sloan, Burrows, Updegraff, Huston, Fleming, McCormick and Gamble. This church was burned April 6th, in the year 1849, and rebuilt in the same year. It was again burned May 16th, 1859, and was rebuilt and dedicated October 19th of the same year.

The number of additions to the church since the organization has been 911. The present number of communicants in actual attendance is 370. The largest additions, by examination, have been made in their chronological order as follows: In the years 1855, 1866, 1876, 1881 and 1882. During these periods the Spirit of God was manifestly present in the congregation, with unusual power.

The Sabbath school of the church was organized in June, 1827. It then had an existence before the organization of the church, and has grown from a very small beginning to the large and flourishing school that it is, with a membership of two hundred and fifty. Here, for years, the children were trained by faithful teachers, and from under its influence have grown up men and women who are now an honor to the church. Besides the parent school, there is a mission, now known by the honored name of Finley Sunday school. It was opened in the north-eastern part of the city, in the year 1860, and a chapel for its accommodation built by the liberality of the congregation, and this was the first mission organized by any congregation in the city. The school has a membership of more than four hundred and fifty.

On the evening of November 24th, 1880, this congregation convened for the purpose of considering the subject of erecting a new church, and decided to build. A lot was chosen, on the corner of Third and Mulberry streets, and on the evening of July 7th, 1882, the corner-stone was laid, with appropriate ceremonies. The pastor, Rev. S. E. Webster, preached an appropriate and impressive commemorative sermon, in the Old First Church, to a crowded house, September 30th, 1883, and on the second Sabbath of the next month the new building, which cost $65,000, was dedicated to the worship of God, without a dollar of incumbrance. On the evening of that day a large congregation was present. Brief remarks were made by the Hon. R. P. Allen, in which he referred to the growth of Presbyterianism in that Valley, and gave many reminiscences of the First Presbyterian Church. Mr. Allen was followed by Messrs O. H. Reighard, James M. Gamble and John K. Hays, Esq.

The church which the congregation has since occupied is a very large and beautiful edifice. It has a frontage of one hundred and forty-six feet on one street and seventy feet on the other. A large square tower, surmounted by a spire, stands on the corner. The tower rises to a height of seventy-five feet, and the spire surmounting it is about one hundred feet in height. The internal arrangements of the building are very tasteful and complete. The Rev. Mr. Webster, the present pastor of the congregation, entered upon his duties here in August, 1880, and there has been a growth of membership, to the number of one hundred and eighty, during the past three and a half years.

Fish, Charles Hull, was the third child of Rev. John B. and Lucia Hull Fish, and was born August 3d, 1830, at Sidney Plains, Delaware County, N. Y. His grandfather, Rev. Peter Fish, was widely known in his day. His brother Edward is at present pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Gilroy, Cal. Mr. Fish spent the early years of his life, until the age of nineteen, in business at Sidney Plains. He came to California in 1852, and was engaged in mining until 1857, when he returned East. In the Spring of 1858 he started for Pike's Peak, and came through to Virginia City, Nev., where he held the office of County Recorder for twelve years. From 1871 to 1875 he lived upon his ranch near Santa Barbara, Cal., when he took charge of the Bonanza mines, as Secretary, with his office at San Francisco. In 1876 he was made President of "The Consolidated Virginia Mining Company," and has held that office to the present time.

Mr. Fish was for five years superintendent of the Sabbath school and elder of the Presbyterian Church in Virginia City; superintendent of the Sabbath school and elder of Howard Presbyterian Church, of San Francisco; and for the last six years has been superintendent of the Sabbath School of the Second Presbyterian Church of Oakland, Cal., and deacon and elder in the First Presbyterian Church of the same place. Mr. Fish is one of nature's favorites by constitution and temperament, regarded to be popular and successful. A singularly well-balanced mind and character, he is quick and clear in his perceptions, prompt in action and thorough in execution, an example of the genius of common sense; and yet he is imaginative, reflective and deeply spiritual, appreciating the beautiful in nature and art, entering with zest into philosophic thought, and is almost mystic in religious feeling and experience. But the traits of character which have attracted hosts of friends, and made him one of the most widely known men on the Pacific coast, are his sterling honesty, abundant good nature, boundless benevolence and a true charity. No good cause appears to him in vain, and a case of want or suffering needs his aid. What he says of himself, Job xxxix, 11-17, describes Mr. Fish.

Finn, William, D. D. Dr. Finn's parents were both of the sturdy race of Puritanism, commonly called Scotch-Irish. His father was an old father of the distinguished Andrew Finn, who, in the early part of the present century, was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S. C. The subject of this notice was born in 1818, in the vicinity of Charleston, N. C. After attending the academy prepared to be entered Davidson College, at or soon after our normal graduation was proclaimed in 1840, in the first class near and in Blountton. His theological course was taken in the Seminary at Columbia, S. C. In 1848, he was licensed by the Charleston Presbytery, and in November, 1848, he was ordained by the Presbytery of Tusculum, and installed pastor of the church at Demopolis, Ala. He removed to Milledgeville, Ga., in 1854, and served the Church there until 1869, when he became pastor of the Third Street, now the "Memorial" Church, in New Orleans. His health being impaired by the climate, he took charge of Stuart College, Clarksville, Tenn., in the interest of the Southwestern Presbyterian University. In 1882 he removed to Mobile, where he now resides, as pastor of the Jackson Street Church.

Dr. Finn is a thoroughly evangelical, an able and instructive preacher. His mind being analytical through its native impulses, his preaching is largely expository. He delights in tracing the logical relations of one truth to another, and in connecting every link which binds it to the doctrine in which it is founded. Partly from this tendency of his mental habits, and partly from a fondness and aptitude for logic—in the wide sense of the term—his discourses are addressed to the understanding and the conscience rather than to the imagination or the emotions. They are, however, interesting as well as profitable to both classes of his hearers—to the more intellectual, from the imagination and food for reflection they afford; to the less intellectual, from the logical arrangement and expression of the thoughts; and to all from the valuable lessons in truth and duty they contain. Owing to self-diffidence, or some similar obstacle, he has not, to the extent that is desired, given to the public, through the medium of the press, the fruits of his talent and scholarship; nor has he aspired to that prominence in the higher circles of the Church which some much inferior to him in qualifications have attained. He is, however, regarded by all who are acquainted with his worth, as an ornament of the Southern Church.

Florida Missions in. The First Presbyterian Church in East Florida was organized by William M. Whit, in 1848, at St. Augustine. He had for many years been laboring in Georgia, in the counties to the South of Savannah, but in consequence of a representation of the destitution of the means of grace in this field, was induced to visit it. He accordingly organized a Presbyterian Church, ordained elders, at Demopolis, in collecting the requisite funds for building a church here, and in due time had the pleasure of seeing his object accomplished.

At the same time, this recently-acquired territory, through the persistent minister within its bounds. A mass meeting of the Methodist Church had been held here, and called for Rev. Eleazer Leitch, pastor of this church in St. Augustine, and within a few days, on his way to New York, in the Spring of 1848, on other funds, he had the honor of the Presbytery of South Carolina, which he had ministered to in the State of South Carolina and Virginia, to visit his congregation and reside; and it seems probable that the mission of M. Whit was occasioned by the representations of Mr. Lathrop. The importance of aid for the erection of a place of worship was obvious, and both M. Whit and Lathrop were active and energetic in their applications for help. The list was appointed, prompt to its return from his collecting tour, by the Missionary Board of the Assembly, to labor in the field in which he had become so deeply interested. He spent months of labor in 1824 at St. Augustine, and two in Pensacola.

The church of St. Augustine was for several years the only one in East Florida. It stood connected with Charleston Union Presbytery, and was, jointly, with the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia. After Mr. Lathrop left on account of ill health it was supplied by E. H. Snowden, sent out and sustained by the American Home Missionary Society. He commenced his labors in 1831. The Sabbath after his arrival the Presbyterian congregation convened for the first time, in the new building which in 50 years they had been engaged in erecting, and which afforded them "very pleasant accommodations." For almost ten years they "had been in the wilderness, without rest, shelter," and it was becoming them at last to be permitted to worship in their own tabernacle.

The Sabbath school, previously languishing, was revived. An advance was manifest in morals and religion. In the surrounding country other Sunday schools were instituted; and Mr. Snowden writes, "I hope you will send a missionary to Florida, but I would advise none to come who cannot endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ."

In 1837 a church of seven members was reported at Mandarin, and one of fifty-one members at Tallahassee.

In 1842 the Presbytery of Florida reported eleven ministers and twenty churches, with a membership of seven hundred and eighty-seven, and the Presbytery of St. Johns eight ministers and sixteen churches, with a membership of four hundred and ninety-two.

Foot, John Alfred. was born in New Haven Conn., November 2d, 1840. Few men can point back to a more worthy ancestry than Mr. Foot. His great-grandfather was Rev. John Hall, and his grandfather, Rev. John Foot. They were distinguished clergymen of their age, and one after the other they held the office of pastor of the Congregational Church in Cheshire, Conn. for the long period of one hundred years. His father was successively a representative in Congress, governor of Connecticut, and United States Senator. While in the Senate he introduced the resolution upon public lands which brought up the great debate between Hays and Webster. Mr. Foot is a brother of the late Admiral Andrew Hull Foot, of distinguished naval fame. He graduated at Yale College at the age of twenty years, studied law at Albany, N. Y., and practiced that profession at Cheshire for seven years. At the age of thirty he removed to Cleveland, O., and formed a law partnership with the late Sherlock J. Andrews and James M. H. W. The firm became distinguished throughout Northern Ohio for the amount of business done, and of its honorable character. He was a member of the Ohio branch of the House of Representatives, and of the State Senate. For more than twenty years he was one of the three commissioners of the State Railroad, and visited similar institutions in other States and in Europe, to learn their practices.

He came to Cleveland one year before the settlement of the late Dr. Samuel C. Aiken, and for nearly fifty years has been an elder in the First or 2000 Second Church. His religious character has ever been above question, and very few men of his profession have been so active in Christian work. In Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly, he has many times been a distinguished member. His addresses are oftentimes exceedingly animated, with sufficient humor to excite most pleasing interest. Though he has passed his fifty-two years, he is in robust health, can read and write without glasses, and as full of animal vigor when he graduated from a College twenty years ago. Though his residence is two miles from his church, no member is more regular in attendance, both morning and evening. The weekly prayer-meeting with no John A. Foot in it would be a decided novelty. In proportion to his ability he is a liberal contributor to all religious and charitable purposes. If left to popular choice, the vote that Mr. Foot should live eighty years longer would be unanimous.

Foster, Rev. Edward P. is the oldest child of William and W. A. Powell Foster, and was born at Bloom Farm, Seneca county, Ohio, October 24th, 1833. He graduated at Marietta College, Ohio, in 1854, studied theology at New Haven Theological Seminary, six years, 1854-60, and graduated at Union Seminary, New York, in 1857. He then went to Kansas, beginning work at Florence in June, and was ordained at Florence by the Presbytery of Emporia in the Fall of 1857. He remained at Florence until August, 1859, when he went to Germany, and attended theological lectures for the Winter term at Berlin, and for the Spring term at Leipzig. Then he returned to Kansas, spending two years preaching at Emporia, Adwell and Florence, when he accepted an invitation to supply the Presbyterian Church at Park Hill, Mo., coming there in September, 1861. This is the church attended by the students of Park College, now about two hundred. He has also a share in the college instruction, hearing some of the lectures of Senior and Junior classes. Mr. Foster is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, an able preacher, and a faithful and successful pastor.

Frisbie, Edward S., D. D. was born in Maryland, Delaware county, N. Y., in 1807. He graduated at Amherst College, with honors, in 1826. Two years of teaching in the classical department of Williams Seminary were followed by one of study at Union Theological Seminary, at the end of which, having decided to make teaching his profession, he accepted an invitation to the principalship of the High School at Amherst, Mass., and while there, completed his course of theological study, under the direction of Professors in the Faculty.

During the twelve years, from 1863 to 1875, his fruitful work, divided somewhat equally between Amherst and Northampton, in Massachusetts, and Binghamton, New York, pushed the high schools in those three places to a noticeably improved and high grade of excellence, and secured for him a fine reputation as instructor and educational organizer, which led to his being called, in 1875, to the Presidency of Wells College for Young Ladies, at Aurora, N. Y., which position he still occupies (1881), with growing usefulness and success.

The degree of D. D., was conferred upon him by his Alma Mater, in 1878, and at some time during the same year he declined an invitation to the Principalship of Williston Seminary.

His characteristic qualities as a teacher are: thoroughness and breadth and utmost accuracy of scholarship; exemplary neatness and beauty in every visible work of his hands; fine connoisseurship in art, and mastery in that of music; great firmness of discipline, with a manner marvelously quiet and gentle; a ceaseless aspiration for higher standards and more perfect attainments in educational work; a wise skill in arranging courses of study in a college curriculum, together with a conscientious and vigilant regard to the spiritual, as well as intellectual, training of his pupils. These characteristics have placed him among the best educators of our land.

G

Galesville University, Wisconsin. The originator, the chief promoter of the interests of this Institution during his life, the largest giver to its funds, and first President, both of Trustees and Faculty, was Hon. George Gale. He was a native of Vermont, and a lawyer by profession. He selected the town site, laid out the village and had the county seat located in it, all in view of the Institution of learning which he had projected. Indeed, his thought was to establish this as the seat of liberal culture for the Upper Mississippi Valley.

The site was chosen with reference to the extraordinary natural beauties of the location. And the subsequent development of the region by the construction of railways and the business expansion has procured for it unrivaled advantages of situation. In sight of the great father of waters, at that point where the grandest natural beauties stud its banks, and where it is flanked by the two largest lines of thoroughfare on the Continent, with another passing by, and a fourth projected, and yet just removed from the dust and noise of this great, throbbing artery, running through the heart of the Northwest, in a secluded valley, nestling amid the most enchanting scenery, this early choice of position has nothing left to wish for to-day. Central, accessible, every surrounding healthful, amid society cultured, moral, industrious, frugal, no spot can surpass it in desirableness as a place for successful training of the young.

The charter was obtained in 1851; the school was opened in 1859; the building was erected in 1860. Its scheme comprised a true University curriculum. The Board arranged: 1. A Normal and Primary Department. 2. A Scientific and Classical. 3. Agricultural and Mechanical. 4. Law. 5. Medical. 6. Theology.

To these were afterwards appended, or organized in conjunction with the University, "The Upper Mississippi Historical Society" and a Missionary Association. It was designed partly, too, as manual labor in its provisions, and has still a fine body of land attached allotted for that use.

It was at once encumbered with scholarships, which now have nearly all expired or been eliminated and canceled. Its tracts of valuable lands were needed and used for building or for current expenses; so that, at the end of eighteen years, it was found exhausted.

Devised and chartered originally only as "an institution of liberal culture," this independence of denominational affinity was its weakness. And at the outset of its active career Judge Gale, himself a Methodist, obtained an act from the Legislature and then succeeded in inducing the Northwest Wisconsin Conference of the M. E. body to espouse its maintenance and control. That act empowered the body to elect a majority of its trustees, the local board being self-perpetuating, but its members chosen by joint ballot with those appointed by Conference. In 1877 this franchise was transferred by the Legislature to the Presbytery of Chippewa. The Presbytery has become itself incorporated, so as to enable it the more effectively and safely to discharge the trust, in the holding of lands and disposal of funds.

The curriculum of Galesville University, although retaining the corporate title and powers, has, under the present management, been adjusted to the demands of the times and of the region. It has now Preparatory and Collegiate departments. It has arranged courses of instruction in Classics, Ancient and Modern, in Science, in Normal Training and in Business, with Music and Painting. And while prescribing no denominational requirements or preferences, it bears distinctly over all and through all exercises, its true, distinct aim, the expansion and direction, as well as furnishing of the whole man—both sexes alike—the heart first, the intellect and physical capabilities in their full place.

A creditable list of useful ministers, of honored men in professional and business pursuits, and in happy families, graces the list of its pupils and graduates. Since the change of control it has grown yearly in efficiency and patronage. Though pressed by the embarrassment attending a regenerated career, it has justified the hopes and repaid the efforts of its increasing ranks of most devoted friends, sending out yearly its trained young men and women into higher preparations for the Christian ministry, into the teacher's place and to the leadership of society.

On the 9th of January, 1884, a fire caught and consumed the interior of its fine edifice, leaving its bare walls. The authorities at once took measures for rebuilding, and it is expected that the renovated structure will be ready for the opening of the next school year.

Rev. S. W. Fallows (since Bishop Fallows) was the first Principal. Then J. S. Faiber and H. Gilliland. Since it has been under Presbyterian management, J. W. McLowry held the office of President for six years. At present, Rev. J. Irwin Smith, D.D., discharges, as Vice-president, the duties of that office.

Galt, Rev. Thomas, was the fifth child of Rev. Thomas and Sarah Happer Galt, and was born in Springfield, Ill., July 10th, 1841. He graduated, in 1865, from Washington and Jefferson College, Washington, Pa., and studied theology in the Northwestern Theological Seminary, Chicago, Ill. From this he graduated in April, 1868, having been licensed by the Chicago Presbytery, in April, 1867. In August, 1868, he took charge of the Presbyterian Church in Aurora, Ill., and the following May he was ordained and installed as pastor of this church, a position which he still holds. After the reunion his church was included in Ottawa Presbytery, and of this body Mr. Galt is the Stated Clerk. Though a man of great modesty, he is highly esteemed as a preacher; and as a pastor he has few equals. He inherits his father's good, clear judgment, as well as a good share of his pulpit ability.

Gardner, James, D.D. Dr. Gardner was born in Ballymena county, Antrim, Ireland, December 3d, 1828. He came from a long continued and decided Presbyterian lineage, who had the blood of the martyrs in their veins. After finishing his preparatory studies, he received his collegiate and theological course in the college of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. Coming, with his father's family, to this country, in 1852, in the Summer of that year he was licensed by the O. S. Presbytery of Ogdensburg, N. Y., and in the following Autumn took charge of the Church at Hammond, in that Presbytery, where he remained for seventeen years. From that place he was called to the Presbyterian Church of Canton, where he has now been a successful and most useful pastor for some fourteen years. In 1868 he received from Hamilton College the degree of A. M., and that of D. D. from the same college, in 1878. The Presbytery of Ogdensburg was one of the first to overture the General Assembly in favor of "Remission;" and Dr. Gardner, in handing in the overture to the Assembly of 1862, was the first, and it is believed the only one, who spoke in favor of its adoption. Several young men from the churches under his pastoral care have entered the ministry; one of his sons is a diligent and faithful minister of our Church, and another is preparing for the same sacred profession. Dr. Gardner is an able and faithful preacher, and a diligent and successful pastor; always at work, presenting truth instructively and strongly, and with rich and varied illustration, and is always listened to with interest and profit. He has been Moderator of the Synod of Central New York for several years, has been Stated Clerk of the Presbytery of St. Lawrence, at the meetings of which he is always present. As to its business he is always intelligently attentive, and in all that relates to the interests of education, or the advancement and prosperity of the Church, whether at home or abroad, few, if any, of our pastors are more intelligent, or active, or earnest than he has always been.

Gilleland, Rev. Leland McAboy, second son of Robert Gilleland and Sarah (Hutchinson), his wife, was born in Butler county, Pa., June 7th, 1843. Having graduated from Washington and Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, Pa., in 1868, he entered the same year the Theological Seminary at Chicago, where he spent three years, graduating in 1871.

In 1870 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Chicago, and immediately upon leaving the Seminary he accepted a call to the Church of White Pigeon, Mich., where he was ordained and installed in April, 1871. In August, 1877, he accepted a call to the Church of Tidioute, Pa., where he remained until January, 1884, when he accepted a call to the Walnut Street Church of Evansville, Ind., where he immediately entered upon his pastoral work. In addition to his other labors, Mr. Gilleland has always taken special interest in educational matters in his own community, and for a time taught Latin and Greek in the High School of Tidioute, delivering also, at stated intervals, to the school a course of lectures upon special subjects. During the Summer of 1884 he spent a vacation of several months in traveling through Great Britain and on the Continent, and his popular lectures upon subjects suggested by his travels have been received with great favor and appreciative interest. He has always been a tireless worker, a zealous preacher, full of life and enthusiasm, and withal a tender pastor and a prudent man of affairs.

His present charge, in the second largest city of the State, is one of wide influence.

Gilmer, Rev. Thomas Walker, was born in Charlottesville, Va., about the year 1831. He was the son of Governor T. W. Gilmer, one of the victims of the bursting of a large gun on the war steamer Princeton. Left, by this sad disaster, without a father, the duty of rearing him and his brothers and sisters, all of tender years, devolved on their widowed mother, who, by education and piety, was well prepared for the task. After graduation in the University of Virginia, he, with his brother next to him in age, were received under the care of West Hanover Presbytery, in 1859, and together licensed, April, 1862. His first choice of a profession while yet without Christ was the law. After a few years' practice of his profession in the city of St. Louis, all his plans of life were suddenly and effectually changed by the power of the truth, under the "demonstration of the Spirit;" not taking counsel with "flesh and blood," he gave, fully and cordially, to his Redeemer, the talents with which he had been endowed, and entered, with his whole heart, on the work of the ministry. After the war he settled as pastor of the Church in Fredericksburg, Va. In study, preaching and pastoral work he illustrated the traits he had developed as a private Christian, in self-denying, humble, prayerful and zealous work for the Master. On the 5th of April, 1869, in the full vigor of manhood, he was suddenly stricken by death, and his loving and beloved people were called to mourn his loss, sadly contrasted with the joy they had felt the day before while hearing from his lips the blessed truths of the Gospel.

Gilmore, Moses. The subject of the following sketch, was born near Dublin, Ireland, in 1749. He was brought up and educated, until the seventeenth year of his age, in Derry, so famous in the annals of Irish Protestantism, and then removed to America, with an uncle, and settled in Hanover township, then of Lancaster, now of Dauphin county, Pa. Having returned to Ireland on business, some few weeks later, the Revolutionary War broke out during his absence, and his return was rendered impossible until after the declaration of peace, in 1783. When, in 1785, Harrisburg was made the county seat of Dauphin county, Mr. Gilmore removed hither, and established himself as a merchant in Market Square. Here he was chosen elder of the Presbyterian Church, in 1794. From the descriptions given of him by the older members of the Church, as he appeared before age had bent his form and interfered with the elasticity of his step, he must have been a gentleman of remarkably fine personal appearance. He was tall and well-proportioned, grave and dignified, and wore, as was customary with gentlemen of his standing in society, the cane, cocked hat, short breeches and silver-buckled shoes of that and the earlier Revolutionary age. He was a man of stately bearing and courtly manners, and his tall, manly form, clothed in the dress peculiar to gentlemen of the olden times, would command involuntary respect. He was a most worthy citizen, and a man of sterling integrity, sincere, incorrupt and straightforward in all his dealings. In Christian character he was decidedly old side, and in this day of so much that is easy, fictitious and sensational in religious life and manners, he would, no doubt, be regarded as severe, cold and Puritanic, but in him and his associates there was, in their reverent and high-toned piety, a solid realness that could well do without the more attractive, but less substantial, piety of many in modern times. Many incidents are still rehearsed that illustrate the character of this good and strong-minded man. When selling goods, he was often heard to tell his customers, "Tak it if ye like, ye'll perhaps find something better at some ither place." The precentor was one day greatly troubled to find a tune of the right metre for the psalm that was to be sung. After failing once or twice, the voice of Mr. Gilmore was heard from another part of the church: "Tut, mon, tak anither tune." Moses Gilmore died, revered by all, in June, 1825, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth year of his eldership.

Glade Run Church, Presbytery of Kittaning, Pa. This church was organized in 1808, with eight members, by Rev. Robert McGarragh, whose ministerial life was spent in the bounds of what is now the Presbytery of Clarion, but at the organization of this church the Presbytery of Redstone. It was the first church of any denomination organized in Armstrong county, east of the Allegheny river. Rev. David Barclay was stated supply from 1819 to 1825, or thereabout. Rev. E. D. Barret was the first pastor, installed in 1828 and resigned in 1830. Rev. James D. Mason was pastor from 1843 to 1849; Rev. C. Forbes, from July, 1849, to May, 1856. The church prospered under the zealous and self-denying labors of these able and godly men, and early took a leading part with surrounding churches in temperance, Sabbath school and mission work. It has been served from the resignation of Mr. Forbes until now by the present pastor.

There are but fragments of records up to 1836, but from these it is evident that there must have been enrolled in this church near one thousand members. Since 1856 five hundred and twenty-three names have been added to the roll, three hundred and thirty-two of them on examination. The present membership is two hundred and forty. These figures show how hard it is for country churches, constantly reduced by emigration to the West and to the cities, to keep up the roll of membership.

Twenty-four young men, members of this church by examination, have within about that many years entered the ministry, besides a number of others who have been members while attending Glade Run Academy, which, by organization and nurture, is a child of this church. The Sabbath school was organized about 1826. It has now 18 classes and over 200 members. James R. Marshall, a member of Session, has been the efficient superintendent since 1861. For the last twenty-six years the total of funds raised for all purposes amounts to $31,206, or an average of five dollars per annum for each member—$2247 of this sum for Foreign Missions.

The seventy-fifth anniversary of the organization of Glade Run Church was celebrated October 30th and 31st, 1883. It was opened with a historical sermon by the pastor, Rev. G.W. Mechlin, D. D. Besides Revs. J. Horner Kerr and J. M. Kelly, whose charges form a part of the territory of this district, Revs. J. H. Marshall, of Butler Presbytery, A. B. Marshall, of New Lisbon, Ohio, and L. Mechlin, of Elderton, Pa., sons of this church, were present and spoke instructively and impressively on the duties of Christians to the Church, revivals, temperance, Sabbath-school work, the obligations of young Christians to the Church, and its vigor increasing with age, and other kindred topics.

Glass, Rev. Harvey, was born February 20th, 1843, in Spencer county, Ky. His father was an honored elder in the old Big Spring Church. He graduated at Centre College in the Summer of 1865, and graduated at Union Theological Seminary, Va., April, 1868; was licensed by Louisville Presbytery in the Summer of 1867. Immediately on his return from the Seminary he entered upon the work of the ministry at Perryville, Boyle county, Ky.; was soon called as pastor to Cynthiana, where he was ordained 1870. Four years later was called to New Providence, where he remained four years, and was thence called to the pastorate at Richmond by his present charge. Mr. Glass was held in the highest esteem by all the Professors of the school through which he passed, and came out of both College and Seminary a good scholar—all around the curriculum. He has filled every position to which he has been called with honor and usefulness. As a theologian and ecclesiastic, he is esteemed by his brethren as a strong man; as a preacher, he is instructive and impressive. He is a man of clear, strong convictions, and with the courage to express them, either in the pulpit, on the floor of the Church courts, or through the press. He is now filling one of the most important charges in the Synod of Kentucky, preaching to a strong and growing church, and to the Faculty and students of Central University, of which Institution he is one of the Curators.

Gordon, Rev. John O., is the oldest child of Alexander and Catharine Edwards Gordon, and was born at Pittsburg, Pa., March 10th, 1850. Graduated at the Western University of Pennsylvania, in 1866. Having pursued a post-graduate course in Yale College, he entered Auburn Theological Seminary, in 1868, where he spent the first two years of his theological course. The third year was spent in Union Theological Seminary, where he graduated, in 1871. Was settled, December 1st, 1871, over the Presbyterian Church of Rensselaerville, N. Y., and, July 1st, 1880, was installed over First Presbyterian Church, Lincoln, Nebraska, where he remained until October 30th, 1882, when he resigned for purposes of European travel. He is a good preacher, and his ministry has been blessed.

Gospel, Its Experimental Evidence. "The most searching question that can be put to a candid and intelligent doubter of revelation," says an able writer, is this: "Do you not believe that a man is made better by becoming a Christian—a sincere, enlightened, whole-hearted Christian? Compare such a one with a coarse, sensual, worldly man, or with a refined and polished selfish person. Do you not believe that a man is a purer, nobler, more exalted being, if his moral sensibilities are awakened, if he is always loyal to right, if he is honorable, kind, benevolent, disinterested, if he reveres God and loves his fellows and lives for immortality? Let the question be put to all who hesitate respecting the truth of Christianity: Do you not believe that the world would be benefited beyond conception if all men should to-day become perfect Christians? Would you not prefer to live in the society of such men? Would you not prefer that your child should grow up under such influences, and become such a character; that your friends and kindred should become so? Nay, have you any objection to being such a character yourself?"

"What, then, will you say when a character which you admire—when a score of such persons tell you: 'We owe everything to Christianity; it has crushed our selfishness; it has tamed our passions; it has filled our cravings; it has refined our sentiments; it has uplifted and inspired our hearts; it has taught us how to be children of God, how to bear sorrow, how to forgive our foes; it has unsealed our spiritual vision and disclosed realities in life—the highest realities—to which before we were wholly blind.' What will you say, my friends, to this practical testimony for Christianity? Will you venture to contend that, while the results of Christ's religion are so glorious, the religion itself is a delusion; that what is best in the moral universe is yet untrue? It is a sad thing to see a man skeptical concerning Christianity in the face of such evidence, for his skepticism is a confession that he does not trust in the reality of his purest conceptions of right and holiness, that he believes the good in God's dominion to be a lie."

"The influence of the Christian religion on nations," says Dr. Thomas Dick, "is not less evident and happy than on individuals. Wherever it has been received, it has brought with it superior light, and has completely banished the absurd systems of polytheism and pagan idolatry, with all the cruel and obscene rites with which they were accompanied, and in their place has substituted a system of doctrine and practice both pure and rational. When it made its way through the Roman empire, it abolished the unnatural practice of polygamy and concubinage, reduced the number of divorces, and mitigated the rigor of servitude, which among that people was cruel and severe. Polished and polite as the Romans have been generally considered, they indulged in the most barbarous entertainments. They delighted to behold men combating with wild beasts and with one another, and we are informed by respectable historians, that the fights of gladiators sometimes deprived Europe of twenty thousand lives in one month. Neither the humanity of Titus, nor the wisdom and virtue of Trojan, could abolish these barbarous spectacles till the gentle and humane spirit of the gospel put a final period to such savage practices, and they can never again be resumed in any nation where its light is diffused and its authority acknowledged. It humanized the barbarous hordes that overturned the Roman empire, and softened their ferocious tempers, as soon as they embraced its principles and yielded to its influence. It civilized, and raised from moral and intellectual degradation, the wild Irish, and our forefathers, the ancient Britons, who were classed among the rudest of barbarians till the time they were converted to the religion of Jesus; so that the knowledge we now see diffused around us, the civilization to which we have advanced, the moral order which prevails, the beauties which adorn our cultivated fields, the comforts and decorations connected with our cities and towns, and the present improved state of the arts and sciences, may all be considered as so many of the beneficial effects which the Christian religion has produced among us. In our own times, we have beheld effects no less powerful and astonishing, in the moral revolution which Christianity has lately produced in Tahiti, in the Sandwich Islands, in Madagascar, and in many other parts of the world, where races of the most degraded character and condition have been enlightened, and transformed into civilized societies, worshipping the true and living God, and rejoicing in the hope of a blessed immortality. In fine, Christianity is adapted to every country and every clime. Its doctrines and precepts are equally calculated to promote the happiness of princes and their subjects, statesmen and philosophers, the high and the low, the rich and the poor. It is completely adapted to the nature and the necessities of men. It forbids the use of nothing but that which is injurious to health of body or peace of mind, and it has a tendency to promote a friendly and affectionate intercourse among men of all nations. And we do not think it possible that the mind of man can conceive a more convincing demonstration of the truth of Christianity than is set before us in the authentic facts on which it rests, in its tendency to produce universal happiness among its followers, and in the intrinsic excellence for which it is distinguished."

Gray, Nathanael, third child of John and Betsy (Rankin) Gray, was born in Pelham, in the western part of Massachusetts, July 20th, 1808. He came from good old Puritan stock, which for seven generations have lived and died on the old family homestead. His grandfather, John Gray, did good service for his country in the War of the Revolution, until he was brought home to die from disease contracted in camp, at Bennington, Vermont.

His early education was as thorough as the schools of his native town would afford, until the age of twenty-one, when he took up the trade of stone-cutter.

On the old homestead was a granite quarry, from which his father donated the first stone that was put into the foundation of Amherst College, and it was a part of Nathanael's early work to get out and prepare these stones—thereby receiving a lesson in charity that seems to have borne good fruit in his after life.

In 1833 he went to New York city, and for some years worked at his trade, until 1837, when he took the position of City Missionary, and continued in this work for twelve years.

Soon after his arrival at New York, he connected himself with the West Presbyterian Church. In 1840 he was elected ruling elder, and held that position until 1850, when he removed to California, and became one of the earliest members of the First Presbyterian Church of San Francisco. Soon after he was elected ruling elder, and has been connected with the church in that capacity for more than thirty years.

Although taking great interest in local good government, and often solicited to accept public offices, he has only twice allowed his name to be used; once in 1852, when he was elected Coroner of the county of San Francisco, and again in 1863, when he was elected to the State Legislature, on an Independent Republican ticket.

He has always been prominent in charitable works, and is, at the present writing, connected with the following Institutions: President of the Old People's Home; President of the San Francisco Benevolent Society; Trustee California Bible Society; Trustee Young Men's Christian Association; Director San Francisco Theological Seminary; Director California Prison Commission.

Green, Rev. Thomas Edward, was born at Harrisville, Pa., December 27th, 1858. His father, Rev. John M. Green, a native of Pennsylvania, is the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Centralia, Ill. His mother, Martha M. McCreary, a minister's daughter, is also a Pennsylvanian. He was graduated by McKendree College, Lebanon, Ill., in 1875. Two years later he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, where he remained until 1879. On June 4th, 1879, he was licensed to preach the gospel at Flora, Ill., and February 5th, 1880, was ordained and installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Mount Carmel, Ill. The following year, on June 16th, he was installed by the Presbytery of Alton, as pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Sparta, the largest in Southern Illinois. His brief ministry in this settlement of Ayrshire Scotchmen was largely successful, and witnessed eighty-nine additions to the membership of his church. In December, 1882, he was called to the pastorate of the Eighth Presbyterian Church of Chicago, where he was installed January 18th, 1883. The first year of his third pastorate has been remarkably blessed. His preaching has constantly attracted large audiences; the religious activities of the church have been quickened; the officers and members have been stimulated to united and zealous work for the Master; the benevolences have been greatly increased, and he has had the joy of welcoming one hundred and fifteen into the membership.

Grier, John Nathan Caldwell, D.D., was born at Brandywine Manor, Pa., June 8th, 1792. He graduated at Dickinson College, in September, 1809, and commenced the study of theology with his father, Rev. Nathan Grier, in the year 1810. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Newcastle, April 7th, 1813. In September, 1814, he received a call to the Church at Brandywine Manor, where he remained as pastor fifty years. For sixteen years before his decease he occasionally assisted the pastor of the church. He died September 12th, 1880, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

When in his prime Dr. Grier was an unusually solemn preacher. His person was commanding, and the deep tones of his voice accorded well with the momentous doctrines which he was commissioned to enforce. His earlier ministry was marked by the most wonderful revivals of religion. In the year 1831 one hundred and twenty-seven were added to his church on profession of faith; in 1832 ninety-two were added; in 1833 seventy-four, and in 1834 sixty-four—making three hundred and thirty seven in four years, one hundred and four of whom were baptized. During his pastorate seventeen young men entered the ministry from his church, and what are now four large and flourishing churches were sent out from his church as colonies. The records of his Presbytery show that during the first forty-five years of his ministry he was absent but once from its stated semi-annual meetings.

The last few years of Dr. Grier's life were spent mostly in retirement, pressed down by the weight of increasing infirmities. One interesting feature of his later experience was his love for the Word of God. During the sixteen years of his retirement from the pastorate he read the Bible through, word for word, the almost incredible number of one hundred and fifty-seven times, marking down on the fly-leaves when he began and when he ended each reading. It was a striking and beautiful coincidence that just at eleven o'clock on Sabbath morning, the exact hour at which, for threescore years, he had gone to his church to hold up Jesus to the people, and with them sing his praises, the summons came, and he went up, through the "beautiful gate," into the heavenly temple, to meet his congregation, and with them join in that nobler worship where every cloud is lifted and where they now see the King in his beauty.

Guyot, Arnold Henry, Ph. D., LL.D., was born near Neufchatel, Switzerland, September 28th, 1807. He studied at Neufchatel, Stuttgart, and Carlsruhe, where he formed an intimate friendship with Agassiz, and began with him the study of Natural Science. He studied theology three years at Neufchatel and Berlin, when he began to devote himself to the studies of Physics, Meteorology, Chemistry, etc. He spent five years in scientific excursions through France, Belgium, Holland and Italy. In 1838 he discovered the laminated structure of the ice in glaciers. De Saussure, Von Buch, Escher and Charpentier, had made numerous observations on this subject, but the extent and true limits of these great outpourings of rocks from the bosom of the Alps were not accurately known. For seven years he traced them on both sides of the Central Alps, in Switzerland and Italy. The full details of these investigations were announced to form the second volume of the "Systeme Glaciere" by Agassiz, Guyot, and Desor, but the removal of Guyot to America prevented its publication. In 1848 he came to the United States and resided for several years at Cambridge, Mass. Now and then he delivered lectures on his favorite subjects. In the Winter of 1849 he delivered a series of lectures in French, at Boston, afterwards collected and translated into English, in one volume, under the title of "Earth and Man." He was afterwards employed by the Smithsonian Institution to organize a system of meteorological observations, for which he prepared an extensive series of practical tables. In 1851 he determined the true height of Mt. Washington; in 1856 of the Black Mountains of North Carolina, and in 1857 of the Green Mountains of Vermont. In 1855 he was appointed Professor of Physical Geography in the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, where he remained until his death, which occurred February 8th, 1884. In 1873 the Vienna International Exhibition gave him a medal of Progress for his geographical works.

Professor Guyot published the following works: "Directions for Meteorological Tables" (Washington, 1850); "Geographical Series, Primary Geography;" "A Series of School Geographies" (1866-75); "Intermediate Geography" (1870); and "Physical Geography," with a set of wall maps (1873). He has delivered lectures on "The Unity of the System of Life the True Foundation of the Classification of Plants and Animals," in Brooklyn, N. Y., and before the Smithsonian Institution, in Washington, and on "Man Primeval," in the Union Theological Seminary, in New York.

H

Haight, Hon. Henry Huntley, son of the Hon. Fletcher M. Haight, was born in Rochester, New York, May 20th, 1825. He entered Yale College in the Summer of 1840, and graduated there in 1844. He was admitted to the Bar by the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri, near the beginning of the year 1847, and practiced law in the City of St. Louis for about three years, when he removed to San Francisco, arriving there January 20th, 1850. He continued in the practice of law till the Fall of 1867, when he was elected Governor of California, for the term of four years. After retiring from office he again followed his profession—and had great success as a lawyer.

HON. HENRY HUNTLEY HAIGHT.

In the year 1861 Mr. Haight was elected an elder in Calvary Presbyterian Church, San Francisco. He served both the State and the Church with great integrity and faithfulness, and adorned his Christian profession, both in public and private life. His death, on the 2d September, 1878, was very sudden and unexpected. He was an exemplary man in all the relations of life. His funeral was largely attended by the members of the Bar and the public at large, and his untimely death, at the age of fifty-three, in the midst of his activity and usefulness, was greatly lamented by the whole community.

Hall, Rev. Robert McCutcheon, was the youngest child of Robert S. and Anna (King) Hall, and was born in Washington county, Indiana, December 6th, 1811. Having graduated at Knox College, Galesburg, Illinois, in 1839, he studied theology in the Chicago Theological Seminary (Congregational); spent a few weeks in Andover Seminary, where his health failed and he was obliged to intermit study for a year, after which he completed his professional studies in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio. He accepted a Professorship in Biddle University, Charlotte, N. C., in the Summer of 1873, and has held it to the present time. He was ordained to preach the gospel, April 1st, 1874. Prof. Hall is a good preacher, and fills his position in the University very acceptably and usefully.

Hall, W. T., D.D., at this time pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Lynchburg, Va., is a son of the Rev. James D. Hall, a venerable minister of the Synod of North Carolina. He was born December 5th, 1835, and in 1854 graduated at Davidson College, in his native State. On leaving college he entered Columbia Seminary, where Dr. James H. Thornwell was then filling, with distinction, the Chair of Theology. Here he remained three years. He began his ministerial life in 1858, at Lancaster Court House, in South Carolina, as a licentiate of Concord Presbytery. In 1859 he was ordained by Bethel Presbytery and installed as pastor of Ebenezer Church. The remainder of his pastoral life to the present time has been divided between but two charges—the first being in Canton, Miss., to which he was called in 1862, and the second his present charge in the city of Lynchburg, to which he was called in 1872. In each of these several fields of labor he has had much to encourage him, in the manifest tokens which he has received of God's favor.

Dr. Hall is still in the prime of his life and his powers. As a man, he is characterized by superior mental ability, a gentle and courteous bearing, firmness of purpose, and pre-eminently by modesty. As a preacher, he is vigorous in thought, loyal to truth, and master of a forcible and scholarly style. As a pastor, he is energetic, consecrated and full of tender sympathy. As a counsellor in the courts of this Church he is held in the highest esteem by his ministerial brethren, on account of his wisdom, prudence and unswerving devotion to duty and to the advancement of the interest of Christ's kingdom.

It should be added that Dr. Hall has been specially interested in the religious welfare of the colored race.

Since coming to Lynchburg he has been largely instrumental in organizing and sustaining a colored Presbyterian Church in that city. By his example and otherwise he has done much to awaken in others an interest in the same cause.

Halsey, Hugh, a ruling elder of the Church of Bridgehampton, Long Island, for many years, was a son of Stephen Halsey, M. D., of the same place, where he was born, June 26th, 1791. He was graduated at Yale College in 1811, having among his classmates the Rev. Drs. Joshua Leavitt, Joseph C. Stiles and Leonard Withington; President Nathanael S. Wheaton, D. D., and Judges John K. Kane and William L. Storrs. He studied law and practiced his profession in his native place to the end of his life. He represented his native county of Suffolk in the Legislature of New York in 1824. He was the Surrogate of the county from 1821 to 1840, and the first Judge, from 1833 to 1847. In 1844 he was a Presidential Elector and the Secretary of the Electoral College of his native State. He served the State as its Surveyor General from 1845 to 1848, and represented the First Senatorial District in the Senate of the State, in 1854 and 1855. He was a man of medium size, handsome proportions, graceful movements, and pleasant expression of countenance. His head was large, forehead broad, eyes bright and penetrating, and all his features shapely. His voice was tender and winning rather than otherwise. He was eminently intelligent, honest, judicious and wise; a friend of peace; an earnest advocate of temperance; a faithful and active Christian in all the relations of society; a leading member of the Church Session, and a prudent counsellor in the higher ecclesiastical bodies. He loved the Church, and through all the years of his manhood, he was a zealous promoter of its prosperity and spiritual welfare. He closed an influential and exceedingly useful life on the 29th of May, 1858.

Hamner, J. Garland, D. D., is the son of the revered and venerable J. G. Hamner, D. D., who still survives. He was born in Baltimore, Md., November 13th, 1836. His academic studies were pursued in Williams College, Massachusetts, whence he graduated in 1855. In the Autumn of the same year he entered Union Theological Seminary, New York, where he remained until 1857, graduating with the class of that year. Mr. Hamner was ordained by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia, November 1st, 1859. His first charge was at Milford, Del., where he labored, with great success, from 1860 to 1863. He was called thence to Philadelphia, where he organized the Wharton Street Church, remaining there till 1869, greatly blessed in his ministry among that people. From Philadelphia he was called to Salisbury, Md., and installed in 1869, where he continued in the pastorate until he was appointed Synodical Evangelist by the Synod of Baltimore. He served the church in this capacity for two years. In 1874 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Waterville, N. Y., and in 1875 was called to become pastor of the Calvary Church, Parkersburg, W. Va. This relation was severed in the Spring of 1883.

In all his charges Dr. Hamner has had large accessions to the church. Energetic, active, and of exceedingly social temperament, he has been blessed with unusual success in the pastoral relation. And not only in this has his ministry been marked, but in the spirituality and increased benevolence that have usually followed his settlement over a congregation.

He is an attractive preacher, presenting truth with a warmth and freshness that never fail to interest the hearer. The honorary degree of D. D., was conferred on him by Marietta College, Ohio, in 1881.

Hargraves, Rev. John T., was pastor at Middleburg, Va. On a visit to Alexandria he died suddenly, in November, 1856, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, at that place, at the house of his brother-in-law, Captain Jamieson, of the U. S. Navy. His funeral solemnities took place at the Second Presbyterian Church, where he was well-known, and where he had often labored in connection with its now sainted pastor, Rev. William C. Walton, his uncle, of precious memory, who died in Hartford, Conn. The Rev. Dr. Boyd and the Rev. Patterson Fletcher officiated on the occasion. At the conclusion of his address, Dr. Boyd reviewed the leading points of the laborious and useful life of his friend, the lamented deceased; the gentleness of his early life, the reality of his conversion, his love for souls, his earnestness in winning them to Christ, his untiring activity, his incorruptible integrity, his close adherence to the doctrines of the gospel, his spirit of prayer and dependence on God—in fine, the success which crowned all, to the honor of the Master, and the magnifying of the great commission which he held under Him.

Harrell, Rev. Franklin Pierce, the oldest child of H. W. & W. A. Harrell, was born in Robeson county, N. C., November 6th, 1852, and was graduated from Davidson College, June, 1877, and finished his theological course in Union Seminary in Virginia, in April, 1880, and on the 26th of the same month was licensed by Fayetteville Presbytery. Soon after this he was called to the pastorate of Prospect Church, where he was ordained and installed, December 4th, 1880, by Concord Presbytery. He supplied Fifth Creek one half the time for one year, after which Prospect was his sole charge. His days of labor for the Master were short. He died June 29th, 1883, and was interred in Oak Grove Cemetery, in Salisbury, beside his two departed children. His last words were, "going home to live with Jesus and the little boys."

Mr. Harrell was an active, earnest and conscientious minister, and his labors were greatly blessed. During his three years of service sixty-one members were added to Prospect Church, and sixty-eight children baptized. He was a watchful pastor and thorough disciplinarian. Through his agency the "marriage question" was brought before the Presbytery, and thence overruled to the General Assembly, and from the Assembly the propriety of striking from the Confession of Faith the clause prohibiting marriage with a deceased wife's sister was sent down to the Presbyteries. Mr. Harrell was courageous in defending what he believed to be the truth, in the pulpit, in the Presbytery and in his dealings with members of his charge.

Havens, Rev. Daniel William, was born in Norwich Town, Conn., January 24th, 1815. He was graduated from Yale College in the year 1843, and took a full course of study in the East Windsor Theological Institute, which he left in July, 1846. He was licensed to preach by the New London Association, in May, 1845. After supplying the pulpit in Exeter Society, Lebanon, Conn., for several months, he commenced, in January, 1847, preaching to his future charge, the First Congregational Church in East Haven, Conn., over which he was ordained pastor, June 16th, 1847. In this pastorate he continued thirty years.

While on a visit to his children in Kansas, he preached in the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church of Holton, and at once received a call to that field. This call he accepted, and resigning his charge in Connecticut, without any interval or delay, was installed pastor in Holton, July 8th, 1877. In this charge he still remains. In his long pastorate in the East he continued contented, happy and beloved, giving to his people the best fruits of diligent labor, and in this labor he continues in his more recent field, with the same excellent results.

Hawley, Rev. Ransom, was the oldest son of Capt. Ebenezer and Lucy (French) Hawley, and was born in Bridgeport, Conn., April 24th, 1802. He pursued his classical course under the direction of his pastor, Rev. Elijah Waterman, and graduated at Auburn Theological Seminary, August, 1828. The same year, May 2nd, he was licensed by the Association of the Eastern District of Fairfield county, Conn. In the same year he received a commission to labor in Indiana, and was probably the second one appointed by the A. H. M. S. for that State. He came to Washington, Davies county, Ind., in November, 1828, and has remained in this State ever since. He was ordained in Washington, November, 1829, by the Wabash Presbytery. He preached here and in parts of three other counties about six years; at Bloomington and vicinity about eight years; at Putnamville and other places twenty-four years. Since then, he has preached there and in other places, according to ability and opportunity. He has preached at least 6350 times, in more than 100 places; received into the Church 550 members; baptized 382 children; married 370 persons; organized 4 churches; built 5 houses of worship; traveled 90,000 miles, mostly on horseback; distributed 1000 Bibles, 30,000 tracts and other religious books; and is 81 years of age. Mr. Hawley is entitled to eminence among the living for the length of his ministry; few to whom Indiana is more largely indebted. The whole of his life, since he completed his preparation for preaching, has been identified with the interest of the Church in this State. He is extensively known, and where known is loved for the purity of his life, his self-denying labors and the kindness of his heart.

Hendrick, John T., D.D., was born in Barren county, Ky., March 15th, 1815. The ancestors of his father, Joseph W. Hendrick, who was reared in Hanover county, Va., emigrated from Holland. His mother, Mary Doswell Thilman, was a descendant of the Huguenot refugees who settled at Mamkin town, Va. Dr. Hendrick was educated at Centre College, Danville, Ky. He studied theology under the direction of Dr. Gideon Blackburn; was licensed by the Presbytery of West Lexington in May, 1833; ordained and installed as pastor of the Stonemouth and Millersburg churches, in Bourbon county, Ky., by the Presbytery of Ebenezer, in 1835. Dr. Hendrick accepted a call to the Flemmingburg Church in 1842, whence he removed to take charge of the Church at Clarksville, Tenn., in 1845. After faithfully serving this important charge until 1858, he entered upon the pastorate of the Church at Paducah, Ky. Under his devoted care, until May, 1883, this became a large and influential charge, while he performed much additional work in extending Presbyterian influence among the destitute places adjacent to Paducah, organizing and fostering a number of churches in his Presbytery. Dr. Hendrick is the father of a large family of children, though afflicted by the loss of several, among whom are Revs. Joseph Thilman and Calvin Styles Hendrick, whose promising course of service in the Church of their fathers was early terminated by death.

Dr. Hendrick is still an active and useful man, of abundant labors, and is now ministering to the congregation at Maysville, Ky. He is a man of fine physique, genial temperament, vigorous mind, and is a most instructive evangelical preacher. He has left a deep and permanent impression for the truth upon all the congregations which he has served, and his long ministry has been remarkably blessed in the salvation of many souls, which acknowledge him as their spiritual father. Dr. Hendrick has contributed several valuable volumes to our Church literature, such as "Letters to the Reformers;" "A Course of Lectures on Science and Religion;" "A Volume of Sermons;" and "Letters on Baptism;" the last of which is an oft quoted and standard work of its kind. Still abounding in works of love, Dr. Hendrick survives all of his contemporaries in the Synods of Kentucky and Nashville, venerated and beloved by his junior brethren.

Henry, Symmes Cleves, D.D., was born in Lammington, N. J., June 7th, 1797. He graduated at

New Jersey College in 1815; studied theology at Princeton Seminary, and was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Newton, May 3d, 1818. He was stated supply at Salem, Mass., in 1818; at Rochester, N. Y., in 1819; of the Third Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 1820, and pastor of the First Church, Cranbury, N. J., 1820-57. He died at Cranbury, March 22d, 1857. Dr. Henry was possessed of a strong intellect, and of very popular manners. He was an able preacher, devoted pastor and faithful presbyter. He was greatly beloved by the congregation which he served so long and so successfully, as well as by his brethren in the ministry.

Hepburn, Andrew Dousa, D. D., was born at Williamsport, Pa., November 14th, 1830. He was a student at Jefferson College, Pa., of the class of 1851, and stood in the front rank as to diligence and attainments. He was absent a considerable part of the Senior year, but present at Commencement, his theme, "The Social Principle." After leaving Camonsburg, he repaired to the University of Virginia, entered as a Senior and graduated there in 1852. He was stated supply at Harrisonburg, Va., 1855; ordained by the Presbytery of Lexington, October 22d, 1858; pastor at New Providence, Va., 1858-60; Professor of Metaphysics and Rhetoric in the University of North Carolina, 1859-67; Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in Madison University, 1868-73; President of Madison University, 1871-73; Professor of Mental Philosophy and English Literature, Davidson College, North Carolina; and since 1877 has been President of this college. Dr. Hepburn is a superior scholar, an able preacher, an excellent instructor, and has fine qualifications for the important position he now occupies.

Herron, Rev. Andrew, son of Rev. Robert Herron, D. D., and Mrs. Mary Eliza (McMurray), his wife, was born in Harrison county, Ohio, August 22d, 1849. The common school and New Hagers-town Academy prepared him for college. He graduated in 1869, at Washington and Jefferson College, and in 1872, from Princeton Theological Seminary. Twice accepting home mission appointments, and advancing them to the condition of self-support, he has had the gratification of seeing a similar change occur in his present field of labor—Albion, Marshall county, Iowa. It is a community that for many years has been favored by having in their midst an academy well attended and well taught. The Presbyterian Church of the village are conspicuous for their zeal in temperance and missionary effort. Strong men have been their ministers. Mr. Herron is a diligent student, an engaging preacher, and commands respect for his mental worth, his Christian excellence, and his wise devotedness in the interests of morality and religion.

Hill, Hon. John, was born at Catskill, N. Y., June 10th, 1821. He united with the Presbyterian Church in that village in 1841, under the pastorate of Rev. G. N. Judd, D. D., and began at once the active duties of the Christian life. In 1844 he removed to Boonton, N. J., and was engaged for many years in mercantile business. He was soon made an elder in the church and superintendent in the Sunday school, which position he still holds, and gradually became known throughout the State, and largely through the country, as a most active worker in the Sunday school, and as a friend of young men, aiding in organizing and extending the work of the Young Men's Christian Association. In 1880 he was sent a delegate, by the New Jersey Sunday-school Association, to the Centennial Celebration in Great Britain. For more than twenty years Mr. Hill has been in public life. In 1861, 1862 and 1866 he was member of the State Assembly, and the last year was Speaker. He served his district four terms as Representative in Congress. From 1874 to 1877 he was a member of the State Senate of New Jersey. While in Congress he was for six years a member of the Post Office Committee, and to his indefatigable efforts the country is largely indebted for the passage of two very important measures—the introduction of the one cent postal cards, in 1873, and the reduction of letter postage to two cents, in 1883.

Mr. Hill has been an efficient member of the various judicatories of the Church, serving on many of the committees of the General Assembly, and was Chairman of the Committee on the Finances of the Church in 1880.

Hodge, Caspar Wistar, D. D., son of the Rev. Charles Hodge, D. D., LL. D., was born at Princeton, N. J., February 21st, 1830. He graduated at New Jersey College in 1848, and was Tutor in the College, 1850-51. He was Teacher in Princeton, N. J., 1852-3; stated supply of Ainslie Street Church, Williamsburg, N. Y., 1853; pastor, 1854-6; pastor at Oxford, Pa., 1856-60. In 1860 he was elected Professor of New Testament Literature and Biblical Greek in Princeton Theological Seminary, which position he still occupies. Dr. Hodge is of a high grade of scholarship, an excellent instructor, and meets the demands of his Professorship with great acceptance. As a preacher, he is able, earnest and impressive. As a writer, he is vigorous and polished.

Hoge, Moses A., D. D., was born in Columbus, O., December 15th, 1818. He is the son of the Rev. James Hoge, D. D., for many years the pastor of the First Church of Columbus, O. Dr. M. A. Hoge graduated from Ohio University in 1839, being among the foremost of his class. For five years succeeding his graduation he taught in the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb in Columbus. This was then a new work, in which he was greatly interested. In the meantime he studied theology with his father, spending the Winter of 1844 and 1845 in the Theological Seminary at Princeton. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Columbus in 1843, and was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Athens, O., June 24th, 1846.

He was called to the First Church of Zanesville in 1851, remained as its pastor two years, when a second church was organized. He became pastor of the new organization, remaining in this relation until 1862, when he was installed pastor of the Westminster Church of Cleveland. In 1866 he removed to Cincinnati and was pastor of Walnut Hill Church, until 1871, when declining health compelled him to abandon the active work of the ministry. He has since resided in Zanesville, O., where he frequently and acceptably supplies the pulpits of Zanesville and neighboring towns, but still unable to do the full work of the pastor.

Dr. Hogg is a man of many gifts, both natural and acquired. A man of a peculiarly pure mind, cheerful, hopeful and even-tempered. He has always been a very diligent student, both of men and books, of religious and secular subjects. In the pulpit he is instructive, chaste, dignified, not powerful, but effective, commanding the attention and respect of all who hear him. Though modest and retiring in disposition, in the Church courts he is perfectly fearless in defence of truth. Few men have drawn around them so large a circle of admiring friends. In life, he is indeed a living epistle, favorably read and known—the embodiment of the spirit of the gospel made effective in his pure and godly life.

Hogg, Moses Drury, D.D., pastor of the Second Church, Richmond, Va., was born on College Hill, near the college building of Hampden-Sidney, September 17th, 1819. His name combines that of his paternal grandfather, Rev. Dr. Moses Hogg, and of his maternal grandfather, Rev. Drury Lacy, a celebrated minister of the close of the last and earlier years of the present century. His father, Rev. Samuel Davies Hogg, removed to Athens, Ohio, and became Professor in the University of Ohio when his son was yet a child. After his death, the lad grew up from early youth among the friends and relatives of his parents, in Virginia and North Carolina, till prepared for college. He graduated in Hampden-Sidney with distinction, and after teaching a private school for a year, became a student of Union Seminary, November, 1840, and also a Tutor in the college near. Though, of course, much occupied with the duties of Tutor, he succeeded, by diligence, united with rare powers of acquiring knowledge, in successfully prosecuting the full course of study in the Seminary, and received the usual certificate of graduation at the close of the third year from entering the Institution. He was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery, October 6th, 1843, and immediately invited to assist Dr. Plumer, of the First Church, in preaching and pastoral work, with especial reference to the supply of a mission chapel. His success in gathering a considerable congregation of regular worshippers in the chapel, opened the way for organizing the Second Church, and he was ordained by East Hanover Presbytery, February 27th, 1845, and installed pastor of the church. The chapel soon becoming too crowded for the congregation, measures were adopted and carried forward successfully, under his direction, for building a church, of Gothic order of architecture, but of well-adjusted proportions, for an audience chamber, and of good taste, both in the exterior and interior. In paying off a heavy debt contracted in the enterprise, Dr. Hogg, both by counsel and personal aid, led the people successfully through. Meanwhile, his services became increasingly acceptable, and though he conducted a large school, by means of which he at once assisted his people in his support, and in paying the debt, his preaching continued more and more acceptable, and his pastoral work more and more efficient in retaining those whom his pulpit services attracted. Further notice of his external work is needless. The result stands forth in a church unsurpassed in the Synod, in numbers by only one, and in the order and influence it presents, by none. Dr. Hogg's natural grace of manner, the facility and felicity of his elocution, are only equaled by his power of acquiring and retaining knowledge. Not a recluse, but ever busy with calls for his attention by his people and strangers visiting the city, he has still reached a maturity of scholarship, not only professional, but general, which few, with far better opportunities of time and place, rarely attain. His habit through life, and now more closely observed than ever, has been to make the preparation of his sermons a matter of the most careful and diligent effort. It is a mistake to suppose that his success in the pulpit is that due merely to a ready and fluent delivery, and the effusions of an hour, mostly un-studied. His life, as a student, is well known to the writer of this sketch, who unhesitatingly avows the conviction of his full fitness for any position to which the Church might call him.

After a pastorate in the same city and the same church and among the same people or their descendants, he stands, to-day, acknowledged to be the leading pulpit speaker and pastor of Richmond and of the Synod of Virginia. He is called away for special occasions of sermons or addresses, through large portions of the North, the South, and the West. As an ecclesiastic, though usually silent in the Church courts, he has, when the calls of position or of duty opened the way, proved to be entirely conversant with the affairs of the Church and capable of sustaining his proposed or adopted measures with efficient results.

The writer has carefully avoided the sentiments of mere language of eulogy, and in view of personal intimacy for forty years, has been guarded against the partialities of friendship. He has set down naught except the truth, and can but pray that such an example may not be lost on our increasing ministry.

Holy Ghost, the third person in the Trinity, the Comforter of the Church of Christ.

I. The Holy Ghost is a real and distinct person in the Godhead. 1. Personal powers of rational understanding and will are ascribed to Him, 1 Cor. ii, 10, 11; xii, 11; Eph. iv, 3. 2. He is joined with the other two Divine Persons, as the object of divine worship and fountain of blessings, Matt. xxviii, 19; 2 Cor. xiii, 14. 3. In the Greek, a masculine article or epithet is joined to His name, Pneuma, which is naturally of the neuter gender, John xiv, 26; xv, 26; xvi, 13; Eph. i, 13. 4. He appeared under the emblem of a dove, and of cloven tongues of fire, Matt. iii; Acts ii. 5. Personal offices of an intercessor belong to Him, Rom. viii, 26. 6. He is represented as performing a multitude of personal acts, as teaching, speaking, witnessing, etc., Mark xiii, 11; Acts xx, 23; Rom. viii, 15, 16; 1 Cor. vi, 19; Acts xv, 28; xvi, 6, 7, etc.

II. It is no less evident that the Holy Ghost is a divine person, equal in power and glory with the Father and Son. 1. Names proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to Him; as Jehovah, Acts xxviii, 25, with Isa. vi, 9, and Hebrews iii, 7, 9, with Exod. xvii, 7; Jer. xxxi, 31, 34; Heb. x, 15, 16. God, Acts v, 3, 4. Lord, 2 Cor. iii, 17, 19. "The Lord, the Spirit." 2. Attributes proper only to the Most High God are ascribed to Him: as omniscience, 1 Cor. ii, 10, 11; Isa. xl, 13, 14. Omnipresence, Ps. cxxxix, 7; Eph. ii, 17, 18; Rom. viii, 26, 27. Omnipotence, Luke i, 35. Eternity, Heb. ix, 14. 3. Divine works are evidently ascribed to Him, Gen. ii, 2; Job xxvi, 13; Ps. xxxii, 6; civ, 30. 4. Worship, proper only to God, is required and ascribed to Him, Isa. vi, 3;

Acts xxviii, 25; Rom. ix, 1; Rev. i, 4. 2 Cor. xiii, 14; Matt. xxviii, 19.

III. The agency or work of the Holy Ghost is divided by some into extraordinary and ordinary. The former by immediate inspiration, making men prophets; the latter by His regenerating and sanctifying influences, making men saints. It is only the latter which is now to be expected. This is more particularly displayed in—1. Conviction of sin, John xvi, 8, 9. 2. Conversion, 1 Cor. xii, ii, 10, 12; Eph. i, 17, 18; John iii, 5, 6. 3. Sanctification, 2 Thess. ii, 13; 1 Cor. vi, 11; Rom. xv, 16. 4. Consolation, John xiv, 16, 26. 5. Direction, John xiv, 17; Rom. xiii, 14. 6. Confirmation, Rom. viii, 16, 26; 1 John ii, 24; Eph. i, 13, 14.

As to the gift of the Holy Spirit, though bestowed in answer to our prayers, it is not expected—1. To inform us immediately, as by a whisper, when either awake or asleep, that we are the children of God; or in any other way than by enabling us to exercise repentance and faith, and love to God and our neighbor. 2. We are not to suppose that He reveals anything contrary to the written Word, or more than is contained in it, or through any other medium. 3. We are not so led by, or operated upon by, the Spirit, as to neglect the means of grace. 4. The Holy Spirit is not promised nor given to render us infallible. 5. Nor is the Holy Spirit given in order that we may do anything which was not before our duty. (See Trinity.)

Household The, How to Bless. An able divine, in a sermon on the text, "Then David returned to bless his household" (2 Sam. vi, 20), thus presents the way in which the head of a family may bless his household, and the reasons which should engage him to attempt it:—

"First, he may 'bless his household' by example. I begin with this, because nothing can supply the want of personal religion. He who despises his own soul will feel little disposition to attend to the souls of others. Destitute of principle, he will be determined only by circumstances, and his exertions, if he makes any, will be partial and rare. Having nothing to animate him from experience, his endeavors will be dull and cold. Where all is merely formal and official, a man will not go far even in the use of means; but what probability is there of his success, when he does use them? Who loves to take his meat from a leprous hand? A drunkard will make a poor preacher of sobriety to servants. A proud and passionate father is a wretched recommender of humility and meekness to his children. What those who are under his care see, will more than counteract what they hear; and all his efforts will be rejected, with the questions, 'Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? Thou that sayest a man should not commit adultery, dost thou commit adultery?' To what is it owing that the offspring of many professors are worse than those of other men? Inconsistency. Inconsistency is more injurious than neglect. The one may be resolved into a forgetfulness of principle; the other shows a contempt of it. You little imagine how early and how effectively children remark things. They notice them when they seem incapable of any distinct observation; and while you would suppose no impression could be left on such soft materials, a fixed turn is given to many a part of the future character. You must therefore reverence them, and be circumspect even in your most free and relaxing moments. You must do, as well as teach; and while you are humble before God, you must be able to say to them, 'Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ.'

"It is commonly observed that example does more than precept. But the young are peculiarly alive to example; and when example has the advantage of nearness and constant exhibition, and unites both authority and endearment, it must prove the most powerful and insensible transformer; and requires in those who furnish it, and who will necessarily be imitated, that they 'abstain from all appearance of evil.' We only add here, that they who constitute your moral charge, are not so much affected and swayed by any direct and positive urgings as by the presence and exemplification and sight of 'whatsoever things are lovely and of good report.' The force of the household is not to be compared with the genial influence of the Spring, by which, without violence and without noise, everything is drawn into bud and bloom.

"Secondly. He may 'bless his household' by government. Order is Heaven's first law. God Himself is the example of it; and by nothing does He bless His creatures more, than by the steadiness of the order of Nature, and the regularity of the seasons. What uncertainty is there in the ebbing and flowing of the tides? What deviation in the changes of the moon? The sun knoweth his going down. Even the comet is not eccentric; in traversing the boundlessness of space, he performs his revolutions of fifty or a hundred years, to a moment. And in all the works of God, what seems disorder is only arrangement beyond our comprehension, for 'in wisdom He has made them all.'

"Hear the Apostle 'Let everything be done decently and in order.' The welfare of your household requires that you should observe times. Everything should have its season—your business, your meals, your devotional exercises, your rising and your rest. The periods for these will vary with the condition of families, but labor to be as punctual as circumstances will allow. It is of importance to peace and temper, and diligence and economy. Confusion is friendly to every evil work. Disorder also multiplies disorder. For no one thinks of being exact with those who set at nought all punctuality.

"The same principle requires that you should keep everything in its place. Subordination is the essence of all order and rule. Never suffer the distinctions of life to be broken down. All violations of this kind injure those who are below the gradation, as well as those above it. The relinquishment of authority may be as wrong as its excesses. He that is responsible for the duties of any relation, should claim its prerogatives and powers. How else is he to discharge them? Be kind and affable to servants; but let nothing divest you of the mistress. Be the tenderest of fathers; but be the father; and no sensible woman will, I am sure, be offended if I add, be the most devoted of husbands, but be the husband.

Thirdly, By Discipline. This regards the treatment of offences: 'For it must needs be that offences will come;' and what is to be done with them? Here two extremes are to be avoided. The one is severity. You are not to magnify trifles into serious evils; and instead of a cheerful countenance to wear a gloom; and instead of commending, to be always finding fault; and instead of enlivening everything around you like the weather in Spring, to be a continual dropping in a rainy, winter day. Instead of making home repulsive, let it possess every attraction, and abound with every indulgence and allowance the exclusions of Scripture do not forbid. Instead of making a child tremble and retreat, gain his confidence and love, and let him run into your arms. 'Fathers,' says the Apostle (for this fault lies mostly with our sex), 'Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, lest they be discouraged.' The other is indulgence—a foolish fondness, or connivance at things actually wrong, or pregnant with evil. This often shows itself with regard to favorites. And here, ye mothers, let not your good be evil spoken of. Do not smother your darlings to death with kisses; and let not your tender bosom be an asylum for delinquents appealing from the deserved censures of the father. The success of such appeals, with kind but weak minds, is very mischievous: it makes preferences where there should be an evenness of regard, and tends to check and discourage wholesome reproof; and 'he that spareth the rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chasteneth him betimes.' 'Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying.' Here Eli failed; 'his sons made themselves vile and he restrained them not.' Here also David erred; he had not displeased Adonijah at any time in saying, 'Why hast thou done so?' When the head of a family cannot prevent the introduction of improper books; the visits of infidel or profane companions; the indulgence of ensnaring usages and indecent discourse; the putting forth of pretensions above his rank; the incurring of expenses beyond his income; does he bear rule in his own house? Is it thus that he puts away evil from his tabernacle? Is it thus that he blesses his household?

"For what is Abraham commended? 'I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the ways of the Lord, to do justice and judgment.' Not that he was the tyrant, and terrified his family with the blackness of his frown, or the roughness of his voice. We no more admire a despot in the house than in the State; but he was decided and firm; not only telling his servants and children what they were to avoid or what they were to perform, but requiring and enforcing obedience by the authority of his station. But proper authority requires dignity as well as power. What can he do, whose levities, and follies, and ignorance, and weakness, deprive him of all awe, and all influence, and all impression? Are we to smile or sigh at the thought of some children being in subjection to their parents, and of some wives being called upon to reverence their husbands? Is there no law to protect females and children? As to children, the case is not voluntary; they deserve pity. But no sympathy is due to females who throw themselves into the empire of folly and weakness, and willingly choose a condition whose duties it is sinful for them to neglect and impossible for them to perform.

“Fourthly, By Instruction. ‘For the soul to be without knowledge, it is not good.’ And this holds supremely true of religious knowledge. ‘These words,’ says Moses, ‘which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.’ Here observe not only the duty, but the manner in which he has enjoined the performance of it. He would make it a constant, a familiar, an easy, a pleasing exercise—a recreation rather than a task. In another place he says, ‘When thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies and the statutes and the judgments which the Lord our God hath commanded you? Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh’s bondmen in Egypt; and the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand. And the Lord showed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes; and he brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he sware unto our fathers. And the Lord commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the Lord our God for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the Lord our God as he hath commanded us.’ Nothing can be more natural than this recommendation. The curiosity of children is great, and will commonly, if judiciously treated, furnish you with sufficient opportunities to inform them. Their questions will show you the bias of their disposition, the state of their minds, and the nature and degree of the information it is proper to administer; and in various cases it is less necessary to go before them than to follow. Events too are always turning up; and these will afford a wise parent a thousand hints of natural and reasonable improvement. Yet there are those who, though they levy a tax upon everthing their avarice, sagacity and zeal can find to promote the temporal interests of their offspring, never seize and turn to a religious account any of those occurrences of the day and of the neighborhood, whether pleasing or awful, that might so easily be made to speak not only to the understanding, but to the imagination and the heart.

“Fifthly, By securing their attendance on the Means of Grace. Servants should be allowed opportunities of public worship and instruction, as often as circumstances will permit; and we admire the plan of our forefathers, who disengaged their domestics as much as possible on the Sabbath, from the preparations of the table, that they might be at liberty to go themselves and get food for their souls. Children also should be led to the House of God—though there is a proper time for their “showing unto Israel.” In determining this, it is not easy to draw the line. If they are taken too early, besides hindering the attention of those who have the charge of them, there is danger that holy exercises will become irksome by frequent and long detentions before they can feel any interest in them. Yet an early attendance is valuable, as it tends to render the habit natural; and impressions may be occasionally made, even upon infant minds, sufficient to lead them to inquire, and to aid you much in your endeavors to instruct them at home.

“Lastly, By Domestic Devotion. This service ought to be performed every morning and evening. It includes prayer. Prayer is not only to be made for your family—though this is a duty and a privilege, and enables you to obtain for your household a thousand blessings—but also with them. It takes in also reading the Scriptures. Mr. Henry goes further: ‘They,’ says he, ‘who daily pray in their houses do well; they that not only pray, but read the Scriptures, do better; but they do best of all who not only pray and read the Scriptures, but sing the praises of God.’ This exercise is very enlivening, and tends to throw off the formality which adheres perhaps more to domestic worship than either to public or private devotion, as it allows of less variety. If singing be not practicable, a psalm or hymn may be read. It will often produce a good effect, by impressing the minds of servants and children. The whole of the service will help you in performing what we have previously recommended, the duty of teaching and admonishing your families. The psalm or hymn will furnish them with sentiments and sentences. The reading of the word will store their minds with facts and doctrine, while the prayer itself will be no inconsiderable instructor. The very engagement will remind them of the presence and agency of God. Your addressing Him for pardon will convince them of guilt; your interceding for your country will teach them patriotism; for your enemies, forgiveness of injuries; for all mankind, universal benevolence. Thus a man may bless his household. Let us consider—

“II. THE REASONS WHICH SHOULD ENGAGE HIM TO ATTEMPT IT.

“For this purpose, let us view Domestic Religion,

“First, In reference to God. To Him it has—a relation of responsibility. We are required to glorify God in every condition we occupy; in every capacity we possess. A poor man is required to serve Him; but if he becomes rich, his duty is varied and enlarged; and from the hour of his acquiring wealth he will be judged by the laws of affluence. A single man is required to serve God as an individual only; but if he enters into connected life, he must serve God as the head of a family, and will be judged by the duties arising from his household relation. God has given him a talent, and he is to make use of that talent. He has committed to him a trust, and he is to be faithful to that trust. He has made him a steward, and he is to give account of his stewardship. ‘I assigned you,’ will God say, ‘the empire of a family. To qualify you for the office, I furnished you with authority, and influence, and resources. How have you employed them? Where are the servants and children you were to have trained up for me?’

“A relation of gratitude. How much dost thou owe to this kindness and care! Who crowned the wish of thy heart in granting thee the object of thy dearest choice? Behold thy wife, like a fruitful vine by the sides of thy house; and thy children, like ‘olive plants round about thy table.’ Who has supplied not only all thy personal, but all thy relative wants? Whose secret has been upon thy tabernacle? Whose providence has blessed the labor of thy hand? Whose vigilance has suffered no evil to befall thee, and no plague to come nigh thy dwelling? And wilt thou refuse to serve Him, with a family which He has formed, and secured, and sustained, and indulged? And wilt thou, instead of making thy house the temple of His praise, render it the grave of His mercies?

“A relation of dependence. Can you dispense with God in your family? What are all your schemes, all your exertions, all your expectations, without Him? ‘Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows; for so he giveth his beloved sleep.’ How wise is it, then, to secure the favor of one who has all things under His control, and is able to make them all work together for your good, or conspire to your destruction. And has he not bound Himself by promise and by threatening? ‘The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked; but he blesseth the habitation of the just.’ What may not be dreaded from the curse of the Almighty? What may not be expected from His blessing? Under the one, the evils of life become intolerable; we sow much, and bring home little; we earn wages to put it into a bag with holes; our table becomes a snare; our successes gender many foolish and hurtful lusts; our prosperity destroys us. Under the other, a little is better than the riches of many wicked; our trials are alleviated; our sorrows are tokens for good; our comforts are enjoyed with a relish which others never taste; the voice of rejoicing and of salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous. Therefore—“Secondly, View it in reference to yourselves. You ought to be concerned chiefly for your spiritual welfare; and should value things as they tend to restrain you from sin and excite you to holiness. If this maxim cannot be denied, let us judge by this rule—the man who performs this duty and the man who neglects it. Can he give way to swearing and falsehood, who is going to hear from God and to speak to Him? Can he throw himself into a fury, who is just going to hold intercourse with the source of peace and love? Must he not guard his temper and conduct, even on the principle of consistency? The other exonerates himself from the reproach of hypocrisy; and because he makes no pretensions to duty, thinks he is justified in living as he pleases. And this it is that restrains many from adopting the practice. They think that it would embarrass them; that it would abridge their liberty; that it would fit upon them the charge of inconsistency. And so far they think justly. But here is their folly: in viewing a freedom from moral motives and restraints as a privilege, and an obligation to urge them to what is right and beneficial in itself, as a hardship and complaint!

“And the practice is not only right, but every way profitable. While you teach you learn; while you do good you are gaining good. Your mind will be tranquillized by a confidence in God, which you alone are justified in reposing, and which you alone can repose in Him. How much does your comfort depend on the dutifulness of those that are under you! But how can you look for morality without piety? It is by teaching them to regard God that you must teach them to regard yourselves, and to be diligent and submissive in their places. It is thus you bind them by sanctions the most powerful, and which operate in your absence, as well as when you are nigh. It is thus you are not only obeyed, but regarded and honored. Religion, when it is consistently exemplified, always inspires respect and reverence. But what hold have the irreligious on the homage of others? So true it is even here, ‘They that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.’ View it—

“Thirdly, In reference to the Family. By how many ties ought the members of your household to be endeared! ‘And we do love them.’ But wherein does your love appear? Can you imagine that it only requires you to ask, what shall they eat, and what shall they drink, and wherewithal shall they be clothed? What is the body to the soul? What is time to eternity? Do you wish to do them good? Can any good equal that godliness which ‘is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come?’

“Were you to suffer your children to go naked, to perish with hunger; were you to leave them in sickness to die alone, you would be shunned as monsters. But you are far more deserving of execration, if you infamously disregard their spiritual and everlasting welfare. Doubtless Herod was viewed with horror by those who had witnessed the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem; but he was far less cruel than some of you. He slew the children of others; you destroy your own. He only killed the body, you destroy both body and soul in hell. Had you any real love to your children, what would be your feelings in life to see them going astray, and verifying, by the evils of their conduct, that the way of transgressors is hard, while conscious that you have done nothing to secure them from it! But what, at death, would you think of a meeting that must take place between you and your children, in the great day! Then they will rise up against you in the judgment, and cause you to be put to death. ‘Cursed be the day of my birth! Why died I not from the womb? Why was I not as a hidden untimely birth, as infants that never see light? Thou father, and thou mother, the instruments of my being, to you I am under no obligations. You only consulted your barbarous inclinations. You gave me an existence over which you watched while I could not be guilty; but mercilessly abandoned me as soon as I became responsible. As the creature of a day, you provided for me; but as an immortal, you left me—you made me—to perish. I execrate your cruelty. I call for damnation upon your heads; and the only relief of the misery to which you have consigned me is, that I can reproach and torment you forever.’

“From such a dreadful scene, how delightful is it to think what a happy meeting there will be between those who have blessed their households and the favored subjects of their pious care! Yea, without going forward to this period of mutual and happy acknowledgment, what a joy unspeakable and full of glory must such benefactors feel even now, when they hear a servant saying, ‘Blessed be God for the hour I entered such a family. I was as ignorant and careless as a heathen; but there the eyes of my understanding were opened, there my feet were turned into the path of peace.’ Or when they hear a child confessing, ‘Oh, what a privilege that I was born of such parents! How early did they teach me to know the Holy Scriptures! How soon they led me to the Throne of Grace; and, by teaching me to pray, furnished me with the best privilege of life! How patiently they watched, and how tenderly they cherished, and how wisely they directed every pious sentiment and every holy purpose! And—

“As a bird each fond endearment tries,
To tempt her new-fledged offspring to the skies,
They tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.”

“It is thus their children rise up and call them blessed! Let us view it—“Fourthly, In reference to Visitants and Guests. These, instead of inducing you to decline the practice, should furnish you with argument in support of it. Woe be to you, if you shrink back from the duty in compliment to the rich, the infidel, the irreligious, or the dissipated—should such ever be found beneath your roof! For ‘he that is ashamed of me and of my words,’ says the Saviour, ‘of him will the Son of man be ashamed, when he comes in the clouds of heaven, with the holy angels.’

“It is not by concealing your principles, but by owning them verbally and practically, that you must be useful to others, and gain their respect. And here you have an opportunity to confess Him before men; and without going out of your way to effect it. It cannot appear to be sought after to give offence. It comes, in the regular course of your household arrangement. And nothing is more likely, without effort and without officiousness, to awaken attention, to inform, to admonish. The preacher remembers well the acknowledgment of a man now with God. He moved in superior life; and, from his rank and talents and extensive and various acquaintance, was likely to have persons frequently at his house who were strangers to his religious economy. He said his manner was, when the time of domestic service arrived, to inform them that he was always accustomed to worship God with his family; if they disliked the practice, they might remain; if they chose to attend, they might accompany him into the library. He said he had never known any that refused; and many of them owned they were much struck with the propriety and usefulness of the usage, and resolved, on their return, to adopt it themselves. The lecturer has also known several individuals himself, whose religious course commenced during a visit to a family who thus honored God and were thus honored by Him. It is recorded, I believe, of Sir Thomas Abney, that even when he was Lord Mayor of London, and on the evening of the feast, he told the company that he always maintained the worship of God in his house; that he was now withdrawing for the purpose, and should presently return. There are few professors of religion who could have done this. They would not have had consciousness enough of their claim to confidence in their integrity. But where the thing was known to be, not the pretence, or show of extraordinary sanctity, but the steady and uniform operation of principle; not an exception from common conduct, but, fine as it was, only a fair specimen of the whole piece; this noble resolution must have produced some impression, even in such an assembly. Observe it—

“Fifthly, In reference to the Country. None of us should live to ourselves. Every one should be concerned to benefit and improve a community in which he enjoys so many advantages. But we know that ‘righteousness exalteth a nation,’ and that ‘sin is a reproach to any people.’ What an enemy, then, are you, if irreligious, to a country that deserves so much at your hands! However loyally you may talk, you contribute to its danger and disgrace, not only by your personal transgressions, but by sending out into the midst of it so much moral contagion, so many unprincipled and vicious individuals, from your own family. And how much would you befriend it were you to fear God yourselves, and to send forth those from under your care who will serve their generation according to his will, and induce Him to say, ‘Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it!’ Who can imagine the good even one of these individuals may effect, by his prayers, his example, his influence, his exertions? What a blessing did Elkanah and Hannah prove to Israel by their training up such a child as Samuel! And what gratitude do all ages owe to his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice, for such a character as Timothy!

“Finally, Let us regard it in reference to the Church. Baxter thinks that if family religion was fully discharged, the preaching of the Word would not long remain the general instrument of conversion. Without being answerable for the extent of this observation, we know who hath said, ‘Train up a child in the way that he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it.’ We know that among our earlier godly ancestors, religion was a kind of heirloom that passed by descent; and instead of the fathers were the children. Families were then the nurseries of the churches; and those who were early ‘planted in the house of the Lord flourished in the courts of our God, and still brought forth fruit in old age.’ Even the ministers of the sanctuary were commonly derived from hence; and these domestic seminaries prepared them to enter the more public Institutions. And what well-defined and consistent characters did they display! And what just notions did they entertain of divine truth! And how superior were they to those teachers who, brought up in ignorance, and after a profligate course, are suddenly converted; who, impressed before they are informed, are always in danger of extremes or eccentricities; who hold no doctrine in its just bearings, but are carried away disproportionably by some one truth, which first caught their attention; and who often continue crude and incoherent in their notions, and illiberal and condemnatory in their sentiments, through life! They were not always making discoveries, but ‘continued in the things which they had learned, and been assured of, knowing of whom they had learned them.’ They were enlightened, but not dazzled. They were refreshed with divine truth, but not intoxicated. They staggered not, but kept on steady in their course; neither turned to the right hand nor to the left. They were not Antinomians, they were not Legalists. None could honor the grace of God more, but they never abused it.

“Not only, therefore, would the churches of Christ be more filled, but better filled; and though our eye is not evil, because God is good, and so far from wishing to limit the Holy One of Israel, we rejoice in the conversion of any; we reckon, and not without much observation, that the best members and the best ministers of our churches—they who, in their conduct and in their preaching, most adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things, are those who are brought from pious families.”

Houston, Rev. Samuel Rutherford, D. D., was born in Rockbridge county, Va., March 12th, 1806. He received his collegiate education in Dickinson College, and spent six years in teaching in the “Deaf Mute and Blind Institution,” Philadelphia. He has ever shown, in his very earnest manner and expressive gesticulation, the fruits of his experience in that kind of teaching. After spending one year in professional study in Princeton Seminary, he completed his course in Union Seminary, Va. Soon after his licensure by Lexington Presbytery, of Virginia, he was ordained by the same an evangelist, with a view to foreign missionary service. He was assigned by the A. B. C. F. M. to Scio, in Greece. Losing his wife by death, and with his colleague, Rev. G. W. Leyburn, having failed to secure a permanent location in the work in Sparta, by reason of their refusal to teach the Catechism of the National Greek Church, both Mr. Houston and Mr. Leyburn returned to the United States. Mr. Houston soon found employment in Monroe county, Va., and took charge of the churches in that county which had grown up under the labors of Rev. Dr. McElhenny, the great pioneer pastor and missionary in the part of the Mississippi valley lying in Virginia. His pastorate of over forty years in the churches of Mount Pleasant and Union, Monroe, has been eminently successful, and he is now surrounded by large congregations, mostly composed of those whom he had baptized in infancy and trained in childhood and youth. Quite a large number, including his oldest son, have followed him into the ministry of Christ. Though now loaded with the infirmities of nearly eighty years, he continues to preach, and shows to younger ministers an example of long-lived and successful service. He still “brings forth fruit in old age.”

Hughes, Isaac Minor, D. D., was born December 23d, 1831, in Ashland county, Ohio, of a godly

Scotch-Irish ancestry. He graduated at Miami University, in June, 1855, ranking second in a class of twenty-three. The Faculty of this Institution selected him as one of its future Professors; but within three months after his graduation he was elected Professor of Greek in Westminster College, Fulton, Mo. This position he filled, with marked success and popularity, from September, 1855, to February, 1858, when he became Principal of Seven-Mile Academy, Butler county, Ohio. The pulpit of the Fulton Presbyterian Church being vacant during a large part of his residence in that place, Professor Hughes was often called upon by the Session to lecture to the congregation. In these informal addresses he developed rare gifts as an orator, and thus his attention was attracted to the work of the holy ministry. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Oxford, in October, 1858, and ordained and installed pastor of Venice Church in August, 1860. From June, 1870, to the present time, he has been the successful and popular pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Richmond, Ind., one of the largest and most important fields in that rich and prosperous State. Dr. Hughes was a member of the first Board of Trustees of Wooster University, appointed from the Synod of Cincinnati, and also a Trustee of Hanover College, from which Institution he received the degree of D. D., in June, 1883. His life has been a very busy one. From earliest youth his energies and time have been constantly and severely taxed. But his sunshiny disposition, excellent health, and the singular good fortune of his agreeable surroundings have continually inspired him with that hopefulness which is one of the surest elements of success. Dr. Hughes takes advanced positions upon all the great questions of the day. He advocates the complete emancipation of woman, and more than 20,000 copies of his argument for National Prohibition have been circulated throughout various parts of the country. His ministry has been a succession of ingatherings of souls. He has often been invited to other fields, but has never seen his way clear to part from the Richmond Church.

Hunter, John Garniss, D. D., was born in Maysville, Ky., November 13th, 1840. His father, N. D. Hunter, Esq., was the youngest son of John Hunter and Jennie Wallace, of Westchester county, N. Y. Having graduated from Centre College, Danville, Ky., in 1861, he began the study of law in Cincinnati, under the direction of Hon. Geo. E. Pugh, ex-Senator of Ohio, but left this work for other service. In 1867 he received his diploma from Union Theological Seminary, Hampden-Sidney, Va., and was licensed to preach the gospel by Ebenezer Presbytery. He was installed pastor at Georgetown, Ky., in 1870, where he now lives, despite the calls to other fields of labor, achieving a successful ministry. He holds an important place in Presbyterian and Synodical work. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him, by Westminster College, in June, 1882. Dr. Hunter is of medium height and courteous in his bearing. His oratorical gifts, supplemented by mental endowments, culture and God's grace, make him very attractive in the pulpit. He is modest, with no pretensions, but with a thorough evangelical zeal that makes Christ's glory its aim, first and always. His ministry has resulted in winning many souls to Jesus.

J

Jackson, Rev. Alexander, son of Joseph and Mary (Gilliland) Jackson, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, February 13th, 1845. He entered Glasgow University in 1865. After spending some time there, he went to Edinburgh, at the age of twenty-one, and formed a connection with a business house, with the privilege of using a part of his time in study. Under this arrangement he was enabled to pursue his studies for four years in the University of Edinburgh and one in the Divinity School. He excelled in philosophical studies, and in a class of two hundred was one of fifteen who won high honors. A Duke of Hamilton scholarship was awarded to him, and he returned to Glasgow University, where he graduated. Afterward he spent a year in London, filling a position in the Library of the British Museum. Coming to America, he continued his divinity studies in Auburn Theological Seminary, 1874-76. He was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Amenia, N. Y., June 6th, 1876, and continued in this relation nearly three years. Afterward he supplied pulpits in Newark, N. J., and Chicago, until he was called to the church in Warren, O., where he began work, October 12th, 1879, and where he still remains, faithful in duty and successful in labor. Mr. Jackson is a gentleman of courteous, frank, manly manner, which at once makes an excellent impression. His sermons are generally plain and practical, free from stereotyped phraseology, and well adapted to interest all classes of hearers.

James, Darwin R., the oldest son of Lewis L. and Cerintha (Wells) James, was born at Williamsburg, Mass., May 14th, 1834. His ancestors were of Puritan stock, and were residents of Massachusetts from the early settlement of that State. In the year 1817 the family removed to Brooklyn, N. Y., leaving the subject of this sketch at Mt. Pleasant boarding school, Amherst, Mass., where he was receiving an education to fit him for business. At the age of twenty-three he formed a co-partnership with his young friend, Mitchell N. Packard, and commenced a successful career in New York city, where so many young men go to try their fortune. For twenty-six years the firm of Packard & James, importers of indigo and spices, has maintained an honorable reputation for uprightness and integrity, not only in this country, but in all parts of the commercial world.

At the early age of eighteen Mr. James commenced active Mission Sunday-school work in the outlying parts of the city of Brooklyn, among the destitute, who are mostly Germans. For thirty-one years he has been continuously engaged in directing Missionary effort in this field, where for twenty-seven years he has been Superintendent of one of the largest Mission Sunday schools in the country, the direct outgrowth of which has been two large and strong Presbyterian churches (Throop Avenue Presbyterian and Hopkins Street German Presbyterian) and three or four other Sunday schools. The work carried on at the Mission school in different directions is very extensive, it having been an aggressive agency for Christianizing and elevating the outlying masses of the great city of Brooklyn. Mr. James is a man of intense industry, and being blessed with a fine constitution, excellent health and a desire to work for the Master, he has been able to accomplish more than the average are able to do.

At the age of twenty-eight he was chosen ruling elder of the Throop Avenue Presbyterian Church, and for twenty-one years has been President of its Board of Trustees. In the Presbytery he has been one of its most active workers, and has been very efficient in assisting feeble Presbyterian churches within the bounds of Presbytery. In the city of Brooklyn he holds important positions of trust, being President of a Savings Bank, Treasurer and Trustee in several benevolent organizations, and in New York city is the Secretary of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, probably the most aggressive commercial organization in the United States. For six years he served as Park Commissioner in the city of Brooklyn. He was elected to the Forty-eighth Congress, as a Republican, by a handsome majority, having declined to be a candidate for the Forty-seventh Congress, and for the Mayoralty of the city of Brooklyn. He is a man of simple and unostentatious habits, of sound sense and judgment, of large and practical benevolence, of broad and liberal views on National and State questions, with an extensive acquaintance with the world, having traveled much in the countries and islands of the East and of Europe, as well as in our own country.

Johnson, Rev. Josephus, the only child of Peter and Margaret Josephine (Morrison) Johnson, was born at Water Valley, Miss., December 3d, 1848. His mother died at eighteen years of age, when he was thirteen days old, and her last words were a prayer that he might be a minister. He graduated at the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, 1869; entered the Theological Seminary, at Columbia, S. C., the same year, and graduated May, 1872. He was ordained a Foreign Missionary, August 13th, 1872. Prevented by sickness just before the time of his sailing for China, his going abroad was deferred for one year. His health continuing poor, he came to Texas in May, 1873, and accepted the position of stated supply of Victoria Church, November, 1873. He was called to become pastor, April, 1874, but being still under the care of the Committee of Foreign Missions, he could not accept until after his release. He was installed pastor March 25th, 1875. He has never served any other church.

Mr. Johnson is fortunate in his manner and social qualities. He has the happy faculty of begetting respect and confidence from first introduction, which soon ripens into sincere friendship and love. His style of preaching is earnest and attractive, impressing his hearers with the sincerity of his own convictions and the sacredness of the cause for which he pleads. Gifted in prayer, he forces the conclusion that he is often at the mercy seat. His church is always well filled on the Sabbath, and his people are devotedly attached to him.

Johnston, John, was born at Denmark, Madison county, Tennessee, March 11th, 1842. He joined the Presbyterian Church in Denmark at about the age of eighteen. He was ordained an elder in Lauderdale Street Presbyterian Church, Memphis, Tenn., in the year 1880. In 1882 he was elected a member of the General Assembly's (Southern) Committee of Education.

Johnstone, William O., D.D., was a native of Ireland. He received his collegiate and theological education there; was licensed to preach, and was settled as pastor for a time. Coming to this country in 1851, he accepted a call to the Kensington Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, which he continued to serve, with great fidelity and steady and sure success, until his death—a period of more than thirty-one years. As an expression of the tenderness with which that congregation cherished the memory of their departed pastor, on January 16th, 1884, they placed a mural tablet, of very neat and tasteful design, on the right of the pulpit, bearing the inscription:—

“William O. Johnstone, D.D., a servant of the Lord Jesus, born April 17th, 1822. Pastor of this Church from September 1st, 1851, until his death, January 16th, 1883. ‘Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.’”—Matt. xxv, 21.

Dr. Johnstone was a good man, a forcible preacher, a faithful pastor, and an active and useful presbyter. From the establishment of the Presbyterian Hospital until his decease, he was one of its most important Directors. He had a warm heart, a generous disposition, frankness of manner, and was highly esteemed by his brethren.

K

Keys, W. S. H., D.D., born July 8th, 1826, in Centre county, Pa., is of English descent on his father's and of Scotch-Irish on his mother's side. His father, a successful and somewhat eminent teacher in his day, instructed him in Latin, Greek and the higher Mathematics. Limited otherwise in his educational advantages to the public schools, "self-made" men may justly claim Dr. Keys as one of their number. He entered the ministry in the Church of the "United Brethren in Christ" at the early age of eighteen years. In that ministry he continued for thirty-three years, taking rank among its most efficient workers. He united, in May, 1878, with the Presbyterian Church, entering its ministry in the Northumberland Presbytery, Pa. In September of that year he received a unanimous call to the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church in the city of Parsons, Neosho Presbytery, Synod of Kansas, which he accepted, and entered upon the duties of his charge November 10th. Under his labors the then dependent mission soon rose to a self-sustaining congregation, and became, in five years, numerically the strongest church in the Presbytery to which it belongs. Dr. Keys is genial and entertaining in society, and is an efficient pastor. Possessed of a strong intellect, he handles every subject he treats thoroughly and exhaustively. Morally and religiously, the distinction between right and wrong in all the relations of life, and the gospel of Christ, are to him intense realities. He is a forcible lecturer on living issues, but wields his greatest power in the pulpit.

Kiehle, Rev. Amos Augustus, son of James and Elizabeth (Litchard) Kiehle, was born in Dansville, Livingston county, N. Y., on the 22d of March, 1847. He was educated at Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., from which he graduated in 1871, and pursued the study of theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York city, graduating therefrom in 1874. On the 21st of October, of the same year, he was ordained to the gospel ministry, and installed pastor of the Franklin Avenue Presbyterian Church of Minneapolis, Minnesota. In the zealous discharge of the duties of this pastorate he continued until February, 1878, when he resigned it to accept that of the First Presbyterian Church of Stillwater, Minn., in which field he labored, with ardor and fidelity, and with evident success, until July, 1881, when he received and accepted a call to the pastorate of Calvary Presbyterian Church, of Milwaukee, Wis., which position he is now (1884) filling, to the marked acceptance of a large and growing congregation, and to the promotion of the sacred cause to which he has devoted his talents.

Tall, slender, nervous, quick of movement and speech, and keenly observant, Mr. Kiehle's bearing is that of one who has important work in hand, and is solicitous that it shall be intelligently and faithfully performed. Affable, courteous, sympathetic, he attracts the confidence and esteem of all classes, and thus gains an attentive and thoughtful hearing for the message which he has to proclaim. In the pulpit his manner is earnest, impressive, and his delivery energetic, rhetorical. His sermons are logically arranged, strongly thought out, forcibly illustrated, gracefully written, and instinct with the truth of salvation through Christ alone. In the prime of vigorous life, studious of current events as well as of books, and fully imbued with the magnitude and vital importance of his chosen mission, he gives promise of great and permanent usefulness to the Church, and long and fruitful service in the promulgation of the truths of the Christian religion.

King, Samuel Alexander, D.D., second son of Rev. William M. and Lucy (Railey) King, was born in Woodford county, Ky., October 11th, 1831. The name of "King," handed down to the present generation by a goodly line of Scotch Presbyterian ancestors, has become a right royal title, in that it is a synonym for probity wherever this family have found a home. Descended from a race of great intellectual force, he early evinced a love of learning, and received, under his father's instruction, a classical education. Trained from infancy by a pious mother, he became a member of the church at the age of eleven, and when fifteen years of age, felt it to be his duty and privilege to preach. Thereupon, he resolutely began to prepare, by private study, for this sacred work, but never entered a theological seminary. He removed to Texas in 1851, and was licensed to preach and ordained at San Marcos in 1856. His work has been eminently that of a pioneer, organizing or building up the churches for which he has preached, viz.: Crockett, Centerville, Robinson and Waco. In Waco, his home since 1867, his labors have been greatly blessed, both in his own congregation and in the community. In 1877 Dr. King was delegate to the Pan-Presbyterian Council at Edinburgh, and in 1880 appointed by the Synod of Texas one of its two directors of Southwestern Presbyterian University, Clarksville, Tenn.

Beloved and revered by those of all classes and creeds, on account of his unassuming goodness, his learning, ability and purity of character, he is held in special regard by evangelical Christians, as an able defender of orthodox faith. His sermons are remarkable for strong and lucid argument, beautiful imagery and purity of style. To his fondness for and familiarity with the classics may be traced the fine command of language and elegant diction that characterize his pulpit oratory and contributions to Church papers. He has, in an eminent degree, the rare gift of saying, on special occasions, that which is most appropriate and forcible.

Kirkpatrick, Rev. John Lycan, D.D., was born, January 20th, 1813, in Mecklenburg county, N. C., of pious Presbyterian parents, who were members of Providence Church, by whose pastor, Rev. James Wallis, he was baptized.

When about four years old, he removed, with his parents, to Morgan county, Ga., and thence, in 1827, to De Kalb county. At thirteen years of age he went to reside with his uncle, Rev. John Kirkpatrick, in Cumberland county, Va., and attended a classical school there for two years. In 1830 he entered Franklin College, at Athens, Ga. The main building being burned, he went, the next Fall, to Hampden-Sidney College, Va., and graduated there, with distinction, in September, 1832. After teaching two years at Charlotte Court House, Va., he entered Union Theological Seminary at Hampden-Sidney, Va., January, 1835. Soon after he was formally taken under the care of West Hanover Presbytery, and by them licensed in March, 1837, and in November following ordained and installed pastor of the Second Church, in Lynchburg, Va. In 1841, he accepted a call from the Church in Gainesville, Ala., and was installed pastor by the Presbytery of Tuskalooza, in the Spring of 1842, and held that position until called to the Glebe Street Church, Charleston, S. C., where he removed in the Spring of 1853, and was installed by the Presbytery of Charleston in the Spring of 1854.

His labors in Alabama were abundant, faithful, and greatly blessed. The Gainesville Church enjoyed several extensive revivals under his ministry, and was largely built up. It became one of the strongest, best organized and most efficient churches in the Synod of Alabama, and was by far the most liberal in the support of the various enterprises of the Church. In the same spirit of liberality they generously allowed and encouraged him in extending his eminently popular and able administrations to other churches, and to destitute neighborhoods, and thus greatly enlarged the sphere of his usefulness, the grateful memory and precious fruits of which remain to this day. His pastoral work in Charleston was highly appreciated, and aided much in building up the young church which he served. He is an able and accomplished preacher, instructive, earnest, tender, and in many ways attractive. Having a clear, penetrating and well balanced mind, a sound judgment, an extensive knowledge of men and affairs, and an uncommon share of common sense, he became a most valuable presbyter. Without compromising principle, or the interests of the Church, he was peculiarly skilled in the solution of intricate questions and adjusting conflicting views. He has been a regular and a working member of Presbytery and Synod, and generally entrusted with the most important matters. He has been often a member of the General Assembly—in 1846, at Philadelphia; in 1854, at Buffalo, N. Y.—where he prepared the "Narrative of Religion." Then after the separation, of the Second Southern Assembly, at Montgomery, Alabama, of which he was the Moderator, in 1862; of the three following and of three others since—confirming the estimate given above of his eminent ability as an ecclesiastical counsellor.

During his pastorate in Charleston, S. C., he was for four years the editor of the Southern Presbyterian, a weekly religious journal. He resigned that charge in 1860, to undertake an agency for the Columbia Theological Seminary, which, however, was arrested by the Civil War.

His scholarship is thorough and varied, and has the endorsement of the general public. In 1852 the University of Alabama conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1845 he was elected by the Synod of Alabama Professor in Oglethorpe University, but declined. In 1860 he was elected President of Davidson College, N. C., at that time in a prosperous condition, and removed thither January, 1861. The Civil War, of course, greatly reduced the attendance of students. In 1865 he was elected

Professor of Moral Philosophy and Evidences of Christianity in Washington College (now Washington and Lee University), Lexington, Va., then rising into special prominence, in consequence of the accession of General Robert E. Lee to the Presidency. He accepted and still fills this position. His relations with General Lee were of the most intimate and confidential nature, and his services and rare administrative talents often called into requisition by him.

Whilst residing in Gainesville and Charleston, he received formal calls or tentative overtures from various churches and institutions of learning, such as Petersburg, Va., Princeton, N. J., Mobile, Ala., Baltimore, St. Louis, Louisville, Union Theological Seminary, Hampden-Sidney and University of Alabama, all unsought, either directly or indirectly, and all promptly declined. He is a man of great purity and elevation of character, firm in principle, and yet fair, impartial and generous. He has a fine physique, of commanding appearance, and dignified and courteous manners.

Kirkpatrick, Major Thomas Jellis, is an eminent lawyer of Lynchburg, Va.; is now, perhaps, a little over fifty years of age; but in all the elements of professional skill and ability, time has rather matured than worn his power. He has often been a member of the Virginia Legislature, and there has been ever distinguished for manly and upright views of conduct. He was a son of Rev. John Kirkpatrick, of Cumberland, and at an early age became a communicant, and very soon afterward was elected a ruling elder in the First Church, Lynchburg, where he has ever been found the judicious and trusted aid of the pastor in every good word and work. For twenty years or more he has been prominent in his zealous labors in behalf of the colored people, meeting a Sabbath school composed of them every Sabbath. He gave a hearty and efficient co-operation with the pastors of the Presbyterian churches in Lynchburg in organizing a Presbyterian church for colored people, procuring a pastor and a comfortable and neat house of worship. Though this organization has superseded his labors in the colored Sunday school, he still gives his efficient aid toward every enterprise for the spiritual welfare of the benighted children of Africa. In the courts of the Church his voice is often heard, in eloquent and persuasive words, sustaining all the Christian enterprises of the day and plans for the right ordering of the work of the Church. But for insuperable obstacles, he would probably, in early life, have entered the ministry. But the Church needs scores of just such elders, mighty in word and deed, for her interests, and examples to men in secular life of the entire consistency of a true Christian life with the proper performance of the duties of a citizen in the high places of the State.

Kneass, Strickland, was born in Philadelphia, July 29th, 1821. He was a son of William Kneass, who was for many years engraver for the Mint.

When quite young he decided on civil engineering as his profession, and assisted in the construction of the Delaware and Schuylkill Canal and the Philadelphia and Wilmington Railroad. When this latter work was finished he entered the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, at Troy, N. Y., where he graduated, with the highest honor, in 1839. For a time he was engaged as surveyor on a projected railroad between Harrisburg and Pittsburg, but the enterprise was abandoned. He became connected with the Naval Bureau of Engineering, where he made some important surveys in fixing the northwest boundary line, and in 1847 became one of the assistants of J. Edgar Thompson in the construction of the Pennsylvania Railroad. He was subsequently associate engineer of the North Pennsylvania Railroad, but resigned, in 1855, to become Chief Engineer and Surveyor of Philadelphia, which position he filled until 1872. During his administration the surveys for the drainage system of the city were made. He also prepared the plans for the South street and Chestnut street bridges over the Schuylkill. In 1872 he accepted the position of assistant to the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, which he filled to the time of his death. Mr. Kneass died January 15th, 1884. He was a member of the American Philosophical Society, the Franklin Society and the American Society of Civil Engineers. He was a director in several of the Pennsylvania branch lines. He was a member of the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church, and was universally respected as an upright gentleman and good citizen. His ability in the profession he adopted was never questioned, and he was considered one of the ablest chief engineers the city ever had. His work was marked by extreme care and accuracy and conscientious exactness.

Kneeland, Rev. Martin Dwelle, is the second son of Dr. Jonathan and Miriam Dwelle Kneeland, and was born in Thorn Hill, N. Y., September 24th, 1848. Prepared for college in the Cazenovia Seminary. Graduated from Hamilton College, in 1869, as an honor man, delivering the literary oration; taught one year at Southold, L. I., as principal of the Preparatory School. Graduated from Auburn Theological Seminary in 1873. He was ordained pastor of Presbyterian Church at Waterloo, N. Y., June 1st, 1873, by the Presbytery of Geneva. Remained in Waterloo until August 1st, 1882, during which time three hundred and two united with the church, of whom two hundred and twenty-six were upon profession of faith. October 27th, 1882, Mr. Kneeland was installed, by the Presbytery of Buffalo, pastor of the Church at Fredonia, where, by his consecrated eloquence and zeal, he has already accomplished most excellent results in that enterprising village. The Fredonia Presbyterian, a monthly paper, is published by Mr. Kneeland in the interest of the church, and is a power in the community for morals and good government, as well as for orthodox religion.

Kumler, Jeremiah P. E., D. D., was born in Butler county, O., August 16th, 1830. He graduated at Miami University in 1853. After one year's course in the Associate Reformed Theological Seminary at Oxford, O., he entered Lane Seminary, and graduated in 1856. For four years after his graduation, he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Greenville, O., where he labored, with marked success. He was ordained by Dayton Presbytery in 1877. For eight years, from 1860, he was pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Oxford, O. In 1868 he accepted a call to the Walnut Street Church of Evansville, Ind., and remained with that church till 1871, when he accepted the pastorate of the First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, Ind. In 1875 he accepted a call from the Third Presbyterian Church of Cincinnati, where he still continues his successful labors for the Master. In addition to an intellect of rare vigor, Dr. Kumler's two chief elements of power are a large, sympathetic heart and a vast capacity for hard work. Although possessing considerable executive ability, his especial field is the pulpit. He speaks with ease and fluency, and always without notes. He is a clear and logical thinker, earnest and forcible in his exposition and application of truth, and has an excellent reputation as a preacher.

L

Lacy, Rev. Drury, D.D., now a resident of Moore county, N. C., was born in Prince Edward county, Va., August 5th, 1802. He was the youngest son of Rev. Drury Lacy, one of the most celebrated ministers of the latter part of the eighteenth and earlier years of the nineteenth century. Dr. Lacy commenced life as a teacher in the home of his father, who had established a classical school at his residence, in which first his oldest and then his youngest son succeeded him. After teaching five or six years, he became a communicant in the church under the ministry of Rev. Dr. Nettleton, in Prince Edward, in 1828. He at once gave up his school and entered the seminary. His residence was three miles distant, but no student was more regular in scholastic duties, though he often walked to the seminary and back home daily. His ministry was commenced as a missionary in adjoining counties. Then he was called to Newbern, N. C., and after a pastorate of three years, settled in Raleigh. Here he made his reputation, both as a preacher and pastor. After eight years he was elected President of Davidson College, a post which he filled, with honor to himself and profit to the college, for six years. The duties of the office, however, proving too arduous, he resigned in 1861, and took a missionary field in Orange Presbytery. After the close of the war he settled in Raleigh, and spent his latter years, from 1865 to 1878, supplying vacant churches in the vicinity and teaching in the Peace Female Institute. Since 1878 increasing infirmities have forbidden active duties.

Dr. Lacy has ever been distinguished for his excellent literary taste, and his strong abhorrence for all that was contrary to sound doctrine and upright practice. Modest and unassuming, ever acting on the motto, esse quam videri, he has uniformly avoided all efforts at self-promotion, but has had the highest appreciation of those who knew him best. May his declining sun set in this life in peace and rise amid the glories of immortal life!

Lamberson, Rev. Samuel Lewis, was born at Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., September 14th, 1809. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1828; entered Princeton Seminary in the same year; spent a portion of two winters there, and then, on account of ill health, removed to the more congenial climate of Virginia, prosecuting his theological studies in Union Theological Seminary, in that State. He was licensed by West Hanover Presbytery. His life was chiefly spent in Virginia and Illinois, and with much usefulness as a teacher and preacher. His decease occurred at Pittsfield, Mass., July 17th, 1875, at the age of sixty-five years and ten months. He died in firm faith and with many utterances of love to his Redeemer.

Lawrence, Rev. Daniel, was born on Long Island, in 1718; was a student at the Log College, and was licensed at Philadelphia, May 28th, 1745. At the request of the people of the Forks of Delaware he was sent, May 24th, 1746, to supply them for a year, with a view to settlement, and in October a call was presented to him. He was ordained April 2d, 1747, and installed on the third Sabbath in June. His health giving way in so laborious a field, he spent the Winter and Spring of 1751 at Cape May; afterward removed there, and was installed pastor June 20th, 1751. Of his ministry little is known. The records mention him as a frequent supply of the Forks, and as going to preach, in 1755, at "New England, over the mountains." He died April 13th, 1766.

Lawrence, Thomas, D.D., was born June 5th, 1832, at Crossford, Lanarkshire, Scotland, but reared in Allegheny City, Pa. He graduated at the Western University in 1858, and studied theology at Xenia and Allegheny. He was licensed December 26th, 1860, by the Presbytery of Allegheny, and ordained September 8th, 1862, by Argyle. He was pastor of Putnam, Washington county, N. Y., September, 1862, to June 18th, 1871. He spent two years in Germany, in the Universities of Bonn and Leipsic. He transferred his connection in September, 1869, to the Presbyterian Church; filled a pastorate at Sharpsburg, Pa., and is now a Professor in Biddle University, established at Charlotte, N. C., for the Freedmen. When Mr. Lawrence was retiring from Sharpsburg Church, to assume the Professor's Chair, his Presbytery, in October, 1879, took the following action:—

“In dissolving the pastoral relation which has subsisted for eight years between Rev. Thomas Lawrence and the Presbyterian Church of Sharpsburg, the Presbytery bears witness to the uniform attendance, active interest, fraternal bearing, prudent counsel and ministerial devotion of our brother. While expressing our regret at the loss we are about to sustain, we give our testimony to his eminent fitness for the important position to which he has been called. We beg him to accept and to carry to his distant field the assurance of our enduring and prayerful remembrance of him and his work.”

Leake, Rev. Samuel, a native of Virginia, was licensed by the Presbytery of Hanover, at Tinkling Spring, Va., April 18th, 1766, and was ordained May 3d, 1770, and settled as pastor of Rich Cove and North Garden Presbyterian churches, Albemarle county, Va. Mr. Leake's pastorate was short, being brought to an end by his death, December 2d, 1775. A large proportion of his numerous descendants have been pious. The blessing of God has rested upon his house.

Ledyard, Rev. Edward P., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., May 11th, 1841. He was graduated at Princeton College, with the highest honors of his class, in 1864; entered the Theological Seminary in Princeton the same year; serving also as Tutor of Mathematics in the College during the two later years of his seminary course. After graduation he was called to the Presbyterian Church at Rondout (now Kingston), on the Hudson, and was ordained and installed pastor of that church, by the Presbytery of North River, August 29th, 1867. His ministry in that field was marked with great success and profit. In 1874 he was unanimously called to the pastorate of the Mt. Auburn Church, one of the most prominent in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio. His abilities here found more ample scope, and he cultivated the field with such skill and talent as to make him eminent among his brethren in the Presbytery, as a faithful pastor, an eloquent preacher and an active, efficient presbyter. In 1883 he resigned the charge of the Mt. Auburn Church, to accept a call from the Second Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, Ohio.

Mr. Ledyard is a minister of rare scholarship; his mind rather of a mathematical than imaginative order, his preaching being largely expository and practical, following the rule and line of God's Word, yet embellished with vivid illustrations. His sermons are always polished, and are “means of grace,” in the highest sense, to the people.

Lenox College, Hopkinton, Iowa. As early as 1854, H. A. Carter, Esq., one of the earliest settlers on the site of the present town of Hopkinton, conceived the purpose of founding an Institution of learning, in which his own children and others might be educated at or near home. The plan was heartily endorsed by another early settler, Leroy Jackson, Esq. Through the efforts of these men, a joint stock company was soon formed to effect this object. During the year 1856 a two-story brick building, sixty by forty feet, was erected in the midst of four acres of beautifully situated land, donated by Mr. Carter. The completion of the building was delayed, from lack of funds, in the hard times that soon set in. However, in 1859, the building was in a condition to admit the opening of the school, under the management of a local board of trustees, on September 1st, the carpenters yet being at work in fitting up some of the rooms. The Rev. Jerome Allen, a graduate of Amherst College, who had been five years Professor in Alexander College, Dubuque, was President, and also in charge of the Presbyterian Church of the village. He, with O. E. Taylor, Miss Lucy A. Cooley and Miss Julia P. Allen, constituted the Faculty. The attendance of students of both sexes was encouraging.

The new Institution bore the name of Bowen Collegiate Institute, from Chauncey S. Bowen, of Chicago, who had given liberally in aid of the enterprise. President Allen visited the churches, attended Teachers' Institutes, gave lectures and other literary entertainments, in order to raise funds and publish the School. His work, zealously prosecuted, resulted in securing several hundred dollars from abroad. Thus the campus was enclosed, and other current expenses were met. But the Trustees found themselves unable to remove the debt incurred by the erection of the building. Messrs. Carter and Jackson, two of the principal stockholders, were the chief creditors. In 1863 they obtained from the court in Delaware county a sheriff's deed for the entire property of the corporation; and in the same year, by the advice of President Allen, presented it to the Synod of Iowa (O. S.), which, as Alexander College had permanently failed, had now no Institution under its care. The only condition of the offer was, that the Synod should engage to maintain the Institution on the co-education plan, at a grade sufficiently high to prepare young men for the Sophomore Class in College, and young women for the corresponding class in the best ladies' seminaries. The Synod accepted the offer, and appointed a committee of seven to mature a plan of management and report to Synod at its next regular meeting.

In the Fall of 1861 the Synod met in Hopkinton, and appointed a full Board of Trustees for the ownership and control of the Institution. Of this Board the Rev. J. L. Wilson was made President, an office which, by annual re-election, he continues to hold. At the same time the name was changed to Lenox Collegiate Institute, in honor of the well-known friend of the Institutions of the Presbyterian Church, James Lenox, Esq., of New York. The school as such, under the former name, had not been a failure. In 1863 President Allen resigned the presidency of the school, though he retained his professorship and continued to supply the Presbyterian Church. The Rev. James W. McKean was elected his successor. He was not, however, allowed to remain long in this position. He died in 1865.

In September, 1861, the Rev. J. D. Mason, of Davenport, long a faithful servant of the church, was induced to accept the Presidency of Lenox. He was pleased to hold this position less than a year. In the Fall of this year, Miss Mary A. George, a graduate of Kimball Union Academy, Meriden, N. H., was elected preceptress. In this position she labored most devotedly for sixteen years, in the promotion of accurate scholarship, by drilling her classes thoroughly in the elements of their various studies. With a like anxiety she sought to form the character of the young ladies of the school, by urging them to a conscientious regard for the requirements of duty in the recitation room and outside of it, and in every sphere. During the vacancies occasioned by the death of President McKean and by the resignation of President Mason, Rev. Professor Allen stood in the breach. Besides being pastor of the church, he was acting as President and financial agent. In various ways he rendered most efficient service. In the Fall term of 1865 the attendance of students was unusually large. Among them were many returned soldiers. In October of this year the Rev. Samuel Hodge, of East Tennessee, visited the Synod of Iowa, in session at Marion. Professor Allen solicited him to preach in Hopkinton and visit the school, and the next week he was employed as Professor of Languages, Ancient and Modern, for one year. Early in 1866 Professor Allen resigned connection with the Institution. He has since occupied important posts in the work of public instruction. He is now (1884) President of the State Normal School of Minnesota, at St. Cloud.

At the meeting of the Synod of Iowa (O. S.), in Dubuque, October, 1866, Prof. Hodge was by the Synod elected President. He held this position until March 28th, 1882. With the exception of an annual appropriation of at first $300, afterward $250, from the Board of Education, tuition fees were the sole reliance for meeting all expenses. The appropriation of the Board was at length discontinued. The President, therefore, continued to fill the pastorate of the church in connection with his appropriate office, in order to a support. This double relationship continued for ten years. The new President, by authority of the Board, directed his efforts toward clearing off the accumulating debts of the Institute. These efforts were finally successful. In 1870 the Synod recommended the Board of Trustees to endow the Presidency in at least the sum of $10,000. This work was vigorously undertaken. Within the three years that followed, by various donations in land, in money, in interest-bearing notes, and especially by the legacy of Converse Clarke, a youthful student of Lenox, who died at Colorado Springs, the endowment fund reached the nominal sum of $18,000 to $20,000. It had been found necessary, in order to compete successfully with the constantly growing public school system, and with other denominational schools, to raise the grade of the Institution. Many students demanded preparation for teaching and for business life. Many expected never to attend another Institution. The essentials of a college course were therefore provided. Three courses of study—Classical, Scientific and Young Ladies' were adopted. The curriculum was extended so as to enable classical graduates to enter the Junior class in the best colleges.

In 1873 a charter conferring full college powers was obtained. For some years the exercise of these powers was held in abeyance. It was hoped that the full sum of $50,000, now recommended by the Synod for endowment purposes, might be obtained.

Meanwhile, members of the graduating classes received from the Faculty certificates of having completed their respective courses of study. The Institution was growing, with a reputation for thorough scholarship and firm, yet parental discipline, in public favor. Professors of rare talent and ability, from time to time, had been secured for the different departments of instruction. Among these may be mentioned Professor Wm. G. Hammond, afterward Chancellor of the Law Department of the State University of Iowa, and now occupying a similar position in St. Louis, Mo.; Professors Samuel Calvin and T. H. McBride, now jointly in charge of the Department of Natural Science in the State University of Iowa; in more recent years, also, Professor C. A. Leonard, now Professor of Latin in the Central University of Kentucky. In 1875, to meet the demand for enlarged accommodation required by the increase of students, an east wing, fifty-five by thirty feet was, by the contributions chiefly of the people of Hopkinton and vicinity, added to the main building. As other Institutions were being established, asking the patronage of the public, and especially of the Presbyterian Church, the Board of Trustees at length resolved to exercise the full college powers secured to the Institution by her charter. The class of 1881 was the first to receive, at the hands of the President, diplomas with the much prized degrees. The Board, also, resolved to confer upon the graduates of former years equal privileges on application.

Although the endowment has never yet been adequate, still, by a careful use of the income, by prompt payment of salaries, though small, and other current expenses, the Institution has had but little difficulty in recent years of furnishing a full and competent Faculty.

In the way of Christian work special gratitude is due the great Head of the Church for what has been accomplished. A decidedly Christian atmosphere has, from the first, surrounded the school. Repeated revivals of religion have taken place. Many of the students have been converted to God. Under the inspiration of prayer and praise and "solemn vows," quite a number have gone forth as heralds of salvation; many others, in various professions and callings, are working for the Master. The Institution now takes its stand as a college in title, as well as in powers and rights. The Synod of Iowa, at its last meeting (October, 1883), granted leave to the trustees so to amend their Articles of Incorporation as to change the name to Lenox College. After the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Hodge, the Board of Trustees elected Prof. James A. Ritchey, of Western Pennsylvania, to the Presidency. Thus, with a scholarly President, an efficient and popular Faculty and an increasing number of students, Lenox College, the oldest existing Presbyterian Institution in the State, hopefully contemplates the future, ready for the work which the Master has for her to do in Northern Iowa.

Long, Rev. Mahlon, A.M., Ph. D., was born in Warminster, Pa., March 6th, 1809. He was engaged in rural occupations in his youth. After teaching for a considerable time, he was employed as clerk in the public offices at the county seat, Doylestown, and in the Doylestown Bank of Bucks county. After graduating at the College of New Jersey, in 1839, he taught a classical school in the neighborhood of his father's residence a year or two, and then pursued the study of theology at New Haven, Conn. He was associated as a student with the Theological Seminary of Yale University three years, but at the expiration of two years he was examined and licensed to preach the gospel by the Fourth Presbytery of Philadelphia, in 1845. In 1847 he was invited to become Principal of the Academy at Harrisburg, and under his direction the Institution rose to an unwonted degree of prosperity. He was much esteemed, as a teacher and a man of intelligence, by Governor Shunk, and by the principal citizens of the Capital of the State. In 1850 he and his brother, Charles Long, late of Delaware College, established "Tennent School," a boarding-school for boys, near Hartsville, Pa., which, through a protracted period, enjoyed very great prosperity. On several occasions it shared in the blessed effects of revivals of religion with which Neshaminy Church, which the pupils attended, was favored. Not a few of those who prepared for college or studied for a period at this Institution, have risen to posts of eminence, influence and usefulness in the world. In 1869 (Prof. Charles Long having died some years before) Mr. Mahlon Long gave up the charge of Tennent School. He resides at present in Philadelphia.

Loomis, Augustus Ward, D.D., was born at Andover, Conn., September 4th, 1816, and graduated at Hamilton College in 1841. He was ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Albany, May 16th, 1844; missionary in China, at Macao, Chusan and Ningpo, 1844-50; missionary to the Creek Indians, at Kowetah, 1852-3; stated supply at St. Charles, Mo., 1853; stated supply at Lower Rock Island, Edward's, and Millersburg, Ill.; and has been missionary to the Chinese, San Francisco, Cal., since 1859. Dr. Loomis, in the varied spheres of his labor, has shown an ardent and controlling desire to win souls to Christ. He is earnest in doing good and blessed in his ministry.

Loomis, Rev. Henry, was born in Burlington, N. Y., March 4th, 1839; graduated from Hamilton College in 1866, and studied theology at Auburn Seminary. He was ordained by the Presbytery of Cayuga, in the Spring of 1869; preached at Jamesville, 1870-71; was missionary of the Presbyterian Board, at Yokohama, Japan, 1871-76; resident in San Rafael, Cal., 1876-81, from which date he has been superintendent of the work of the American Bible Society, for Japan, residing in Yokohama. He is an earnest Christian and a faithful laborer in the vineyard of the Lord.

Lowe, Rev. Benjamin Johnson, was born in Lebanon, Hunterdon county, N. J., January 11th, 1795, and was graduated from Princeton College, in 1814, and from Princeton Theological Seminary, in 1818. He was licensed, April 29th, 1818, by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and died in San Francisco, Cal., April 24th, 1875, in the eighty-first year of his age, meeting peacefully the summons to enter into rest. He was affectionate, genial, pure in life, and always zealous for the truth. His life was an active one, and his hoary head was "a crown of glory."

Lowrie, Rev. J. G., second son of Rev. John M. Lowrie, D.D. Born at Wellsville, Ohio, October 28th, 1846; early boyhood spent at Lancaster, Ohio, and at Fort Wayne, Ind.; graduated from Princeton College in 1867; Superintendent of Public Schools of Kendallville, Ind., 1867-8; entered Princeton Seminary 1868; licensed by Presbytery of Fort Wayne, May 13th, 1870; commissioned by Board of Home Missions to labor in Colorado in 1871; was the first minister of the churches of Golden, Longmont and Central City, Col. During ministry at Golden, and later at Central, houses of worship were erected. Ordained as an evangelist by the Presbytery of Colorado, March 17th, 1872; preached three years at Colorado Springs, from 1873 to 1876; called to pastorate of First Presbyterian Church, Mount Sterling, Ill., September, 1876.

M

MacGonigle, Rev. John N., oldest son of Alexander N. and Angeline MacGonigle, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., October 29th, 1851. He was graduated from the Western University of Pennsylvania in 1871, and from the Western Theological Seminary in 1875. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Pittsburg, in April, 1871, and ordained by the Presbytery of Blairsville, and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Ebensburg, Pa., on May 11th, 1875. Here he remained until October, 1877, when he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Parker City, Pa. From here he was called, in August, of 1880, to become pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Oil City, where he now labors. Here his work has been greatly blessed in the increasing and strengthening of the membership of the church, and in erecting one of the finest church edifices in Northwestern Pennsylvania.

As a preacher, Mr. MacGonigle is refined and scholarly, but eminently earnest and practical. He is a fluent and ready speaker. His sermons are chaste, spiritual and strong, and many of them have been published by request, on account of their pointed and terse presentation of the truth.

As a pastor, he has unusual influence and power. Courteous and genial, he is easily approached, and is beloved by all, not only of his church, but the entire community. Cautious and practical in everything, yet his warm and sympathetic heart makes him a friend and helper of the distressed and suffering. His executive ability is seen and felt in all departments of church work. His fidelity to the truth, and a happy combination of qualities, sought after, and shared in parts by all, but seldom so naturally and symmetrically united in one man, is the secret of his success.

Macklin, William, was born June 5th, 1816, in Millin county, Pa. He became a Christian in 1858, and united with the Church of his fathers. He was chosen and ordained a ruling elder in the Presbyterian Church in McVeytown, in 1863, and from that time to the day of his death, February 21st, 1884, he was not only a consistent Christian, but active and zealous in all branches of Church work in his native place. Particularly was this Christian activity manifested in the Sabbath school, of which he was long the honored and efficient superintendent. Mr. Macklin so identified himself with all of the interests of Christ's kingdom here on the earth—the material, the social, the intellectual and the spiritual—that he became one of the potent forces for good in the community where he lived and died, and was buried.

And his influence was not restricted, any more than was his good name, to the immediate vicinity of McVeytown. Such was the character of the man that he was chosen more than once to represent his Church in her higher courts, and often selected by his fellow-men to represent them and do business for them in the secular concerns of life; so that, when he died, many came from the towns along the Juniata Valley, to pay their last tribute of respect to him whom they had learned to love and appreciate as a man of sound judgment and of sterling integrity.

Macrae, G. W., was born near Warrenton, Va., May 28th, 1838. He removed to Clarksville, Tenn., in September, 1849, where he grew up and was educated. He joined the church at that place in 1867. He removed to Memphis, Tenn., in 1870, and connected himself with the Second Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. W. E. Boggs, pastor, at that time. Mr. Macrae was ordained an elder in said church in 1874. He has been a member of the General Assembly's (Southern) Committee of Education from the date of its removal to Memphis in 1874, and Treasurer of the same since 1876.

Magee, Irving, D.D., is the son of William J. and Gertrude (Moore) Magee, and was born at Red Hook, N. Y., July 21th, 1831. At the age of sixteen he began teaching a district school, and very soon taught in Hartwick Seminary, New York, where he completed his preparation for college. He graduated at Williams College in 1857, and while there was an intimate friend of President Garfield, who graduated in 1856. He then was Principal of Spencertown Academy, New York, for one year, and in 1860 graduated at Union Theological Seminary, New York. Before graduation he was tendered a call to St. Luke's Evangelical Lutheran Church at Valatie, N. Y., which he accepted, and became pastor of it at once, after graduating. In 1865 he was called to the Lombard Street Church, Baltimore, Md. In 1869 to the First Church, Dayton, Ohio. In 1872 to the First Church, Albany, N. Y. After serving the latter charge for ten years, he was, in 1882, called to the Rondout Presbyterian Church in the city of Kingston, on the Hudson, where he still remains. His life has been a very active and laborious one, having brought about fifteen hundred members into the Church of Christ. He has received repeated invitations to college professorships, but preferred to continue in the pastoral work. He has published a few monographs, the principal one, perhaps, being "A Brief Compendium of the History and Doctrines of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." But his most important literary work was the formation of a "New Liturgy for the General Synod of the Lutheran Church in America," which was adopted by that body in 1881. He has delivered many Lyceum lectures and public addresses.

Dr. Magee is a clergyman in whom the physical, the intellectual and the spiritual unite in the right proportion to form a Christian cultured gentleman. As to his pulpit qualities, no better criticism can be given than the following paragraph, borrowed from a sketch of him in Frank Leslie's Illustrated News: "As a preacher, his sermons are marked by vigor and originality of thought, remarkable delicacy and beauty of diction, richness and variety of illustration, and in their delivery, with dignity, grace and tenderness." If it be true that every minister has his outside hobby, his is the Physical Sciences; and his taste for and proficiency in these would give him, at any time, a professorship, if he chose to relinquish the work of the pastor. Although always maintaining the dignity of his office, he is not so extremely clerical as to lose the character of a citizen. He has made it a practice to identify himself with every public question which has a moral bearing. His executive capacity and felicity of speech cause him to be much sought after as a presiding officer, and make him a welcome guest at the banquet. Among those who know him best, he is distinguished for his loyalty, and sympathy, and purity, and frankness, and humbleness, and cheerfulness, and many other heart graces, which, as much as his more professional qualifications, have enabled him to achieve the wonderful success which has attended his ministry in several cities.

Mann, John Greir, was born in Doylestown, Bucks county, Pa., on the 12th of December, 1805, and died on the 5th of May, 1883. He came of that Scotch-Irish stock which has furnished so much strength, genius and faith to our American Presbyterianism. When he was but seventeen years old he professed his faith in Christ and united with the Presbyterian Church at Doylestown, and in that fellowship he lived and labored for an unbroken period of sixty years. On the 9th of April, 1853, he was chosen to the office of ruling elder by the unanimous vote of the congregation, and for thirty years continued in the active discharge of the duties of that office. Throughout his life he was deeply interested in religious work among the young, and was, for upward of twenty years, superintendent of one of the Sabbath schools under the direction of the Session of his church. In whatever position he was placed he proved himself to be a man of exceptional Christian worth, and was distinguished for his steadfastness and fidelity. He was always in his place in the church, the Sabbath school, the prayer-meeting, and the Session; and his fervent prayers, his wise counsels, and his supreme devotion to the welfare of the church in which he was an office-bearer, won for him the love and confidence of his associates, who are peculiarly afflicted in his death.

He was one of that class of Christians with whom the first vow of consecration embraces potentially a whole life of unswerving Christian fidelity. Alike in little things or great, he was never wanting. He never acted from mere impulse. Devotion to principle, love to his Saviour, controlled his actions and governed his life. The heart of his pastor safely trusted in him, for in him he found at once support and inspiration. His Christian character was so marked that, at his funeral, his pastor said: "For me to know Mr. Mann was to enjoy a means of grace, and to feel the hand of sanctified prudence laid on the head of the enthusiasm of youth." As with his pastor, so it was with all his brethren, for they found him to be a man whose fixed purpose was "to deal justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with his God." With all his devotion he was modest, unobtrusive and undemonstrative; a Christian worker who sought the approval of his Master rather than the applause of the world; a Presbyterian who firmly adhered to the doctrines of his own Church, but who was so devoted to the cause of true religion that no one was more cordially fraternal than he toward other denominations.

McCandlish, Rev. William, was born in Scotland, September 12th, 1810. In the Summer of 1817 he was brought by his parents to the United States. Having graduated in Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in September, 1834, he entered the Western Theological Seminary the same Fall, and completed his seminary course in September, 1837. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Carlisle, meeting in the Church of Big Spring, September, 1837. His first pastoral charge was Wooster, O., where he labored ten years and seven months. That church was blessed with a precious revival of religion during his pastorate. In the Summer of 1849 he removed to Lewistown, Ill. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Lewistown till May, 1854, when he was transferred to the Westminster Presbyterian Church of Quincy, Ill. The church of Lewistown was blessed with a gracious visitation of great power during his pastorate. In 1858 he removed to Nebraska, and engaged in general missionary work till the Spring of 1869, when he received an appointment by the American Bible Society as District Superintendent for Nebraska, Colorado and Wyoming. After a constant service for the Bible Society for thirteen years, he retired, in the seventy-second year of his age, to a service nearer home. During 1883 he has been employed in the circulation of the Bible through the city of Omaha, as colporteur of the American Bible Society. His life has been one of diligence and usefulness in the Master's service.

McCay, Charles Francis, LL.D., was the oldest child of Robert and Sally (Reed) McCay, and was born at Danville, Pa., March 8th, 1810. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pennsylvania, in 1829; was made Professor of Mathematics at Lafayette College, Pa., in 1833; was for twenty years (1834-53) an officer of the University of Georgia; a part of the time as Professor of Mechanical Philosophy and Civil Engineering, and afterward of Mathematics and Astronomy; and from 1851 to 1857 was first a Professor and then President of the College of South Carolina. From 1858 to 1869 he was first Secretary and then President of a fire insurance company in Augusta, Ga. In 1869 he removed to Baltimore, where, for many years, he was Actuary of the Insurance Department of the State of Maryland.

In 1870 he recommended to the General Assembly a plan of relief for the ministers of the Presbyterian Church South, by which many of their families procured insurance on their lives, for which he was Actuary, as one of the Executive Committee of Home Missions. While a Professor at Athens, Ga., he published his lectures on "Civil Engineering" and on the "Differential and Integral Calculus," and while Actuary, from 1848 to 1883, of several life insurance companies, he published many essays on the "Law of Mortality," especially during the first years of insurance, and among small numbers of persons, which attracted much attention.

McClure, Rev. James Gore King, was the fifth child of Archibald and Susan (Rice) McClure, born in Albany, N. Y., November 24th, 1848. Graduated at the Albany Academy, with special honors, he entered Yale College in the class of '70; and there, a favorite with all for the charms of his friendship, he maintained a high scholarship, and won the esteem of students and professors for his manly Christian character. The same features marked his course at Princeton Seminary, where he was graduated in 1873, having been licensed the year previous by the Presbytery of Albany. December 10th, 1874, the same Presbytery ordained and installed him pastor at New Scotland, only a few miles from the home of his youth. During his five years' pastorate there the church had large gain in spiritual and material strength, extensive additions and improvements were made to the property, and eighty-five persons confessed their faith. Resigning, in 1879, for foreign travel and study, he visited the British Islands, Europe, Egypt and the Holy Land. Soon after his return he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Lake Forest, Ill., on November 3d, 1881; where, on a larger scale, the labors and fruits of his first pastorate are being repeated. In theological opinion Mr. McClure is a moderate conservative, of the Princeton school. As a preacher, his style is illustrative, clear, persuasive, warmly evangelical, and marked by earnest heart-force in utterance. As a pastor, he possesses fertile resources, untiring energy, large executive ability, rare tact and judgment, combined with a tender sympathy, which makes him unusually beloved in the homes of his people.

McCorkle, Mr. Samuel, was long an elder in the First Presbyterian Church, Lynchburg, Va. Born August 20th, 1800, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, he brought from his native county, Rockbridge, the results of that early training which the men of that stalwart Presbyterian stock generally evinced. While eminently sound in the Calvinistic system of doctrine, he was distinguished for the works of which that system, rightly understood and received, has ever been the source. He united with a devoted attachment to his own church an enlarged charity toward those of other attachments. Prominent among merchants for his integrity and his sound judgment, his services were sought in many public interests, and he fully bore out, in his conduct as a servant of the public, the reputation for sound views in devising and executing schemes for the public welfare, which he had so long sustained in regard to his private interests and enterprises.

He was the faithful adviser and friend of his pastor and the leader in enterprises for the increase of the moral power of the church. His liberality in contributing to its material prosperity was but the counterpart of his zeal for its spiritual interests. At a time of great depression in the pecuniary ability of the people of his church, he took the lead in the most generous contributions, and by example, as well as personal address, aroused a spirit of effort on the part of the congregation, which resulted in the entire relief of the church from its depressed condition. Abundant in good works, honored and beloved by the whole community, and especially by the church over which he had so long been one of the overseers, he waited patiently, through nine weary months of declining health, till his change came, and gently fell asleep in Jesus, to rest in peace, August 6th, 1866—his eldership having existed thirty-three years.

McCosh, James, D. D., LL. D., was born in Ayrshire, Scotland, April 1st, 1811. He entered the University of Glasgow in 1824, and studied there during the five succeeding years. Removing thence in 1829, he entered the University of Edinburgh, where he continued his studies for another period of five years, under such instructors as Drs. Chalmers and Welch. While a student in Edinburgh he wrote an essay on the Stoic Philosophy, for which the University gave him the honorary degree of Master of Arts.

In 1831 he was licensed to preach the gospel. The following year he was ordained and appointed to the ministry of Abbey Church, at Arbroath. He continued in this charge for three years, and became identified with the Evangelical, or Non-intrusion party of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, of which party Dr. Thomas Guthrie was leader in that district.

In 1839 he removed to Brechin, Scotland, having been appointed, by the Crown, pastor of the Presbyterian church at that place. This position he held until the disruption of the Church, in 1843.

Dr. McCosh believed thoroughly in the spiritual independence of the Church, which had been interfered with by the settlement of ministers in parishes against the will of the people. He expressed his conviction by joining the Free Church party.

His labors, which were continued for several years in and around Brechin, were eminently successful. He took an active part in planting new churches in his own and neighboring counties. In the parish church at Brechin he and his colleague, Dr. Foote, had 1415 communicants. While attending to these arduous duties he wrote and published his first important work, "The Method of Divine Government, Physical and Moral," which gave him a wide reputation, both in Europe and America.

In 1852 he removed to Belfast, having been appointed by the Crown to the Chair of Logic and Metaphysics in Queen's College. He entered with zeal upon the work of his new profession, and soon became as eminent as an instructor as he had been as a pastor. He was Professor in Belfast sixteen years.

In the Spring of 1868 he was elected to succeed Dr. John MacLean as President of the College of New Jersey, at Princeton. In the Fall of that year he was inaugurated and entered upon his duties as President and Professor of Biblical Instruction and of Psychology and History of Philosophy. The college has prospered wonderfully under his management. During his Presidency about three millions of dollars have been contributed to the College, and the number of professors and students has more than doubled. He introduced the "fellowship system," and encourages the spirit of original scientific research on the part of the students. He has also greatly strengthened the department of philosophy.

Dr. McCosh takes a lively interest in all schemes which give promise of aiding in the general diffusion of knowledge, or of arousing the Church to activity, and of uniting Christians throughout the world for mutual support and co-operation. Before his removal to this country he earnestly advocated the national system of education in Ireland, and took an active part in preparing the Irish Presbyterian Church for the disestablishment of 1869, and the successful organization of a practical system of sustentation of her ministry is largely due to him.

In a sermon preached during the session of the General Assembly in Philadelphia, in 1870, he suggested the idea of a Presbyterian Alliance. Two years later, at the Ter-Centenary Celebration of the Reformation in Scotland, held in Philadelphia, November 20th, 1872, he presented a scheme for such an organization. He was Moderator of the Conference which met in London and organized the Alliance, July, 1875. In 1877 he visited Edinburgh as a delegate to the council of this body, then held in that city.

Dr. McCosh is a voluminous writer. His contributions to periodical literature appear in rapid succession. They are chiefly upon religious, moral and philosophical subjects. An enumeration of the titles of his published sermons, essays and reviews would probably exceed the limits of this sketch. The most important of his published works are: "Method of Divine Government," 1850; "Typical Forms and Special Ends in Creation" (in conjunction with Dr. Dickie), 1855; "The Intuitions of the Mind," 1860; "The Supernatural in Relation to the Natural," 1862; "Defence of Fundamental Truth," 1866; "The Laws of Discursive Thought; Being a Text-Book of Formal Logic," 1870; "Christianity and Positivism," 1871; "The Scottish Philosophy," 1875; "Ideas in Nature Overlooked by Dr. Tyndall," 1875; "The Development Hypothesis; Is it Sufficient?" 1876; "The Emotions," 1880. He is at present issuing a series of small volumes on philosophical subjects, called, a "Philosophical Series." Five parts have appeared up to this date, March, 1884.

McCrery, Rev. John, graduated at Princeton College in 1764, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1766. He received a very flattering number of calls. He was ordained May 10th, 1769, at the Head of Christiana Church, Del., and installed over that congregation and White Clay Creek. In 1769 the Synod, "in consideration of Mr. McCrery's great services on his mission to the western frontiers" of Pennsylvania, voted him "an additional allowance of five pounds." In 1771 they appointed him to make a missionary tour of three months in the South, and provided for the supply of his pulpits during his absence. He was, however, absent a year. His salary was fully allowed by the congregations, and the expense of a man and carriage borne by them to bring him from North Carolina, after a tedious illness. It was said that "in the vigor of his life he was absent on supplies near the fourth of his time," and that, "for the last seven years of his ministry he had not been able to officiate more than half of the time." Mr. McCreery's death took place June 18th, 1800, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He was buried in the Head of Christiana Cemetery, and a lengthy epitaph commemorates his virtues. The Presbytery lamented him as "a faithful and zealous minister of the gospel."

McCurdy, Thomas, was an old citizen of Jersey Shore, Pa., and one of its most experienced and trusted business men. He died November 7th, 1883.

For many years he was closely associated in business relations with the late George Tomb, Esq., and for some years, up to the commencement of the sickness which resulted in his death, was the efficient Cashier of the Jersey Shore Banking Company. He enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the community, both as a business man and a Christian. As his name denotes, he belonged to that worthy stock of Pennsylvania's inhabitants—Scotch-Irish—who have reflected so much honor on both Church and State. He united with the Presbyterian Church many years ago, and continued a faithful and useful member till the Master translated him to the Church above.

McGilvary, Daniel, D. D., was born in Moore county, North Carolina, May 16th, 1828. For a time he was engaged in teaching. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary; stated supply at Carthage and Union churches, N. C., 1856-7; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Orange, December 13th, 1857; missionary in Siam, at Bangkok, 1858-61; Petchaburi, 1861-67; Chiengmoi, 1867-. Dr. McGilvary has intellectual ability, and is ardently devoted to the self-sacrificing work to which his life has been mainly devoted.

McIlwaine, Archibald G., was of Irish birth and parentage. He was born in Londonderry, Ireland, July 5th, 1801, and inherited also, from a strong Presbyterian ancestry, a devoted attachment to the Church, which, in the maturity of early manhood, he selected as the school for himself and his family, in "things pertaining to God." His exemplary industry, fidelity and honorable enterprise, placed him in the very front rank of the noblest specimens of mercantile men in the city of Petersburg, Va. The success which crowned his honest labors enabled him to become a liberal contributor to Hampden-Sidney College and Union Seminary, in Boards of Trustees of both of which institutions he was for many years a most judicious and efficient member. His home was ever the resort of Presbyterian ministers and others prominent in the Church, when visiting the city. With no outward manifestation of wealth in the splendors of its furniture or luxurious entertainments, his hospitality was free and cordial.

His benefactions were not only in large contributions, in supporting the Institutions of his Church, but also in the ministrations of a large and Christian charity, in the circle of his home. Wise in forming and persistent in maintaining his views of right and wrong, in the affairs of State and Church, he allowed no differences of opinion to break the ties of Christian and neighborly friendships. With no injuries which he desired or sought to revenge, and no animosities allowed to grow out of difference with others, he was eminently one who sought the "things which make for peace and whereby one may edify another." His decline into infirm health, and then his death, April 10th, 1878, was a source of immense loss to the Church, and it will require years to rear one to follow in his steps. But his example is a legacy the Church and his family, it is hoped, will ever find a benefit.

Mealy, Rev. John M., was the oldest son of Anthony A. and Jane Mealy, and was born in Claysville, Washington county, Pennsylvania, January 17th 1813. He graduated at Washington College, in the year 1864, and at the Western Theological Seminary, 1867. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Washington, in 1866, and having received a call from the Church of Neshannock, Lawrence county, Pa., accepted it, and was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Shenango, on September 25th, 1867. He has continued in the pastorate of this church ever since, faithful in duty, beloved by his people, and successful in his work.

Mechlin, George W., D. D., was the eldest son of William and Catharine Mechlin, and was born in Concord Township, Butler county, Pa., in 18—. Greatly desiring an education, he left his father's farm and, by his energy, perseverance and economy, worked his way, by teaching and otherwise, through an academic course at the Academy of Butler, and graduated at Jefferson College, in the class of 1853. Having graduated at the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, and being a licentiate of the Presbytery of Allegheny, he received a call from the churches of Glade Run and Concord, of the Presbytery of Saltsburgh, and was ordained and installed over these churches February 20th, 1857—half time at each place. Glade Run Church petitioned Presbytery for the whole of his time, and it was granted, in the Spring of 1865. This relation still continues, in 1884. Dr. Mechlin was chosen Principal of Glade Run Academy in the Spring of 1855, and has held that position up to the present time, except from 1861 to 1868, during which time Rev. J. M. Jones was Principal. Both the congregation and academy under his care have an unusual record in the number of young men they have given to the ministry of the gospel. So that Dr. Mechlin's influence and impress have been far extended, and always on the side of old-fashioned orthodoxy in doctrine and strict purity of life.

Meigs, Rev. George Duffield, A. M., is the second son of Matthew Meigs, LL. D., and Mary (Gould) Meigs, and was born August 3d, 1844. His maternal grandfather, Rev. William R. Gould, was a pioneer missionary of the Congregational Church at Gallipolis, Ohio. Mr. Meigs graduated from Lafayette College in 1865, and entered Auburn Theological Seminary in 1870, the intervening time having been spent in civil engineering. On leaving the Seminary he taught in his father's "Hill School," in Pottstown, Pa., until the Summer of 1876. In the Spring of this year he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Philadelphia, North, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Mansfield, Pa., in July of the same year, being ordained and installed by the Wellsboro' Presbytery. Continuing in this Home Mission field until compelled, by nervous prostration, through arduous work, to intermit ministerial work for a season, this pastorate closed, to the unanimous regret of both pastor and people, in February, 1882. Having been rehabilitated by a long Summer's work as a civil engineer, in the open air, a call was accepted to the Presbyterian Church in Watkins, N. Y., where he was installed pastor in June, 1883. Here his ministrations continue, with increasing acceptance, to a growing congregation, and he is esteemed as an active leader in all movements for the moral improvement of the community.

Mr. Meigs is a warm-hearted, frank and unpretentious man, and is calculated to reach and influence all classes of people. His manner, though easy and natural, has a pleasant quaintness and candor about it that wins and holds the friendship of all acquaintances, both old and young. As a preacher, he is more than commonly attractive. His sermons are plain and eminently Scriptural, and are delivered in an easy conversational manner. They often abound in rich original thought, clearly expressed, and are always listened to with close attention by his hearers. His many personal gifts and scholarly attainments are sure to open before him a field of great usefulness wherever Providence may place him.

Michigan, Missions In. "Although," says Dr. Gillet, "Detroit was visited as early as 1610, and a settlement effected and a fort erected in 1701, it was not till 1805 that a Territorial government was established in Michigan. Among its earliest settlers were emigrants sent out (1749) from France at the expense of the government. In 1801, when Mr. Badger, on his visit to the Indians, reached Detroit, he reported that 'there was not one Christian to be found in all this region, except a black man who appeared pious.' In 1804 it was spoken of as a 'most abandoned place.' At this time Dr. Bangs visited it, as a Methodist missionary, and the Congregational minister told him that he had preached in Detroit until none but a few children would come to hear him. 'If you can succeed,' he added—'which I very much doubt—I shall rejoice.' He did not succeed, but 'shook off the dust of his feet as a testimony against them, and took his departure.' Barely a month elapsed after this significant expression of disappointed effort before the place was almost entirely consumed by fire, a single house only remaining uninjured.

"Till after the reorganization of the Territorial government, in the Fall of 1813, and the close of the war, no effort was made to send missionaries into this region. The principal portion, indeed, of the white population consisted of soldiers, resident at the military station. For successive years, after 1817, the missionaries of the Assembly, one or more, were commissioned to labor for a portion of their time in connection with these stations. The first to enter this field was the Rev. John Monteith, whose commission was renewed in substantially the same form for several years.

"Mr. Monteith, sent out by the Board of Missions, reached Detroit, June 27th, 1816. He met from the people so cordial a reception that it appeared to him unnecessary any longer to bear the character of a missionary. He commenced his labors as a stated minister, and found himself in the midst of 'a wide field of usefulness.' 'The profaneness of the soldiers,' he says, 'exceeds anything I ever imagined. There is no Sabbath in this country.' Faithful in the discharge of his duty, both in public and private, he was treated by all classes with the greatest respect, and not a word was uttered in opposition.

"In this place he found himself two hundred miles distant from any Presbyterian minister, and almost crushed under the task imposed upon him. Amid prevailing ignorance and wickedness, there was scarcely an individual from whom he could derive assistance. The only Christian zeal perceptible was among the Methodists. The army was without a chaplain, and his work was greater than he felt able to perform. Yet one month of each year, with the consent of his people, was devoted to missionary excursions. He accordingly visited Raisin, the Rapids of the Miami, Sandusky, Cleveland, and other places, and preached frequently. At Fort Meigs and Raisin he felt confident that congregations might be gathered.

"Doubtless in consequence of his report, the Assembly, in 1818, directed that a missionary should be sent for six months to the settlements on the river Raisin, and this direction was repeated in the following years.

"In 1820, it was said of Mackinaw, that 'the Christian Sabbath had not got so far.' It was, however, recognized in that year, for the first time by the people, on occasion of the visit of the Rev. Dr. Jedediah Morse, who gathered the people of the place to listen to the preaching of the gospel. A year later, the Rev. Dr. Yates, of Union College, visited this place, and once again there was an external recognition of the claims of the Sabbath. In 1822 the Rev. Mr. Ferry came to Mackinaw, as a missionary of the United Foreign Missionary Society, and, although he could not find in the place a single Christian brother with whom he could say, 'Our Father,' he did not despond. Cheerfully and patiently he toiled on, and in ten years the character of the place was reported to have become entirely changed.

"In 1820, Mr. Monteith, afterward settled at Blissfield, Mich., reported the results of his visits to the military stations in the Territory. The substance of it was discouraging and even appalling.

"The general aspect of manners among the troops gave an idea of infernal spirits rather than of human beings. Meanwhile, he had urgent calls from the surrounding territory to preach the gospel. In the same year, Rev. Moses Hunter performed a mission for six months at Fort Meigs, on the river Raisin, and in other destitute settlements in that region. The places where he itinerated were important and growing. So acceptable were his labors that he was invited by the people to return and reside among them. There was but one Presbyterian minister in the region—at River Raisin. At Fort Meigs a church had been organized, originally with but twelve members.

"Mr. Monteith continued his labors in this region during the following year. At Monroe and Meigs, Presbyterian churches were now organized and were reported as in a flourishing condition. In the course of the few succeeding years churches were gathered at Detroit, Ypsilanti, Monroe, Dexter, Farmington, Bloomfield, Pontiac, Mackinaw, Statesburg, Plymouth, Tecumseh, Dixborough and Ann Arbor. The church of Pontiac was under the care of the Presbytery of Geneva for some years after 1824. The name of Ypsilanti indicates its date. It was formed in 1823, at the period when sympathy for Greece in her struggle for independence pervaded the land and was felt even in the Western forests.

"In December, 1824, Isaiah W. Ruggles was sent to Michigan by the United Domestic Missionary Society, and commenced his labors at Pontiac, limiting his excursions mainly to Oakland county, yet having a large circuit in which he had no fellow-laborer. In August, 1824, the church of Pontiac numbered fifty-five. During the month Mr. Ruggles organized a second church, in the southern part of the county, consisting of eight members, from which an application was forwarded for a minister. Mr. Ruggles soon after commenced his pastorate at Monroe. Noah M. Wells, after laboring in the Summer of 1824 at Detroit, was settled there as pastor, and Stephen Frontis, Assembly's missionary, was laboring at the same period, with good success, at the river Raisin. William Page was settled at Ann Arbor, October 24th, 1826. Ira Dunning at Farmington, on the 10th of the same month. Eric Prince commenced his labors in Monroe and Oakland county in 1827. Alanson Darwin entered this field in September, and Isaac Melvaine in October, of the same year.

"The church at Mackinaw was organized and served by Rev. William M. Ferry, sent out in the latter part of 1823, by the United Foreign Missionary Society, as Superintendent of the Indian Mission at this important station. The same Society had missionaries transferred to its charge from the Northern Missionary Society, laboring at Fort Gratiot, on the St. Clair, about a mile below the outlet of Lake Huron.

"The Western Missionary Society of the Synod of Pittsburg was also engaged in this field. In 1823 it established a mission at the Falls of St. Mary. There were several French and English families already located here, and it was largely resorted to for fishing purposes by the Indian tribes. As a military and trading post its position was regarded as of great importance, and all the fur trade of the Northwest was compelled to pass through it. Here also was a United States military station, and here also Mr. Schoolcraft, the Indian agent, resided. The labors of the missionary, Rev. Robert M. Laird, were followed by signal success, especially among the soldiers of the garrison. Early in 1824 he writes that twenty-two persons had attended his inquiry meetings. He was constantly engaged in preaching, distributing Bibles and other books, and in religious visitation. A timely donation of a box of books was forwarded to him by Rev. Thaddeus Osgood.

"The Assembly's appointments for Michigan were, in 1822, Joshua L. Moore for six months at Detroit, or, in case this field was occupied, in destitute portions of the Territory; and in 1823 two missionaries were appointed, one of whom, Eldad W. Goodman, was to labor for six months, mainly in the vicinity of Monroe and Fort Meigs. In the following year Daniel Waterbury and Judah Ely were sent out by the Board to labor within the bounds of the State, and in 1825 Alvan Coe was directed to spend three months at Sault de St. Marie, or Green Bay, while Stephen Frontis was to visit the infant churches of Fort Meigs, Monroe, Mount Clemens and Pontiac, and, if Detroit was still unoccupied, to pay particular attention to that place.

"The Presbytery of Detroit was erected by the Assembly in 1827. It consisted of five ministers: Noah M. Wells, Eric Prince, Isaiah W. Ruggles, William M. Ferry and William Page; and of the five churches of Detroit, Farmington, Monroe, Pontiac and Mackinaw. Mr. Wells, the patriarch of the Presbytery, was at Detroit, Ruggles at Pontiac, Ferry at Mackinaw, Prince at Farmington, and Page at Monroe. The Presbytery stood connected with the Western Reserve Synod. In the course of the five succeeding years, Ira M. Weed, P. W. Warren, C. G. Clark, G. Harnell, Luther Humphrey, Catting Marsh and others, entered the field. Churches were organized at Dexter, Bloomfield, Beardlie's Prairie, Statesburg, Plymouth, Tecumseh, Dixborough, and Ann Arbor, so that in 1832 the Presbytery could report thirteen ministers and fourteen churches.

"In the following year the two new Presbyteries of St. Joseph and of Monroe were formed out of that of Detroit—the first embracing four and the last seven members. John P. Cleveland succeeded Mr. Wells as pastor at Detroit, and was the leading member of the Presbytery which retained the old name. Three years later the three Presbyteries numbered together thirty-two ministers and fifty-nine churches—so rapidly had the new State been occupied by the tide of immigration.

"In 1833 the Synod of Michigan consisted of: Presbytery of Detroit, forty ministers and thirty-nine churches; Presbytery of Grand Rapids, thirty-two ministers and thirty-three churches; Presbytery of Kalamazoo, twenty-one ministers and twenty-three churches; Presbytery of Lansing, twenty-one ministers and nineteen churches; Presbytery of Monroe, fifteen ministers and twenty churches; Presbytery of Saginaw, thirty-seven ministers and fifty churches—all these churches embracing a membership of 16,688."

Miller, Samuel, D.D., was the fourth son of the Rev. John Miller, born a few miles from Dover, Del., October 31st, 1769, and graduated, with high honor, at the University of Pennsylvania, July 31st, 1789. He commenced the study of theology shortly after his graduation, under the direction of his father, but his father being removed before he had completed his theological course, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Lewes, of which his father had long been a leading member, on the 15th October, 1791, and immediately after put himself, for the residue of his course, under the instruction of the celebrated Dr. Nisbet, of Dickinson College.

In April, 1792, he received a call to the pastoral charge of the congregation at Dover, then recently vacated by the death of his venerable father, which, however, he ultimately declined. In the Autumn of this year he received a unanimous call from the United Presbyterian churches of New York, to become the colleague of Dr. Rodgers and Dr. McKnight. This call he accepted, and was ordained and installed June 5th, 1793. From the commencement of his ministry in New York he enjoyed a high reputation. Besides having the advantage of a remarkably fine person, and most bland and attractive manners, he had, from the beginning, an uncommonly polished style, and there was an air of literary refinement pervading all his performances, that excited general admiration, and well might put criticism at defiance. He was scarcely settled before his services began to be put in requisition on public occasions, and several of these early occasional discourses were published, and still remain as a monument of his taste, talents and piety.

In 1806, Dr. Miller was Moderator of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. He took a deep interest in the establishment of the Theological Seminary at Princeton, from the first inception of the enterprise, though without the remotest idea that he was destined to be more intimately connected with it than many others of his brethren. When the Chair of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government was to be filled, the eyes of the Church were directed to Dr. Miller, and in due time the judgment of the Church was pronounced in his being formally elected to that responsible place. The appointment was made in May, 1813, and having accepted it, he was inducted into office on the 29th of September following. Here Dr. Miller continued, discharging the duties of his office with great fidelity and ability, and to the entire acceptance of the Church, during a period of more than thirty-six years. In May, 1849, in view of the growing infirmities of age, he tendered his resignation of the office, and the General Assembly, in accepting it, testified, at the same time, in the strongest manner possible, their grateful appreciation of his services and their high respect for his character. His health, which had been waning for a considerable time, failed after this more perceptibly, until at length it became manifest to all that his period of active service was over. He felt himself that his work was done, and he was ready to enter upon his reward. The few friends who were privileged to see him during the period of his decline, especially after he had nearly reached the dark boundary, were not only edified, but surprised at the expressions of humble, grateful, joyful triumph that fell from his lips. He gently passed away to his heavenly rest, January 7th, 1850. His funeral drew together a large concourse of clergymen and other distinguished strangers from the neighboring towns and cities, and an appropriate and characteristic sermon was preached by his venerable colleague, Dr. Alexander.

In many respects Dr. Miller was a remarkable man. He was a laborious and successful student, methodical in his plans and never entered on the performance of any public duty without full and accurate preparation. The great secret of his being able to do so much, and to do it so well, was that he did everything systematically. He had a time for every duty, and one duty was not suffered to encroach upon another. In his personal habits and dress he was remarkably neat, without anything, however, of undue precision. In his manners he was polished and graceful, and duly attentive to all those proprieties which confer dignity upon social intercourse. Of the "clerical manners" which he recommended in his invaluable work on that subject, he was himself an admirable example.

Dr. Miller's intellectual and moral character partook of the same beautiful symmetry that characterized his external appearance. He had by nature a kindly, sympathetic and generous spirit. His heart beat quick to the tale of distress, and his hand opened instinctively to administer relief. Whilst he made no display of his charities by giving to particular objects large sums, worthy of being displayed as examples of liberality, it could not be concealed that he refused aid to no object that he considered worthy of public or private beneficence. He used to say that he loved to have a nail in every building intended for the glory of God or the good of man. He had warm social affections, and received, as well as imparted, great pleasure in his intercourse with his friends. His mind was perfectly well balanced in all its faculties, calm and deliberate, but certain in its movements, and worthy of being trusted wherever good taste, sound judgment and high intelligence were demanded. There are few men who have an assemblage of intellectual and moral qualities so well fitted as were his to form a dignified character, or to secure a course of honorable and enduring usefulness.

Dr. Miller was eminent as a preacher. His voice was pleasant, his enunciation perfectly distinct, his attitudes in the pulpit were extremely dignified, his gesture was always appropriate, and his utterance was deliberate. He never shot at random, but always had a distinct object in view, and went deliberately and skillfully at work to accomplish it. There was the same symmetry about his sermons as there was about his character, everything was in its right place. He did not deal in dry and doubtful speculations, but confined himself to Bible truth. "For solid gospel truth, presented in a distinct and logical manner, and expressed in chaste and appropriate language," says Dr. Canham, "he was certainly distinguished above most of his brethren. . . . In leading the devotions of the large congregation, or of the social meeting, he was peculiarly happy. There was a simplicity and reverence in his manner and language, and an appropriateness in the topics which he introduced, which were admirably fitted to awaken devout feeling in the hearts of his auditors."

As a Professor in the Theological Seminary, Dr. Miller was alike able and faithful. He gave to his work all the energies of his mind and body. His lectures were always highly appropriate and instructive, and while they were evidently the result of much thought and investigation, and were so admirably perspicuous and well arranged that they could easily be remembered, they were written with excellent taste, and sometimes, when description was called for, were marked by great rhetorical beauty. His intercourse with the students was characterized by paternal kindness.

Dr. Miller attained distinction as an author, his graceful and vigorous pen having produced a very large number of valuable volumes and pamphlets, which are too well known to require any specific mention here. But the crowning excellence of his character, after all, was his humble and devoted piety, his attachment to the great truths of the gospel, and his earnest desire to honor his Lord and Saviour, by making known to the perishing the way of life. He was eminently conscientious, disinterested and devout. Condescending in indifferent matters, he always stood firm to his own convictions where anything important was involved. He was meek, humble, patient and forgiving. He moved about in society, exhibiting the graces of nature in attractive combination with the higher graces of the Spirit. He was a living epistle of righteousness, known and read of all men who enjoyed his acquaintance or came within the range of his wide-spread influence.

Milligan, Rev. Thomas Vincent, D. D., was born in Tuscaroras county, O., in May, 1829, of Christian parents, who honestly endeavored to bring "him up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." After some literary training in the New Hagerstown Academy, near his home, he entered Jefferson College, Washington county, Pa., from which he was graduated in due time. He studied theology in the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Steubenville, April, 1860, and one year later was ordained by the same Presbytery and settled as pastor of the Waynesburg Church. This field he occupied successfully till October, 1873, when he removed to the Old Church of Steubenville. Leaving this church in 1877, he became pastor of the Church of East Liverpool, O., which he still holds.

Dr. Milligan has been quite successful, and has rendered good service in his several pastorates. He is an earnest, energetic, persevering man. A fine presbyter and ready speaker, he wields a strong influence in the several ecclesiastical bodies of which he is a member. A good man, a firm believer of the Holy Scriptures, fearing God and loving men, he has before him the prospect of doing effective service for the Kingdom of Christ for some years to come.

Milner, Rev. Duncan Chambers, was born in Mount Pleasant, Jefferson county, Ohio, March 10th, 1841. He graduated at Washington and Jefferson College, Pa., in the class of 1866, and studied theology at the Union Theological Seminary, New York. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Brooklyn, and commissioned by the Board of Home Missions at the close of his seminary course. In October of the same year he was ordained, with eight other Union Seminary students, at Kansas City, and assumed at once his first charge at Osceola, Mo., with general missionary work in the southwestern part of that State.

After three and a half years of arduous labor in that wide field, he was called to the Third Presbyterian Church of Kansas City; thence, in May, 1875, to the First Presbyterian Church of Ottawa, Kansas, where he remained till December, 1882. Since that time he has had charge of the First Presbyterian Church, of Atchison, Kansas. On his arrival in Kansas, he entered zealously into the temperance movement then in progress, and became a member of the Executive Committee of the State Temperance Union, under which the campaign for the Prohibition Constitutional Amendment was conducted to a successful issue. He is now President of the Inter-State Sunday-school Assembly. Mr. Milner has a wide following outside of his immediate church. He is a good preacher, sympathetic and ready, and a popular public speaker. His style is direct, anecdotal and illustrative, rather than syllogistic. His moral courage is invincible and absolute, and stamps him a man among men anywhere and everywhere.

Moore, Rev. David W., was born at Brandywine Manor, Chester county, Pa., October 5th, 1830. He graduated at Princeton College in 1858; at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1861, and was licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in 1860. He was called, ordained and settled at Lower Brandywine, Del., May 8th, 1861, and continued in this pastorate until October, 1872. After spending one year as a missionary in Mississippi, he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at McVeytown, Pa., October, 1873. In October, 1883, he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Kennett Square, Pa., in the Presbytery of Chester. Mr. Moore is a faithful preacher, a diligent pastor, and has been blessed in his ministry.

Moore, Rev. George F., oldest son of William E. and Harriet F. Moore, was born in West Chester, Pa., October 15th, 1851. Graduated at Yale College, 1872, and Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1877. Licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Columbus, April 13th, 1876; ordained by the same body, February 8th, 1878. Pastor of the Putnam

Presbyterian Church in Zanesville, O., May, 1878, to May, 1883. Hitchcock Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature in Andover Theological Seminary, Andover, Mass., 1883. Mr. Moore is an able preacher and a gentleman of high scholarly attainments.

Moore, John Silliman, D.D., was born of Scotch-Irish ancestry, in Kemper county, Miss., June 7th, 1840. After a preparatory course at Pleasant Ridge, Ala., he entered Oglethorpe College, Ga., where he studied until 1861. By teaching school he secured means to enter the University of Mississippi, where he graduated in 1867. He then took a three years' course at the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., and was licensed to preach, June 7th, 1870, by the Presbytery of Tuskalooza. As a licentiate, he took charge of the Church at Jefferson, Texas, where he was ordained, and where he labored successfully for seven years, when he was called to the Church at McKinney. After being there two years, he was invited to take charge of the Church at Sherman, Texas, where he still labors, having built up an active and vigorous church.

Dr. Moore is a man of medium size, courteous and remarkably popular. As a preacher, he is deservedly held in high esteem, his sermons being prepared with care and delivered with earnestness to the consciences of his hearers. As a presbyter, he is judicious, fraternal and catholic in his feelings, yet an ardent lover of the polity and doctrine of his own Church. He is now moderator of the Synod of Texas.

Moore, William E., D. D., son of Jacob Moore, M. D., and Sarah Faris Moore, was born in Strasburg, Pa., April 1st, 1823. The family shortly returned to Delaware, the home of its Scotch Presbyterian ancestry. There, in 1829, the father died, and the mother, a woman of sterling Christian character, trained her two sons and two daughters in the fear of God, and in the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church. As Superintendent of the first Sunday school in old Pencader Church, she was often known to shut her little boys for safe keeping into the high, closed pulpit of the time, that she might better go on with her work. One of those sons is Dr. J. Faris Moore, for the last twenty-five years an elder in Baltimore. The other, the subject of this sketch, graduated from Yale College in 1847, and immediately became Principal of the Historic Academy, at Fairfield, Conn. Here it was his privilege to be the private student in theology, and assistant in parish work, of Lyman H. Atwater, D. D.

Mr. Moore was licensed by the Presbytery of Wilmington, Del., April, 1850, and ordained and installed over the First Presbyterian Church, West Chester, Pa., October 31st, of the same year. A pastorate of twenty-one and a half years was closed in April, 1872, when he accepted a call to the Second Church, Columbus, O., where he was installed the following October, and where he still remains. Repeatedly a delegate to the General Assembly. Dr. Moore has been assigned to its important committees, most recently upon that for the Revision of the Book of Discipline. In 1877 he was a member of the Presbyterian Council in Edinburgh, where he read a valued paper upon the eldership.

For many years a member of the Publication Committee (N. S.), and afterward of the Board, Dr. Moore has perhaps rendered his most important public service as the editor of the "Digest of the Acts of the New School Assemblies to 1860," and again of the "New Digest," of those of the whole Church to 1873. For thirteen years he was Stated Clerk of the Synod of Pennsylvania, and after the reunion, of that of Philadelphia, until his removal out of its bounds. He is now Stated Clerk of the Synod of Ohio. To the affairs of the Church at large, Dr. Moore has given a knowledge, a judgment and an experience, which makes his opinion to be widely sought in matters pertaining to the history and polity of the Church. Of his six sons, two at this date are following his footsteps into the ministry: George F. Moore, five years pastor of Putnam Church, Zanesville, O., now Professor of Hebrew and Oriental Languages in Andover Theological Seminary, and Edward C. Moore of the present Senior Class, Union Seminary, New York.

Morrow, Rev. Richard H., was born near Blair's Mills, Huntingdon county, Pa., January 13th, 1823. He prepared for college at Tuscarora Academy, and graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1851. His standing as a student and as a man, a friend and a devoted Christian, was of the highest. He taught a year or longer at Shade Gap, spent two years at Allegheny Seminary, and one year at Princeton Theological Seminary, and then entered upon labors at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in May, 1855, continuing the devoted and beloved pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of that place for about four years. His labors were highly appreciated by those among whom he labored, and attended with gratifying success. A call to the churches of McVeytown and Newton Hamilton, Pa., was received by him and declined. But his promising career was cut short by disease and death. While yet at the Seminary, there were indications of pulmonary ailment. These continued and gradually increased until, in January, 1859, he returned to Pennsylvania, that he might die at his old home and amid his native mountains. His death occurred June 10th, 1859. He was a patient sufferer, and enjoyed, in a high degree, the peace and the sustaining power of Christ's gospel.

Morton, Major James, of Prince Edward county, Va., was born about the middle of the last century. He lived to extreme old age, dying when about ninety-six years of age. Having enjoyed only the advantages of an ordinary English education, he yet reached a high position for general intelligence, by having been endowed with natural readiness of apprehension, a remarkably retentive memory, and having associated, from early life, with men of liberal education, from whom he imbibed, rapidly, much of the culture which they had attained.

In early manhood he entered the service of his country in the War of the Revolution. It was his lot to suffer as well as fight in the ranks, for he was long a prisoner of war, closely confined in the city of Charleston. By his valor as a soldier, he won the confidence and admiration of the superior officers, especially of the Marquis Lafayette, who met him with marked intimations of high regard, when on his visit to the United States in 1824. The title he bore through life was heroically won, by distinguished services of bravery as a private and then captain, in many a hard-fought battle. At the close of the war he returned to his native county and State, and continued to illustrate in civil life the virtues of honesty, fidelity and stern adherence to the path of duty, at whatever cost, by which he had gained in his military career the soubriquet of "solid column." In the Presbyterian Church, of which he became an elder early in middle life, and in the office of magistrate, which he held about fifty years, he well merited and received from his fellow-citizens the most implicit confidence. As presiding justice in the county court, his colleagues rarely hesitated to follow his lead on questions coming before them for decision. When awarded a pension, in his old age, such was his confidence in the equitable justice manifested by the Government, that when solicited by a pension agent to employ him in prosecuting his claim, he replied. "If my country thinks the pension deserved, it will be paid," and steadily refused to make any efforts toward obtaining the pension, other than to comply with the ordinary forms of law. He became a Trustee of Hampden-Sidney in 1792, and was most punctual in attending to his duties till the infirmities of age, in 1835, prevented. He took a lively interest in the incipient steps toward the establishment of Union Theological Seminary, and after the Institution had been finally organized and its first building erected, he attended, with great delight, the religious meetings of the students, and contributed, by his presence, greatly to their encouragement. His last days were times of great infirmity of body, and, for some years, of spiritual distress. But the latter wore off, and though, with increase of years, his infirmities grew apace, he found "the joy of the Lord" his abiding strength. His death seemed rather the final decay of nature than the result of any acute malady, and in the fullness of years, of labor and of honor. "he was gathered to his fathers" to rest till the Resurrection glories shall be unfolded.

Munro, John Henry, D. D., eldest son of Daniel and Rachel Munro, was born at Rosevale, near Moira, Ireland. He was educated at the Royal Academical Institution, Belfast, where he gained the silver medal, which was the highest prize for general scholarship. Having entered Queen's College, Belfast, in 1860, he took honors in Natural Philosophy and Chemistry, and graduated in 1864. He studied theology in the Assembly's College, Belfast, and the Free Church College, Edinburgh, and having been licensed to preach in 1867, was ordained pastor of the Sandys Street Church, Newry. He became editor of Day-break, the Children's Missionary Magazine of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. In 1873 he accepted the pastorate of the Springfield Street Church, Boston, Mass., having been selected by a deputation sent to Ireland to procure a minister. He became pastor of the Central Church in Philadelphia, at Eighth and Cherry streets, in the year 1875; and under his guidance the church built a new edifice at Broad street and Fairmount avenue, which was dedicated in 1878. Dr. Munro is a cultured gentleman, a fine scholar, a vigorous writer, an excellent preacher, and continues to be blessed in his ministry among an attached and appreciative people.

Murkland, Rev. Sidney Smith, was born in Kilmarnock, Scotland, February 4th, 1807. Having completed the prescribed course of study, he was ordained to the ministry, and sent out as a Foreign Missionary in 1836, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, his field of labor being Demerara, South America. Here he labored, more or less, ten years, with extraordinary energy and success, leading thousands to the Saviour, and organizing them into churches, which soon became not only self-supporting, but also large contributors to the London Society.

His health having entirely broken down under the equatorial climate and the unremitting toil, he was sent by his physician to Nova Scotia, where he preached the gospel four years, chiefly at Liverpool. In 1851 he came to the United States, preaching first at Parkersburg, W. Va., and afterward in Petersburg, Richmond, and the vicinity of Hampden-Sidney College, Va. In 1861 he went to Bethany, N. C., where he exercised his ministry sixteen years. At the close of the Civil War he resigned his pastoral charge, and gave himself enthusiastically to the evangelization and elevation of the Freedmen. He built five churches, established schools, preached far and wide. With a few kindred brethren he organized the first Presbytery, and in due course the first Synod, of the colored people in this country. He helped to lay the foundation of Scotia Seminary and Biddle University (whose Presidency he declined), the two great educational Institutions of the Presbyterian Church for the Freedmen in the South.

Worn out by exhausting labors, and stricken with paralysis, he returned to Virginia, and spent his closing days in the family of his son, at Farmville, where he fell asleep, on March 1st, 1880, in the midst of his beloved ones, and in the unclouded assurance of his Saviour's presence. His last expression was to testify Christ was with him.

Mr. Murkland was a man of noble presence and of large, natural endowments. He was without fear and without reproach, bold, fervent, intensely earnest, preaching Christ, living Christ. "For me to live is Christ; to die, is gain."

Mutchmore, Samuel Alexander, D. D., is of purely Scotch and Scotch-Irish ancestry, who, after coming to this country, took a creditable part in its civil and military conflicts. He was born in the State of Ohio. His father, Alexander Mutchmore, is still living, a man of vigorous mind, who saw service in the War of 1812. His mother, Mary Brady McCune, was a daughter of Col. Thomas McCune, an officer under General Washington, who represented his district in Ohio eleven successive sessions in the Senate, and whose wife was sister of General Hugh Brady, of military distinction in Pennsylvania, and Colonel Samuel Brady, the celebrated Indian fighter.

Mr. Mutchmore was three years in Ohio University, and a year and a half (including a session at Law School) in Indiana University. He graduated at Centre College, Danville, Ky.; studied theology at Danville Seminary, and entered the active ministry about 1858, as Home Missionary in Southern Kentucky, stationed at Bowling Green. He occupied the pulpit of Dr. Halsey, Chestnut Street Church, Louisville, Ky., for several months. After a year's pastorate at Columbia, Mo. (1859), he was called to Fulton, Mo., the seat of Westminster College, the occasion being an extensive revival among the citizens and students, while acting as commissioner sent by Presbytery to settle a difficulty between the Church and the College. At the close of 1802 he went to Carondelet, then a small town. St. Louis built the Carondelet Avenue Church, raised the money and dedicated it free of debt.

In 1805 he was called to the Cockslick Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and took charge of it January 1st, 1806. Between one and two hundred were added to the church in a revival immediately after. The following Spring the congregation determined to remove, under his leadership, to Franklin street and Columbia avenue, where the present substantial edifice was erected, at a cost of $70,000. The seven years' pastorate was one of prosperity, over five hundred persons being added upon profession of faith, and the membership increasing from less than two hundred to over seven hundred. He was transferred to Alexander Presbyterian Church by action of Presbytery, it being in deep financial distress.

During his pastorate the debt of $25,000 was paid, $16,000 more were appropriated to repairs and improvements upon the church ($12,000 of which was a gift from the pastor himself), and the membership was increased from 160 to over 500, mostly on profession of faith. In 1853 he became proprietor of the Presbyterian.

Dr. Mutchmore is at present pastor of the Collegiate Church, Montgomery Avenue and Eighteenth street, where his labors continue to be greatly blessed. He occupies a high rank as a preacher. Possessed of an intellect at once vigorous and logically disciplined, an earnest spirit, and a strong emotional nature, he presents the truth with great force and fervor. As a presbyter, he is faithful in the discharge of duty. As a writer, he is clear and cogent. His fine social qualities are appreciated by all who are acquainted with him.

N

Neil, John Witherspoon, D.D., was born in Portsmouth, Va., February 25th, 1837. His parents were the Rev. William and Eliza Bogart Neil. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College, Va., in 1857, and studied law for a year in Louisville, Ky. In 1858 he entered the Theological Seminary at Danville, Ky., from which he graduated in 1861.

In 1860 he was licensed by the Presbytery of Louisville and in 1861 the Presbytery of Central Mississippi ordained and installed him pastor of the Church at Richmond, La., a village a few miles west of Vicksburg. In 1864-5 he labored very successfully in the Jackson Street Church, Mobile, Ala. After this he supplied, for a short time, the church in Columbus, Ga. In 1866 the Presbytery of Nashville installed him pastor of the church at Murfreesboro', Tenn., where, for over four years, he worked very successfully, gathering a large congregation and rebuilding the house of worship.

In 1871 he was appointed by his Presbytery to the evangelistic work. In 1872 the Committee of Missions of the Southern Presbyterian Church sent him to San Antonio, Texas, where he still is. In that city he found a few Presbyterians, and immediately organized a factory social congregation. He has now a strong, active, self-supporting church, worshipping in a beautiful and spacious building, which is filled to its utmost capacity. He has had to contend against the forces of Romanism and German intolerance. By his prudent management and faithfulness, he is the head of Protestantism in the city. Dr. Neil's name is all else a preacher of the gospel. His preaching is attractive, from its deep thoughtfulness, clear simple statement and intense earnestness. His manner is pleasant. He is a sympathetic and diligent pastor, and has unbounded energy and capacity for work.

Neshaminy (Warwick) Church, Hartsill's Point. The precise date of the organization of this church cannot be ascertained. Tradition puts it in the year 1710, but it was probably a few years later. Although over a century and a half old, it has had but seven pastors, namely:—

Rev. William Tennent, Sr., from 1726 to 1742—sixteen years; a man of comprehensive views, indomitable energy and fervent piety. He could speak and write the Latin language with entire ease. In 1730 he was Moderator of the Synod of Philadelphia. He was in hearty sympathy with the "great awakening" of 1730-40, and, with his talented sons, zealously wrought with Whitefield in his revival work. In founding "Log College," for the education of young men for the ministry, he did a great work for his own and succeeding generations. Among its distinguished alumni were the Rev. Samuel Blair, the Rev. John Blair, afterward Professor of Theology and Vice President of Princeton College; Rev. Samuel Finley, for ten five years President of Princeton College; the Rev. Wm. Robinson and Rev. John Rowland, both of whom were eminently successful in their ministry.

Rev. Charles Brown, from December 1st, 1743, to August 13th, 1772—nearly twenty-nine years; a graduate of Log College; an earnest and effective preacher, and for nine years a Trustee of Princeton College. He died while yet pastor, in the West Indies, whether he had gone to solicit funds for the college.

Rev. Nehemiah T. . ., from November 3d, 1774, to March 1st, 1812—nearly thirty-eight years; a man of "profound understanding," and an able expounder of the Divine Word, and also an ardent patriot. He was Clerk of the Synod of New York and Philadelphia for three years; Moderator of the General Assembly in 1801, and its Permanent Clerk for several years afterward.

Rev. Robert B. Bohrbll, from October 20th, 1813, to November 1st, 1838—twenty-five years; a most excellent preacher and eminently successful pastor. Two great revivals of religion occurred during his pastorate. He resigned on account of ill health, and died June 28th, 1845.

Rev. James P. Wilson, Jr., from February 26th, 1839, to June 30th, 1847—eight years and four months. Two extensive revivals of religion occurred during his pastorate, and many were added to the church. He resigned to accept the Presidency of Delaware College, Newark, Del.; and while occupying that position received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Pennsylvania.

Rev. Douglas K. Turner, from April 18th, 1848, to April 20th, 1873—twenty-five years. Several seasons of special religious interest were enjoyed, and progress made in the temporal affairs of the church. He resigned on account of ill health.

Rev. William E. Jones, D. D., installed October 23d, 1873, and still the pastor. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Centre College, Kentucky, June 14th, 1876; and is a member of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. He is a sound, instructive, Scriptural preacher, and a faithful pastor.

New Windsor College, situated in the heart of one of the healthiest and most picturesque sections of Maryland, was chartered in 1843, by the Presbyterians. In 1852 it was reorganized by Andrew J. Baker and others, and though still under the auspices of the Presbyterian Church, is not a sectarian Institution, the pupils being allowed to worship in accordance with their religious convictions. The Institution has preparatory and collegiate departments, to which both sexes are admitted, with such restrictions only as the nature of the case demands. Rev. J. P. Carter was the first President. He was succeeded by Andrew J. Baker, who presided until 1877, when Rev. A. M. Jelly, D.D., the present excellent Principal, took charge. The College is essentially two separate Institutions, with two boards of instructors, located on the same ground and under the same general management, and thus parents are enabled to educate both their sons and daughters without separating them. Under the administration of Dr. Jelly, with the aid of his competent Faculty, it is blessed with prosperity, and is exerting a salutary influence. (See p. 1192.)

Noble, Jonathan H., D. D., oldest son of Hon. Obadiah and Lois Harris Noble, was born in Timonmouth, Vt., October 8th, 1801. Graduated at Williams College in 1826; studied nearly three years in Princeton Seminary, was licensed by the Presbytery of New York, April 2d, 1827; and installed by the same body, April, 1830. Was Moderator of the Presbytery of the Presbyterian Church of Cambridgeport, from September 18th, 1829, to September 18th, 1832; was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, North Cambridgeville, N. Y., from September, 1832, to July 1st, 1837; was pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Schaghticoke, N. Y., from March, 1837, to February, 1865; of the Third Church, Troy, N. Y., from 1868 to 1871; the Church at Pittstown, from 1871 to 1873; and the Church at Johnsonville, from 1871 to 1877, preaching continuously for the forty-eight years, losing but six Sabbaths from illness during the whole time. Dr. Noble was distinguished for his unpretending but instructive preaching, and his gentle and genuine sympathy with the people of his charge. Always present in the meetings of his Presbytery, and remembering everything presbyterial which had ever come under his notice, he was authority with his brethren, and their delight.

Nurse, Rev. James, was born in Washington, D. C., April 30th, 1805. He graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., in 1823. He was stated supply at Germantown, Pa., 1828-30; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia, May 19th, 1829; pastor at East Kishacoquillas, Pa., 1831-34; pastor at Perryville, Milroy, 1834-49, and teacher at Washington, D. C., 1850-54. He died of cholera, while seeking a new charge in the ministry, at Salem, Iowa, July 6th, 1854. Mr. Nurse was editor of the first edition of the "Paragraph Bible" in this country. He was a good scholar and an able preacher.

Nurse, Rev. Joseph Everett, was born in Washington, D. C., April 17th, 1819. He attended the Classical Academy of the Hon. S. P. Chase; graduated at Jefferson College, Pa., 1837; taught a classical Academy in Washington, D. C., 1840-49; and was licensed by the Presbytery of the District of Columbia, in May, 1849. He was appointed Professor of Ethics and English Studies and Acting Chaplain at the U. S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, August, 1850. He was on duty at the U. S. Naval Observatory at Washington, 1865-79, and on special duty at the Navy Department, 1879-1881, at which time he was placed on the retired list by law. Mr. Nurse was stated supply to the Presbyterian churches of Prince William and Fairfax, of Virginia, 1867-1875; abroad on public duty, 1875; stated supply to the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church of Washington, 1876; and to the churches of Falls and Balls Bluff, Va., 1879. He is still occupied in preaching at missionary stations in and near Washington, almost continuously, when not serving as stated supply. Prof. Nurse is a gentleman of scholarly attainments, an instructive preacher and a good writer. He published, in 1857, "The Maritime Canal of Suez;" in 1874, "Memorial of Founding of the U. S. Naval Observatory;" in

NEW WINDSOR COLLEGE, MARYLAND.

1875, in Harper's Magazine, "Observatories in the United States;" in 1879, "The Second Arctic Expedition of C. F. Hall," ordered by the U. S. Senate; and in 1883, "An Exploration in the Ice Zones."

Nutman, Rev. John, was a native of Newark, N. J., and was licensed by Philadelphia Presbytery, and ordained pastor of Hanover, New Jersey, in 1730. Dr. Alden calls the congregation Whippany, it included at first West Hanover and South Hanover. He resigned the charge in 1745, and engaged in teaching in Newark. He died, September 1st, 1751. His daughter was the first wife of Jonathan Sergeant, and the mother of the wife of the Rev. Dr. Ewing, of Philadelphia.

O

Ogden, Joseph M., D.D., was born in Elizabethtown, N. J., September 21st, 1801; graduated at Princeton College and Princeton Theological Seminary; ordained an evangelist by the Presbytery of Elizabeth, September 11th, 1827; a home missionary in Pennsylvania for a time, and pastor of the Church of Chatham, N. J., from 1828 to 1873. Dr. Ogden died at his home in Chatham, February 13th, 1884, in the eightieth year of his age. He was widely known and highly esteemed.

Omelvena, Rev. James, is the youngest child of James and Jane (Gibson) Omelvena, and was born in county Antrim, Ireland, December 28th 1831. He emigrated to America in 1868, and in the following year he began his studies for the ministry. One year was spent in preparatory studies in the Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. His collegiate education was received at Blackburn University, Carlinville, Ill., and theological course taken at Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, O., graduating from latter Institution in 1876. He was licensed to preach in 1875 by the Presbytery of Alton, and in 1877 was ordained by the Presbytery of Vincennes. After graduating he preached to the Presbyterian Church in Spencer, Ind., until February, 1878, when he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Dayton, Ind., where he still continues, faithful and successful in his labors.

P

Palmer, Wales Lewis, son of William A. and Olive Palmer, was born in Machias Port, Me., May 8th, 1834. Was married to Ruth Morgan, October 31st, 1861; came to California in 1852 and joined Howard Church in 1858. He has been an elder in that church since 1866 and Clerk of the Session since 1877. He was a member of the Board of Education of San Francisco for several terms and President in 1861. Mr. Palmer has had so many years of active official life in the Church, and under circumstances so varied and trying, as to be sufficient to fully bring out what is in the man. He has proved himself faithful in trying times, liberal in needy times, hopeful in desponding times and charitable always; able, under the impulsive panics that carried others away, to stand to his duty when he stood almost alone. Catholic of spirit, loving all who bear the name of Christ, yet exacting with himself in loyalty to the principles of Presbyterianism. Conservative in making changes, earnest in completing those once made.

Parker, Rev. Alexander, a child of James and Martha (Blair) Parker, was born at Georgetown, Ohio, July 17th 1829. A partial course at Marietta College was interrupted by the failure of his health, but subsequently, undertaking the study of theology, he graduated from Lane Seminary in 1857. Receiving licensure from Cincinnati Presbytery, May, 1856, and ordained, April, 1858, he served the churches at Allensville and Jacksonville, Indiana, from 1857 to 1859. Settled afterward at North Madison, Indiana (1859-1866), Connersville, Indiana (1866-1870), Columbus, Indiana (1870-1883); he removed from the last-named residence to Orange, California.

Mr. Parker's physical characteristics strongly suggest the features of his character. More than six feet in height, his frame is solidly and compactly built. Of a clear well-balanced judgment, and excellent powers of analysis, he has great patience and steadiness of will. His friends are attracted by a conspicuous modesty and charity. In his public discourses there are uniformly marks of a symmetrical mind, and often the mighty truths of the Calvinistic system are urged upon the attention with tremendous force. Upon Mr. Parker's removal to California, the action of the Presbytery of Indianapolis was a proof of the esteem in which he is held among his brethren.

Parry, Rev. Thomas, the fifth son of John and Phoebe Parry, was born near Denbigh, North Wales, October 10th, 1844. His parents emigrated to Wisconsin while he was still but a boy. In 1870 he graduated from Princeton College, and in 1873 from Princeton Seminary. In the latter year he was licensed to preach by New Brunswick Presbytery, and in September of the same year became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Constantine, Mich., where he labored successfully until May, 1877, when he went to Ottawa, Ill., and for a time supplied the pulpit there. In February, 1878, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian Church of Providence, R. I., where he labored with good success, until May, 1880, when he accepted a call to the Central Presbyterian Church of Terre Haute, Ind. He remained pastor of this church until January, 1884, when he accepted a call to the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, of Chicago, Illinois.

Although laboring under great disadvantages in early life, of which the youth now can have no appreciation, Mr. Parry has not only mastered an education peculiar to his profession, but is thoroughly versed in the philosophies, ancient and modern, having a mind peculiarly adapted to the comprehension of all philosophic thought, and he is able to make efficient use of this knowledge in combating the false philosophies of the times. Of broad and liberal views, he is yet thoroughly orthodox and Presbyterian. His ministry has been quite successful; his earnestness, energy and zeal, and a warm heart, full of desire for the salvation of souls, make his pulpit efforts very impressive. He readily impresses a community as one much above the ordinary. His success has largely been due to the motto he has adopted and lives up to in his pulpit labors, i. e., "To do the very best I can every time." Each removal he has made has been to a broader field of usefulness.

Parsons, David, D.D., was the son of Rev. David and Eunice Wells Parsons, born at Amherst, Mass., January 28th, 1749. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1772, and succeeded his father as pastor at Amherst, October 30, 1782. His father, grandfather and great-grandfather were clergymen and graduates of Harvard.

Dr. Parsons was a man of noble, commanding presence, courtly address and dignified, persuasive manners. His head and face were models of manly beauty, and his smile was said to be a benediction. His picture represents a man over six feet in height, of broad, deep chest, symmetrical body and limbs, dressed in the clerical Continental fashion of the day. His talents and bearing were of a high order, and his sermons, still extant in his own handwriting, prove him to have been a vigorous original thinker and writer. His father had filled the pulpit at Amherst for more than forty years, and though almost a loyalist during the Revolution, he had, by virtue of his lofty character, piety, benevolence, wide influence and personal love of his people, retained his ministry. Yet his church, for a long time, had been almost rent asunder by political contentions.

The subject of this sketch succeeded his father at the age of thirty-three years, and his course was so conciliatory, patriotic and Christian that, after a ministry of thirty-eight years, his retirement was a source of deep regret to the entire congregation. He was a man of brilliant conversational powers, an infinite fund of humor, quick at repartee, and many of his witty sayings are still preserved by tradition. His house was large and commodious, and his hospitality unbounded. It was the gathering place of the clergy from far and wide, who delighted to meet at the house of their "Bishop," as they were wont to call him. His efforts for the promotion of education, and especially the training of young men for the ministry, were unceasing during his whole life, and he was instrumental in founding Amherst Academy, a school of no little note in its day, and the germ of the present college. Amherst College was largely indebted to him for its conception and the efforts he made for its establishment, though he died before the charter was received from the Legislature. He left behind him the record of a most useful, honorable, benevolent life; a preacher of rare force and excellence, and a profound believer in the sacred teachings of the gospel.

Pearson, Rev. William Franklin, youngest son of Anthony and Sarah (Peden) Pearson, was born July 9th, 1831, in Spartanburg county, South Carolina. He was taken under the care of the South Carolina Presbytery, September 15th, 1855, and entered the Theological Seminary at Columbia, S. C., in October of the same year. He was licensed to preach April 10th, 1858, and graduated at the Seminary, June 10th of the same year. His first pastoral charge was Little Mountain Church and Varennes, over which he was installed June 9th, 1860. This relation continued ten years. He was called to Greenville Church and Ninety Six, and served them jointly for three years, and then to Upper Long Cane Church, in connection with Greenville Church, which has been his pastoral charge for the past fifteen years. For a quarter of a century he has preached the gospel, faithfully and successfully, in Abbeville county, S. C., and lives now in the town of Due West, within ten miles of his first pastoral charge.

Penrose, Hon. Charles Bingham, son of Clement Biddle Penrose and Anna Howard Bingham, was born October 6th, 1798, at his father's country seat, near Frankford, Philadelphia. In 1819 he studied law in Philadelphia, with Samuel Ewing, Esq., and on being admitted to the Bar, in 1821, settled in Carlisle. Here he at once took his place among the foremost in the number of eminent jurists of which that Bar could then justly boast. Popular manners, legal erudition, close attention to business, and admirable oratorical powers, soon secured him a large practice.

In 1833 Mr. Penrose was elected to the State Senate, and on the expiration of his term was re-elected. In this capacity he achieved distinction, even among the men of ability who at that time were chosen to this office. In 1841 President Harrison appointed him Solicitor of the Treasury, which position he held until the close of President Tyler's Administration, discharging its duties with marked ability and fidelity. When he resigned his office, returning to Pennsylvania, he resumed the practice of his profession in Lancaster, with success. In 1847 he settled in Philadelphia, his native city, and soon became largely engaged in his professional pursuits. In 1856 he was elected as a Reform candidate to the State Senate. He labored most faithfully in aid of the good cause he had espoused, but the work and exposure were more than his constitution could bear, and after a short illness, he died of pneumonia, at his post in Harrisburg, on April 6th, 1857.

The character of Mr. Penrose was distinguished by many strong and prominent points. He was emphatically self-reliant, depending on his own resources in the accomplishment of his plans and purposes. He was an earnest man in everything he undertook. To selfishness he was an entire stranger. "He looked not only upon his own things, but also on the things of others." Benevolence beamed in his countenance, and often found expression, not in good wishes merely, but also in acts of delicate and seasonable kindness. His generosity was apparent to everybody, amounting almost to a fault. His manner, which was highly cultivated, was gentle, courteous and genial, offensive to none, attractive to all. Especially was he gracious to his inferiors, careful of their rights, and considerate of their feelings. Best of all, he was a Christian. He was a consistent and exemplary member of the Presbyterian Church, recognizing it practically as "the whole duty of man to fear God and keep His commandments."

Mr. Penrose was the father of the late William M. Penrose, an eminent member of the Bar of Carlisle; R. A. F. Penrose, M.D., a distinguished Professor in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania; and the Hon. Clement Biddle Penrose, an able and popular Judge of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia.

Piney Creek Presbyterian Church, Carroll county, Md. "April 13th, 1763, Tom's Creek and Pipe Creek churches asked leave to apply to the Presbytery of New Brunswick for a young man to supply them." The answer to this request is not recorded, but the Rev. Samuel Thompson was appointed to preach at Tom's Creek, and the Rev. Robert McMardil was at the same time appointed to preach at Pine Creek, on the fourth Sabbath of April. At this point in the history the name of Pipe Creek disappears from the record, and that of Pine, then Piney Creek, is substituted, showing that the congregation now adopted a new name, if it did not also change its place of worship.

The Church was supplied during the next Autumn and Winter by William Edmeston and John Slemmons, licentiates of the Donegal Presbytery, by William Magaw, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Philadelphia, and by the Rev. Robert Smith. During the next five years Tom's Creek and Piney Creek had occasional supplies, appointed chiefly at the stated meetings of the Presbytery in April and October. Andrew Bay, John Slemmons, John Craighead, Hezekiah James Buleh, Samuel Thompson and Robert Cooper, were among their preachers. Mr. Slemmons was unanimously called to Lower Marsh Creek on the third Saturday of November, 1761, and on the 23d of May was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Carlisle. He frequently supplied Tom's Creek and Piney Creek, both before and after his settlement at Marsh Creek. Piney Creek had, meanwhile, asked for the appointment of the Rev. Joseph Rhea, "in particular," as a supply. A call to Mr. Rhea to accept the pastorate of the church was presented to him in April, 1771. The commissioners from Piney Creek, to prosecute the call before Presbytery, were Patrick Watson and Matthew Galt. They stated that subscriptions amounting to £110 or £112 had been secured for Mr. Rhea's support, that if he became pastor they proposed to maintain his family for the first year, in addition to the salary, and that this agreement had been entered on record in their "Book of Congregational Affairs." An existing difficulty between Tom's Creek and Piney Creek delayed the placing the call in Mr. Rhea's hands. This difficulty grew out of two subjects of dispute. The first was, that Piney Creek desired a separation from Tom's Creek and the settlement of a pastor of their own, whereas Tom's Creek favored the continuance of the former union, and a joint settlement of a pastor. The second subject of controversy was that of the boundary line between the two congregations. These questions of distraction were acted upon by a committee of Presbytery, in the judgment and determination of which both congregations acquiesced. The way being now clear for presenting the call to Mr. Rhea, it was placed in his hands, and accepted. The record omits the arrangements for his installation, but this doubtless soon followed, as from this time he discharged the duties of the pastorate.

At what precise time the first house of worship was erected at Piney Creek is unknown. It was, however, prior to the settlement of Mr. Rhea, as is shown by the deed conveying the lot of ground and the house built upon it to the trustees. The original Piney Creek Church, erected prior to Mr. Rhea's settlement in 1771, was a very plain log structure. Its pews were—

" Straight-backed and tall,
Its pulpit goblet-formed,
Half way up the wall,
The sounding-board above."

It was removed about the year 1818, when the present brick church was built upon the same site and much after the same fashion. It was remodeled and modernized in 1869, during the pastorate of Mr. Patterson. The number of pews in the second church before the last improvements were made were fifty-eight. The deed of the old church is dated February 15th, 1771, and was given for a consideration of five shillings, by Abraham Heyter, of Frederick county, province of Maryland, to Patrick Watson, James Galt, and John McCorkle, of the same county and province, and James Barr and James Hunter, of York county, province of Pennsylvania, in trust for a church and burying ground. Mr. Rhea tendered his resignation as pastor of the Piney Creek Church in April, 1776, and, after due deliberation, Presbytery dissolved the pastoral relation.

The Rev. James Martin, a member of the Associate Presbytery of Pennsylvania, accepted a call to Piney Creek Church, and was installed November 9th, 1780. The support promised was "four hundred bushels of wheat per year, or the current price thereof in money, and as much more as the circumstances of the congregation would admit." Mr. Martin continued pastor of the church until 1789. Tradition speaks of him as an able and popular preacher. He is said to have been a very earnest and animated speaker. Like all the preachers of that day, and those especially of the denomination from which he originally came, his sermons were long, perhaps seldom less than an hour and a half, and sometimes considerably longer. On a warm Summer day it was not unusual for him to take off his coat and preach in his shirt sleeves. In the pulpit he was very forgetful of himself and his personal appearance, so intensely was he taken up in his subject. He would first take off his coat, then begin to loosen his cravat, and conclude by taking off his wig, holding it in his hand and shaking it in the face of the congregation; and sometimes, during the course of his sermon, his wig would become awry, the back part turned to the front, and he utterly unconscious of the metamorphosis.

The pulpit of the Piney Creek Church remained vacant for several years after Mr. Martin's resignation, and depended upon Presbytery for preaching and the administration of the Sacraments. In October, 1801, the Piney Creek Church extended a call to Mr. Davidson, offering him £87, 10s. for one half of his ministerial and pastoral services. A commissioner informed the Presbytery that Tom's Creek had been consulted, and had agreed that Mr. Davidson's services should be divided between the two congregations. The call was accordingly presented to Mr. Davidson, and upon his acceptance of it, the arrangement was consummated. Tom's Creek and Piney Creek were now, for the first time in a period of forty years, united under the same pastor. The union then established has, however, been continued, with entire harmony, through successive pastorates, for three-quarters of a century. Mr. Davidson's labors were continued in the two congregations until the Autumn of 1809. Of the internal and spiritual condition of Piney Creek Church during Mr. Davidson's pastorate little is known. In 1806 the total membership was 124; in 1807, 113; in 1808, 108. In 1805 the additions to the church were 10; in 1807, 8; in 1808, 7; in 1809, 9. The baptisms in 1806 were 14; in 1807, 8; in 1808, 21; in 1809, 10; in 1810, 11.

The pastors of the Piney Creek Church have been: 1763-70, vacant, with occasional supplies; 1771-76, Rev. Joseph Rhea; 1776-80, vacant, with occasional supplies; 1780-89, Rev. James Martin; 1789-1800, vacant, with occasional supplies; 1801-10, Rev. Patrick Davidson; 1811-13, vacant, with occasional supplies; 1814-66, Rev. Robert S. Grier; 1866-73, Rev. Isaac M. Patterson; 1873, Rev. William Simonton.

Planting of Presbyterianism in Kentucky One Hundred Years Ago.

The Synod of Kentucky, at its meeting in Harrodsburg, October 12th, 1883, celebrated, with a very interesting programme of services, the "Centennial of Presbyterianism in Kentucky." Appropriate and able addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. N. Saunders, Rev. J. L. McKee, D.D., Rev. E. P. Humphrey, D.D., Rev. L. G. Barbour, D.D., Rev. T. D. Witherspoon, D.D. On Sunday evening, at the close of the Synod's Sessions, Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D., of Richmond, Va., delivered, by invitation, a historical discourse. Dr. Hoge took for his text "The people which sat in darkness saw great light, and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up." (Matt. iv, 16), which was the text of the first sermon preached by a Presbyterian minister in Kentucky. From Dr. Hoge's admirable discourse we make the following extract:—

"The first explorers of Kentucky," says Davidson, "spread everywhere, on their return, the most glowing accounts of what they had seen—luxuriantness of the soil, the salubrity of the climate, the undulating face of the country, the vast fields of native clover, the magnificent groves of sugar tree and walnut, the deeply-channeled rivers sweeping between precipitous cliffs, the verdure of the vegetation," all combining to make it the imperial park of nature, the temple of the world. Allured by these glowing descriptions, emigrants flocked to it from every quarter, but principally from Virginia.

"When the year 1783 opened with the prospect of peace with Great Britain, emigrants poured into Kentucky by the thousand; but now history must make a pause, for a new era is about to be inaugurated. Most eminent among all those who flocked to this Western garden of the Hesperides was the Rev. David Rice, then pastor of the Church at the Peaks of Otter, in Bedford county, Va., whose summits command one of the noblest prospects in the world, emblematic of the influence to be exercised, and the far-reaching, widely-extended results which were to follow the arrival of this eminent servant of Christ. His appearance was hailed with joy by the Presbyterian settlers, to many of whom he was known personally, and to all by reputation. The advent of this eminent man marks an era ever to be remembered in the history of the Synod of Kentucky.

"I do not mean by this that he was a man of transcendent talents and acquirements, for in both of these characteristics he has been surpassed by members of the Synod, some of whom have gone to their rest (I pause for an instant, reverently and lovingly, to lay an immortelle on the tomb of Stuart Robinson), and others of whom yet survive to adorn the spheres in which they move. But, as in the unexplored field, the first furrow which cuts the sod and turns up a new line of color across the surface is more conspicuous than all the parallel ridges of an evenly-plowed field, so it was with David Rice—if not the most gifted, he was the first. He was the Columbus of the ecclesiastical history of Kentucky. It is just one hundred years since he preached in Harrodsburg a sermon on the text which, in honor of his memory, I have chosen as the text of my discourse, representing, as I do, the State from which he came.

"If anything more than another can illustrate the change which time has wrought, it is the geographical boundaries of our States and of the Synods and Presbyteries of our Church. We can now hardly realize the fact that Kentucky was once only the continuation of a county in Virginia, and that it was not entitled even to be called 'the county of Kentucky' until 1776; that it was not even a 'district' until 1780, and that from this subordinate position it sprang into a sovereign State and member of the Union in 1792. We have another illustration of the astonishing growth of our country and Church, when we remember that in 1789 the Synod of Virginia was composed of four Presbyteries: First, the Presbytery of Redstone, which covered the settlements of Western Pennsylvania; second, the Presbytery of Hanover, which embraced all of Eastern Virginia; third, Lexington, covering the valley and what is now known as West Virginia; and fourth, the Presbytery of Transylvania, which included the District of Kentucky, and the settlements on Cumberland river, extending into what is now the State of Tennessee.

"It was into this vast ecclesiastical domain that Father Rice, in the providence of God, came, bearing the lamp of life, and near the spot where we now worship the first congregation gathered, to catch the early light which for a hundred years has been brightening and broadening, until now it fills not only the territory occupied by your noble Synod, but illumines the shores of the Pacific.

"It is not my province to-day to give you a biographical sketch of this pioneer of Presbyterianism, or of any of the little band who accompanied and succeeded him; but even at this distant period we cannot contemplate the work accomplished by these servants of Christ without a new thrill of admiration at the zeal, fortitude and perseverance with which they fulfilled the great mission entrusted to them. When we say they labored, and we are entered into their labors, we mean much more than that their labors were the illustration of mere activity; they were also the illustration of the privations, the self-denials and sufferings they endured. They illustrated what has been true in all lands and in all times, of those who have done the pioneer work of the world—what has been true of all reformers and philanthropists and champions of truth and righteousness.

"It has ever been the lot of such men so to toil while others rested; to watch while others slept; and often to bear the ridicule and the misrepresentation and the persecution of those whom they sought to save and bless.

"Count me o'er earth's chosen heroes;
They were souls that stood alone,
While the men they agonized for Hurled the contumelious stone."

"Such has been the cost of inheritance bequeathed to us by those who have maintained the empire of principle in the world in all generations.

"And now, having completed our review of the influences which shaped the men whose noble office it was to lay the foundation of the institutions which we most love and cherish, since we know what fire it was which fused the metal, and what forces they were which formed the moulds into which that metal was cast, we can more easily account for much that is characteristic in the spirit, and we can better appreciate the distinctive features of the Church which claims our allegiance and heartfelt homage.

"In this discession I distinctly disavow the purpose of seeking to create the impression that Presbyterians claim any monopoly of the honor which belongs equally to all patriots and Christians of other churches who labored with them to secure the sacred right of conscience, and the civil liberty we enjoy.

"There are men of other lineage and of other faiths than ours, whose names are illustrious in the annals of the country, and dear to our hearts because of their splendid services in the cause of freedom in the Church and in the State. Did time permit, and if this occasion rendered it appropriate, I would pay deserved tributes, and make special acknowledgments of the efficient aid rendered by those who co-operated with our fathers in their conflict for the right and true. So when I refer to what I consider some of the peculiar characteristics of our own Church, which give it a claim upon our love and labor, it is not to disparage others. Nothing is more foreign to my disposition and purpose than to draw invidious comparisons, or to make comments of any kind on the faith and forms of other churches. I desire only to suggest a few of the reasons why we regard our own as worthy of the warmest devotion of its sons. And the light of history has been invoked, that in that light we might more clearly trace the development of its life through ages of conflict and persecution, and that we might the better appreciate some of the characteristics which commend it to our reason and endear it to our hearts.

"1. We honor it for the strict conformity of its outward organization to what we understand to be the primitive model of the Church of the Apostles; the parity of its ministry; its representative form of government; the minister to labor in word and doctrine; the ruling elder to co-operate with him in all that pertains to its spiritual control; the deacons to have oversight of its temporal interests; each freely working in his own appropriate sphere, all acting in unison, with reference to a common end; all assimilated by a common standard of doctrine and discipline, and compacted into a unity secured by a system of representative Assemblies.

"2. We honor it because of the spirituality of its services, and the simplicity of its forms of worship and mode of administering the Divine ordinances.

"3. We honor it because of its boldness and fidelity in proclaiming and defending all the doctrines of God's Word—even those which have always been most ungenial to the natural heart—doctrines which some suppress, which others qualify, and which others repudiate.

"4. We honor it because, in sharp contrast with those systems of faith which enchain and enfeeble the understanding by suppressing free inquiry and committing both thought and conscience to the keeping of spiritual guardians, the tendency of the Presbyterian system has been to encourage investigation, to vindicate the right of private judgment, and to stimulate and develop the intelligence of the people—the demonstration of which is to be found in the splendid literature it has created; in the contributions of its writers to mental, moral and physical science, and above all, to theology, the queen of all the sciences; so that, wherever our church has been planted, its fruits have been seen in the school, the academy, the college, and the university, the free press, the free Bible, the free pulpit and the free people.

"5. We honor it because the intelligence of the people, quickened by Calvinistic training, has given rise to the demand for a thoroughly-educated ministry, and though not numerically the strongest of the denominations in the land, it contains the largest number of theological seminaries, as well as the most thorough and comprehensive in the course of study required.

"6. We honor it because the moral influence of our church in any community where it has been planted is out of all proportion to its numbers. Its aspect toward fashionable amusements and popular vices may be provokingly stern and forbidding, but there is a force in its rebuke which is felt and acknowledged. Its spirit is always conservative; its influence ever on the side of law and order, and its example one of reverence for lawful authority. Wherever it entrenches itself in any community, it is a barrier against anarchy and misrule, standing equally ready to oppose violence, whether of the magistrate or the mob.

"7. We honor it because of its generous and kindly bearing toward all other evangelical churches. It does not deny the validity of their ordination or sacraments, even when it believes them to be irregular. It can unite cordially with other Christians in the promotion of genuine revivals; can invite them to the communion table and sit down at theirs, laboring with them in every good word and work, and rejoicing in the success of all who are toiling to advance the cause of Christ in the world.

"8. We honor our Church because of the noble stand it has always taken in behalf of civil and religious liberty. It would be strange, indeed, were it otherwise, for the history of Presbyterianism, as we have seen, has been the history of conflict with tyranny in the Church and State from the beginning. Some of us are the descendants of the men who, at the foot of the heath-clad Grampians, contended for Christ's crown and covenant, or who fought the dragoons of Claverhouse at Bothwell Bridge, or at the siege of Londonderry resisted to the death the army of King James. Those were the days when the Presbyterians of Scotland suffered extremities which no tongue can tell—from hunger, nakedness, and banishment—compelled to hide themselves in damp caves and clefts of the rock, without shelter, fire, food or clothing; with none to pity or succor them; when fathers were hanged or shot for protecting their children, and children for defending their parents, and husbands for shielding the wives of their bosoms from the violence of the brutal troopers of the royal army.

"Others of us can trace our ancestry to the men who were compelled by Bourbon tyranny to flee from their once happy homes in the fertile plains of Languedoc, or the delightful valleys of the Loire, and who found an asylum on the high banks of the James, in Virginia, or on the low lands of the Santee and Cooper rivers, in South Carolina.

"There is among my own kindred the old family Bible which their Huguenot ancestors carried first to Holland and then to Virginia. Its covers are worn; its leaves are yellow and faded; they have often been wet with the salt spray of the sea, and the salt tears of the sorrowing exiles; the names in the family register are growing dim; I trust they are bright in the Book of Life.

"Then did the people of God suffer and bleed, both upon the field and the scaffold; and yet, while we read the annals of those days with indignation and bitter tears, we read them also with the most glowing gratitude and admiration at the recollection of the constancy and triumphant heroism of the men who chose to embrace the stake rather than refuse to embrace the cross. From the long night and storm of these persecutions there blazed forth the burning and the shining lights of the world; but now, thank God, here, in the goodly land which His providence prepared for them, the descendants of the Covenanters and the Huguenot and the noble martyrs of the North of Ireland are found dwelling together, with none to molest them or make them afraid; and yet ready, as ever, I trust, if need be—ready once more to brave and peril all, for the testimony of Jesus and for the defence of the faith delivered to the saints.

“And now, fathers and brethren of this venerable Synod, these hallowed memories make their own appeal. We cannot but highly prize what has been so dearly purchased. If not the lineal descendants of the men of whom I have been speaking, we are the inheritors of their faith. If their blood does not run in our veins, their principles possess our souls. We are now the representatives of the Church which they so nobly represented in their day. Be it ours to conserve, defend, and transmit to those who come after us, the institutions which we hold in trust for the generations yet unborn. Let the hallowed recollections of the past stir within us the resolve to make the future fuller of all noble sacrifice and service, so that the evening star of memory may become the morning star of hope, and light the way to new endeavor.

“What we now need is a new, sweet and heavenly unction from on High—the effusion of that quickening grace which will arouse the slumbering energies of our Church and cause every man to do his duty at his post, and by properly plying every instrumentality for good within his reach, thus demonstrate to the world the value of our principles and the efficiency of our organization; that our Church may stand confessed before all men as one of God’s chosen instruments in filling the earth with the knowledge of His great salvation, and that because of its influence in all latitudes and in all lands, it may be truly said, ‘The people that sat in darkness saw great light, and to them that sat in the region and shadow of death light has sprung up.’”

Porter, Abner A., D. D., was the son of Rev. Francis Porter and Isabella Kilpatrick, and was born at Asheville, North Carolina, A. D. 1817, and died in Austin, Texas, on Sabbath, December 8th, 1872. His father had six sons, four of whom entered the ministry in the Presbyterian Church.

Abner received his early training in an academy presided over by his father. He graduated, with distinction, at Princeton College, N. J., about A. D. 1836 or 1837. He pursued his theological studies at the Seminary in Columbia, S. C., where he was distinguished for close application to his studies, and exhibited a judgment and taste of rare excellence and refinement. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, Ala., in the Spring of 1842, and in October of the same year was ordained by that Presbytery, and installed as pastor over two small country congregations in Green county, Ala. He was at once recognized as one of the ablest preachers of that region.

In the year 1846 he removed to Charleston, S. C., where, for a time, he assisted Dr. Thomas Smyth, of the Second Church. During this period that church was blessed with the outpouring of God’s Spirit; many were added to the Church, and a colony was sent out and organized into a church, called the Glebe Street Church, of Charleston.

In the year 1851 he accepted a call to the First Church, Selma, Ala. Here his health, never robust, gave way under his heavy labors, and he was compelled to resign his charge. After many months of great suffering, he was, in a measure, relieved by a skillful surgical operation, and so far regained his health as to be able to resume labor.

He then became editor of the Southern Presbyterian, published in Columbia, S. C., which paper he conducted with distinguished ability until, by the issues of the war, the publication of the paper was suspended.

Leaving Columbia he took charge of a church in Greenville, S. C., where he labored for a number of years, greatly beloved by all the people of God in that region.

In the year 1869, at the request of the Committee of Domestic Missions of the Southern Church, he made a tour of inspection through Southern and Middle Texas, to learn the condition and wants of the Church in that region. The result of this visit was that the Committee, impressed with the importance of supplying that region with the gospel, urged him to return to Texas and take charge of the Church at Austin. To their urgency he reluctantly yielded, feeling that his strength was not equal to the work which they wished him to undertake; but leaving a people to whom he was devoted, and who loved him so well, he bowed to what he regarded as a call of duty and removed to Texas. The position which he assumed in Austin was one requiring much labor, guided by much wisdom, patience and prudence. These, by the grace of God, he brought to the work, and greatly endeared himself to the people of God in that city.

But the burden proved too heavy for him. His health rapidly declined, and on Sabbath, December 8th, 1872, he fell asleep in Jesus.

Dr. Porter was a man of rare gifts and endowments. His mind was admirably well balanced and well disciplined; of sound judgment, refined taste and accurate scholarship. As a preacher, he was eminently evangelical. He was an able defender of the system of doctrines set forth in our Standards, having made himself master of the literature connected with its formation and history. He was thoroughly honest in his views, and strenuous in their defence, but was not an extremist. His manner in the pulpit was always grave and earnest. In his younger years some may have thought there was a lack of gentleness in his manner when controverting opinions which he regarded as hostile to the truth. This grew out of the intensity of his convictions. But in maturer life it all disappeared, and his manner was eminently tender and gentle. He dwelt much on the love of God in Christ, and the deep experiences of the believer's heart in its conflict with sin.

In his intercourse with men at large, he was regarded as too reserved, which was sometimes attributed to haughtiness. But this was a mistake. It was constitutional, rather. Few men could be less influenced by the outward circumstances of men than he was. He was singularly free from prejudice, envy and censoriousness, in judging and speaking of men. He was dignified, manly, generous and just in all his intercourse with men. In prayer he was most remarkable. No one who heard him once could ever forget the deep solemnity of his whole manner; the simplicity, the earnestness of his petitions, and the confiding tone in which they were uttered, could not fail to fix attention. To the plain, illiterate worshiper there was in his manner a strange fascination. We knew a pious old slave, a domestic, who, when she would hear his name called to ask the blessing at the table, would drop whatever work she was at and hasten to the dining-room door to listen, absorbed, to that brief and simple prayer from his lips. Indeed, in all his public performances, while he commanded the respect and the admiration of the most cultivated, he fixed the attention and won the hearts of the plain and the poor, who learned to love him with simple devotion.

Porter, Albert H., a nephew of General Peter B. Porter, Secretary of War under President Adams, was born at Canandaigua N. Y., October 25th, 1801. He came with his parents to Niagara Falls, in 1806, and united with the Presbyterian Church there, in 1831. In December of the same year he was ordained elder, which office he has now filled for fifty-three years, the longest service ever rendered by any elder in Niagara Presbytery. In faith he has always been soundly orthodox; and he has also adhered loyally to the Church of his choice. Both the spiritual and temporal interests of the Church have always been near and dear to his heart. Having been blessed with a generous portion of worldly goods, he has acted the part of a wise and conscientious steward. Besides standing ready at all times to give whatever was needed for Church purposes at home, he is a regular and generous contributor to the boards. His charities have also been extended to the American Bible Society, and many other Christian Institutions, such as Auburn Seminary and Hamilton College. And he loves to dispense his benevolence, in a quiet way, to the poor of his village, and to our Home-Missionaries on the frontier. Thus for more than half a century Elder Porter has stood as a pillar in the Church of Niagara Falls.

Presbyterian Church of Cayuga, New York. The first missionary, in all probability, who visited any part of the territory of Western New York was the Rev. Samuel Kirtland. In 1791 or '92 Mr. Kinney is spoken of as laboring in what is now Northville. He held meetings in the house of Ebenezer Hoskins. Rev. Daniel Thatcher was sent into Western New York, by the General Assembly, in 1795. In 1798 Dr. Hillyer was sent to labor in this region, Genoa and Aurora being particularly named. Dr. Seth Williston labored in Milton, Genoa in 1799, and organized a church in Locke the same year. But up to the close of the year 1800 no minister of the Presbyterian or Congregational Denomination had been settled in this region. Prior, however, to 1800 several Christian Societies had been organized. Regular religious services were held at Northville as early as 1793, in the house of Benjamin Close. And in 1798, at Northville, was organized the first Presbyterian church of the county. The Church of Aurelius was organized in 1799, and, in the same year, one in Locke. In 1800 a church was formed in Scipio. These last were afterward merged in other Societies.

Under the influence of "the Great Revival of 1800," when copious showers of divine grace swept up and down the Atlantic coast, leaping the Allegheny range, and ceasing not until they refreshed the very limits of this then western frontier, the pastors of many flourishing churches in Connecticut and Massachusetts left their homes and came into these wilds, to labor for the souls of the new settlers.

Among the workers who first labored in Cayuga, was the Rev. David Higgins, who, as early as 1801, was sent by the Missionary Society of Connecticut, on a mission of four months to the new settlements in the State of New York. He went as far the Genesee river. On his return, among other places, he preached at the town of Aurelius, which then comprised the present town, and also Auburn, Fleming and Springport. The same year he received and accepted a call from the Aurelius Church, and in July, 1802, moved his family from Connecticut. In September, 1802, he was installed by an Ecclesiastical Council, and soon after a church was erected. The population was so scattered, however, that divine services were held alternately at Auburn, Aurelius, Cayuga and Grover's settlement (now Fleming). Mr. Higgins seems to have labored on this circuit until 1811, when the First Church of Auburn was organized, in July. After that time his work was with the First Church of Auburn alone, until his relations with Aurelius were dissolved, in 1813.

From 1811-19 this people were supplied with monthly missionary preaching, and worshiped with the Aurelius Society, which at that time occupied the old stone church which used to stand opposite the place now owned by Dr. Hamilton.

On the 26th of April, 1819, a public meeting was called in the school-house (the rear of the present Davis' Hall), for the purpose of organizing a religious society in the village of Cayuga. It was resolved that it should be organized according to the Presbyterian form of government, and be known by the name of "The Presbyterian Society of the Village of Cayuga."

Loring Willard, Jonathan Whitney, Uri Foot, Daniel McIntosh, Solomon Dewey and Jeremiah Hallock were duly elected trustees of said Society. One week and a day later (May 3d), this Society met at the same place, and out of their number, under the direction of Rev. Joshua Lane, of the Presbytery of Cayuga, and Rev. William Bacon, of the Presbytery of Geneva, the following sixteen members from the church of Aurelius were formed into a church, viz.: John Fitch, Gershom B. Gillett, Doring Willard, Jeremiah Hallock, Bazaleel Shaw, Jr., Abbey P. Allen, Percy Shaw, Temperance Bernan, Susan Annin, Meliscent Foot, Roxy Ann Foot, Parthenia M. Foot, Philomela Perry, Polly Savage and Tabitha McIntosh.

On the 20th day of June following, Rev. William Bacon presiding, twelve more were received by letter from the church of Aurelius, and Thomas Mumford, Jeremiah Hallock, Elias Thompson and Gershom B. Gillett were elected ruling elders, and Elias Thompson was chosen deacon.

On the 29th day of the same month the Church at Seneca Falls and this united in settling as their pastor the Rev. William Bacon.

Mr. Bacon's relation to the Church of Cayuga was dissolved February 6th, 1821. In July of the same year this church was transferred from Geneva to Cayuga Presbytery, under whose care it has since remained. On the 23d day of July, 1821, a call was made to the Rev. Melad Pomeroy to become pastor of this church, and officiate one-half the time in Aurelius Church. Mr. Pomeroy was installed August 8th, 1821. Under his labors the Society continued to prosper, and the meeting house was completed and dedicated February 26th, 1823. As soon as the church was completed, Mr. Pomeroy was released from the Aurelius Church, and for ten years, viz., till January, 1833, ministered to the Society at Cayuga alone, making his entire labors here of twelve years' duration.

After Mr. Pomeroy came Rev. Octavius Fitch, who supplied the church, and with good success, during the year 1833. Following Mr. Fitch came, in April, 1834, Rev. Henry Snyder, who remained one year. Rev. Erasmus H. Adams followed Mr. Snyder, and labored from June, 1835 to February, 1836. After Mr. Adams left, the pulpit was supplied, for a time, partly from the Seminary at Auburn, but principally by an aged clergyman by the name of Clark. Rev. T. R. Townsend began to labor in the church July 9th, 1837, and was installed pastor in 1838. Mr.

Townsend was highly esteemed as a man and a Christian. During his ministry the church was in a prosperous condition, spiritually and financially.

After Mr. Townsend's dismissal Mr. Pomeroy returned as stated supply, in which relation he continued until 1852. During his second ministry there was a very gracious visitation of the Holy Spirit. In July, 1851, Rev. Timothy M. Hopkins was engaged as stated supply, which relation he sustained until 1860. The Rev. F. W. Roberts came to Cayuga in May, 1860, but his labors were suddenly cut short, by death, in September of the same year. He was much beloved and his decease deeply lamented. The Rev. H. H. Allen labored as stated supply, from May, 1861, to November, 1869. Under his labors there was a steady growth in both temporal and spiritual affairs. The Rev. G. P. Sewall was installed pastor, December 28th, 1870, and his labors during his continuance in this relation were largely blessed. The Rev. Edward P. Willard is at present stated supply of the congregation.

Presbyterian Church, Chester, Morris county, N. J. The history of this church (formerly the Church of Black River and sometimes the Church of Roxbury) runs back to the middle of the last century. It was founded by settlers from the eastern end of Long Island, N. Y. Previous to 1740, a Presbyterian house of worship had been erected between Black River and Mendham, one and a half miles west of Mendham. In 1745 a church building was erected in Mendham Village, and the Presbyterians of Black River soon after were organized into a church, under the name of the First Presbyterian Congregation of Roxbury, and erected an edifice about a mile and a half north of the present village of Chester.

The first pastor was the Rev. Samuel Harker or Harcour, probably of Huguenot descent. He graduated at Princeton College; was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Brunswick, and, according to the records of that Presbytery, was ordained and installed at Roxbury, on Black river, one of the head waters of the Raritan, October 31st, 1752. He is mentioned in "Foote's Sketches of North Carolina," where some of his family resided, as remarkable for size, vigor and strength. One of his daughters married Judge Symmes, of Marietta, Ohio, and was mother-in-law of ex-President Harrison. The son of another daughter, who married Dr. Caldwell, of Lamington, N. J., was Rev. Dr. Caldwell, at one time a teacher in the College of New Jersey, and for more than thirty years, President (the first) of the University of North Carolina.

In 1757 the Presbytery heard that he had imbibed and vented certain erroneous doctrines, and were about to proceed against him, when they learned that he had left his charge and gone as a chaplain in the army. By order of Synod, in 1759, a committee met at Mendham and examined a paper containing Mr. Harker's principles, many of which they found to be correct, but others containing errors. On hearing this report, the Synod found it expedient "to try yet whether further converse may convince him, and agree that he meet with Samuel and James Finley, John Blair, and Robert and Sampson Smith, at Nottingham, in November, and on his return with Gilbert Tennent, Treat Ewing and Dr. Alison." He met with these committees, but without benefit, though the interview lasted two days and one evening.

In 1761 he published his sentiments in a book entitled "An Appeal to the Christian World," to which Rev. John Blair published an answer, entitled "The Synod of New York and Philadelphia Defended." In 1763, the "Synod condemned his propositions, declaring that they could not continue him as a member, and that he be disqualified for preaching or exercising his ministry anywhere," and the Church of Black River was declared vacant. In "Hodge's History of the Presbyterian Church" there are several references to this case, cited as one of the earliest instances of Presbyterian oversight. It is asserted that this was the only case of discipline for erroneous doctrine during the period extending from 1758-1789. Mr. Harker perished at sea, with his son, who was on his way to England to receive Episcopal ordination.

For five years after the removal of Mr. Harker the church was under the care of Presbytery, but without a regular pastor, until the Autumn of 1768, when it settled Rev. William Woodhull, of Brookhaven, Long Island, a brother of the Rev. Dr. John Woodhull, of Freehold, New Jersey. He was a graduate of Princeton College (class of 1764), and studied theology with the Rev. Samuel Buell, of East Hampton, Long Island. After a few years he was obliged to relinquish pastoral labor, on account of bronchial trouble, but still remained a prominent man in the community. He opened a Latin school, in which General Mahlon Dickerson, Secretary of the Navy under General Jackson, was a scholar. He represented Morris county in the First Legislature of Independent New Jersey, which met at Princeton, in August, 1776. He was elected to the same position in 1777. In the Legislature at Perth Amboy, in 1789, and in that of Burlington, in 1790, he again represented Morris county as member of Council. He was appointed a Judge of Common Pleas in 1808, and was a prominent man in the town and county until his death, in 1821.

In 1783 the Presbytery of New York reported that they had left the name of Rev. William Woodhull out of their list of members, because, on account of feeble health, he had relinquished his ministerial duties. "The Synod deeming this reason to be insufficient, directed his name to be restored to the roll." This is one of the earliest instances of Presbyterian action on the subject of the demission of the ministry. During the American Revolution the church was without a settled pastor, and at one period the building was used as a hospital. Near the close of the war an unsuccessful attempt was made to unite with the Congregational Church of the town. In 1785 Rev. Samuel Fordham, of Long Island, was obtained as stated supply, and installed in the pastorate in 1786, in which office he remained for thirty years. His time, like that of Mr. Woodhull, was divided between Roxbury and Succasunna.

He was succeeded, about 1815, by Rev. Jacob Cassner, of Baskingridge, N. J., a graduate of the College and Theological Seminary of Princeton. He gave this church one-third of his time, preaching at Black River (or Chester), German Valley and Fox Hill (now Fairmount). From Chester he was called to Washington, Warren county, where he died.

In 1818 the church called to the pastorate Rev. John Ernest Miller, of Albany, N. Y., a member of the Reformed (Dutch) Church. He remained in Chester until the Spring of 1823, when he took charge of the Reformed Dutch Church of Tomkinsville, Staten Island, and was succeeded, in the Autumn of the same year, by Rev. Abraham Williamson, a native of New Jersey and a graduate of Princeton College and Seminary. During his pastorate of thirty years important changes occurred. Two colonies swarmed from the mother church.

In 1835 forty-eight persons were dismissed to organize the Presbyterian Church of Mount Olive, and in 1852 twenty-six persons were dismissed to form the Presbyterian Church of Flanders. In 1851 the congregation abandoned the old site and edifice, and built and occupied the house in the village in which they now worship. Mr. Williamson remained in charge of the church until 1853, in the Autumn of which year Rev. George M. S. Blauvelt (son of Rev. Dr. William Blauvelt, for more than fifty-five years pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Lumbington, N. J.), a graduate of Princeton Seminary, began a pastorate, which continued until October, 1856. From June, 1857, Rev. Josiah Markle, of the College and Seminary of New Brunswick, N. J., was pastor of the church until April, 1858. In June, 1858, James F. Brewster (a descendant of Elder William Brewster, of the Mayflower, and of Rev. Nathaniel Brewster, pastor of the Church of Setauket, Long Island, for thirty-five years until 1691) became the stated supply, and was ordained and installed by the Presbytery of Passaic in October, 1858. He is a native of New Jersey, a graduate of Rutgers College and Princeton Seminary. During this pastorate the membership has increased about fifty per cent., a parsonage has been built, the church edifice has been renovated, a pipe organ has been introduced, and a handsome chapel has been erected, the latter the gift of Mr. James E. Hedges, of Elizabeth, N. J.

On the 21st of June, 1883, the congregation, with a large gathering of clergymen and friends, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of pastoral labor, with appropriate services.

Presbyterian Church of Cross Creek, Washington county, Pa. The region of country called Cross Creek obtained its name from a creek which empties into the Ohio river near Wellsburg, West Virginia, while another creek empties into the same river directly across the stream. Hence the name Cross Creek. This region is very fertile, heavily timbered, well watered, and abounds in bituminous coal of the best quality. It began to be settled about the year 1770-71. The first settlers were mostly Scotch-Irish. Some came directly from the North of Ireland and West of Scotland, some from York county, Pennsylvania, and from Winchester, Virginia, and a few from Mecklenburg, North Carolina. Among these pioneers were some pious men, who began to hold meetings for social worship as early as 1776-77. Two such Societies were organized within the bounds of Cross Creek. One on Irish Ridge. The leading members of this Society were John Morrison and Robert McCready (both of whom afterward became ruling elders of the Church of Cross Creek), William McCandless and Samuel Strain. The other Society held their meetings at the house of Major William Vance, and in the houses around. The leaders here were Major William Vance, James Campbell, John Stone, Robert Barr and William Wilson. For several years these settlers were greatly harassed by incursions of hostile Indians. Not a few of those who fell under their murderous tomahawks lie in the burying ground of this congregation. From these incursions the people fled into Vance's and Wells' forts—the former one mile north, and the latter five miles west of this church. In these forts, social, and afterward public worship, was kept up for about seven years—especially in Summer and Autumn—the seasons when the Indians were wont to make their raids. On these meetings the Holy Spirit was shed down, and in Vance's fort some seven or eight persons were converted. Among these were Thomas Marquis and his wife Jane. Mr. Marquis subsequently became first a ruling elder, and afterward the pastor of the congregation.

The Rev. James Powers, from the Forks of Youghiogheny, visited this region, and preached the first gospel sermon ever heard in it on the 14th of September, 1778. This was under an oak tree, just outside the gate of Vance's fort. After the sermon twenty-one children were baptized. Among them was the firstborn of Mr. and Mrs. Marquis.

In April, 1779, the Rev. Joseph Smith, from York county, Pennsylvania, visited this region, and preached several sermons. After his return home the Rev. John McMillan (who had come with his family to Chartiers in '78) preached a few sermons in the bounds of Cross Creek. These sermons greatly stirred up the people to obtain the stated ministrations of the gospel among them. In the early Summer of 1779 James Edgar came from York county, Pennsylvania, and purchased a farm in Cross Creek. About the same time Messrs. William Smiley and Robert Caldwell, and others, came from the same region (Chanceford and Slate Ridge) to Upper Buffalo. These likewise desiring the ministrations of the gospel, the two companies met at the house of James Marshall, midway between Buffalo and Cross Creek, and made out a call for the Rev. Joseph Smith, who had been their minister in York county. This call is dated June 21st, 1779. The salary promised was seventy-five pounds. This call was carried down to the Presbytery of New Castle, then met at Carlisle, by Mr. Edgar, and was accepted on the 27th of October, 1779. In the Summer of 1779 a committee of three persons from Cross Creek and three from Upper Buffalo were appointed to locate sites for the two meeting houses. The three members of the committee from Cross Creek were Major Wm. Vance, Robert McCready and Henry Graham; and Messrs. William Smiley and Robert Caldwell were two of the members from Buffalo. These located the sites where the houses now stand. Henry Graham, Esq., donated the land for the church at Cross Creek.

In the Autumn of 1779, the Rev. Joseph Smith removed with his family to his new charge. Shortly after his arrival three ruling elders were chosen by vote of the congregation, viz: James Edgar, John Morrison, and George Marquis. Mr. Edgar had been ordained an elder in York county. Mr. Marquis was appointed the first leader of the singing in the church.

In the Autumn of 1779, mainly through the influence of Mr. Edgar, Joseph Patterson removed from York county into Cross Creek. He was a seceder from the North of Ireland; had been a school-teacher in York county; was an ardently pious man; became an active leader in meetings for social worship; afterward a ruling elder in the church of Cross Creek; subsequently, a minister of the gospel, and for many years was the faithful, successful and greatly beloved pastor of the congregation of Racoon, Pennsylvania.

In the Winter of 1781 and 1782, God began to pour out His Spirit on the congregations of Upper Buffalo and Cross Creek. In the Autumn of 1782 the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time in Cross Creek. About fifty persons from both of the congregations were received into full membership. This work continued, with but little abatement, for six or seven years. The most gracious visitation was in June, 1787, when about fifty members were added to the church of Cross Creek. Mr. Smith preached his last sermon at Cross Creek (from Galatians i, 8), and died of fever and inflammation of the brain, on the 19th of April, 1792, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. His flesh rests in the cemetery of Upper Buffalo, and the epitaph recorded on his tombstone was written by his intimate friend and fellow laborer, Rev. Thaddeus Dodd, of Ten Mile, Pa.

In the Winter of 1782-83, the first addition was made to the Session. This addition was made by appointment of the Session, and consisted of Thomas Marquis, Joseph Patterson and Joseph Vance. Near the end of Mr. Smith's pastorate another addition, consisting of Robert McCready, Esq., Wm. Rea, Esq., Henry Graham, Esq., Robert Lyle, Hugh Newell and Thomas Marshall, were called by the people, and this has continued ever since to be the mode of addition. These were ordained and installed by the Rev. James Hughes, pastor of the congregation of West Liberty, after the decease of Mr. Smith. After being supplied by the Presbytery for a little more than a year, Cross Creek gave a unanimous call to the Rev. Thomas Marquis to become their pastor.

Thomas Marquis was of Irish parentage, born in Opequon Valley, near Winchester, Va., in the year 1753. In 1775 he was married to Miss Jane Park, who was born and bred in the same region of country, a lady of great personal attractions, and well qualified to discharge the duties of the important place she so honorably filled. Shortly after their marriage this pair removed to Cross Creek. After his conversion the attention of Mr. Marquis was turned, by the advice of Messrs. Smith and Dodd, to seek the gospel ministry. (See his sketch.) The preaching of Mr. Marquis was very popular, and soon he received three calls for his ministerial services—one from the united congregations of Bethel and Ebenezer, another from Ten Mile, and another from Cross Creek. The call from Cross Creek, dated October 18th, 1793, was accepted on the 23d of April, 1794; and as the congregation of Cross Creek was under the care of the Presbytery of Ohio, he was dismissed, to put himself under the care of that Presbytery, and was, by them, ordained and installed on the 13th of June following. About the same time Upper Buffalo had given a call to the Rev. David Smith, son of their former pastor, which he held in his hands for consideration, and by agreement, Mr. Marquis was to supply their pulpit half of the time, till they obtained a pastor. This he continued to do till the beginning of the year 1798, a period of three years, six months and seventeen days. From that date all his ministerial labors were given to Cross Creek, till October, 1826, a little over thirty-two years from the beginning of his pastorate.

Under the ministry of Mr. Marquis, God began to revive His work, in 1799. This brought about thirty members into the church. A season of great religious declension followed. In the Summer of 1802 there began to be increased interest on the subject of religion, and some additions were made to the church. This feeling increased till, on the 5th of October, what has been called the great revival was fully ushered in. This work was attended by extraordinary bodily exercise. This exercise was never relied upon by the ministers and elders of the Presbytery as evidence of true religion. Some of the subjects never became pious. Some who were eminently pious were the subjects of it. And not a few of the subjects became hopefully pious, and held fast and adorned their profession till death. This revival continued through the years 1803 and 1804, and brought into the church about one hundred members.

During this pastorate two additions were made to the Session. In 1807, John Wilkins, Esq., Thomas Smith, Esq., John Marquis, Hugh Edgar, and Samuel McKibben; and, in 1818, Messrs. John Henry, James Fleming, George Newell, Hugh Lee, George Miller, Andrew Farrar and Joseph Smith.

Before resigning his charge, in 1825, Mr. Marquis earnestly requested the Rev. John Stockton to consent to become his successor, and used all his influence to effect that end; and shortly after, seeing his wish accomplished, he went on a visit to Bellefontaine, Ohio, to see his son-in-law, the Rev. Joseph Stevenson, and while there was taken ill with fever, and died on the 27th of September, 1827, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. His flesh sleeps with kindred dust, in the cemetery of Bellefontaine, Ohio.

The Rev. John Stockton, who was licensed to preach the gospel by the Presbytery of Washington, April 20th, 1825, and afterward spent a year at Princeton Theological Seminary, shortly after received a unanimous call from Cross Creek Church. This call he accepted in April, 1827; began to preach stately on the first Sabbath of May, and was ordained and installed on the 20th of June following. In these services the pastor elect preached a trial sermon, on a text chosen for the occasion by Mr. McCurdy, viz: Ps. exxy, 1, "They that trust in the Lord," etc. Dr. Jennings preached the ordination sermon, from Col. iv, 17, "Take heed to the ministry," etc., and Dr. Anderson gave the charges to the pastor and the congregation.

In the Winter of 1827-28, God began to revive his work again in Cross Creek. This work spread over every part of the congregation, and continued for between four and five years. And so powerful was it that at one time one hundred and twenty persons applied for privilege to come to the Lord's table. Again, in 1835-6-7, God revived His work, and some one hundred and forty members were added. Again, in 1840-1-2, there was another season of refreshing, when about one hundred persons professed to have passed from death into life. Again, in 1853-4, God visited and brought out of the world about ninety. Since then, in 1857-8-9, gentle showers of grace have distilled on this hill of Zion—and with only one or two exceptions there have been some added to the church at every communion season.

At the commencement of this pastorate the Session consisted of the following members, viz: Hon. Joseph Vance, Robert McCready, Esq., Samuel McKibben, George Miller, James Fleming, Andrew Farrar, Hugh Lee and George Newell. In 1831 Hon.

Walter Graig and William Cowen, Ebenezer Smith and John Amspoker were added. In 1837 General James Lee, Abraham Barber and James Dinsmore were installed. In 1843 Messrs. George Miller, Jr., Robert Lee, Thomas Wilkin and John McKibben. In 1854 Messrs. Joseph Graham, Joseph Vance, Jr., and Andrew Reed; and in 1858 Messrs. William Lee, Russel T. Johnson and Samuel Cowen; and in 1866 Messrs. James Walker and William M. Campbell; and in 1870 Messrs. Samuel White, David Gault, Richard Wells and James Donehoo, Esq.

In 1866 Messrs. Samuel White and John D. Cowen were chosen and ordained to be deacons; and in 1876 Messrs. Isaac M. Lawton, Daniel Hainer, John M. Boyce and William K. Lyle were added to the Board.

The congregation of Cross Creek has erected in succession five houses of worship, viz: The first in 1779, of unhewed logs, thirty-six feet long by twenty-two feet wide; the second in 1784, of hewed logs, sixty feet by thirty, one story high and pulpit in the side; to this, afterward, another story and gallery were added. This house was burned (supposed to have been fired by an incendiary) on Sabbath morning, April 20th, 1803. Forthwith the congregation built another house, of stone, fifty-six feet square. This was the house in which the congregation worshiped at the beginning of Dr. Stockton's pastorate. This house becoming too strait, another was erected, of brick, A. D., 1830, seventy-six feet by fifty-six, with a gallery. The walls of this house becoming cracked, and in the opinion of some unsafe, were taken down, and the present house built in 1864, on the same site. This house is of brick, eighty-two feet by fifty-four, with a lecture room, a Session room and a library room in the basement.

Dr. Stockton (see his Sketch) resigned his pastorate April 24th, 1877. During the fifty years of his service to the church, meetings for prayer and for the monthly concert were constantly kept up. A Sabbath school, organized in 1821, was taught, Summer and Winter, without interruption, and with great benefit to many of the youth. The congregation contributed with increasing liberality to all the schemes of benevolence recommended by the General Assembly, and to many others whose object is to promote the Redeemer's kingdom. And besides contributing largely to build up three other congregations organized within her original bounds, like a parent hive, she has sent forth numerous colonies, which have formed the nuclei of what are now flourishing churches in the North and West of our country.

Presbyterian Church, Hagerstown, Md. The first pastor of this Church, as far as is known, was the Rev. Thomas McPherrin. How long, precisely, he was connected with it in this character, is not known, but as there is in the Minutes of the Presbytery of 1774 a notice of his acceptance of a call from the united congregations of East and West Conococheague and Jerusalem, and then, in the Minutes of 1779, a notice of the dissolution of his pastoral relation to the people of Hagerstown, it is evident that his connection with that congregation was of short duration.

In 1788, in compliance with a supplication from Falling Waters, Hagerstown and Williamsport, the Rev. Mr. Caldwell was appointed by Presbytery "as a constant supply for those places, for one year."

From about 1809, the Rev. John Lind divided his time between Greencastle and Hagerstown. He was a son of the Rev. Matthew Lind, and came from Ireland in 1774, and shortly afterward organized the Associate Reformed Church, his church being erected in Greencastle. Under the pastorate of the younger Lind, the first church on South Potomac street was erected.

On November 15th, 1817, Robert Douglas, John Kennedy, Joseph Gabby and John Robertson, were ordained to the office of ruling elder, and the church was known as the Associate Reformed Church. On the following day the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time by an English Presbyterian minister. The Society thus formed comprised thirty-seven members. The church had just been completed, at a cost of $9149.17. This included also the price of the lot. The lot upon which the church was erected was purchased for $1500, from Gottlieb Zimmerman. From the organization of the church until the end of 1824 there were added to its membership fifty-seven persons. In 1824 the Rev. Mr. Lind died.

In September, 1825, the Rev. Matthew L. Fullerton was installed pastor of the church in Hagerstown. The church, together with that of Greencastle, united, in the Spring of 1825, with the Presbytery of Carlisle. Mr. Fullerton ministered to the congregations of Hagerstown and Greencastle, upon alternate Sundays, until his death, September 17th, 1833. The Rev. Richard Wynkoop was installed, June 25th, 1834, when the severance from the Greencastle Church became final. The pastorate of Rev. Mr. Wynkoop continued until his death, April 6th, 1842. He was succeeded by the Rev. Herman Douglass, and he by Rev. John F. McLaren. Mr. William Love, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Baltimore, was called to the church in 1845. At the same time, the Associate Reformed Church was taken under the care of the Presbytery of Carlisle, as "The Second Presbyterian Church of Hagerstown." In 1846 the First and Second churches were, by a resolution of Presbytery, and on their own request, united, to be known as "The Presbyterian Church of Hagerstown," the name by which it was designated prior to the separation. In the same year Mr. Love's labors among his people ceased, and he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Winchester, Va. September 14th, 1846, the Rev. Septimus Tustin was called and came in response to the call, but was not installed until the following year. Dr. Tustin having resigned, Rev. B. W. Dunlap was next called, and began his ministry in the latter part of 1851 or early in 1852. He died, February 17th, 1856, and was succeeded by the Rev. Robert A. Brown, who was called early in the year 1858.

In the Spring of 1862 the Rev. Mr. Brown resigned, and the pulpit was afterward filled, and until September 24th, 1866, by Rev. W. C. Stitt, first as stated supply and then as pastor. February 18th, 1867, the Rev. Tryon Edwards, D. D., was called, and took charge of the congregation. He resigned October 29th, 1872. In April following, the congregation, at the annual meeting, directed the building of a new church. July 24th, 1873, the Rev. J. C. Thompson was called, and he was installed November 18th of that year. Mr. Thompson resigned in 1879, and was succeeded by the Rev. J. A. Roundthaler, the present pastor. The old church on South Potomac street was sold to the Christian Church in 1878, but the last service held in it by the Presbyterians was on Sunday, December 18th, 1875. The new church was dedicated on Sunday, December 25th, 1875, the Rev. Dr. J. T. Smith, of Baltimore, preaching in the morning, and the Rev. George P. Hayes, D. D., President of Washington College, preaching in the evening. The edifice, which was designed by E. G. Lind, of Baltimore, is of gray stone, and is simple, but imposing, in design.

Presbyterian Church in Kentucky. From an excellent address on this subject, delivered by the Rev. J. N. Saunders, at the celebration of the "Centennial of Presbyterianism in Kentucky" by the Synod of Kentucky (South), October 12th, 1883, we make the following extract:—

"The Revolutionary War virtually closed with the surrender of Cornwallis, at Yorktown, in the Fall of 1781. With its close, multitudes began to turn their hearts and faces toward the rich, cheap and unoccupied lands of the West. Hitherto, emigration had been confined, comparatively, to the few: to hunters, explorers, land jobbers, and those who were ambitious to be among the very first daring and adventurous occupants of these western wilds. But now a different, and, in many respects, a far more enlightened and substantial class of people was ready and anxious to come. These came by families, by companies and by great colonies, to settle around the old forts or stations, or to form new settlements of their own. This was the state of things when Mr. Rice reached the country, in the Fall of 1783, and continued to be for many years. In 1780, Kentucky was but a single county; but so rapid was its increase within the next twelve years, that it grew into nine counties, with population enough to warrant its admission into the Union as an independent State.

"These immigrants came, some from North Carolina, a few from Pennsylvania and other northeastern States, but mainly from the State of Virginia. On this account, we have always claimed to be a daughter of Virginia, both in Church and State.

"Among these immigrants there was a scattered

Presbyterian element, out of which our first churches were gathered and organized. And it will be interesting, in this connection, to look, for a moment, at our ecclesiastical origin; to see where we came from; to know who were our ancestors; as well as to learn something of their faith, their principles and their spirit.

"Our first people, then, came to Kentucky from the States which I have just named, the far larger portion of them coming from the churches and Presbyterian neighborhoods in the Valley of Virginia. But, then, they or their parents were only emigrants to the States which they left when they came here. In blood, religion and nationality they ran back, by a remove or two, to the old country, mostly to Scotland or to the North of Ireland, where many of them, though of pure Scotch blood, had lived so long that they had acquired the name, 'Scotch Irish.' In doctrine, they were Calvinists; in church government, Presbyterians. They belonged to a faith and people who innately loved civil freedom and personal liberty, and who, for hundreds of years, had chafed under and rebelled against religious intolerance and State and prelatical oppressions.

"They carried the blood of martyrs in their veins—the blood of those who signed the League and Covenant, at Gray friar's Church in 1638. They had been a long persecuted and afflicted people, but, like brave old John Knox, feared the face of no man, and willingly bowed to no master, save God. So, whether they fled from persecutions at home, or were poor and voluntary exiles from their native land, as most of them were who came to this country, they were all stubbornly and unyieldingly upon the side of tolerance and religious freedom. Hence, those of them who were in America during the war with England were patriots, and actively helped the colonies to gain their independence. And when Virginia formed her first State Constitution, our people, through the eloquence, learning and influence of John Blair Smith, did more, perhaps, than any other religious people, to secure the adoption of the famous act of 'religious liberty'—an act that frees the conscience and the Church of God from all civil or State control; an act that has since been accepted by all our States. This, then, is something of our origin, something of the faith, the principles and the spirit of the old Presbyterian stock. And we are not ashamed of our origin, nor of our record in the past, but point, with becoming pride and pleasure, to the positions we have held, to the places we have filled in the State, in the Church, in learning, in agriculture, commerce, and in all that advances and adorns the race. The names and deeds of our illustrious and honored dead occupy a large space in the history of the Protestant world. A want of time will not allow me to speak of the Calvinistic and Presbyterian Huguenots and Holland Dutch, who also came in small numbers to Kentucky in its early settlement. They were, and are still, a grand and good people, and have done much to sustain the Church, as well as to strengthen and build up the State. Here, as in Holland and in France, they have always been upon the side of a pure gospel, a free church and a liberal civil government.

"The scattered Presbyterians whom Mr. Rice and our first preachers found in Kentucky, and those who came in the next few years, were, as might be expected, in a more or less demoralized spiritual condition. Many of them had felt the evil effects of the long war; many had lived for years upon the borders of civilization, exposed to the damaging influences of a wild, rough frontier life, where they were without Sabbaths or ministers, and where they were compelled to fight a savage and treacherous Indian foe. And still others had suffered from the evil and poisonous effects of that insidious French infidelity which followed the Revolutionary War, and which had spread through the country, beginning in the high places and among some of the great men of the East, and extending to the cabins and many of the humble pioneers of the West.

"Hence, Mr. Rice spent his first year in gathering congregations, and in trying to elevate the tone of morals and piety among the people.

"The second year he organized three churches; one at Concord or Danville, one at the forks of Dicks river, and one at Cane Run, which was in this vicinity, and was transferred to the Harrodsburg Church, under the pastorate of that great preacher, Dr. Cleland. This year, also, he preached a funeral sermon at McAfee's Station, on Salt river, which was the first sermon ever preached in that vicinity.

"The following year he organized the Salt river people—the McAfee's, McCowans, Armstrongs, Sharps, Lapsleys, Buchanans and others—into what has for a long time been New Providence Church, a church that is only a few miles distant from this place, and a church to which Dr. Cleland gave some forty-five years of his great and useful life.

"In the Autumn of 1784 the Rev. Adam Rankin, the second of our pioneer preachers, came to Kentucky, and began his services at Lexington and in Fayette county. He at once organized a church in Lexington, and soon afterward, the church which has always been known as Pisgah.

"In the Fall of 1785 the Rev. James Crawford settled at Walnut Hill. He and Terah Templin were ordained to the full work of the ministry at Danville, in November of that year, by a commission appointed by the Presbytery of Hanover.

"Mr. Templin laid the foundation of some of our old churches in Washington county—the Church at Hardin's Creek, which is now Lebanon, and the Church at Road's Run, which is now Springfield.

"Thomas Craighead and Andrew McClure came in 1786.

"Thus, within three years from the time of Mr. Rice's arrival, our ministerial force had increased to six men, who were preaching to twelve organized churches, and to quite a number of gathered congregations.

"This year (1786) the Synod of New York and Philadelphia, which was still our highest Church court in the United States, formed the Presbytery of Transylvania, composed of the six ministers just named. The new Presbytery held its first meeting in Danville, October 17th, 1786, with Mr. Rice in the Moderator's chair.

"And it will be interesting to note, in this connection, that a great revival of religion began this year in Hampden-Sidney and Liberty Hall (Washington and Lee) Colleges, which continued for two years, and pervaded the entire Synod of Virginia. Many young men of great ability and future promise were converted, and, in due time brought into the ministry. Eight of these, subsequently, came to Kentucky as missionaries; their names are as follows: Robert Marshall, Cary H. Allen, William Calhoun, John P. Campbell, Samuel Rannels, Robert Stuart, Robert Wilson, and John Lyle.

"By education and training, these men were exactly suited for the responsible and difficult work which awaited them here. And their whole after history shows that they were successful in winning souls to Christ; wise in extending the borders of the Church, and administering its affairs, and bold, able and efficient in defending the truth, as it is set forth in our Standards of doctrine and Church order.

"In the beginning, the Presbytery of Transylvania embraced the whole district of Kentucky, including the Cumberland river settlements, with a large country, extending through what are now the States of Tennessee and Mississippi, and then, subsequently, reaching northward into Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, a territory vast enough to make a mighty empire.

"In the year 1789, the single Synod of New York and Philadelphia was cut up into four Synods, and these constituted our first General Assembly in the United States.

"From this date to 1799, or for ten years, the Presbytery of Transylvania belonged to the Synod of Virginia, and was thus obliged to send its delegates a long and difficult distance, to attend the sessions of their higher court; besides being put to immense inconvenience in the settlement of all cases of appeal or complaint, as well as in many other vital respects.

"In the meantime, the Presbytery's churches and congregations had greatly multiplied; and its ministers had increased to the number of twenty-six, a number sufficiently large to warrant the erection of one or more new presbyteries. This was done, and in the year 1802 the Presbyteries of Transylvania, West Lexington and Washington met in the city of Lexington as the Synod of Kentucky, with the names of thirty-seven ministers upon their roll, and with David Rice as their first Moderator.

"The most memorable and important act of this first Synod was the erection of the Cumberland Presbytery out of the southern portions of Transylvania; which act the Synod revoked, for grave and sufficient reasons, at its sessions in 1806.

"Passing unnoticed the damaging and troublesome Rankin controversy and schism about psalmody, you will note that at the beginning of the present century the Church entered upon what is called, in our history, the great revival period, of which I shall speak only in the very briefest terms. The revival began under the preaching of the Rev. James McGready, in the Green river country, in the year 1800, and ran through the next two or three years.

"It was widespread, not only reaching all the churches in Kentucky, but extending into several other States. In feeling, it was deep, powerful, anomalous, yea, startling, and, in many respects, incomprehensible—far more so, perhaps, than anything of the kind which has ever characterized the history of religion in this or any other country, accompanied, in many instances, with a nervous disturbance as yet unexplained.

"That it was, in a large degree, a genuine work of God's grace, and that multitudes were soundly converted, none will deny who have carefully studied its history. But that it was, at the same time, accompanied by very much that led to serious errors in doctrine and church order, and that it was attended with fearful disorders, silly and fatal delusions, extravagant and disgusting fanaticisms, and wild and sinful excesses, will scarcely be denied by any in our times. It left behind it a few results that were good, but many more that were pernicious and evil. When the excitements of this strange work had died away, there followed a long period of coldness and spiritual dearth, which was not broken till the beginning of the revival in Dr. Cleland's church, in the year 1823, which gradually and silently extended during the next four or five years to most of the churches in our Synod. This is usually denominated, in our annals, the revival of 1827-8, and was precious, not only in the conversion of souls, but in bringing many into our ministry who have done a great and good work for the Church.

"But we must return for a moment to the first revival named. During its continuance, and following its close, there were grave departures in doctrine, and in the forms and modes of religious service, as we hold them, introduced by some of our own ministers. They had received 'new light,' had learned 'new doctrines,' had picked up 'new measures,' and were ready to make, and did make, war upon our Confession of Faith and Catechisms. These were led chiefly by Barton W. Stone, and soon formed a party known as the New Lights, or Stonites. Subsequently, they amalgamated with the disciples of Alexander Campbell, and have thus grown into a large and influential sect. Of course, this defection from our ranks was a serious trouble and a grievous loss. Again, going along with and following this revival, great changes were also taking place in the religious views and practices of some of the members of the Cumberland Presbytery.

"They needed more ministers, and hence, were willing to license any who made a credible profession of religion and felt that they were called to preach the gospel, regardless of mental culture or theological training. And their doctrinal views in the meantime had reached a point that would only allow them to adopt our Confession of Faith in part, or with large mental reservations. They had discovered, as they supposed, a sort of middle yet tenable and logical ground, between Arminianism and Calvinism; and from this, they proposed to preach and expound the doctrines of the Bible; which they proceeded to do, and still do.

"On account of these grave and fundamental departures from the teachings of the old Westminster Confession of Faith, the Cumberland Presbytery, as I have already said, was dissolved by the Synod, in 1806. And in four years afterward, or in 1810, the members of this dissolved body who did not return to Transylvania united with those who constituted themselves into an independent Presbytery, which they called the Presbytery of Cumberland. And this was the foundation and beginning of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church—a church which holds our exact form of government, but differs from us widely in its standard of ministerial education, in some of its church usages, as well as, materially, in some of our old-fashioned Calvinistic doctrines.

"The schism out of which this Church grew was also a real loss and grievous trouble to our already deplete ranks; but under the blessing of God it has grown and prospered, and accomplished a mighty work for Christ and the world. It soon extended its borders beyond Kentucky and Tennessee, reaching southward, westward and northward, and is now one of the large and influential powers in the Christian world, reporting in all, by its minutes of last year, one Assembly, 27 Synods, 117 Presbyteries, 1386 ministers, 2457 congregations and 111,863 members.

"From the year 1810 and onward, our Synod had a slow but steady growth, adding to its churches, increasing its ministers, and giving a fair proportion of its time, men and means to the cause of secular and religious education. As the country increased in population, and as the Church grew and expanded north and south of us, other synods and presbyteries were formed, until the Synod of Kentucky was confined, as it is now, within the bounds of our own State.

"For a moment I recall here the fact that, in the beginning of our history in Kentucky, we had but one Synod in the United States, which was the 'Synod of New York and Philadelphia.' Now, those who are represented in this Centennial service to-day, in spite of all our losses, by schisms and in other ways, have, in Kentucky alone, two synods, ten presbyteries, more than two hundred ministers, more than two hundred and fifty churches, and nearly fifteen thousand members. These facts and figures will give you some idea of what Kentucky Presbyterians have been doing at home since David Rice preached his first sermon in Harrodsburg.

"To have followed up our history, through all the intervening years, which I have virtually passed over in silence; to have noted a tithe of their important events; to have mentioned Blythe and Cameron and those who belonged to their day—Cleland and Wilson and those who labored with them; Nelson, Blackburn, McChord and Lapsley; Edgar, Bishop and John Breckinridge; Nathan Hall, Brown, J. C. Young and William L. Breckinridge; McClung, Rice, Stiles, Hill and Grundy; Bayless, Green, Robert J. Breckinridge and Stuart Robinson; as well as a host of others belonging to the list of our honored and worthy dead, would have far transcended my limits, as well as your time and patience. All these subjects, and matters of personal history await the facile and scholarly pen of a second Davidson, who will, doubtless, supplement that author's elegant volume with one of his own, possessing like merit and bulk.

"More: To speak of our honored dead, of the maintenance of our doctrines and forms of church government, of our work and influence in the different departments of education, and of our Sabbath-school schemes and labors, are themes yet to be presented by accomplished speakers, who will follow me in these services.

"And now, I shall devote the residue of my time to a brief notice of three or four features of that history, which I have thus imperfectly epitomized.

"In a service like this, our sympathies naturally prompt us to look at the difficulties and great discouragements which met and hindered our fathers in their efforts to build up a Presbyterian Church in Kentucky. These, as I have already intimated, were great, stubborn and long continued. It was surely no easy matter to interest the minds of a backwoods people, and turn their thoughts and affections to a subject that disallowed wickedness and excesses of every kind, to persuade them to honor God's law and to keep his appointed Sabbaths, to inspire them with a spirit of peace, love and forgiveness, and bring them into Christ's kingdom, while society was mixed, rough and unsettled, and while they were still exposed to the temptations of hate and bloody revenge. When we think of all the difficulties and discouraging perplexities which met and followed them through the trying years of their work, we often wonder that they succeeded so well as they did, and are deeply impressed with the plenitude of the mercy and grace that constantly attended and sustained them. If God had not been with them, they must have failed. But now, with all the learning, refinements and Christian civilization of a century, we find human nature to-day, just as it was in the days of our fathers, as prone to evil, to levity and irreverence; as prone to hate and revenge, and as prone to soul-destroying errors and exciting novelties! Education, and what we call higher and advanced civilization, do not make men, essentially, new creatures. They may change, modify, and in many respects adorn and beautify, but they can never regenerate the soul and make a sinful race truly love and honor God. Nothing but the grace of God, coming through a preached Gospel, can do this. Hence, with our constantly desecrated Sabbaths, and with floods of wickedness all around us, it is, after all, about as difficult to preach the Gospel successfully now, as it was when illiterate backwoodsmen and rough Indian fighters made up the congregations. And if we succeed in our difficult and discouraging work, it can only be through the same divine agency that imparted success to our fathers.

"Our sympathies are also deeply moved, when we recall the great physical labors, discomforts and actual sufferings, which were necessary parts of their daily experience. With our advantages, comforts and comparatively easy work, we can scarcely put a proper estimate upon these. We really know but little about them. We ride to our Church courts in easy-going coaches and with the speed of the locomotive; they went upon horseback, through rain, sunshine, heat or cold; measuring the long and tiresome road through mud, over dangerous and swollen streams, and often exposed to hunger, thirst and rough fare. We go to the Assembly in palace cars, are entertained like princes, and have a royal and luxurious holiday; to them an attendance upon the sessions of the Assembly was a hardship and a tedious, self-sacrificing labor. For years the journey was made in the saddle, bridle-path and buffalo trail, and then by rough, lumbering and bumping stages. We can fill our Presbyterian and missionary appointments in two or three Sabbaths, and the travel and the labor are a pleasant recreation. But it was not so with our fathers. Their missionary and evangelistic travels and labors were tenfold more than ours—reaching over a vast extent of country, and involving labors and sacrifices that we could hardly endure now. For example, Mr. Vance was appointed by his Presbytery to preach two Sabbaths in the Illinois Grant, Mr. Cleland to preach at discretion in the Indiana Territory, and other brethren to perform labors nearly as difficult. These appointments were not only made, but Presbytery saw that they were filled. Besides all this, their home work was simply immense. It was filled up with travels, preachings, exposures and hardships that would appall many a man in our day.

"My brethren, these were truly men of God; men filled with preaching and missionary zeal, and men who were willing to endure hardness for the sake of preaching the gospel to dying sinners. And to the praise of His grace, God owned and blessed their labors, preserved their lives, and, in one way and another, took care of them and their families.

"And it is risking little to say that, if the spirit, zeal, labors and self-denials of these pioneer preachers had characterized all the later periods of our history, our Church would appear in a different attitude to-day; for it cannot be denied that there have been frequent and long periods, in which we have been greatly lacking in these essential elements of success—periods when pastors were satisfied to watch and feed their own flocks; when churches were content to meagerly support the gospel at home, and leave vacancies and destitute places to shift for themselves, when Presbyterians had lost much of their spirit of evangelization, and when young ministers naturally sought easy and fat places, rather than weak churches and destitute settlements.

"There is no denying the unpleasant fact that, for many years, our Synod, Presbyteries and churches were in a spiritually dozing mood, having lost very much of their old zeal, energy and Christian consecration, as well as very much of their former spirit of aggressiveness upon the unoccupied regions of the country.

"But may we not indulge the hope that these days of spiritual inaction, sloth and indifference are past and gone? That we have been baptized anew, by the Great Head of the Church, with the same spirit which animated the hearts and warmed the zeal and inspired the abundant labors of those who planted a Church for us in the wilderness?

"I am sure we may indulge such a hope; for our preachers, through the entire State, are manifesting now zeal and interest in their work; preaching efficiently, not only at home, but to those who are unable to supply themselves with the gospel. The spirit of evangelization is prevailing throughout our borders. And the wonderful success that has followed the evangelistic scheme which we put into active operation two years ago, has not only accomplished grand results, but is stimulating the whole Church to do still greater and better things. Two such enterprises as this, prosecuted by our best talent, sustained by the abundant wealth of the country, and owned and blessed of God, would soon not only double but quadruple our present numbers."

Presbyterian Church, New Castle, Del. In the year of 1657 or '58, a Dutch Church was organized in this place by the Rev. John Polhemus, while on his way from Brazil, where the Dutch at that time had a colony, to New Amsterdam, near which he settled and died. The year following, the Rev. Everardus Welius was commissioned by the Classis of Amsterdam as minister to the Church in New Amstel, the name by which the place was then known, and served in this capacity until his death, which occurred two years after his arrival. In 1675

the Rev. Petrus Tasschemakers settled and labored here between two and three years. In the records of this period it is stated that "on Sandhook stood a small wooden church." In this building the Dutch continued to worship, as an independent congregation, although with diminished numbers. The name of the town was now changed from New Amstel to that of New Castle, and was incorporated in 1667.

Charles II granted to the Duke of York all the Dutch possessions in America called New Netherlands, but which from this time bore the name of New York. In this grant were included the three counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, on the Delaware.

From this time the population underwent great changes by the arrival of emigrants from various parts of the Old World, who prized the rights of conscience more than home, kindred or native land. It is obvious that, as these emigrants from France and Great Britain arrived at New Castle in small numbers, and often one by one, they, in all matters of religion, united with their Dutch brethren, who worshiped in "the small wooden church" on Sandhook. For the Dutch were Calvinists in doctrine and Presbyterians in discipline, while the Confession of Faith adopted by the Huguenots was drawn up by John Calvin himself, so that in doctrine and discipline there was a close resemblance between the Church of Holland and that of France. Thus, it appears that toward the close of the 17th century there were gathered in New Castle individual members of the churches of these several nations, drawn together, not only by a common sympathy in each other's trials, but by the stronger influence of a common faith in the same grand system of religious truth.

"We are not able," says the Rev. J. B. Spotswood, D.D., in his "Historical Sketch of the Presbyterian Church in New Castle," published in 1859, "to designate the precise locality of the 'small wooden church,' found here by the English, in 1664, and concerning which Penn speaks in his letter to London, dated in 1683, but there is good reason for believing that it is a part of the lot on which our new church has been erected, and adjoining which is the graveyard of the old Dutch Church."

The first Presbyterian minister who labored in New Castle and the country adjacent was the Rev. John Wilson. (See his Sketch.) There is evidence that he preached here prior to 1703. After a brief absence from the place he returned, and not only continued to preach, but commenced making arrangements for erecting a new house of worship. "For, by this time," observes Dr. Spotswood, "'the small wooden church,' built by the Dutch Church, had fallen to decay, and was, moreover, not sufficiently large to accommodate the congregation, which had been very much increased by the continued emigration from the old country. The lot on which this church stands was purchased, one portion of it from John Brewster, and the other from Thomas Janvier, and Sarah, his wife. The two deeds are in our possession, each dated the 15th of August, 1707, and executed 'to Roeloffe De Haes, Sylvester Garland and Thomas Janvier, merchants and undertakers, or agents, for erecting and building a Presbyterian Church, or house of worship, in the town of New Castle.' The consideration money for both was twenty-two pounds, Pennsylvania currency.

"On this lot was erected the house in which we are now assembled, and in which, for a century and a half, the worship of God has been maintained.

"It is highly probable," adds Dr. Spotswood, "that this is the oldest congregation of our denomination in this country." The only two which claim to be more ancient, are the First Church in Philadelphia, and the one in Snow Hill, Maryland, both of which had settled pastors in 1701. We have no means of ascertaining the precise date of our organization, but there is a strong probability that it was in 1684 or '85. In 1703 it appears before us fully established, possessing all the elements of a church that had been in existence for some time; a bench of Elders, a Board of Trustees, and numbers and wealth sufficient to justify them in building a new house of worship; moreover, we find it, at this date, deprived for a season of the services of their minister, who must have been with it for some time, as he had become discouraged, and was absent, seeking another field of labor, but finding none, he returned, and remained until his death. The congregation increased so rapidly, that it was necessary to enlarge the church building, which was done in 1712. To do that, it was necessary to purchase from Mr. Brewster eighteen feet of ground adjoining. The deed for this portion is dated April 3d, 1712.

The Rev. James Anderson was the second pastor of the Church at New Castle. Receiving a call from "the Presbyterian Congregation of New York," the Synod appointed a committee of their number "to receive and audit the reasons of the people of New Castle, against the removal of Mr. Anderson to New York, or any other place." This committee finally decided, on Mr. Anderson's acceptance of the call, to dissolve his pastoral relation, and "transported him to New York." (See his Sketch.) The successor of Mr. Anderson, and the third pastor of this congregation, was the Rev. Robert Cross, who sustained this relation until May, 1722. He is elsewhere noticed. The vacancy occasioned by his removal was filled by supplies appointed by the Presbytery, among whom were the Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, the Rev. Gilbert Tennent, and the Rev. Hugh Stevenson, who supplied the pulpit during the year 1727.

It may be interesting to state here, that about this time the churches of New London and White Clay Creek were organized, the former in 1720, the latter in 1722. In 1738 a grant of a lot of ground for building a Presbyterian Church, and for a burying place, was made to the inhabitants of the village at Christiana Bridge, but the church was not built until 1745. When the Rev. Charles Tennent left the churches of White Clay Creek and Christiana Bridge, the latter formed a union with the Church of New Castle. The Rev. Daniel Thane was installed pastor over the united congregations, May 1st, 1757 and continued in this relation until about the year 1763. Previous to the union of this congregation with Christiana Bridge, it was for a short time united to Drawyer's, under the pastoral charge of the Rev. John Dick, who was installed in 1746, and died the following year. After Mr. Thane's departure, the united congregations remained vacant until 1765, when the Rev. Mr. Magaw was employed by them as stated supply for one year. During that year the Rev. Mr. Kirkpatrick preached to each of them occasionally. The Rev. Joseph Montgomery was installed pastor April 16th, 1769, resigning the relation October 29th, 1777. The congregation remained vacant from the resignation of Mr. Montgomery to the settlement of the Rev. Samuel Barr, in 1791, during which time the pulpits were supplied by the Presbytery. Mr. Barr remained pastor of the two congregations until August 3d, 1796. In 1799, the Rev. John E. Latta received a call to settle here, and was installed August 13th, 1800. His pastorate extended over a period of twenty-four years. (See his Sketch.) The successors of Mr. Latta were the Rev. Joshua N. Danforth, from November 30th, 1825, until May 20th, 1828; the Rev. John M. Dickey, from May 19th, 1830, until the Spring of 1832; the Rev. James Knox, from November 21st, 1832, until the early part of the year 1834; the Rev. John Decker, from February 24th, 1835, until the Spring of 1842; and the Rev. John B. Spotswood, from 1842 to the present date (1884). Notices of all these brethren will be found elsewhere.

No list of the names of the ruling elders of these congregations can be found until 1791, when Mr. Barr was installed. At that time, the bench consisted of the following gentlemen, viz., William Scott, Robert Bryan, Samuel Barr and William Aiken. Messrs. Ruth and Aiken having died in 1792, Alexander Duncan and Samuel Ruth were elected to supply their places, and at the same time James Caldwell was added to the number. In 1800, when Mr. Latta was installed, the session was again enlarged, by the election of James Couper, Richard Hamby, Dr. Robert L. Smith and George Pratt, all of whom belonged to the congregation of Christiana Bridge. In 1802 Charles Thomas, Jacob Belville and Hugh Gemmill were added to the session in New Castle. In 1815 Dr. James Couper, Kensey Johns, John Belville and Nicholas Vandyke were elected from the congregation in New Castle; in 1826, Matthew Kean. In 1830 James McEnlough and James Smith, and in 1839 Elijah Start and John Gordon were added to the number of elders in this congregation, and Wm. F. Lane in 1857.

Presbyterian Church, Newtown, Long Island, New York. Newtown was settled by English emigrants from the New England colonies, in 1652. This was but thirty-two years after the landing of the Puritans at Plymouth, and but twenty-nine years after the settlement of Manhattan Island, now New York, by the Dutch. Cromwell was then at the zenith of his power in England.

Four years after the settlement of the town, in 1656, there is preserved a list of fifty-five persons who had become proprietors of the soil, by purchasing of the Indians 1376 acres for £68, 16s. 4d., at the rate of a shilling for an acre.

As with the other English settlements on the eastern part of Long Island, the early settlers at Newtown were Dissenters in religious principles, and mainly Presbyterians in doctrine and polity, according to the Confession of Faith adopted by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, in 1642. They were a Christian people, stern in moral and religious principles, enterprising, and devoted adherents to liberty and freedom of conscience. That the Presbyterian element predominated among them seems evident from various considerations. It is a well-known fact that the Puritans were not all Congregationalists. In the New England colonies this was especially the case. Prior to the year 1640, Cotton Mather, in his "Magnalia," tells us that 4000 Presbyterians had arrived in New England. Besides, it is known that many of the Congregationalists brought with them from the mother country to New England "a preference for Presbyterianism." This is shown from the nature of the ecclesiastical systems which they adopted. Elders were a regular part of the organization of their churches; and their Synods, in authority, approached very nearly to the Presbyteries and Synods of the Presbyterian Church.

To these facts must be added that of the 2000 Presbyterian ministers cast out of the Church of England, by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662, a considerable number found a refuge in New England. Thus, we have good ground for believing that the first settlers of Newtown, and those emigrants who soon increased their numbers, were mainly, if not altogether, Presbyterians. Moreover, the steps which were taken by the church at Newtown to be organized as Presbyterian when the opportunity offered, confirms this view.

Some of the English companies who settled on this island, we know, "came with their churches already organized," bringing their pastors with them. This was the case with the company which settled the town of South Hampton, in 1640. Their pastor was a Presbyterian. It may have been so with the company which settled Newtown. They had come as united in religious views and kindred feelings, and there is reason to believe that the Rev. John Moore came with them. In the New York Colonial Manuscripts there is a document attested by "John Moore, Minister of the Church of Hemstede." But may not this be a mistake? And should we not for "Hemstede" read Middleburgh, as Newtown was then called? For Rev. Richard Denton, at the date of the document, was the minister at Hemstede. Be this as it may, it is certain, that very early after the settlement of the company, "a town-house was immediately erected, which served the double purpose of a church and a residence for the minister," and in which the Rev. John Moore ministered. He was also the first school teacher, instructing the children during the week.

This first pastor died in 1657. His death was a great loss to the town, and the inhabitants mourned and made this record, that "God had deprived them of the public means of grace and salvation, and also of the education of their children in scholastic discipline, the way to true happiness." Richard Mills was employed to teach in his place, and "to help in the Sabbath exercises."

After a lapse of five years, because it was so difficult to procure ministers at that time, the Rev. William Leverich was settled as the second pastor, in 1662. He was a graduate of Cambridge College, England; a man of ardent piety, extensive learning, deep religious experience, and a faithful laborer. After a pastorate of fourteen years, he died, in 1677. He may be considered the father of this church. He had unquestionably organized its members; but how organized, or what the spiritual fruit of his labors, or how many in membership, is not known, as all records of these facts are lost. It was during Mr. Leverich's ministry that the first church building devoted exclusively to divine worship was erected, in 1671, on the ground nearly opposite the place which the present building occupies.

From 1677 to 1708, a period of thirty years, the town enjoyed the services of Revs. Morgan Jones, John Morse and Robert Breck. The Rev. Morgan Jones was a graduate of Oxford College, England, and was one of the dissenting Presbyterian ministers among the 2000 who were ejected from their parishes by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662. He had been Episcopally ordained, and had his parish in Wales. The Rev. John Morse was a native of Massachusetts, and a graduate of Harvard College. He was a licentiate when called, but was soon ordained and installed as pastor of the church. Very early after his settlement, in 1695, the house and grounds to the east of the village, now occupied by the heirs of Mr. Robert Thompson, were purchased for the use of the minister. Mr. Morse died here, in the midst of his work, but twenty-six years of age. The Rev. Robert Breck was also of Massachusetts, and a graduate of Harvard College. He was a young man of great promise, and served the church but two or three years. He was a bold asserter of the principles of the Nonconformists, and through the ill-treatment and threats from the Episcopal Governor was compelled to leave his charge. The combined pastorates of these three ministers embraced only twelve years, showing that the church was vacant at intervals for eighteen years. This was owing in part to colonial troubles, the inroads of the French on the northern frontiers, and especially from the opposition and intolerance of Lord Cornbury against dissenting churches, in his zeal to establish the Episcopal Church in the province.

The first church building, which had been erected in 1671, was taken possession of by Rev. Mr. Urquhart, of the Episcopal Church, in 1703, and held till 1708. It was during this Episcopal oppression that the Rev. John Hampton and Rev. Francis Makemie, both Presbyterian ministers, were arrested and imprisoned, in 1707, because the former had preached the previous day at Newtown, and the latter in New York, without license from Lord Cornbury. They were arrested in this village, and carried thence, by way of Jamaica, to New York, where they were imprisoned. They were charged, when the warrant was issued to the Sheriff for their arrest, that they had "gone to Long Island, with intent there to spread their pernicious doctrine and principles, to the great disturbance of the Church by law established, and the government of this province." "If any," writes Livingston, just after the event, "want information concerning the sufferings of other dissenters, both in their persons, estates and religious liberties, I recommend them to the body of inhabitants of Jamaica and Newtown."

We now come to the important ministry of the Rev. Samuel Pumry, whose pastorate over this church extended from 1708 to 1744, a period of thirty-six years. He was a graduate of Yale College, and Mr. Riker, in his history, says, "he sustained the character of a systematic, learned and eminently pious man." It was during his ministry, in 1715, that he, with this church, was received into the Presbytery of Philadelphia. Thus this church had hitherto been an immature Presbyterian church, under a Congregational polity; but now, when organized Presbyterianism offered itself, it at once entered the ranks of that denomination.

In 1717 a new church was erected on the site where the present building stands, but it was not finished and furnished fully till 1741. After his long and successful ministry, Mr. Pumry died, in 1744, and was buried in the old churchyard, where a tombstone with a quaint inscription marks his grave. All church records previous to the ministry of Mr. Pumry have been lost, save a memorandum of eight names, who were members of the church in 1708 at his settlement. The first Session book, so far as we know, was purchased in 1725, which is still preserved; and from that period to the present time the records have been regularly kept. Sixty-seven members were received into the church under Mr. Pumry's ministry.

There is another interesting fact connected with the ministry of this devoted servant of the Lord. The Rev. Samuel Sacket, of the Sacket family, and the Rev. Dr. Benjamin Pumry, Mr. Pumry's son, were both born nearly the same time, 1712-13, in this village; both trained under Mr. Pumry's pastorate; both entered the ministry about the same time, and both died in the year 1781. Mr. Sacket labored most successfully in his ministry in Westchester county. The inscription upon his tombstone at Yorktown is, that "He was a judicious, faithful, laborious and successful minister of the gospel."

Rev. Dr. Benjamin Pumry was one of the ablest and most distinguished ministers of his day. His whole ministry of forty-nine years was spent at Hebron, Conn.

From this period till the War of the Revolution, the successive pastors were Rev. George McNish, two years; Rev. Simeon Horton, twenty-seven years; and Rev. Andrew Bay, two years. At the opening of Mr. Horton's ministry, his labors were remarkably blessed. The church was revived, a larger number than usual being added to the church. The Sessional minutes prove that he was a man of deep piety and ardent zeal. In 1764, while he was pastor, Whitefield preached in this village.

After the battle of Long Island, and during the period of seven years from 1776 to 1783, when the British troops had possession of Newtown, this patriotic church (for nearly all the members of the congregation were patriots) suffered severely. Its ordinances were suspended; its leading members scattered, being in prison or exile; and its house of worship was first used as a hospital, and then demolished. The whole Synod of New York espoused the cause of the Revolution; and hence, in part, the hatred of the British to the Presbyterians here. At the close of the war the church was regathered, and but five members in full communion appeared at its first meetings. By the kindness of the Reformed Dutch Church, the congregation worshiped once a fortnight in their edifice. Under these circumstances, the church was not in a condition to settle a pastor, and therefore, during the following six years, from 1784 to 1790, engaged the services of the Rev. James Lyon, Rev. Peter Fish and Rev. Elisha Palmer, successively, as supplies. It was during this period, in 1787, ninety-seven years ago, that the erection of the present edifice was commenced. On its foundation stones are engraved the initials of the names of certain members of the congregation. It was completed and dedicated in 1791. The Rev. Dr. Rodgers, of New York, preached the sermon.

Rev. Nathanael Woodhull was called to the church and installed in 1790, and his pastorate extended twenty years—till 1810. In personal appearance, winning manners, holiness of character, and pulpit talents, he stood conspicuous among his brethren in the ministry. His death was universally regretted.

He received eighty members into full communion. His successor was the Rev. William Boardman, who was installed in 1811. His pastorate was marked by a remarkable revival, the fruit, in part, of the faithful labors of his predecessor, and of his own fervent and active piety. He labored seven years, and died in 1818. It was during Mr. Boardman's ministry, and just before its close, in 1717, that the trustees of the church, having sold the old parsonage property to the east of the village, and which had been occupied as such for a century, purchased the "Union Hotel," called the "Corner House," with eleven acres of land, and here Mr. Boardman lived and died. It is the house now occupied by Mrs. Brown. Mr. Boardman received sixty-three members into full communion. His successor was the late beloved Dr. John Goldsmith, who was installed in 1819. His faithful and able pastorate continued thirty-four years. He died in 1851, suddenly cut down, in the fullness and strength of his manhood. For his stern love of the truth, dignified and imposing manner, intellectual ability, refined spirituality and uncompromising devotion in his ministerial work, he stood high in the estimation of his brethren, and commanded the reverence and love of his people. During his pastorate Dr. Goldsmith received into the full communion of the church 215 members, a precious token to him of the Divine favor and mercy.

Shortly after Dr. Goldsmith commenced his pastorate, "in or about the year 1821, the 'Corner House'" was sold; but a portion of the land was retained, and on it was built the present parsonage.

The Rev. John P. Knox was installed pastor of the church, March 28th, 1855, and under his long ministry it was largely blessed. In 1880 he preached an "Anniversary Discourse of a Twenty-five Years' Pastorate," from which the facts of this sketch are gleaned.

Presbyterian Church, Snow Hill, Maryland. Snow Hill is situated on the Poconoke, a navigable and tidal river on the eastern shore of Maryland. The town is only six miles from the sea; has fifteen hundred inhabitants, and is the county-seat of Worcester county. Previous to 1742 the present counties of Worcester and Wicomico were included in Somerset, which extended from the sea to the bay, and from Delaware to the Virginia line.

1683. The uniform tradition in Snow Hill is, that when Makemie came from Ireland, in 1683, in response to the petition of "Colonel William Stevens and others," sent in 1680, he immediately organized a church and built a meeting-house here, and that this was his first church. The people were there, and impatient of his coming; times were prosperous, and no reason appears for delay. These people were principally Scotch-Irish, with a sprinkling of Scotch and French Protestants.

1684. Most likely Rev. Samuel Davis came over with Makemie, as we find him recorded in court, February 26th, 1684, as marrying John Broughton and Elizabeth Bradshaw. Broughton is an old Snow Hill name; ten families of the name stand on the church books in 1751, and one remains who spells his name the same way. This strengthens the idea that the marriage was in Snow Hill, and Samuel Davis the minister, as we shall now prove that he was seven years later. Makemie probably left him there and went to organize churches elsewhere.

1691. For, August 12th, 1691, John Galbreath left by will, recorded in court, five thousand pounds of pork each, to Samuel Davis, minister at Snow Hill; Francis Makemie, minister at Rehoboth; and Thomas Wilson, minister at Manokin. The phraseology shows that these were settled ministers at those places.

1697. "In obedience to an order of his Excellency, the Governor, and Council, dated the 10th day of August, 1697, commanding the Sheriffs of this province to return a list of what Romish priests and lay brothers are resident in their respective counties, and what churches, chapels or places of worship they have, what manner of buildings they are, and in what places situate; and return also a like account about the Quakers and other dissenters from the Church of England and their places of worship," etc., the Sheriff (Major William Whittington), of Somerset, reports: "Here are neither Popish priests, lay brothers, nor any of their chapels. As to the Quakers and other dissenters, to the first, none as I know of particularly, and the other hath a house in Snow Hill, one on the road going up along the seaside, and one at Manokin, about thirty feet long; plain country buildings, all of them."

1705. Rev. John Hampton was preaching in Snow Hill, and next year assisted in forming the first Presbytery.

1717. The original Presbytery of Philadelphia was now divided in three Presbyteries, one of which was the Presbytery of Snow Hill. The fathers seem to have recognized its importance and antiquity. What Philadelphia was to Pennsylvania, and New Jersey and New Castle to Northern Delaware, that Snow Hill was to Southern Delaware and Somerset, from Lewes to the Virginia line.

1719. August 1st. The vestry of All Hallows Protestant Episcopal Parish, Snow Hill, petition the Bishop of London for a preacher, declaring that since establishment they have not had a regular minister except two years. "Now, seeing the constant abode of a dissenting minister is likely to alienate the people from the communion of the Church, we, the vestry of said parish . . . represent to your lordship's consideration our misery through a long continuance of the famine in scarcity of the Word of God in our church, etc." So at this period Snow Hill was "the constant abode of a dissenting (Presbyterian) minister."

1745. The church records prior to 1745 are lost. In that year the Makemie Church, probably a log house, had stood sixty-two years. A contract was now made for building a new "meeting house in Snow Hill town." It cost, exclusive of the pews, £142. 5s. 4d.

1747. Rules were adopted "for regulating the pews."

1751. Rev. John Hamilton preached a sermon, and "did set apart as elders of and for the Presbyterian dissenting congregation near Snow Hill town," five persons, making in all twelve, which number had long been considered "a full bench of elders." Their names were Adam Spence, Samuel Bratten, Matthew Hopkins, William Aydelott, Robert King, Jr., John Irving, William Nilson, Thomas Martin, Samuel Stevenson, John Richardson and William Aydelott, Jr. The minister's salary was now £44.

1752. The congregation was laid out into districts, each placed under the supervision of an elder, one of whose duties was to gather in strangers. A study was built this year, costing £10. Fifty-four families contributed to both the building of the church and the minister's salary and many more to one of these objects.

1753. Rev. Mr. Donnelson was supplying the church at this time; and Pitt's Creek, for the first time, appears on the record, asking Presbytery to send him back.

1757. Rev. David Purviance, while preaching here, died, and was interred in the churchyard.

1760. A stone was purchased "for a bounder for the meeting-house lot." It lies buried in the north corner of the yard. At a "Presbytery held in Snow Hill the Rev. Mr. John Harris" was installed. An addition was also built to the church.

1767. A new pulpit was erected.

1779. Rev. Samuel McMasters began to preach in Snow Hill, and his name appears on the books as late as 1801. Part or all of this time he preached at Rehoboth also. His salary from Snow Hill varied from £40 to £22, probably proportioned to the services rendered. From 1782 to 1792, the average was £30. And in six successive years three farthings appeared as part of the payment, showing how exact they were in settling their accounts.

1795. The frame church, now fifty years old, was replaced by a brick structure. The amount secured for its erection from subscriptions and sale of pews appears to have been $1751.

1800. An act was passed by the Legislature of Maryland, incorporating "The Presbyterian Church in Snow Hill, Worcester County." By this charter the pastor is chairman, ex-officio, of the committee having charge of the finances. This committee, like the Session, consists of 12, the apostolic number.

1805. April 4. Fifty-two families, at least, were now holding pews in the new church. Probably there were more, as we find it hard to tell how many were in a pew like number "33, Dr. Spence and others."

1813. Rev. Stuart Williamson was pastor, and died here in 1815 or 1816. The salary remaining due was paid to his estate, in 1816.

1818. Rev. Stephen Sanders had charge of the pulpit.

1820-30. Rev. Thomas B. Balch was pastor of Snow Hill, Rehoboth and Pitt's Creek.

1822. A bell was procured.

1826. Mr. Balch received a letter from Rehoboth Church, declaring itself unable to pay what it had promised toward his salary, and Pitt's Creek stated that it could not make up the deficiency arising from the failure of Rehoboth.

1831-9. Rev. C. H. Mustard was pastor, salary five hundred dollars; probably Pitt's Creek paid the half of this.

1832. A new roof was put on the church and some improvements made.

1840-48. Rev. J. J. Graff was in charge, salary five hundred and fifty dollars.

1847. The pastor and congregation decided to act with the New School body, but soon after, under the leadership of Judge Spence, the church united with the Old School.

1852. Rev. B. G. McPhail was installed over Snow Hill and Pitt's Creek, ending his days and his ministry here in 1857. In his time the Church bought its first parsonage, for seven hundred dollars.

1857. Rev. Elkanah D. Mackey was installed and died next year. A substantial tomb in the churchyard bears witness to the sorrow of the church and the worth of the minister.

1859. Rev. Wm. D. Mackey was ordained and installed over Snow Hill and Pitt's Creek. Next year the church was blessed with a revival, which added thirty-two members, making the total communicants eighty-one. The number in Sabbath school was sixty-five.

1860. Snow Hill and Pitt's Creek now separated finally, each considering itself able to sustain a minister.

1866. The total funds raised this year, $700.

1868. Mr. Mackey left, and next year Rev. Charles Beach came and stayed until 1870. Members now on the roll, seventy.

1872. Rev. F. B. Myers became pastor, and remained six years. In his time the parsonage was repaired, and a new organ and a new bell purchased. The average amount raised for all purposes was $1300 annually, and when he left there were eighty-five members of the church and seventy-five of the Sabbath school.

1877. Rev. David Conway arrived, and was pastor until September, 1883. The church boundaries had been contracting for years, so that all its families lived in town except four. Expansion now commenced. A church was built at Stockton, nine miles south, by a bequest from Dr. Gunby. A congregation was soon gathered, a Sabbath school organized, with a permanent membership of one hundred, and of those who professed their faith in Christ, three good men were ordained elders. The boundaries were thus pushed out to the sea and down into Virginia.

Then the old parsonage was sold and another purchased, an elegant mansion, in the best location in town, surrounded by two and a half acres of ground. This was laid out in lawn, garden and orchard, with shade, fruit and ornamental trees, and shrubbery in abundance. It is the best parsonage within a circuit of one hundred miles.

To show the vitality of the old congregation, it may be stated that from 1877 to 1883 the communicants increased forty per cent., the Sabbath school members nearly tripled, and the funds contributed (omitting the bequest) averaged $2000 per annum.

1883. The statistical report shows communicants one hundred and fourteen; Sabbath-school members two hundred and five; funds raised $1836.00.

On this the two hundredth anniversary of the organization, it was resolved to build a Makemie Memorial Church, in honor of its founder, and to strengthen and accommodate the congregation.

1884. For the old brick house of worship, now in its eighty-ninth year, is as unfit for the activities of church life as the human frame is at the same age for exhibiting the energies of youthful vigor. The congregation has subscribed about $5000, and some additional help has come from friends outside, and more is expected, to make the church worthy of the man and the occasion.

The tradition in Snow Hill, that there Makemie organized his first church and built his first meeting house, is antagonized by a similar tradition at Rehoboth. Which is to be received? That of Snow Hill, for the following reasons:—

1. Snow Hill was the only town in Somerset, when Makemie came, which had an existence other than on paper. The statute ordering it to be regularly laid out, and making it a port of entry and export, recognized it as a town already built, and confirms the inhabitants in possession of the lots whereon they had located. This act was passed in 1686.

But when an act was passed for the ground on which Rehoboth now stands, there was not a house to locate the place by, and so the description runs from the boundary of one man's land to that of another.

Rehoboth to-day has ten very humble dwellings, and neither history, tradition, nor the oldest inhabitant has knowledge of a time when it had more. Snow Hill has 1500 inhabitants, and in 1683 the difference was relatively as great in favor of Snow Hill. And the town grew, because population was dense around it.

Now to which of these places would Makemie go to build his first church, the town or the forest? He would follow Paul's example, and go where most people were

2. The people in and around Snow Hill were mainly Presbyterian; those around the place now called Rehoboth were chiefly Episcopalian. Unlike some other counties in Maryland, the people of Somerset were then chiefly Presbyterian or Episcopalian, and they are so still, if Methodists be excluded. The Episcopal church in Coventry parish (where Rehoboth is) was well established, but in Snow Hill was not commenced for a decade afterward. And we have seen above that in 1719 it was still weak, while Snow Hill was "the constant abode of a dissenting Presbyterian minister." So strong was the Presbyterian element around Snow Hill, that in 1697 we find another church "on the road going up along the seaside," near Berlin, and soon another appeared near Newark; three churches in sixteen miles! No such strength had Presbyterianism at Rehoboth. Snow Hill, then, had the people, and these were Presbyterian, and there Makemie would go.

3. The Sheriff's Report, in 1697, shows no dissenting church at Rehoboth. Major William Whittington, the Sheriff, was a resident of Coventry parish, near Rehoboth, went to a mill hard by, knew Makemie, was a man of intelligence and benevolence, owned lands all over the county, went past Rehoboth every time he went to court, yet saw no church there in 1697. Pocomoke has a tradition that Makemie preached long in a house of Colonel Stevens, which may have been called a church by courtesy. But, however that may be, the Sheriff's testimony is decisive as to 1697.

4. Irving Spence, not having the proofs quoted above, seems to yield to Rehoboth; but his son, Elder Irving Spence, has recently shown, in an able article, that if his father had had the facts we have, he never would have "submitted his judgment" to that of others, which was all he did do.

5. It is a well-known fact that Makemie, instead of receiving contributions from Rehoboth, "supplied the temporal wants of the church out of his own resources." Snow Hill paid its own way.

6. While Presbyterians abounded at Snow Hill, Rev. Samuel McMaster, who lived at Rehoboth, says the church there was started by "a few families of English Dissenters." Where would an Irishman, like Makemie, organize his first church; among the few English Dissenters at Rehoboth, or the many Scotch-Irish at Snow Hill?

7. The only two points that appear to favor Rehoboth, go against it, when properly understood.

"Makemie," say some, "would go first to Rehoboth, to Stevens, the prominent man who brought him over."

Stevens didn't bring him over; and if he had, he would have been as likely to send him to Snow Hill as to Rehoboth. For Stevens was an Englishman, who took up the tract of land where Snow Hill stands, gave it its name, from Snow Hill, in London (probably his old home), and was now settling it with colonists.

To proselyte a man two hundred years after his death is unfair. The Rehoboth men have done that ignorantly, on the sole strength of the petition to the Presbytery of Laggan, from "Colonel Wm. Stevens, and others." Two years after signing that, he signed another paper (and was willing to swear to it), in which he declares himself an Episcopalian, "professing the gospel of Jesus Christ, according to the liturgy of the Church of England." (See "Scharf's History of Maryland," Vol. I, p. 287.)

Not to the English Episcopalian at Rehoboth would Makemie go to organize his first church, but to his kith and kin, the Scotch-Irish of Snow Hill. The "others" on the petition were the crew who sailed the Presbyterian barque; Colonel Stevens was only the figure-head, and a borrowed one at that! Why send to Ireland for a minister? Because they were Irish themselves, and knew the men and the state of affairs there. They got Stevens to head the paper, because he was a prominent man.

8. Makemie's long connection with Rehoboth is the only other point that seems to favor that place. But that was owing to another reason altogether. He married into a wealthy family in Virginia, and in order to live with them on the estate he denied himself the liberty of Maryland, and submitted to the restrictions of Virginia. The reason he held on to Rehoboth was that he could reach it readily from his home. It was the nearest to him. His long service there proves nothing as to its seniority.

But it accounts for the tradition. Where he had long been the people would first think, and then say, he had been first. The Rehoboth tradition can thus be accounted for on grounds other than the fact; the Snow Hill on the fact alone.

9. No wonder, then, that Craighead (Scotch and Irish seeds in American soil) declares Snow Hill, "so far as now known, the first regularly organized Presbyterian Church in America.

10. And Dr. Gillett, in his History of the Presbyterian Church, after reading the volume in which Dr. Macdonald tried to prove Jamaica the oldest American Presbyterian Church, says, judiciously and judiciously "He organized the Presbyterian Church in Snow Hill, Maryland. Here, in the narrow neck of land between the Chesapeake and the ocean . . . the Presbyterian Church in America began its existence."

Presbyterian Congregation, Youngstown, Ohio. This is, no doubt, the oldest church organization of any denomination upon the Western Reserve. Owing to the loss of the early records, the exact date of its organization cannot be given. It is probable that it was organized some time in the year 1800, by the Presbytery of Ohio. Upon the organization of the Presbytery of Erie, April 13th, 1802, this congregation was included within its bounds. Its Presbyterial connection again changed in 1808, upon the organization of Hartford Presbytery, where it remained until the division of 1837. The Presbytery of Beaver, successor to Hartford Presbytery, adhered to the Old School branch. After the separation, deciding to unite itself with the New School or exsundered wing of the Church, this congregation presented a request to the Presbytery of Trumbull to be received under its care, and it was then placed in its roll of churches. This connection remained until the union (1870), when the Presbytery itself was dissolved and the new Presbytery of Mahoning formed. This church had long been first in point of membership while under the care of Trumbull Presbytery, and it is numerically the strongest church in the Presbytery of Mahoning, having now about five hundred members.

The first church edifice was erected probably as early as 1802, near the northwest corner of Wood street and Wick avenue, immediately opposite the present church. A new building was erected in 1835, on Federal street, and occupied until 1866, when the present house of worship was first opened for service.

In 1832 the Presbyterian Church in Liberty was formed from this congregation, forty-three members being at first dismissed for this purpose, three out of the four elders then composing the Session being among the number. The eighty-four years of the existence of the congregation have, for the most part, been years of peace and harmony. The "unity of the Spirit has been kept, in the bond of peace."

The Sabbath-school connected with this church is the oldest in the place, and probably one of the first organized on the Western Reserve. All the records prior to 1862 have been destroyed or lost. This renders it impossible to give more than a brief sketch of its history. William Rice, late of Painesville, for many years an elder in this congregation, who was present and participated in its organization, stated that it was organized in the log church building then in use, in the Autumn of 1820, Elder Samuel Bryson being elected the first superintendent. Dr. Manning and Elders John Loughridge and William Rice afterward served in the same capacity. Although in the sixty-fourth year of its existence, it shows no signs of decrepitude, and has been, and is, carrying out the design of the founders, viz: "A nursery of the Church."

In 1801, the Rev. William Wick was installed as pastor of the Youngstown Church, for the half of his time. Mr. Wick was one of the original members of the Presbytery of Erie. He was also an original member of the Presbytery of Beaver. His labors were confined chiefly to Youngstown and Hopewell, although he found time to engage in missionary work "in the regions beyond." He was the first permanent laborer in the Western Reserve. About three years after his settlement he was blessed with the outpouring of God's Spirit, during which many were gathered into the church. He was aided by the Connecticut Missionary Society, for a year or two, and was always the friend of missions. He and Joseph Badger were ever fast friends, and took missionary tours together. He was Moderator of the Synod of Pittsburg in 1811.

Says his daughter, Mrs. Wood, "I remember distinctly of Revs. McCurdy, Marquis, Badger, Hughes and others, meeting at my father's house, to devise plans for the spread of the gospel throughout the Western wilderness."

He was a faithful minister of the Word, yet his ministry was brief. In October, 1811, he contracted a severe cold, and in a short time it became evident that his lungs were seriously affected. He was feeble through the Winter, yet was generally able to preach. March 26th, 1815, was the Sabbath he was to preach at Hopewell. He was not able to leave the house, and sent one of his sons to request the congregation to come to his house, and although very feeble, addressed them in a very solemn and affecting manner, and baptized a child. Being exhausted, he was assisted to his bed. On Monday and Tuesday he seemed better, and walked about the house and yard, and attended to family worship as usual. On Tuesday morning he sung with his family, in worship, in a clear voice, the hymn—

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand."

After singing, he said, "This music sounds heavenly. Oh, what will it be to hear the heavenly strains above!" That evening he retired without any visible change. At six o'clock on Wednesday morning Mrs. Wick noticed that his breathing was short and labored. He was beyond the power of speech, and before his family could be summoned his spirit had taken its flight to the land of rest and glory.

His death took place at Hopewell, Pa., on the 29th day of March, 1815, in the forty-seventh year of his age and sixteenth of his ministry. At his own request he was buried at Youngstown, O.

He was the father of eight sons and three daughters, the greatest portion of whom have gone down to the grave. His sons have, several of them, occupied places of authority and trust amongst their fellow-citizens, and one of them has been in the chief council of the nation.

It is recorded on his tombstone that he preached, during his ministry, one thousand five hundred and twenty-two sermons, and married fifty-six couples.

The Rev. John Core, the second pastor of this church, was born in 1755; licensed in 1816; was installed pastor of this congregation, in connection with Brookfield and Vienna, June 25th, 1817. He was released, April 10th, 1823, after a successful pastorate of six years. The church rolls show that over one hundred were added to the church during his ministry here. Mr. Core died in Clarion county, Pa., May 17th, 1854.

Rev. Ward Stafford, the third pastor of this church, was born about 1789. He commenced the work of the ministry about the year 1815, and labored for the greater part of the time in and about the city of New York until 1829. From "Gillett's History of the Presbyterian Church," we learn that "the Allen Street Church owed its existence largely to the efforts of Rev. Ward Stafford and Samuel J. Mills, who, in the Summer of 1816, explored a large and forbidding portion of the city, and succeeded in gathering a small congregation."

The church at Youngstown made out a call for Mr. Stafford in January, 1830, which was accepted, and he was installed pastor, April 5th, 1830, by the Presbytery of Hartford. Rev. James Wright preached on the occasion; Rev. James Satterfield presided, and gave the charge to the minister, and Rev. Thos. E. Hughes addressed the people and made the concluding prayer. The relation thus constituted continued until 1837, when he was released. During his seven years' labor, about one hundred persons were added to the membership of the church. Of his subsequent history we are not able to speak, but abundant evidence remains of his faithfulness as a preacher of the gospel. The date of his death is not definitely known, but it occurred about 1851.

Rev. Charles A. Boardman, who served this church with such ability and success for fifteen years, was born in Connecticut, in the year 1788. He was much more than an ordinary man, and during his pastorate here, and since his release and decease, it has been an occasion of surprise to many that this church was permitted to have his services so long. He was a man of fine intellect, and universally beloved for his many virtues, both as a man and a Christian. A letter from his daughter, Mrs. S. B. McEwen, gives a short sketch of his life before his settlement over this church, part of which is here inserted:—

"Rev. C. A. Boardman was born at New Milford, Litchfield county, Conn., November 19th, 1788. Was licensed to preach October, 1817. Was ordained pastor of the church and society of New Preston, Conn., June 18th, 1818. Rev. Dr. Lyman Beecher delivered the charge to the pastor on that occasion, and with him my father made his first exchange; and under my father's preaching in New Preston, the Rev. Dr. Horace Bushnell, of Hartford, Conn., was converted, and first united with his church at that place. In April, 1830, he received and accepted a call to the Third Congregational Church of New Haven, where he remained until 1832, when he removed to Westport, Conn., where he remained until January, 1837, when, yielding to the urgent request of the President and officers of Western Reserve College, he became Agent for the Western Reserve Education Society, in which capacity he served until he took charge of the Presbyterian Church at Youngstown, in 1839. These items I have taken from a record of his life, written by himself, which I have in my possession."

Mr. Boardman was installed pastor of this congregation, August 6th, 1839, by the Presbytery of Trumbull. Mrs. Boardman having been called away by death, in 1851, and his children having removed from this place, he felt constrained, in 1854, to ask the congregation to unite with him in an application to the Presbytery for a dissolution of the pastoral relation.

Dr. Levi B. Wilson was installed pastor of this church November 9th, 1859, and remained in charge until September 24th, 1869, when the relation was dissolved. While, as has been said, this is an old congregation, yet, owing to the formation of new congregations in its vicinity, and deaths and removals, it is not strange that, in a town of slow growth, the membership should be no larger in 1859 than it was thirty years before, at the commencement of Mr. Stafford's ministry. At this time (1859) the church had a membership of about one hundred and fifty. The town was then commencing its rapid increase in population and wealth. That the church, under his leadership, was enabled to keep pace with the advance in material interests of the place, is evident from the fact that he left the church with a membership of two hundred and eighty. Two precious revivals occurred during his ministry, in 1862 and 1866.

The Rev. Daniel H. Evans, the present pastor, commenced his labors in February, 1870, and was installed May 5th of that year. (See his Sketch.)

This church has had six pastors and three stated supplies. It has had twenty-four elders, most of whom are fallen asleep, and seven remain till the present; all men of good report, whose names are as follows: Robert Montgomery, John Gibson, Reuben McMillan, Augustus B. Cornell, Thomas H. Wilson, Dr. George Cornell and Robert McCurdy.

Presbyterian Board of Missions for Freedmen. At the session of the General Assembly, O. S., at Newark, N. J., in May, 1864, the subject of Missions among the freed people was brought before the body, from a number of directions entirely independent of each other. Overtures from the Presbyteries of New Lisbon, Ohio, of Louisville, Ky., of Newton, N. J., with papers presented by Rev. William Chester, D. D., Secretary of the Board of Education, and by Rev. S. C. Logan, of the Presbytery of Lake, requested some definite action on the subject. Upon motion of Rev. Mr. Logan, a resolution giving instruction to the Board of Education to endeavor to supply the freed people with schools, was referred to a special committee, consisting of ministers G. W. Musgrave, D. D., N. L. Rice, D. D., Alfred Nevin, D. D., S. C. Logan, and ruling elder Thomas Archer, of Baltimore. The majority of this committee, consisting of the last three members mentioned, agreed upon the paper which was afterwards presented and adopted by the General Assembly. (See Min., 1864, pages, 321, 322, 323.) This action organized two committees, one in Philadelphia and the other in Indianapolis, consisting of two ministers and three ruling elders each, to organize and conduct missions among the freedmen. These were styled "The Eastern" and "Western Committees on Freedmen." The members of the Eastern Committee were ministers W. P. Breed and Samuel F. Colt; elders Morris Patterson, John McArthur and Wilfred Hall. Those of the Western were ministers J. Howard Nixon and Samuel C. Logan; elders James M. Ray, Charles N. Todd and Jesse L. Williams.

The committees organized; the Eastern Committee on the 24th of June, 1864, by the appointment of Dr. Breed as Chairman and Rev. S. F. Colt as Secretary, and the Western Committee on July 21st, 1864, with Rev. J. H. Nixon Chairman, and Rev. S. C. Logan Secretary. With these officers the work of exploration and of establishing schools in refugee camps, and of supplying the wants of the suffering freedmen, was prosecuted with great energy. The work of establishing missions, both in the East and West, was greatly hindered by the conditions of uncertainty following the varied fortunes of the war. No churches could be organized, because of the instability and homeless condition of the communities, all of which were under military rule. The Eastern Committee employed a few ministers as explorers chiefly, and sent a number of teachers to the refugees along the Atlantic coast, and held temporary schools in military camps at Washington, Fortress Monroe, Newbern, and Williamsburg, Va. The Western Committee operated chiefly in Tennessee and Northern Alabama, at points held by the Northern army, and in Kansas and Arkansas, where quietness reigned. Both committees were more than ordinarily successful in the work assigned to them. At the next meeting of the Assembly they were able to report sufficiently definite information to lay the foundation of organized work among the freedmen. At the Assembly at Pittsburg, May, 1865, the war having been ended, with the established freedom of more than four millions of slaves, a vast field was recognized as opened for the fullest work of Christian missions. The Assembly, at that session, consolidated its two committees in the appointment of a single committee, called "The Assembly's Committee on Freedmen," which was located at Pittsburg, Pa., and authorized to appoint one or more executive officers or superintendents. To this committee was committed the whole care, under the Assembly, of mission work for these millions.

The Assembly's Committee was organized on the 21st of June, 1865, by the election of Rev. William D. Howard Chairman, and Rev. James Allison Recording Secretary. Dr. Howard served with fidelity for one year and resigned, when the Rev. Elliott E. Swift, D. D., was chosen to fill his place, which position he still holds. This Committee consisted of nine ministers and nine ruling elders. Alexander Cameron, an elder of the First Church of Allegheny, was chosen Treasurer, and served the first year without salary. After full discussion, it was determined to elect but one Secretary for the whole field; and the Rev. Samuel C. Logan, of the Presbytery of Lake, and a native of Hanover, Ind., was unanimously chosen that Secretary. On the 12th of the following month Mr. Logan accepted the office and entered upon the work.

This Committee found thirty-six missionary teachers in the field—sixteen sent out by the Eastern Committee and twenty by the Western—whose work had been determined and controlled by military lines. The missions were all conducted after the manner of the work of missions among the heathen.

The superintendence of every department, the organization of churches, the securing and sending out of missionaries, and the location of the same, the planting of institutions of all grades, with the building of churches, school-houses and teachers' homes, as well as the work of raising funds, was put upon the Secretary and an Executive Committee of ten members, five only of whom, by reason of residence in the city, were able to attend the meetings; and it met with great hindrance from the unsettled views and unfortunate ecclesiastical divisions, as well as by the various adverse influences incident to the civil war. But the work was carried forward with energy and patience, and was crowned with rapid and marked success.

At the reunion of the Presbyterian Church, in 1869, the New School branch not having had a separate organization for the work among the freedmen, the "Assembly's Committee" was continued at Pittsburg, under the style of "The Assembly's Committee of Missions for Freedmen." On the 1st of July, 1869, Secretary Logan resigned his position, to enter again upon the work of the pastorate, and the Rev. A. C. McClelland, of Pittsburg, was chosen his successor. Under the energetic fidelity of this worthy minister the work was carried on upon the same general plan adopted by the Committee during the first years of its labors. Secretary McClelland died, while engaged in the work of this office, in the year 1880. The Rev. Richard H. Allen, D. D., a Philadelphia pastor and a native of Kentucky, was unanimously chosen his successor. In 1882, at Springfield, Illinois, the Assembly constituted the Committee a regular board, and directed it to secure a charter from the State. This was done; and now the work is fully equipped, and promises, under God, a wide and speedy success.

Presbyterianism in Alabama. One of the earliest missionaries to Alabama was J. W. Platt, sent out by the Young Men's Evangelical Missionary Society, of New York. He arrived at Huntsville on the 26th of November, 1819. Of this place he remarked, "Its inhabitants will suffer nothing by a comparison of those of most other towns in our country, as it respects intelligence, refinement and wealth." Yet there was in the place no organized church or stated ministry, or house of worship, although many were anxious for gospel ordinances. Through his influence, steps were taken to erect "a handsome brick church."

From Huntsville, where he was urgently pressed to remain, Mr. Platt proceeded to Tuscaloosa, St. Stephens, Blakely and Mobile. Everywhere he was kindly and hospitably received. "It was pleasant," he says, "to be among these people, to feed these sheep in the wilderness."

In the successive years, from 1817 to 1820, Francis H. Porter was commissioned by the Assembly to labor as a missionary in Alabama Territory. In 1819 Lucas Kennedy was appointed with him to the same field. In 1819 we find James L. Sloss and Hiland Hulburt, members of the Presbytery of South Carolina, laboring in connection with the congregations respectively of Jackson and Claiborne.

Of these names, that of James Long Sloss is deserving of special mention. He was a native of Ireland, but came to this country at an early age. It was the earnest desire of his pious parents that he should be devoted to the work of the ministry; and one of his earliest recollections was that his father placed his hand upon his head, and said, "My son, I would rather see you a faithful minister of the gospel than a crowned monarch." Under the care of Dr. Waddeled he completed his preparatory theological course, and notwithstanding the solicitations of some of his friends, who urged him to devote himself to the legal profession, was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of South Carolina, in November, 1817. (See his Sketch.)

Another efficient pioneer laborer in this region has been already mentioned—Francis H. Porter. For several successive years he had itinerated largely throughout the northern portions of the State. In 1820 he visited Pleasant Valley, where "the assemblies were large, attentive and serious;" White's and Story's settlement, in Green county—where he organized the church of New Hope—and the adjacent region.

In 1821 Joseph P. Cunningham and Salmon Cowles were appointed by the Assembly missionaries to Alabama, the latter to labor in the northern part. In the following year the former was reappointed to the same field. James B. Stafford was directed also to labor within the bounds of the State. In 1823 the name of Francis H. Porter appears alone on the list of missionary appointments for this field, and in the two following years Samuel Taylor is the only laborer for Alabama and West Florida commissioned by the Board. The Presbytery of Alabama, however, was authorized to employ one or more missionaries, on the condition of bearing half the expense.

In 1825 the two Presbyteries of Alabama and North Alabama, covering the whole State, contained jointly seventeen ministers, of whom five—Thomas Newton, Neil McMillan, Henry White, Alexander A. Campbell and Thomas C. Stewart—were without charge, but for the most part engaged in missionary labor. Besides these, James Hillhouse was pastor at Greensborough, J. P. Cunningham at Concord, Green county, Thomas Alexander at Selma, Isaac Haden at Prairie Bluff, and John B. Warren at Mobile.

In North Alabama Presbytery, William Potter was pastor at Huntsville, A. K. Davis and John Allan labored in the same region, Joseph Wood at Tusculumbia, Hugh Barr at Courtland, and Robert M. Cunningham—who had recently resigned his charge at Lexington, Ky.—at Moulton, in the neighborhood of which his efforts were crowned with large success. He became instrumental, subsequently, in raising up the church at Tuscaloosa, and another in the neighboring town of Carthage. Joseph Parks Cunningham, already mentioned as a member of the Presbytery of Alabama, was his son.

At this period the churches connected with both Presbyteries, although two or three were within the bounds of Mississippi, numbered only twenty-eight. Of these nearly all were feeble and unable to support a pastor. The average number of members belonging to each was about thirty.

In 1830 the two Presbyteries of North and South Alabama numbered conjointly twenty-nine ministers and forty-one churches, with a membership of seven hundred and thirteen. In 1834 the Presbytery of Tuscaloosa was formed from that of South Alabama. In 1837 the Presbytery of North Alabama—connected with the Synod of West Tennessee—had eight ministers and sixteen churches, numbering five hundred and fourteen members. South Alabama had thirteen ministers, five licentiates and thirty-one churches, with a membership of sixteen hundred and ninety-three. The Presbytery of Tuscaloosa had ten ministers and fifteen churches, with a membership of seven hundred and thirty-nine. In the northern part of the State the only pastors were James L. Sloss, at Florence and Dr. John Allan, at Huntsville. The stated supplies were S. H. Morrison, at Moulton; James Weatherby, at Tusculumbia, and James H. Gillespie, at Somerville. In Southern Alabama William T. Hamilton was settled over the Government Street Church, Mobile; Robert Nall, at Marion; Elon O. Martin, at Hopewell and Sandy Ridge; and James B. Adams, at Hebron and New Hope. Thirty-three of the churches, or more than one-half, had stated supplies, while seventeen were vacant.

In 1882 the Synod of Alabama consisted of the Presbytery of East Alabama, 17 ministers and 37 churches; Presbytery of South Alabama, 20 ministers and 52 churches, and Presbytery of Tuscaloosa, 14 ministers and 30 churches.

Presbyterianism in Georgia. The field embraced within the limits of the State of Georgia came properly under the care of the Synod of South Carolina, and by members of that body had been extensively visited. But the Synod, unequal to the supply of its own destitutions, made application to the Assembly for aid. In 1820 Mr. R. Chamberlain, a recent graduate of Princeton, was sent thither, and labored in all the towns of the upper country of Georgia, preaching at Waynesborough, Louisville, Mt. Zion, Bethany, Greenborough, Madison, Athens, Lexington, Washington, Sparta, Milledgeville, Clinton, etc. At about the same time Azariah G. Orton and Charles J. Hinsdale, recommended for the service by one of the Professors at Princeton, were sent into the same field.

Previous to this, little labor had been bestowed upon it, except at Midway and Savannah, and their vicinity. The Assembly had, indeed, repeatedly sent out missionaries, whose labors were to be extended to places within the borders of the State. In 1816 John Covert was commissioned to labor for six months in South Carolina and Georgia, his route to be prescribed by Dr. Flinn, of Charleston. His labors were continued during a portion of the following year, in the same field. In 1818 William Moderwell was commissioned for four months, in the upper part of Georgia, and in 1819 Moses Waddel was elected to the Presidency of the University of Georgia. Thomas Alexander had for some time been laboring as pastor of the Salem and Mt. Zion churches, in Clark county, Thomas Goulding at White Bluff, and E. B. Caldwell at Waynesborough. There were, doubtless, other missionaries laboring in other parts of the State, but, with the exception of the churches of Savannah and Midway, all the others were feeble and for the most part unable to sustain a pastor. The Church at Savannah was the oldest in the State. It had been formed previous to 1760, when John J. Zubly, a native of Switzerland and an emigrant to this country, assumed the pastoral charge. An able, learned and devoted minister of the gospel, he labored at his post till, for his political views, he was exiled from the State. His death occurred in 1781, somewhere in South Carolina, although his remains were brought to Savannah for interment. How long after his death the church remained vacant does not appear. In 1801 Robert Smith, who had been laboring for some time as pastor of the Church of Schenectady, was forced, by the failure of his health, to seek a milder climate, and in that year he was called to the charge of the Church of Savannah.

In the Autumn of 1806 the church secured the pastoral services of the gifted and devoted Henry Kollock. (See his Sketch.)

A neighbor and fellow-laborer of Kollock was William McWhir, who, for several years before his arrival, had taken charge of the church at Sunbury and a school at Springfield, in Liberty county, some twenty miles south of Savannah. The labors of the school at length became such that he was forced to abandon it, while the great destitution of the means of grace in the surrounding region impressed him with the obligation still to preach as he had opportunity. He organized the McIntosh Church, afterward removed to Darien, and labored, till 1820, at various places in the counties of Bryan, Liberty and McIntosh. In 1827 he resumed his labors in this region, and continued them for ten years.

Another pioneer laborer of the Presbyterian Church in Georgia was Rev. (Dr.) John Brown, whose career has already been briefly traced. For several years, subsequent to 1811, he discharged the duties of his office as President of Georgia University, after which he was chosen pastor of Mount Zion Church, in Hancock county. This station he held for twelve years, at the same time laboring extensively as an evangelist.

In 1820 Hinsdale and Orton, who have been already mentioned as the Assembly's missionaries, entered the field. Following the advice of the Synod of South Carolina, they selected as the sphere of their itinerancy the region embraced by the then seven western counties of Georgia—Baldwin, Jones, Twiggs, Pulaski, Laurens and Wilkinson, lying between the Oconee and Ocmulgee, and the southern part of Washington county, between Oconee and Ogeechee rivers. The whole region had been purchased of the Indians only fourteen years previous, and all the settlements were of recent date. The vices of a new population were extensively prevalent. The want of an enlightened and faithful ministry was deplorable. Before the arrival of the missionaries there was no Presbyterian preaching whatever. Religion was lightly esteemed, and the "walk of many professors was inconsistent and ungodly." Yet, before the period of their service was complete, the missionaries were able to report a prospect that several Presbyterian congregations might be organized.

In 1821 the Presbytery of Georgia, which had recently been formed, and which covered more than half the State, contained but eight ministers. They were still aided, but to a feeble extent, by the missionaries sent out by the Assembly. The burden of their support fell mainly upon the Synod. Horace S. Pratt and Charles K. Hinsdale were commissioned in 1821 to labor in this region. In 1822 John H. Vancouver was appointed for six months. The supervision of this field devolved mainly upon the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia; and the destitutions of other portions of the region under its care were such that it could give but little attention to the wants of the Presbyterian Church in Georgia.

In 1825 the Presbytery had but six ministers and one licentiate. Of the six, four, viz: William McWhir, S. J. Davis, Murdock Murphy and C. G. McWhorter, were without charge, although not less efficient and energetic in missionary labor than their brethren, Horace S. Pratt and Robert Quarterman, the first pastor at St. Mary's, and the last at Midway. Prior to this period, Rev. N. S. Beman (Dr. Beman, of Troy) had preached, with great acceptance, at Mt. Zion, Eatonton, and other places, for several years, and his brother, Carlisle Beman, afterward President of Midway College, had been licensed to preach the gospel. Besides these, there were within the State, though connected mainly with the Presbytery of Hopewell, Dr. Francis Cummins, at Shady Grove, Greene county; Dr. Waddel, President of the State University at Athens; Dr. Alonzo Church, a native of Vermont, and associated with Waddel as a teacher in the University from 1819; William Moderwell, at Augusta; Remembrance Chamberlain, at Madison, in Morgan county; John S. Wilson, at Laurensville; Alexander H. Webster, at Washington, Wilkes county; Joseph Y. Alexander, at Lincolnton; and Thomas Goulding, at Lexington, Oglethorpe county. In 1825, Rev. George Foot, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Hopewell, was ordained and located at Monticello, Hillsborough and Clinton, and (Dr.) Joseph C. Stiles was licensed. But all these, besides licentiates and ministers without charge, numbered only about twelve; so that the entire number of Presbyterian ministers within the bounds of the State scarcely exceeded twenty. Yet this (1825) was the date of the revival of the system of four-days' meetings in Hopewell Presbytery, with which a great improvement in the state of religion commenced.

In 1830 the number of ministers had been but slightly increased. The churches numbered from thirty to forty, and their membership was but little more than twelve hundred.

In 1837 the Presbyterian Church in Georgia was represented by the three Presbyteries of Hopewell, Georgia and Flint River, the first with eighteen ministers and forty churches, with a membership of ten hundred and nine; the second with ten ministers, nine churches and a membership of three hundred and forty-five; and the last, set off as "Good Hope," from Hopewell, in 1833, and numbering eleven ministers. The pastors of the State were Robert Quarterman, of the Congregational Church, Midway; N. A. Pratt, of Darien; Washington Baird, of Waynesville; Joseph L. Jones, of Savannah; Nathan Hoyt, of Athens; George James, of Monticello; and John W. Baker, of Milledgeville. More than twenty of the churches had stated supplies, and about the same number were vacant. Among the members of the Presbytery were President Church, of Athens; President Beman, of Milledgeville; Professor Jones, of Columbia; Francis R. Goulding, stated supply of Washington Church; and Theodore M. Dwight, of Burke County Church.

In 1882 the Synod of Georgia consisted of the Presbytery of Athens, nine ministers and twenty-six churches; Presbytery of Atlanta, fifteen ministers and thirty-four churches. Presbytery of Augusta, eleven ministers and eighteen churches; Presbytery of Cherokee, fourteen ministers and thirty-two churches; and Presbytery of Macon, nine ministers and twenty-one churches. The Synod of South Georgia and Florida consisted of the Presbytery of Florida, eleven ministers and twenty churches; Presbytery of Savannah, twelve ministers and twenty-two churches; and Presbytery of St. Johns, eight ministers and sixteen churches.

Presbyterian Reunion, The. When the Old School General Assembly was in session at Newark, N. J., in 1864, a meeting of ministers and elders, members of that body, and others casually in attendance (called by a notice sent by a commissioner of the Assembly, to the Moderator, to be read), was held for conference upon the expediency and feasibility of organic Reunion. This, so far as is known to the writer, was the first action in favor of Reunion on the part of a public and representative body. It was not the action of the General Assembly itself, but of those, in large part, who were members of it. This meeting consisted of—

Y.; John Ogden, Milwaukee, Wis.; James Rankin, Dummingsville, Pa.; Charles Fuller, Scranton, Pa.; John D. Stokes, Beaver, Pa.

The paper prepared and published by this meeting was signed by the ministers and elders just named. From this document we make the following extract:—

"It is believed that the great majority in each branch sincerely receive and adopt the Confession of Faith, as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures, and approve the same government and discipline. On this basis we may reunite, mutually regarding and treating the office-bearers and church courts of each branch as coordinate elements in the reconstruction. There are difficulties in the way of repairing the breaches of Zion, which must be met and overcome by well-considered methods, and in a spirit of forbearance and prudence. Reunion cannot be accomplished, nor is it to be desired, without the restoration of a spirit of unity and fraternity. We believe this spirit exists, and is constantly increasing. That which should first engage the attention of the friends of Reunion should be to find out how far unity of sentiment and kindness of feeling prevail."

The spirit of reunion which was thus fostered and developed, continued, under the influence of advocates of the measure, to increase. By an evident preconcert on the part of leading minds on both sides, St. Louis was selected as the place of meeting for the two Assemblies of 1866. Steps were then taken which led to the appointment of a joint committee representing the two bodies, to which the subject of reunion was given in charge. Year by year progress was made in overcoming the difficulties that stood in the way of reunion, until, in 1869, the two Assemblies, acting in concert, met alike in the city of New York, and adopted such measures as were necessary to perfect the work.

According to adjournment, the two Assemblies convened in the city of Pittsburg, on Wednesday, November 10th, 1869, at eleven o'clock, A. M. The General Assembly (O. S.) met in the First Presbyterian Church, on Wood street. The General Assembly (N. S.) convened in the Third Presbyterian Church, on Sixth Avenue. The Old School roll counted two hundred and thirty-seven, and the New School roll two hundred and twenty-seven. It had already been agreed that at ten o'clock on Friday the two Assemblies should each be regularly dissolved, and that the two bodies should immediately come together for such religious celebration of the grand event as was befitting to the occasion. Thus, at the same hour, in both houses, with a solemnity becoming so rare an event, the Rev. Philemon H. Fowler, D. D., Moderator of the New School Assembly, and the Rev. Melancthon W. Jacobus, D. D., Moderator of the Old School Assembly, dissolved their respective Assemblies. The Christian Doxology and the Apostolic Benediction closed whatever pertained to the separate history and doings of these kindred bodies, which had now become in effect ONE.

It was arranged that the two Assemblies were to meet and greet each other in the open street, at 10 o'clock. The New School body first left their house at the hour, and marched in double file down Sixth Avenue to Wood street. As they turned the corner into Wood street, the head of the column stood opposite the First Church. This was the signal for the Old School body to move out of their house and to take up the line of march, in a parallel column with the other body, along Wood street, also a double file. Through Fifth Avenue into Smithfield street, and onward to the Third Presbyterian Church, the procession passed, brethren unbosoming themselves to brethren at every step. It was a grand public profession of Christian unity. It was felt to be the linking of mighty forces for doing battle against a world of evil. As the procession reached the church, the building was blockaded by the immense waiting multitude. As the head of the column entered the door, the large and noble edifice rang with the grand old "Jubilee Hymn," sung by a choir in the organ loft.

"Blest be the tie that binds
The gladly solemn band!"

The spacious platform was promptly filled by the officers of the Assemblies, and by such of the Commissioners as could be seated there, and as soon as the remainder of the procession was disposed of in the body of the church, the outside multitude rushed in, and instantly every seat and standing place was crowded to the utmost capacity of the building.

Hundreds could find no room, not even so much as about the door. On either side of a small table, in the centre of the platform, the Moderators, Drs. Fowler and Jacobus sat, and presided by turns. It was now about 11 o'clock, and the "Coronation Hymn" was grandly given, by the entire audience. The solid mass of faces in pew, aisle, doorway and gallery was most impressive from the platform. And from the body of the house the array of commissioners, clerical and lay, among the foremost men in Church and State, and met for such a divine purpose, was everywhere noted as a rare sight.

Dr. Fowler made the opening address of the occasion, after which, turning to Dr. Jacobus, he said:—

"My Dear Brother Moderator: May we not, before I take my seat, perform a simple act symbolical of the Union which has taken place between these two branches of the Church. Let us clasp hands."

This challenge was instantly responded to. The Moderators promptly grasped each other's hands, "amidst prolonged and deafening applause." The Doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," to the tune of Old Hundred, was then sung, with a hearty good will, the great audience standing. After an address by Dr. Jacobus, the audience united in singing the Hymn—

"Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love"

Dr. G. W. Mu-grave and Dr. William Adams followed with addresses. At the close of Dr. Adams' address, the Rev. Edwin F. Hatfield, D. D., was called on to offer prayer, which he did, with great fervency. On motion of the Rev. Ravand K. Rodgers, D. D., it was unanimously resolved, that the cordial thanks of the Re-united Church be returned to the members of the Joint Committee, through whose labors of love, by the blessing of God, this great and glorious result has been brought about.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel W. Fisher, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, read a paper, in which he suggested "that it is incumbent on the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America—one in organization, one in faith, one in effort—to make a special offering to the treasury of our Lord of one million of dollars." A motion was made, and carried unanimously, to make the thank-offering to be raised the sum of $5,000,000 instead of $1,000,000. Addresses were made by Dr. John Hall, of New York, Hon. William Strong, now of the Supreme Court, United States; Hon. Charles D. Drake, United States Senator from Missouri; Henry Day, Esq., of New York; Hon. Wm. E. Dodge, and Mr. George H. Stuart, of Philadelphia. When Mr. Stuart took his seat, the Moderator called on Mr. Robert Carter, ruling elder of New York, to offer prayer. This he did, with great unction, and in hearty sympathy with the occasion, the great Assembly were blended together at the throne of grace.

After the benediction was pronounced by Dr. Jacobus the immense audience, which had been held together with unlagging interest for three hours, dispersed, but never to forget the day of THE PRESBYTERIAN REUNION. In 1870, a single General Assembly at Philadelphia represented the United Church, in which were now combined long-separated elements, no longer estranged, but "Like kindred drops commingled into one."

Preston, Col. John Thomas Lewis, of Lexington, Va., now about seventy-four years of age, has long held a prominent position in the Church of his Fathers. A lineal descendant of John Preston, of Tinkling Spring Church, among the earliest and most efficient pioneers of Presbyterianism in the Valley of Virginia, Col. Preston has proved himself worthy of such parentage. At an early age he gave up the profession of law for literary pursuits, as more congenial to his taste. The State of Virginia had one of its armories placed near Lexington, and kept a company of soldiers to guard the property. Col. Preston was among the first, if not the first, to suggest the idea of a Military School to be established, and the keeping of the State's military property to be committed to the officers and pupils of the school. It was organized, and he was appointed a Professor in its corps of Instructors. He cordially co-operated with the Superintendent, Gen. F. H. Smith, in impressing on the Institution a decidedly Christian character. Though, with approaching age, he resigned his position, a few years since, the authorities, anxious to continue his relation to the Institution, conferred on him an honorable post of something like an Emeritus Professor, which he continued to fill, till within a couple of years. He has ever been the wise counsellor in the church Session, of which he has, for nearly forty years, been a member; and in all the higher courts, in which he has frequently had a seat, he has taken a modest but decidedly able position, as a ready debater and most judicious presbyter. God has blessed his careful training of his sons, by calling two of them to the ministry; and the father, in his declining years, has constant joy in seeing the generation of his name coming forward to sustain in the church the great interests he has so long and ably upheld. Isa. lix, 21, is well verified in this, as in many other instances.

Prince, W. L. T., is the youngest child of Lawrence and Charlotte Prince. He was born May 9th, 1823, in Darlington county, S. C., but his parents moved to Cheraw when he was four years of age. His father was an elder in Cheraw Church and his mother a daughter of Colonel Lemuel Benton, of the Revolution, and first member of Congress from the old Cheraw District, S. C. At their hospitable home all the ministers traveling through that section were entertained. He was admitted to the Bar in December, 1844, and was a member of the Legislature in 1860-1. He was received into the church when a little over twelve years of age; elected a deacon in January, 1858; and elected ruling elder in July,

W. L. T. PRINCE, ESQ.

1863. He was Commissioner from Harmony Presbytery to the General Assemblies in Macon and Louisville, and from Mecklenburg Presbytery to the Assemblies in New Orleans and Knoxville. General Prince is a genial gentleman, a lawyer of ability, faithful in the discharge of his duties as an elder, and a valuable and influential member of the Church Courts.

R

Reid, Samuel McDowell, long an eminent citizen of Lexington, Va., and Clerk of the Rockbridge Courts, was born near Lexington, in the latter part of the last century. Though the child of pious parents, and reared in true Christian principles, he did not become a communicant of the Church till late in life. His strict integrity, in public and private relations, had ever commended him to the confidence of the community. As a Trustee of Washington College, he was distinguished for his uprightness of all his relations to its interests, its Faculty and students. He ably and faithfully served the Board of Trustees, as Clerk, and generously appropriated the salary paid him to the Library funds of the College. His home was the resort of the wise and good from every quarter, and continued, after the death of his wife, in 1837, under the domestic management of his maiden sisters, to be the scene of a liberal, though unostentatious, hospitality.

Nearly related by blood to Rev. Dr. Alexander, many visitors from Philadelphia, Princeton, New York and other places in the Northern States found a cordial welcome at his fireside. Associated thus with so many, eminent alike for piety and literary culture, he perpetuated, with increasing years, the respect and admiration for virtuous people, and principles in which he had been trained in early life. When he became a communicant, there was no surprise felt in the community. On the contrary, all who knew him had been long at a loss to understand why he had not long before taken such a step. His fellow members in the church at once called him to the eldership, and till age, with its infirmities, disqualified him for active duties, he was ever prominent and efficient in the office he honored, both in the duties connected with the Session and congregation, and those of the positions in the higher courts, which he often filled. He illustrated the oft-repeated conviction of the people of God, that "seed, though buried long, shall not deceive our hope," as well as the promise, "I will be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee."

Robinson, Thomas H., D. D., was born in North East, Erie county, Pa., on January 30th, 1828. Descending from Scotch-Irish parentage, he was early trained in the doctrines of the Calvinistic faith. When eighteen years of age he entered the College at Oberlin, Ohio, and was graduated in 1850. During vacations, and in the year subsequent to his graduation, he engaged in teaching, at one time being Principal of an Academy at Ashtabula, Ohio. He began his studies in theology at the Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., in 1851, and went steadily forward to the completion of the course in that Institution. Being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Ohio, in June, 1854, he was almost immediately called to be associate pastor with the Rev. Dr. De Witt, over the Market Square Church, of Harrisburg, Pa.; entering on his work in October, and being ordained and installed in the January following. Here he labored for thirty years, as a pastor, beloved, and as a preacher, most acceptable. In 1868 Hamilton College conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1871 he was made a trustee of Princeton College, and in the year following he was chosen to be a director of the Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa. When the Synod of Harrisburg was constituted, under the order of the United churches, Dr. Robinson was elected Stated Clerk; and when the boundaries of the Synods were made coterminous with the respective States, he was chosen to the same office in the Synod of Pennsylvania. In October, 1883, he was, by unanimous vote, appointed to the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric, Church Government and Pastoral Theology, in the Seminary at Allegheny, Pa., which position he decided, after long and anxious deliberation, to accept, and will be inaugurated at some time, not yet fixed, in this year, 1884.

Dr. Robinson is an able preacher, has been a devoted pastor, is a faithful and efficient presbyter, and largely enjoys the esteem of his brethren and the confidence of the Church.

S

Saunders, Ephraim Dod, D.D., was born on the 30th of September, 1808, at the village of Brookside, near Mendham, New Jersey. On the paternal side he was connected with the Dod family, of which Professor Albert Dod, of Princeton, was a distinguished member. He graduated at Yale, in the class of 1831, a class remarkable for the fact that thirty-two of its eighty-one members became ministers of the gospel. He remained at New Haven after his graduation, to study theology, but at the expiration of a few months returned home, to pursue his studies there; he never again became a student of any theological seminary. In the Fall of 1832 he went to Fluvanna county, Virginia, where he engaged in teaching. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of East Hanover, on the 18th of October, 1833, and ordained by the Presbytery of West Hanover, November 21st, 1834. While laboring in this part of Virginia he was instrumental in building three churches. He afterward became principal of an academy in Petersburg, having been compelled to relinquish preaching, on account of trouble with his throat.

He left Virginia about 1847, returning North. In 1849 he was engaged in missionary work in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania, his work resulting in the establishment of the Presbyterian Church in Pottsville. In 1852 he purchased a valuable property in West Philadelphia, upon which he erected buildings, and established a classical military school, the Saunders Academy. On the 1st of July, 1871, Dr. Saunders gave a deed of this property to the Presbyterian Church, of Philadelphia, for the founding of the Presbyterian Hospital of that city. This deed was only restricted by a life-interest in a portion of the property held by Dr. Saunders and his wife.

Dr. Saunders died at his home in West Philadelphia, on the 13th of September, 1872. He was a gentleman of courteous manner, benevolent spirit, and great energy. He delighted in doing good, as opportunity offered. He was greatly beloved by the students of his Academy in West Philadelphia, many of whom have since reached positions of eminence in the Church and the State, and all of whom cherish his memory as a faithful instructor and affectionate friend.

Snowden, James Ross, LL.D., son of the Rev. Nathaniel Randolph Snowden, was born in Chester, Delaware county, Pa. He was educated chiefly under the tuition of his father, during his connection with Dickinson College, before it passed into the hands of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Choosing the Bar for his profession, and having taken up his residence at Franklin, Venango county, he was appointed Deputy Attorney-General. Subsequently, and for several years, he was elected to the Legislature of the State, and was Speaker of the House of Representatives in 1842, and again in 1844. In 1845 he was elected State Treasurer, and re-elected in 1846. In 1847 he was appointed, by President Polk, Treasurer of the United States Mint, Philadelphia, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States. In 1850 he returned to the Bar, and fixing his residence at Pittsburg, was appointed Solicitor of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which position he resigned to accept the position of Director of the Mint, in 1853, which office he held until 1861, when he was appointed Prothonotary of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. In 1873 he resumed the practice of his profession in Philadelphia. During these active duties he was also connected with many scientific, literary and historical societies, and, as an elder in the Presbyterian Church, took an active and prominent part in its various judicatories.

Dr. Snowden was author of "Ancient and Modern Coins," "Medals of Washington and National Medals," "The Coins and Money Terms of the Bible,"

"The Corn-Planters' Memorial," and "Sketch of the Six Nations of Indians." In 1868 he contributed to "Bouvier's Law Dictionary" the articles on the Cons. of the United States and Foreign Nations. He also, at different times, published addresses, pamphlets on currency, on International coinage, history, and other subjects. He was a gentleman of well-cultivated intellect, polished manners, great kindness of heart, large personal influence, and highly esteemed for his many attractive traits of character.

Sutton, Joseph Ford, D. D., was born in Harlyston, N. J., of Presbyterian and Revolutionary stock. He graduated at Rutgers College, N. J., in 1852, after which he spent one year as Teacher of Greek, Latin, Mathematics and Eloquence in the Seminary where he had prepared for college. He graduated at Union Theological Seminary, in 1857, and was ordained by the Presbytery of Rockaway, in December of that year. He was stated supply of the Second Church in Hanover, 1857-8, and became pastor of the First Church in Parsippany, N. J., in 1858, retaining this charge until impaired health required, much to the regret of his people, its resignation in 1861. After several years of public service, he was stated supply of the Church in Howell, Mich. From Howell he was called to Philadelphia, in 1865, to become pastor of the Western Presbyterian Church, as successor to the late Dr. Charles A. Smith. Resigning this pastorate in 1867, he engaged in a new enterprise in the northeastern part of the city, which was, in due time, organized as the Hermon Presbyterian Church, of which he became pastor, and so continued till the Autumn of 1873, when he resigned his charge and turned his attention to journalism. In 1875 he founded The Presbyterian Journal, of which he was the proprietor and publisher, being assisted in the editorial department by the Rev. Alfred Nevin, D. D., LL. D. Dr. Sutton is a cultivated, genial gentleman, an orthodox, earnest and impressive preacher, and, by reason of his acquaintance with ecclesiastical law, a useful member of Church courts. He has strong convictions, and the courage to express and maintain them.

Van Dyke, Rev. Joseph Smith, was born near New Brunswick, N. J., November 20, 1832. As a student at Princeton College, he ranked among the first scholars, and graduated third in a class of nearly one hundred, receiving the Philosophical Oration. He studied theology at Princeton Seminary, being Tutor in Greek in his Alma Mater during part of this time. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown, October 3d, 1860. He was pastor at Bloomsbury, N. J., 1861-9, during which time there was an extensive revival, and has been pastor of the Second Church, Cranbury, N. J., since 1869, where he is beloved by his people and prospered in his ministry. Mr. Van Dyke is a gentleman of genial spirit, an excellent preacher, a faithful pastor, and diligent and fearless in the discharge of duty. He is also an author of decided ability. In 1871 he published "Popery the Foe of the Church and of the Republic," which has passed through ten editions, and in 1881, "Through the Prison to the Throne; Illustrations of Life from the Biography of Joseph," which has been received with much favor. He has also given to the public an admirable tract on "Legal Prohibition," published by the National Temperance Society, and a pamphlet entitled, "Giving or Entertainment—Which?" that has attracted much attention.

W

Waddell, Addison, M. D., was a son of Rev. James Waddell, D. D., well known as the "Blind Preacher," from the description given of him by the pen of Hon. William Wirt. Born to an inheritance of a good name, and reared by Christian parents in the knowledge and love of Christian truth, Dr. Waddell became, in comparatively early life, a prominent and useful elder of the church in Staunton, Va. His cautious and prudent turn of mind, and the careful circumspection with which he considered all questions presented for his decision, led many, on a superficial acquaintance, to form the opinion that he was deficient in energy. But no one who knew the assiduity and ever-persistent attention with which he discharged the duties of his profession, could justly reach such a conclusion. Few pastors have ever enjoyed the co-operation of a wiser and more prudent adviser. With all the pressure of an extensive and laborious medical practice, he was ever ready for the calls of duty as an elder of the church. His opportunities for participating in the counsels of the higher courts of the Church were, of course, extremely limited by his professional engagements. But while the public interests of the Church at large were not within the reach of his personal aid, the influence of his wise and judicious views was often felt, with lasting benefit, by his fellow elders and the many ministers with whom he associated in his hospitable home, from time to time.

In the combination of his professional and ecclesiastical offices, his services were invaluable. He was the "Good Samaritan," eminently, as he was called by one of his pastors. He never waived the calls of the poor in their times of disease, and his professional services, in this way, though often never repaid in money, were no less freely bestowed, to the comfort of the needy sufferers; while the opportunities of ministering to their souls, either personally or by the pastor's aid, which he was ever mindful to seek, were improved to the edification of those whose minds, as well as bodies, were his religious care. He died suddenly, but safely, aged seventy years, in 1855. No death in Staunton ever called together a larger number of real mourners or excited more profound regret among the large circle who had been, so often, the beneficiaries of his combined skill and tenderness. His children and his children's children "rise up and call him blessed."

Waddell, Joseph Addison, the second son of Dr. Waddell, became, at an early age, a communicant in the Church of his fathers, and at an unusually early period of his adult life was called to take his place on the bench of elders in the Staunton Church. His name soon became associated with all that was wise in counsel and judicious in action connected with the affairs of Church and State. His fellow-citizens, of Augusta county, Va., gave him repeated marks of confidence in imposing on him, unmasked, the duties of a Legislator in the General Assembly of the State. Though a lawyer by profession, his native modesty and diffidence led him to seek rather the duties of the office than of the Bar. In the performance of them he brought to bear, with eminent success, his clear and extensive legal acquirements. In the Senate of Virginia he was, for years, a leader, enjoying the confidence of the Lieutenant Governor, J. L. Marye, who admired, loved and trusted him, as his occasional substitute, in performing the duties of the presiding officer of the Senate. By that body he was entrusted with the office of President pro tem., to serve in the absence of the Lieutenant Governor. Had his pressing professional duties permitted, he might long have remained in the service of the State. His popularity was not due to any catering to men's prejudices or passions, but to the commanding power of a conviction of Mr. Waddell's integrity, sound judgment and stern regard for the claims of duty.

As an elder, he has, oftener than his father, been found in the higher courts of the Church; though not as often, owing to professional engagements, as all who best knew him could desire. When present, he has evinced the same pious zeal for what was right and for the best interests of the Church, which had distinguished his father. In the affairs of the church of which he has been long a loved and honored officer, he has secured the hearty confidence and love of his fellow members, and lives, it is hoped, to render his fellow members and the community generally yet further service, while, in private life, he continues to illustrate the power of the faith and love of an humble follower of his Lord and Master.

The Lord's Prayer.

Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen.

The Apostles' Creed.

I believe in God the Father Almighty,
Maker of Heaven and Earth: And in Jesus Christ his only Son our Lord: Who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary: Suffered under Pontius Pilate:
Was crucified, dead, and buried: He descended into Hell:* The third day he rose again from the dead: He ascended into Heaven: and sitteth at the right hand of God the Father Almighty:
From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead: I believe in the Holy Ghost: the Holy Catholic Church: The Communion of Saints: The Forgiveness of Sins: The Resurrection of the body: and the Life everlasting.

Of old, that went and came?
But, Lord, Thy Church is praying yet—
A thousand years the same.

“We mark the goodly battlements,
And her foundations strong;
We hear within the solemn voice
Of her unending song.

“For, not like kingdoms of the world
Thy holy Church, O God!
Though earthquake shocks are threatening her,
And tempests are abroad,

“Unshaken as eternal hills,
Immovable, she stands;
A mountain that shall fill the earth;
A house not made with hands!”

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

The Ter-centenary Celebration held in Philadelphia, A.D., 1872, demonstrated the value of historic decorations for awakening interest in and increasing the profit of such an occasion. The question, therefore, arose at an early date, in the business committee to whom had been assigned the duty of arranging for the Second Council of the Presbyterian Alliance: Cannot something of the same kind, on a larger scale, be done by us? A committee on "Hall and Decorations" was erected, to whom the matter was referred. The result was seen in the symbolic decorations which covered the walls of the hall in which the Council met.

The purpose which determined the general plan adopted was two-fold:—first, to give to foreign members and visitors a welcome which might bear in it a savor of home. The hope was entertained that, as these brethren from distant lands should cast their eyes upon the bannered columns which represented their own Churches and countries, they would feel that here in America, also, they might dwell, "every man under his vine and under his fig tree." Certainly the American Church is a vineyard whose growth is but the product of transplantings from the fields of Europe. The original thought of the committee was to give every Church represented in the Alliance some place and name in the decorations. But practical difficulties which could not well be overcome compelled the adoption of the more general and representative plan which finally prevailed.

Second, and chiefly, the purpose of the designs was to illustrate to Americans the worthy and catholic history and the catholic distribution of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System. A glance at the banners on the wall gave historic confirmation of the fact brought by the living witnesses within the Council, that, of all branches of the Protestant Church, the Presbyterian has ever been and is the most truly catholic. No disparagement is meant of our sister communions by the assertion, and the emphasis, by decorations or otherwise, of this truth. At all events, it is the indisputable testimony of history.

However it may be in other lands, in America it is certainly the case that this fact is not generally understood. The impression is wide-spread that Presbyterianism is a type of Scotch and Scotch-Irish Protestantism—a local product of Great Britain, or at furthest of Geneva. How few among the people at large know that once England's metropolis was Presbyterian, and London could count a score of Presbyteries; that Presbyterianism was regnant once in England's Parliament, and supreme within her sanctuaries and seats of learning! How few know that the noble, Bible-loving Christians of Wales are Presbyterians! How few have learned that the glory of French thought and the flower of French chivalry were in the ranks of the Presbyterian Huguenots! Few, also, are they who know that Holland's noble annals are records of the struggles and triumphs of the Reformed Church; who know that Germany has wide and honorable historic affinities with Presbyterianism; that the fairest chapters of Bohemian and Hungarian Church history belong to the same system; that Italy and Switzerland are radiant with the glory of sires whose sons were gathered beneath the banners of the Presbyterian Alliance. Moreover, the wide distribution of the Church by emigration and through missionary and evangelistic labors is very duly apprehended by our countrymen at large, and even by members of our own communion.

To such a condition as this the committee framed their designs. They sought to make the Hall of Assembly a school whose "object teaching" might point the people to the central facts and leading figures in the history of the Churches of the Alliance. That in some measure, at least, they have succeeded, the result has shown.

In precisely the same line is the publication of this Photographic Souvenir of the Decorations, which, it is hoped, may perpetuate and greatly extend and deepen the impressions made during the Council meetings.

In the general plan of decorations adopted it was arranged to represent, as far as possible, every historic Church by its seal; the historic leaders by seals, mottoes, and coats-of-arms, and the historic events by commemorative sentences, names, dates, and devices. The collection of the seals and arms was a tedious and difficult undertaking. The work began early in the year 1880, and was diligently prosecuted by personal visits in Europe made by Mr. Murray Gibson, and by letters addressed to all parts of the world. Libraries, museums, private collections, heralds, colleges, historical, antiquarian, and numismatic societies all contributed their quota.

Several facts soon appeared. There seems to be no large and distinct collection of ecclesiastical seals and symbols belonging to Protestant communions. If there be such, no knowledge of it has yet come to the committee. There is here a most interesting field for some one to cultivate.*

Another fact which came to light is that, as a rule, engravings of seals cannot be trusted for accuracy. For example, a collection of several cuts of the "burning bush" of the Scotch Kirk had no two alike. It was impossible to know what form was the authentic one without an impression from the seal itself. This was accordingly procured, and proved to be quite unlike every one of the cuts in its details. The same variations obtained in a collection of the familiar seal of the Vaudois. This fact increased the labors and perplexities of the committee, as it was often difficult and sometimes impossible to get authentic specimens. However, in the end many accurate copies were procured, and these were closely copied by the decorators. So that the final result was a really scientific treatment of the subject. The source, and so also the authority of every symbol will be hereafter noted in connection with its description.

Again, it soon became evident that the knowledge of and interest in the peculiar form of historic memorials which the committee were seeking were very limited. It frequently occurred that men in prominent positions in various Churches were not able to say whether or not their Church had or ever had had a seal or other symbol. Even when there was knowledge of such an emblem the notion of its outline and details was often exceedingly dim.

*The writer of these lines will gratefully receive any additions to a collection which any one may be able to make. He particularly asks pastors, stated clerks, and others in office to send to him impressions and engravings of Church seals, and coats-of-arms, and seals of the Reformers.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

However, the committee have to express cordial thanks for the courtesy and prompt attention which their numerous letters, with scarcely an exception, secured from gentlemen in all parts of Europe and America. Their thanks are especially due to Dr. Matthews, of Quebec, one of the Clerks of the Alliance; to James Macdonald, Esq., of Edinburgh, Scotland, and to Pastor Chaponnier, of Geneva, Switzerland.

In addition, the chairman of the committee acknowledges his obligations to his colleagues, Rev. Drs. John De Witt, C. A. Dickey, and S. W. Dana, for their constant sympathy and support in the execution of his plans; to Mr. Wm. E. Tenbrook, who had charge of the wood-work; to Mr. Robert Scott, who arranged the floral designs, and to Mr. Murray Gibson, whose admirable taste and skill directed the execution of the painted decorations. The designs, combinations, and historic illustrations were prepared by the committee, but to the last named gentleman is largely due the credit for the manner in which the details were wrought out.

One more fact may be referred to in order to complete the history of the figures preserved in this Souvenir. The efforts made by two skillful photographers to take views of the decorations within the hall proved unsatisfactory. This was due to the presence in such large proportion of non-photographic colors, and to the unfavorable conditions of light. The attempt was abandoned as impracticable, greatly to the disappointment of many persons, who in many ways expressed the wish to have copies of the designs. At the close of the Council the hall was stripped of its decorations, and the only hope of perpetuating them in any form lay within the hands of an artist whom the writer had engaged (after the photographers had pronounced the matter beyond their art) to make drawings for his own library, with the purpose of ultimately preserving them in the library of the Presbyterian Historical Society.

During a brief illness, which had removed him from duty at the Council, the thought occurred to him that the designs might be restored under favorable conditions of light outside the hall, and thus photographed. This was found to be practicable. But could anyone be found to undertake the work? The representatives of the "Presbyterian Publishing Company" were sent for, the project laid before them, and they finally consented to take the risks. In consideration of this, the writer offered to secure a copyright upon the designs, and transfer it to the above company, under certain conditions, intended to open the way to the free use of the emblems and illustrations in such form as might not impend the publishers' interests.* Accordingly, the figures were taken from their place of storage, restored to their original forms, erected upon a large scaffold prepared for them in the open air, under the best conditions obtainable, and photographed. Even the pictures thus obtained were too dim in parts to be valuable. A skilled operator

* It is due to these gentlemen to say that they were moved to this undertaking quite as much by sympathy with the purpose to gratify the public desire for the Designs and perpetuate and enlarge them, as by any hope of pecuniary advantage.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

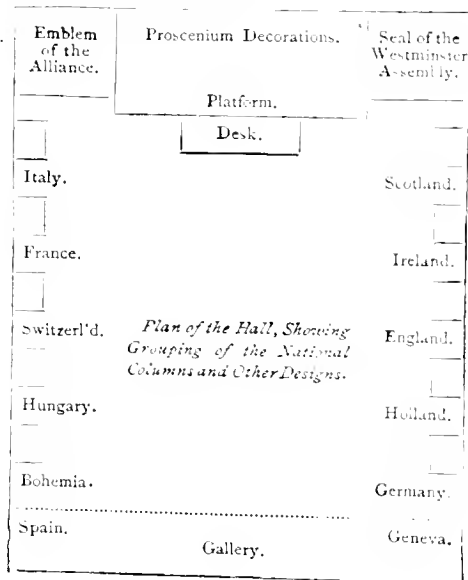

was therefore placed at the negatives, who, after several weeks' continuous work, put them in such condition that they gave the excellent prints presented in this Souvenir.

The proscenium view alone could not be restored. The copies of this have been made from an India-ink drawing made from the original by Miss Clara Todd. It is an accurate drawing, and proved even more pliable for photographic use than the huge colored cartoons.

The great labor of preparing the original designs was thus fairly matched by the difficulties of preserving them. The writer has taken upon him the task of so preserving them, and accompanying the prints with the following explanations, influenced solely by the opinions and requests of brethren whose judgment he is bound to respect. That the work may deepen in some hearts love of the Church and zeal in her service is his earnest prayer.

DESCRIPTION OF THE DECORATIONS.

The general plan of the decorations was modified by the arrangement of the hall. The assembly room of Horticultural Hall is a rectangular room, 155 feet long, 75 feet wide, and 28 feet high. On the western end is a proscenium or platform 42 feet in width and 37 feet deep. This is approached from the hall floor by a door on each side. On the eastern end of the hall is a gallery. The wall space between platform and gallery is broken by five windows on each side. Between these windows were placed the decorative columns intended to commemorate the Churches represented in the Alliance. The following rude outline plan will illustrate the above statements :

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

Upon the interspaces between the windows on the north side were arranged in the following order the columns of 1st, Scotland; 2d, Ireland; 3d, England; 4th, Holland; 5th, Germany; and in the first interspace over the gallery the seal of the Ancient Company of Genevise Pastors. On the south side in the same order (from the west) were: 1st, Italy; 2d, France; 3d, Switzerland; 4th, Hungary; 5th, Bohemia, and in the first interspace over the gallery the seal of the Reformed Church of Spain.

The columns measured twenty feet in height (several exceeded this) and about seven feet in width. They were rectangular in shape, every one being composed of three separate framed canvas paintings, which were joined together and bolted upon strong beams. These beams were braced at the floor, bound at the top by copper wire into iron hooks, and the whole united and braced by light cross-beams. The entire wooden frame-work was wrapped and festooned with evergreen wreathing, and thus added much to the general effect of the decorations. About twenty-one hundred square feet of canvas were used for the paintings, and five thousand feet of wreathing.

SCOTLAND'S COLUMN.*

Beginning on the north side, the first column was devoted to Scotland. The upper portion was a large shield, whose background is a blue field, which is covered with golden thistles, the thistle being the floral emblem of Scotland. In the centre of the shield is the seal of the Established and Free Churches of Scotland. It is a burning bush, with the motto, Nec Tamen Consumebatur—"And yet it was not consumed." The figure and motto are taken from the scriptural account of the burning bush in which Jehovah appeared to Moses, the bush which burned, and yet was not consumed. The whole is emblematical of the Church of Scotland, which passed through the fires of persecution, and yet was not destroyed. Upon the shield, just above the seal of the Scotch Kirk, is a dove with outspread wings, representing the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, whose symbol is a dove with an olive branch in its mouth. Immediately beneath the shield, in large letters, is the word CULDEES—a reference to the primitive Christians of Scotland. Some Presbyterian historians hold to the idea, which is authenticated by strong historic proofs, that Scotland, indeed all of Great Britain and Ireland, was Christianized in part before it was occupied by the Roman Church. The name Culdees is that by which the early British Christians in the second and third centuries and upwards were known. It is supposed by some to be derived from the Latin words, Cultores Dei—"Worshippers of God." By others to be derived from the Gaelic words, Gille De, which mean "Servants of God;" or, from Cuil, which means "a retreat," from the fact that they lived in secluded islands. The Island of

* Immediately before the assembling of the Council several representatives of the daily press sought explanations of the decorations for publication. The writer dictated to a stenographer a brief description, which was published in a number of papers. As this verbal description was given amidst the confusion and care of completing the work in the hall, it was of course very imperfect, and the published account had many errors.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

Iona was one of their favorite retreats. The word Culdees in this connection, therefore, emphasizes the belief that the Presbyterian Church is of ancient foundation, and that the simplicity of its forms and the peculiarity of its organization were characteristics of the primitive Christians. The same idea is expressed in historic references on the columns of Ireland and Italy.

Beneath this name is a tablet to JOHN KNOX, the eminent Reformer of Scotland. His name is in gold, on a blue field, and is printed on either side of a large scarlet oval, upon which, in gilt letters, is his motto:—"The truth I speak, impugn it whoso list." These famous words were spoken on the occasion of his trial for treason before Mary, Queen of Scots. Immediately beneath this is a tablet of the same character to REGENT MURRAY, called "The Good Regent." The oval centre bears his heraldic coat-of-arms. The field of the oval is bronze, and the field of the arms scarlet, the name being in white. Beneath this is a tablet to the Covenanters. A panel in blue bears a bronze shield, upon which is an uplifted right arm, an emblem of the mode in which the old Covenanters took their oath; their descendants thus take it to this day; and in many parts of America this mode of "swearing with the uplifted hand" prevails before our courts of law. Beneath the shield is a scarlet tablet bearing the following dates historic as times of Covenant taking: "A.D., 1551," "A.D., 1638, the time of the "NATIONAL COVENANT," as it was called, when Charles the First tried to force Laud's Liturgy upon Scotland, and the people rose in rebellion. Among the associations of this period are Jenny Geddes and the famous three-legged stool which she hurled at the dean who dared "say mass at her lug." "A.D., 1643," the next date, was the time of THE SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT, which was shared with Scotland by the Parliament of England, "A.D., 1650," the period of the Cameronian Covenanters, just preceding the revolution of 1688, when William and Mary came to the throne. Two flags, copies of those carried by the Covenanters, are crossed on either side of the Covenanters' tablet. One shows a scarlet St. Andrews cross upon a blue field, and bears upon the quarterings the names, "Christ," "Covenant," "King," * "Kingdom." The other shows a white St. Andrews cross with a scarlet thistle [silk] embroidered in the centre. The field is blue and scarlet, and the quarterings bear the names, "Covenants," "For Religion," "Kingdom," "Crown." † Beneath this is a large tablet, in the centre of which is a blue scroll, upon which is inscribed the names of Scottish commissioners to the Westminster General Assembly. Those commissioners were "Henderson," "Rutherford," "Gilespie," "Bailey," "Sir Archibald Johnstone," and "Maitland." The latter name appears on the scroll nearly obliterated by a black line, signifying the fact that Maitland became an apostate and traitor, and under the name of Lauderdale bitterly persecuted his old friends and co-religionists. On either side of the scroll are the names, "Melville," "Hamilton," "Sir David Lindsay," "Cameron," "Argyle," "The Lollards of Kyle," "Welch," "Wis-

* The word "Kirk" was at times substituted for "King," as it appears on the first flag.

† This is an imitation of a flag preserved in the Advocate's Library, Edinburgh. The color is however described as "pink" instead of scarlet. It must be a faded scarlet, I think, as the latter was undoubtedly one of the Covenanters' colors.

hart," and "Chalmers;" and in a black border the "Earl of Kintore," one of the distinguished delegates to the Council, recently deceased.

IRELAND'S COLUMN.

The shield of Ireland has a green field, sprinkled over with golden shamrocks. On the shield, in bronze color, is the seal of the Church of Ireland—substantially the same as that of Scotland, though the burning bush has a different form, being more elongated. Above it is the motto, Ardens Sed Virens—"Burning, but Flourishing." The scroll surrounding the seal reads, "General Assembly Presbyterian Church in Ireland." Beneath that is a large crimson tablet whose centre is a large circle in blue. Upon scrolls on either side of the blue circle are the words, PATRICK, A.D., 372, on one side, and COLUMBA, A.D., 563, on the other. Upon the circle, above and below, are the words, "Ireland's Primitive Presbyters," with the sentence in quotation marks between them, "365 Churches, 365 Bishops, 3000 Elders." The quotation is from the distinguished and amiable Irish prelate, Archbishop Usher. The idea here is that the churches established by St. Patrick, according to history, had each a bishop and each about eight elders, after the manner of Presbyterians; that, therefore, St. Patrick established churches after the Presbyterian order, and was himself an apostle of Presbyterianism. A cluster of shamrocks in green surrounds the above sentence. Beneath that are the following historic dates and names: "The Ulster Plantation, A.D., 1605," which commemorates the settlement of northern Ireland by the Scotch during the reign of James I.; hence the term Scotch-Irish. The whole northern province of Ireland was called Ulster.

Among the ministers first settling in the Ulster Plantation were "Brice," "Blair," "Cunningham," "Livingstone." The last is known in connection with the remarkable revival at the "Kirk of Shotts,"* which name has been introduced to distinguish him, and also to mark the great revival of that day, which had such a happy influence upon the character of the Ulster people. "Sir John Clotworthy" was one of the eminent laymen. "The Black Oath of 1689—Irish Massacre, 1641." The Black Oath is the one which Charles I. compelled the Irish people to take, to the effect that they would never disobey any of the king's commands, and that they foreswore all covenants whatsoever. Multitudes of Presbyterians and others could not and would not conform to this requirement, and were mercilessly persecuted therefor. The terrible uprising of the Roman Catholic population which threatened the extinction of Protestantism is commemorated in the next reference. "First Presbytery, A.D., 1642," marks the time of establishing the First Presbytery in Ulster during the reaction which followed.

Beneath this is a tablet in bronze, in the centre of which is the coat-of-arms of Londonderry. The shield is white, with red and blue quarterings. In the centre

* The propriety and correctness of this reference was questioned, but the Committee have not erred. Livingstone was on a visit to Scotland when he preached the famous "Kirk of Shotts" sermon. His subsequent prosecution and suspension from the ministry were based on alleged uncanonical conduct in thus officiating in Scotland while himself an Irish clergyman. See Reed's History of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, Vol. I., p. 127, sqq.

are figured a castle and a skeleton, emblems of the memorable seige and the famine that resulted during the seige. Beneath the shield is the motto, Vita, Veritas, Victoria—"Life, Truth, Victory." On the same tablet, and surrounding the coat-of-arms, are the inscriptions, "Siege of Derry, 1689," "Battle of the Boyne, 1690," "William III. of Glorious Memory." Beneath this is a tablet bearing the following inscriptions: "Act of Toleration, A.D., 1723," "Rise of the Secession Church, A.D., 1733," "Repeal of Sacramental Test, A.D., 1780," "Henry Cooke, 1821," "Franciscus Makemieus Scoto-Hibernus, A.D., 1681." Dr. Cooke was the famous champion of the Presbyterians against the Unitarian heresy in northern Ireland. Makemie was one of the earliest Presbyterian ministers in America. The title on the tablet is that under which he was enrolled as a student in the University of Glasgow, A.D., 1675.*

ENGLAND'S COLUMN.

The shield upon the English Church column above has a scarlet field, which is sprinkled with roses in gold; in the centre is figured the seal of the Presbyterian Church of England, which is a double circle. On one of the circles is the seal of the Westminster General Assembly; on the other is the burning bush, the seal of the Scotch Kirk, which is here set upon an open rose; above it all is a dove with out-spread wings. The symbolism expresses the fact that the present Church of England was formed by a union of the Scotch Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, and English Presbyterians; and their seals were blended as above to make the seal of the United Church. Beneath this is a large band bearing the word "PURITANS," a characteristic name of English Presbyterians. Underneath is a circular tablet, inscribed, "2000 Non-Conforming Presbyterian Divines, August 24th, A.D., 1662." This commemorates the ministers of the English Church of that period (the Established Church being then Presbyterian), who abandoned their churches, livings, and manses, or parsonages, rather than conform to the liturgical requirements of King Charles II. Beneath this, again, is a tablet bearing a large white scroll, on which is written, "Westminster Confession of Faith. Assembly of Divines Westminster Abbey, A.D., 1643-1647." This famous assembly was held in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, and was one of the most learned bodies of divines ever assembled. It prepared the symbols of the Church known as the Westminster Confession of Faith and Larger and Shorter Catechisms. The ordinance of Parliament which convoked this assembly declared it to be among its chief aims "that such a government shall be settled in the Church as may be most agreeable to God's Holy Word, and most apt to procure and preserve the peace of the Church at home, and nearer agreement with the Church of Scotland and other Reformed Churches abroad." The thought was cherished by many of the leading spirits of the assembly, that Protestant Christendom ought to

* It was asserted during the sessions of Council that documents had been recently found which showed that Makemie preached in America as early as 1681. Reed, on the contrary, says that he found a record that he preached "for Mr. Hempton in Burt, April 2, 1682, from Luke xiii. 3, forenoon and afternoon." See History, Vol. II, p. 324. We can hardly suppose that Makemie had returned from America on the above occasion.

led through the agency of their body to form a substantial Union in matters of church government and worship. They anticipated not only the "Presbyterian Alliance," but the "Evangelical Alliance" as well. Hetherington, the historian of the Westminster Assembly, in referring to this fact, thirty-seven years ago (A.D., 1843), uses these prophetic words: "Let but the attempt be made, in the spirit of sincerity and faith and prayer, and there may now be realized a Protestant, or rather a Presbyterian Union embracing the world."* Following this is a tablet to the Shorter Catechism—two cherubs holding a banner upon which is written "The Shorter Catechism." "Ans. I. Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever." Beneath this is a tablet bearing names and commemorative sentences. "Twisse," "Herle," and "Gouge" were distinguished members of the Westminster Assembly. "Baxter," the divine, best known among us by his "Saint's Rest," and "Call to the Unconverted." Few men exercised a wider or better influence in England than Richard Baxter. His ministry was a model of pastoral faithfulness, and his numerous published works are a monument to his industry and ability. "Pym" and "Hamden" were eminent patriots; "Wandsworth, A.D., 1572," marks the place and date of the establishment of the first Presbytery held in England. "Bangor," "Columbanus," are commemorative of the early Christians of Wales.

HOLLAND'S COLUMN.*

The larger upper shield of Holland has a blue field, upon which is a large bronze circle, bearing a medal commemorative of the Synod of Dort. It shows a temple upon the top of a rock. Worshipers are ascending to the temple by a highway cut in the rock. The four winds, represented under the form of cherubs, appear in the four quarters, blowing upon the rock. The scroll surrounding the figure reads, Errunt Ut Mons Sion, MDCXIX—"They are as Mount Zion, A.D., 1619." The idea appears to be that the Church, under all the winds of persecution, is as Mount Zion which cannot be removed. Ps. cxxv. 1. It is possible, however, that the "winds" may be the symbols of heavenly influences breathed upon the Church. A large band beneath the shield bears the Dutch motto, Eendracht Maakt Macht—"Union (or literally, a united pull) makes might," more freely, in union there is strength. Beneath this is a tablet to WILLIAM THE SILENT, under whom the Netherlands achieved her civil and religious independence. This tablet bears upon an orange band the name "William." In the centre, upon a blue field, is William's coat-of-arms, with the motto, Nisi Dominus Frustra, literally, "Unless God, Vain," an abbreviation of the Latin version of the Scripture, "Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it." Ps. cxxvii. 1. This coat-of-arms and motto form the accepted emblem of the (Dutch) Reformed Church of America, of which it is also here commemorative. A scarlet band beneath the coat-of-arms bears the name of his noble and distinguished mother, "Juliana of Stolberg." Underneath is a white tablet in the shape of a Maltese cross, upon which is pictured a lily springing up through thorns, one of the emblems of the Holland Church. Surrounding it is the Dutch text, Als Een Lillie Onder De Doornen—"As a lily among the thorns." Across the lily, and between the parts of the motto, is the sentence, "100,000 martyrs, A.D., 1507--1573," commemorating those who died for their faith as martyrs during the terrible persecutions under the Emperor Charles V., his son Philip II., and the bloody Duke of Alva.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

Beneath the cruciform tablet are two small tablets, one in blue to the Dutch navy, or "Beggars of the Sea," inscribed, "Admiral Boisot," "Brill, A.D., 1572," "Leyden, A.D., 1574." Boisot was the admiral who achieved the liberation of Leyden at its historic siege. Brill was the first seaport town captured by the Water Beggars, which capture turned the scale in favor of the struggling patriots. On either side of the above is painted in bronze color a large oval medal, the one on the right being an exact copy of the Beggars' medal, which was struck in commemoration of the famous Beggar Society organized under Brederode. The figure shows two hands clasped between the leather handles of two sacks, such as were carried by the begging friars of that time. The date "1556" is on the medal, and around it the inscription in French, Jusques a Porter La Besace. This is the continuation of the historic sentence, "Faithful to the King until the carrying of the Beggar's sack." On the reverse of the medal from which the above was copied is a bust of King Philip, surrounded by the legend, "Faithful to the King." The conclusion, as quoted above, appears on the other side. William the Silent wore one of these "Beggars' Medals" at the time of his assassination.

The companion oval on the opposite side of the tablet⁶ bears one of the devices and mottoes of William the Silent. It is a pelican brooding over her nest, feeding her nestlings with the blood drawn from her own breast. Underneath is the motto, Pro Lege, Rege et Grege—"For the law, For the King and People." Above and beneath the bird are the words, Divino Favore—"By the Divine Favor." This device and legend William had inscribed upon some of the flags carried by him in battle. Beneath the tablet to the Dutch navy, and between the medals, is the inscription, "Dort, A.D., 1618-19," commemorating the Synod of Dort, at which the creed of the Dutch Church was established as it now exists. This Synod was convened agreeably to a call of the States General, in the city of Dort, November 13th, A.D., 1618. It consisted of eighty-six members, ministers, ruling elders, and professors delegated from the Belgic Churches, and representatives from other Reformed Churches. Among these were five from Great Britain—George Carleton, Bishop of Llandaff; Joseph Hall, Dean of Worcester, and afterwards Bishop successively of Exeter and Norwich, and author of the delightful "Contemplations;" John Davenant, Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury; Samuel Ward, Archdeacon of Taunton, and Theological Professor in the University of Cambridge; and Walter Balcanquhall, of Scotland. The "apostolic succession" of these good men who could spend pleasant and profitable months deliberating, praying, and preaching with Presbyterian bishops and elders, has been somewhat broken upon, it is to be feared. The Anglican Church of that day was certainly more catholic than now.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

A tablet in white beneath commemorates the establishment of the Dutch Church in America, and reads as follows: "New Netherlands," the Dutch name of New York; "Michaëlius, A.D., 1628," the first Dutch minister and missionary; "Classis of Amsterdam," the Dutch Classis or Presbytery that sent out the first missionaries; and finally, the sentence, "Puritan Fathers, Delfhaven, 1620," showing the connection of the Dutch Church with the American Puritans by this reference to the port from which the Mayflower sailed with the first pilgrim settlers of New England.

GERMANY'S COLUMN.

The shield at the top is in black and red, with a white bar diagonally across the centre, the colors of Germany and Switzerland, the countries from which the German Reformed Church received its chief strength. On the upper part of the shield is a scroll, inscribed, HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, PALATINATE, A.D., 1563. The Palatinate was the province of Germany, in whose capital city, Heidelberg, the creed of the German Reformed Church was established. On the shield below this scroll is a plain seal, inscribed, Freie Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands—"Free Evangelical Church of Germany." Across the centre is the single word, "Presbyterium." This is the Presbyterian Seal of the Church whose name is represented on the legend—one of the Churches of the Alliance. Underneath the shield is a large tablet to Frederick III., the Elector Palatine, under whose auspices the Heidelberg Catechism was prepared. It is inscribed as follows: "Frederick III., the Pious Elector Palatine;" "Catechism Proclaimed, A.D., 1563;" "Defence at Augsburg, A.D., 1566." These inscriptions fill the arms and central part of the tablet, and beneath them is the sentence, Herr, Nach Deinem Wille,—"According to Thy Will, O Lord,"—which was Frederick's favorite motto.

Beneath the arms of the tablet are respectively the names, "Cassimir" and "Frederick IV." A ribband which winds underneath these names bears the dying words of Frederick III.: "Lutz, Wirds Nicht Thun, Mein Fritz Wirds Thun," meaning "Louis will not do; my Fritz will do." These words proved prophetic, for Lutz, or Louis, attempted to destroy his father's work, but dying shortly, the regency fell into the hands of John Cassimir, who held it until Frederick, the son of Louis, or "Fritz," Frederick's grandson, came to the throne, by whom the work of the Pious Elector was re-established and perfected. Next follows a tablet in crimson, upon which, in gold letters, are names and dates connected with the establishment of the Dutch Church as follows: "Melancthon," the great theologian, the friend and associate of Luther, whose theology, departing from that of Luther in the matter of the Lord's Supper, moulded the opinions of the Reformed Germans. Also, "Ursinus" and "Olevianus," the authors of the Heidelberg Catechism; "Boquin," an eminent divine; "Dathenus," who wrote the Dutch Psalms; "Termilio," the Italian theologian; "Presbyterian, Established A.D., 1570," commemorating the establishment of Presbyterian Government in the Palatinate. "Bavaria—A.D., 1803—Baden," commemorates the division of the Palatinate between Bavaria and Baden. "United Catechism, A.D., 1855," commemorates the modification of the Heidelberg Catechism to suit the union of the Reformed Germans with the Lutherans of the Province as it now is constituted.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

Beneath this tablet is a large circular figure, the seal of the German Reformed Synod of America. A clergyman on one side and an American Indian with his bow and feathers on the other, are represented as holding open a copy of the Holy Scriptures which rests upon an ark or desk. Above the Bible, in gold, is a triangle laid in the centre of a sun, emblem of the Holy Trinity. Beneath the ark is the Latin legend, the motto of the Church, Pro Deo et Ecclesia—"For God and the Church." The legend surrounding the figure reads, "Synod of the Reformed Church in the U.S." Beneath this is a tablet in white to the early missionaries in America, inscribed, "Michael Schlatter, St. Gall, Switzerland," "Weiss," "Bechtel," "Boehm," "First Coetus," "Philadelphia, September 29, 1747," "Relations with Holland Dissolved, A.D., 1792." The German Reformed Church, like the Dutch Reformed, was established among the German settlers of America under the auspices and by the support of the great classis of Amsterdam. "Coetus" is the term by which the Synod was then known. One of the happy results of the late Council, at least in America, has been to draw more closely the cords of sympathy between the Anglo-Saxon and the German branches of the Presbyterian Family.*

GENEVA'S COLUMN.

In the first interspace over the north gallery is a shield corresponding with the shields of the columns, upon which is the seal of the Ancient Company of Pastors of Geneva. It is a flamboyant star or radiant sun, in the centre of which is a gold oval, bearing the initials, J. H. S.—"Jesus Hominum Salvator." On the scroll surrounding it is the inscription, Vence Compagnie des Pasteurs de Genevee—"Ancient Company of Pastors of Geneva." This for 600 years before the Reformation was the emblem of the monks in Geneva.

ITALY'S COLUMN.

The large shield on the top of the Italian column bears the seal of the Vaudois, or Waldensian Church, in the centre of the Italian coat-of-arms. This seal represents a candle and candle-stick surrounded by seven golden stars, and on the scroll the motto, Lux Lucet in Tenebris—"The Light Shineth in the Darkness." This motto accurately represents the historic character and position of the Waldensian Church, which existed from the earliest times in the mountains of the Cottian Alps, particularly in Piedmont. In commemoration of this fact there is a large tablet beneath the shield. Next in order, however, is a white band quite across the column, which bears the names, VAUDOIS, WALDENSES.

Below this is a circular tablet, with arms on either side, which is thus inscribed and figured: "Apostolic Heritors of an Apostolic Faith and Church." Churches of the Reformed are not apt to lay much stress upon an "apostolic succession," as the phrase goes in current speech. They rather emphasize the apostolic spirit, life,

*The facts concerning the planting of the Reformed Church of the Palatinate have been well brought out by the "Reformed Church Publication Board" in Philadelphia, in several volumes, among which I acknowledge obligations to "The Ter-centenary Monument of the Heidelberg Catechism," Russell's "Creed and Customs," and "Schlatter's Life and Travels," by Harbaugh.

and doctrine. Yet they have far better historic grounds upon which to set up claims for direct ecclesiastical descent from the primitive ages of Christianity than some who deem themselves specially favored in that way. In the very land of the Papacy, Italy, we may point to a Presbyterian folk who are the "Apostolic Heritors of an Apostolic Faith and Church"—the Vaudois. They have existed from primitive times in the valleys of the Cottian Alps, of Dauphiny, Provence, and Piedmont. The long independence of the diocese of Milan, to which the Vaudois belonged, is a well-known fact of history. Ambrose (of that, see A.D., 374-397), in the fourth century, maintained a doctrine which we would call Protestant. The development of the Papal heresies was estopped against this independent diocese up to the times of the Evangelical Claude of Turin in the ninth century, and even to the twelfth century, when all the priests of upper Italy were free from the yoke of the celibate. Apostolic Christianity found its last ramparts in the Alpine valleys. Rome gradually separated from the Apostles; the Alpine Presbyters maintained the primitive religion. Thus through all those dark ages their Church was true to their motto and symbol.

In the centre of the circle, upon a crimson field, is a lily springing up from a bed of thorns. Underneath it is the Latin word Emergo—"I struggle through." This is a favorite symbol of the Waldensian Church, as well as of the Church of Holland. The tablet also bears the name, "Waldo, A.D., 1170," and commemorates the Waldensian merchant, Waldo, or Valdo, who was very active in the twelfth century in spreading evangelical doctrine. Beneath the tablet, upon a scarlet field, are the names, "Barbas," "Regidor," "Coadjutor," "Colporteur Vaudois." They mark these facts: The early pastors of the Vaudois were called "Barbas," a title of respect in the Vaudois idiom, literally signifying "an uncle." The name afterwards was turned into a term of reproach, their enemies calling the Waldensians Les Barbets. Every pastor in turn was a missionary. The missionaries went forth two and two; one, an old man, was called Regidor, the rector, and the other, a young man, called Coadjutor, the helper. After the birth of printing, in the Reformation days, and up to the present time, a favorite mode of evangelization with the Vaudois is by colporteurs or booksellers. Whittier, in his beautiful poem, "The Waldensian Teacher," has celebrated this phase of Waldensian missionary life.

The following sentences commemorate important periods in the Waldensian history: "Rochemanant, A.D., 1437, Toumpi de Sagnet." Rochemanant was a point in the Alpine passes at which a handful of Vaudois achieved a notable victory; as is also the other name, "Toumpi de Sagnet, which means Sagnet's Hole. Sagnet de Planghere was the name of the commander of the enemies of the Vaudois, and the chasm in which he lost his life was so called, and is so called still.

The next inscription is, "Romance, M.S. Bible, Vaudois Bible, 1535." The Vaudois from the earliest date had in the Romance language manuscript copies of Holy Scripture handed down from time immemorial. At the period of the Reformation, at an immense cost to these poor people, a translation of the Bible was made into French by Olivetan, and was the first complete translation of the Bible into the French language.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

The next sentence is, "Janavel, Jahier, 1655." "Piedmontese Easter." Janavel was one of the most noted of the Vaudois leaders. Jahier was one of his associate captains. These two men with a mere handful of Vaudois held the upper mountains of the Alps against the combined armies of Savoy and France, commanded by the Marquis of Pianesse. Their defence, which has passed into history as the "War of the Outlaws," presents a series of exploits whose gallantry and success have made them one of the marvels and anomalies of military deeds. The most extravagant writers of romance would hardly venture to ascribe to their heroes such actions as beyond all question were wrought again and again by these men. "Piedmontese Easter" commemorates the terrible massacre by the Roman soldiers and volunteers, whose horrors excited the sympathy and awakened the execrations of universal Christendom. After the Edict of Nantes and the French Dragonnades the Waldenses were visited by another persecution, which swept their valleys with fire and sword, and scattered many thousands of them among various nations, principally Switzerland and Germany. This event is commemorated in the sentence, "Expulsion, Exile, 1686—7." Beneath this is a device commemorating "The Glorious Return"—La Glorieuse Retour—of the exiled Vaudois to their native Alpine homes under Arnaud, one of their pastors. In the centre of the tablet is a white shield with two young pine trees wreathed along the margins, and within the wreath the inscriptions, "Henry Arnaud," "La Balsille, A.D., 1689." This glorious return is another of the noteworthy military achievements of this people. It repeated the exploits of the War of the Outlaws under Janavel, and is indeed even more famous than they. The venerable chief, Janavel, who was too feeble to accompany the expedition, prepared the plan of operations, and gave written instructions. Escaping through the Swiss lines, and crossing Lake Geneva, a band of several hundred men mounted the Alps, penetrated the ranks of opposing troops, and won and held for themselves a home amid their native valleys in the face of great armies of disciplined troops, the united forces of Louis XIV., of France, and Victor Amadeus II., of Savoy, commanded by the best generals of the age. These troops were again and again defeated by Arnaud and his men. "La Balsille" was one of the Alpine passes or strongholds at which a famous victory was gained. The Duke of Savoy at last found it to his interest to seek peace, and ask the military aid of his Vaudois subjects; this they cheerfully gave, and sent a regiment to the field.

On either side of the shields is an accurate imitation of the historic flag of this Vaudois regiment. It is a white field, interspersed with blue stars, and bearing the motto, Patientia Laesa Fit Furor—"Patience abused turns to wrath."

Beneath is a tablet, or scarlet and blue field, upon which are dates commemorating important events in the history of the Vaudois, as follows: "Consistorial Organization, Napoleon, A.D., 1805." "Felix Neff, A.D., 1824, Gen. Beckwith." These two gentlemen were friends of the modern Vaudois, and very active in calling the attention of European Christians to their wants, establishing schools, hospitals, etc., amongst them. "Edict of Emancipation, Charles Albert, A.D., 1848." This was the period at which the Vaudois became citizens of Italy, fully enfranchised, with all rights, civil and religious, amid the rejoicings of their countrymen, which were participated in even by many of their Roman Catholic neighbors and friends.

Beneath this tablet is the following quotation from Milton's famous sonnet upon the Waldensians :—

"Thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,—
Even they who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones."

FRANCE'S COLUMN.

The top of the French column is a large shield, with a blue field, covered with golden fleur de lis (lilies), the floral emblem of France. In the centre is the seal of the Reformed Church of France. The design is a burning bush, somewhat resembling that of Scotland, with the name, in Hebrew characters, of Jehovah, across the flame. The motto is, Flagror non Consumor—"I am burned, but not consumed." The legend on the scroll is, S Synodi Ecclesie in Gallia Reformatæ—"Seal of the Synod of the Reformed Church in Gall" (France). A large band below the shield bears the name, HUGUENOTS, the historic title of the Presbyterians of France. Beneath this, in a large branched circle, is the name of "Coligni," divided by a shield bearing his coat-of-arms, which is a single eagle in silver. Coligni was the famous Admiral of France, who so successfully and frequently led the armies of the Huguenots, and who perished at the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The St. Bartholomew massacre, that unparalleled scene of perfidy and blood-shed, commenced at Paris, August 24th., 1572, and thence swept over the chief parts of France. The Huguenot nobles had assembled in large numbers at the metropolis to attend the festivities upon the marriage of Prince Henry, of Navarre (afterwards Henry IV.), and Margaret, of Valois, daughter of Catharine de Medici, and sister of the king. King Charles IX., instigated by his mother, gave the order for the massacre. The Huguenots, caressed and lulled asleep by royal oaths, were taken unawares and inhumanly butchered, with a view to their entire extirpation. Sully estimated that 70,000 were massacred in eight days. The Pope signified his joy and approbation by appointing a day of jubilee, causing frescoes of the horrible scenes to be painted in the Cistine Chapel, and by striking a commemorative medal.

Beneath this is a small tablet, bearing the name, "Ivry," the scene of the Huguenot victory, which has been so beautifully sung by Macaulay. A cruciform tablet underneath bears the sentences: "Seventy Thousand Huguenot Martyrs," "St. Bartholomew's Day, A.D., 1572," "Five Hundred Thousand Exiles, A.D., 1685." A golden crown is above, and a crown of laurel beneath the sentences. 1685 was the period of the Dragonnades, when Louis XIV. revoked the Edict of Nantes, and banished great multitudes of his Protestant subjects, many of whom came to this country. The tablet beneath this bears, on a blue field, the following names: "Lefevre," "Berquin," "Calvin," "Olivetan," "Margaret of Valois." The last was the sister of Francis I., a warm Protestant herself. "Clement Marot," the author of the Huguenot Psalms; "Jeanne D'Albert, Queen of Navarre," the mother of Henry IV.; "Prince of Conde;" "Theodore de Beze;" "Palissy, the Potter."

Upon a crimson tablet beneath is written, "Synod Re-assembled, A.D., 1872," marking the meeting of the Reformed Synod under Government sanction after two centuries of suppression.

SWITZERLAND'S COLUMN.

The next column is dedicated to Switzerland, one of the great centres of the Reformation. The large shield above has a scarlet field, the colors of Switzerland, in the centre of which, in a large circle, is the seal of the Reformed Church of Geneva. The device is a shield, bearing in its quarterings on one side a golden key, and on the other, a crowned single eagle, in blue, on a gold field. Above is a radiant sun, in the centre of which is the monogram, "J. H. S."—Jesus Hominum Salvator—"Jesus, the Saviour of Men." Above is the motto, Post Tenebras Lux—"After darkness, light!" A wreath of oak and olive is below the arms. This is both the cantonal and ecclesiastical symbol of Geneva.

Underneath the shield is a large, branched, circular tablet inscribed to CALVIN, the great theologian of the Reformed Churches. The circle bears his seal, which is a hand holding a heart. This device is worked in gold, upon a scarlet field. Above it is the motto, Meum Tibi Offero, Domine—"I offer my heart to Thee, O God." Beneath it is another motto of Calvin's, Prompte et Sincere—"Promptly and earnestly."

Beneath this is a tablet to ZWINGLI, the great Reformer of Zurich. It bears his coat-of-arms, which is a shield in black and gold, in the centre of which is a broad ring; his name is written on either side. Pendent to this on the tablet beneath is a large oval, which bears the seal of the Church of Zurich. The device is a pulpit supporting an open Bible. At the base of the pulpit is a shield in blue and silver, without any heraldic device, the coat-of-arms of the Canton of Zurich. The scroll surrounding the device reads: Kirchenrath des Canton Zurich—"The Presbytery of the Canton of Zurich." Arranged on each side of the shield are the following names: "Farel," "Olivetian," "Ritter," "Ecolampadius," "Haller," "Viret," all of them eminent Swiss Reformers. A tablet below bears the names of a number of distinguished Swiss theologians, in the centre of which is the name, "Knox," as John Knox was once a pastor at Geneva. The names are as follows: "Pictet," "Turretin," "Lavater," "Buxtorf," "Knox," "Wettstein," "Osterwald," "D'Aubigne," "Mustin," "Ruchat."

HUNGARY'S COLUMN.

The next column is dedicated to Hungary. The large shield atop bears the arms of Hungary, and in the centre is the large circular seal of the Reformed Church of the Superintendency of Debreczen. The device upon the shield represents our Lord's baptism. The Saviour is represented as standing in the stream, while the Baptist, kneeling upon the bank above, baptizes him by profusion. On the opposite side is the Agnus Dei, and just above, upon the bank, a clump of trees, behind which, in the distance, is a lion in retreat, representing the fleeing of Satan from the presence of the Lord. A dove from above descends upon the person of our Saviour. The scroll bears the words, A Helv Hittv Tiszanturli Egyházkerület Pecsete—"The Seal of the Helvetic Confession, Superintendency beyond the (river) Tisza."

Upon a large, square, branched tablet beneath is the seal of the Reformed College of Debreczen. The device is an ancient one, being a closed Bible, upon the back of which is inscribed, in Hebrew characters, the name, "Jehovah." A hand holding a pen is represented as writing the characters upon the book. The motto arranged above and beneath is, Orando et Laborando—"By praying and working." On either side of this tablet are the names, "Matthias Devay," the great Reformer of Hungary, and "Steven Szegedin," the great theologian. A tablet beneath bears the names of distinguished divines and magnates who were historic in the Reformation days. The names are as follows: "Grynaeus," "De Kalmance," "Count Nadasday," "Count Perenyi," "Count Peter Petrovich."

The next inscription commemorates the issue of the first Hungarian New Testament translated by John Sylvestre. That which follows marks an important example of the covenanting scenes so characteristic of the Reformation in Scotland, which occurred at the fortress and town of Erlau, belonging to the Perenyi family. "Sylvestre, Hungarian New Testament, A.D., 1671," "Covenant of Erlau, A.D., 1562." Hungary in the Reformation days was almost entirely Protestant. At one time all the magnates of the empire, except three families, were devoted Reformers. The Protestant Church is now quite numerous, numbering at least one million of Lutherans and two millions of Presbyterians.

A tablet beneath bears the following inscriptions:—"Helvetic Confession, Ezenger, A.D., 1558." The Helvetic Confession is the creed or confession held by the Hungarians. The following dates also appear: "Peace of Vienna, A.D., 1606," "Peace of Linz, A.D., 1645," "Edict of Toleration, October 27, 1781." The Peace of Vienna arrested the persecutions of Emperor Rudolph II., who was compelled by the Botskay insurrection and the threatening Turks to conciliate his Protestant subjects by setting aside the decrees enacted against them, and granting them liberty of conscience. Ferdinand III., instigated by the Roman hierarchy, renewed the outrages of Rudolph, and was opposed by Prince Rakotzy, supported by France and Sweden. The issue was the Peace of Linz, the second pillar of the rights and freedom of the Protestant Church in Hungary. Complete religious liberty was thus secured. With characteristic disregard of faith, these treaties were continually broken during the next century, until the Hungarian Church had been brought to the very verge of ruin. No opportunity of crushing the Protestants had been passed by, until their Church was reduced to a state of abject slavery, receiving fewer privileges than were accorded to the Israelites. A deliverer arose in Emperor Joseph II., who issued the Edict of Toleration, and restored many of the privileges of Protestants. But the spirit of Papacy survived, and during the present century many bitter trials fell to the Hungarian Protestants. Those which preceded and followed the revolution of 1848 are well-known among us through the appeals of Governor Kossuth. To-day under the Austro-Hungarian Empire the Church enjoys great freedom.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

COLUMN OF BOHEMIA AND MORAVIA.

The next column is that of Bohemia and Moravia. The top shield bears the coat-of-arms, on one side, of Bohemia; on the other, that of Moravia. The Bohemian coat is a rampant lion, in silver, upon a scarlet field; the Moravian, an eagle, checkered scarlet and silver, on a blue field. In the centre is an oval, bearing the seal of the Church of Bohemia, which is a cup standing upon a Bible, and a palm branch laid at the foot. The legend is, Ev Ref Kolinske Pecet Cirkve—"Seal of the Evangelical Reformed Church of Kolinske." The motto is the now familiar: Veritas Omnia Vincet—Truth conquers all things! The seal from which the copy was made was that of a local congregation, the only one to be obtained at the time. A band beneath bears the name, "Hussites," and underneath this is a favorite device of the Bohemian people. It represents a dove fleeing before a thunder storm, out of which a lightning bolt falls, to the shadows of a rock, into whose recesses the dove seeks refuge. The motto above is, Hac ab Hoste Tuta Post Te—"Hither safe from the enemy pursuing." In Bohemian characters upon the base of the rock is inscribed the text, "And that rock was Christ." On a broad, blue band beneath is the name, TABORITES, the title given to the Reformed party among the Bohemians, so called from Mount Tabor, a rocky fortress at which they established their headquarters. Beneath this is a tablet to "Jerome of Prague." Underneath this is the inscription, "General John Zisca, the Invincible, A.D., 1360-1424. Wagenburg." Beneath these are crossed two ecclesiastical flags of Bohemia. One is made of white bunting, bearing a scarlet silken cup; the other of scarlet bunting, bearing a yellow cup. Zisca was the blind general who won every battle in which he was engaged, and who for years successfully opposed the forces of Sigismund, who sought to destroy the liberties and religion of Bohemia. The name, Wagenburg, or wagon-fort, indicates a favorite mode of defence with Zisca, viz.: to construct breastworks for his troops of the army baggage wagons. A large, red tablet underneath bears the following inscription: "Johannes Hus, born, A.D., 1373, Exustus non Convictus, July 6th, A.D., 1415." The Latin quotation is the remark of Erasmus upon John Huss's conviction—"Burnt, but not Convicted."

SPAIN'S COLUMN.

The large shield over the gallery on the north side was appropriated to Spain. It bears the coat-of-arms of the Spanish kingdom, and upon it the seal of the Spanish Reformed Church, which is precisely that of the Church of Scotland—the burning bush, and the motto, Nec Tamen Consumeatur. The legend is, Comission Permanente Iglesia Cristiana Espanola—"Permanent Commission of the Christian Church of Spain."

PROSCENIUM DECORATIONS.

On the proscenium end of the hall, on the north side, is a very large frame (eight and one-half feet high, by seven and one-half feet wide), bearing the seal of the Westminster General Assembly of Divines. The device is an open Bible, upon the pages of which is written, "The Word of God." A palm wreath surrounds this, and the scroll is, "Seal for Approbation of Ministers." This seal was procured from the British Museum, the copy being made from a stamped impression sent to the Committee, and is of great historic interest.

On the opposite side, in a similar space, above the stage door, is a corresponding frame, bearing the emblem of the Council. This is a golden candle-stick surrounded by a wreath above composed of the floral emblems of various nations represented in the Council, viz.: the thistle, Scotland; rose, England; shamrock, Ireland; fleur de lis, France; corn-flower, or kaiserbloom, Germany; lily and thorns, Holland; bunch of berries, Hungary; leek, Wales; palm, Bohemia; maple tri-foil, Canada; pine leaves and cone, America.*

Beneath the wreath is the motto, Lampades Multæ, Una Lux—"The lamps are many, but the light is one." On the scroll the inscription is, "General Council of Churches holding the Presbyterian System.†

In the centre of the proscenium are two frames. The upper one is the seal of the Presbyterian Church of America. The device is a serpent (in gold) upon a pole, referring to the brazen serpent upheld in the wilderness camp of Israel. Above this is a wreath of the floral emblems of all nations, signifying the fact that the Presbyterian Church in America has been composed of members from all the Reformed Churches of Europe. The motto beneath the serpent is, Christus Levatus, Salvator—"Christ uplifted, the Saviour."‡ A ribbon beneath bears the motto, Vox Clamantis in Deserto,—"A voice crying in the wilderness,"—which signifies the position of the Presbyterian Church as a missionary Church in the unsettled wilderness of America.§ Beneath this, in an oval frame, is the coat-of-arms of the City of Philadelphia, with her motto, Philadelphia Maneto, the Greek original of the command, "Let brotherly love continue."

From the sides of the proscenium, streamers of bunting in white, blue, orange, and scarlet, bear, in the following order, the following mottoes:—

1. "We being many are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." Rom. xii. 5.

2. "He called the ELDERS * * * and said, * * * Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you OVERSEERS." The quotation is from Paul's address to the Elders of Ephesus. The words, "Elders" (Presbiterous in the Greek), and "Overseers" (Episcopous in Greek), are in red letters, to emphasize the fact that Presbyters and Bishops are in Scripture one order.

* This list cannot claim to be entirely accurate, and is open to correction. Much pains, however, was taken to make it correct, and the writer would be gratified if these floral emblems could be authoritatively determined.

† This emblem cannot be called a "seal," nor be received as the authorized emblem of the Alliance. The Committee found the "lamp" in use, by consent of some of the officers of the last Council, and made it the central point of the above device, for which, thus far, they alone are responsible.

‡ The wreath and motto are additions of the Committee. The seal of the American Church is simply the serpent as here shown, and the legend around it is, "Trustees General Assembly Presbyterian Church."

§ This motto was used at the Ter-centenary Celebration in 1872, and has since been a favorite motto, as it happily expresses our Home Missionary history and character.

HISTORIC DECORATIONS.

3. The next streamer bears two quotations from the Westminster Confession, as follows: "There is no other head of the Church but the Lord Jesus Christ." "God alone is Lord of the conscience."

4. The final streamer reads: "Built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone."

The streamers stretch from the sides of the proscenium to the central seals.
